King William perceiuing his people thus diſcomfited, and himſelfe incloſed on ech ſide amongſt his enimies, after he had aſſaied to breake forth on ſome ſide from amongſt them, when he ſaw his indeuour could by no meanes preuaile, and that the enimies made onelie at him, he yéelded himſelfe. There was not much bloud ſpilled on either ſide at this bickering, for the one part in the beginning of the fraie (as ye haue heard) fleeing of ſet purpoſe to the place where their ambuſh laie, eſcaped without much hurt; and the other, ſcared by the breaking forth of the ambuſh, abode the brunt but a ſmall while, returning immediatlie towards the king; and then perceiuing they could do no good, they made the beſt ſhift they could ech man for himſelfe, to eſcape the enimies hands. The king being thus taken of his enimies, was conueied to king Henrie ouer into Normandie, where he was as then remaining. The yéere that king William was thus taken, was after the birth of our Sauiour Chriſt 1174, and the ninth of king Williams reigne.

At length king William wearied with long tarieng thus at Anwike, and ſeeing no enimies to appeere, determined to worke ſome exploit yet before his returne, and therevpon ſent forth the moſt part of all his armie abroad into the countrie, to forreie the ſame, keeping no great companie about him, till the returne of the other thus ſent forth. Wherevpon incontinentlie a great ambuſhment of Engliſhmen came vpon him with counterfeited Scotiſh enſignes, and were not once ſuſpected for Engliſhmen, till the king was compaſſed in by them on ech ſide, and ſo finallie taken and led awaie yer anie Scotiſhman wiſt thereof, ſaue a few which were left (as is ſaid) with him for the time. In deed Wilhelmus Paruus, a canon ſometime in the abbeie of Bridlington in Yorkeſhire, in that his booke which he writes of the Norman kings of England, affirmes how there were not manie more than about three ſcore horſſemen with king William, while he was thus taken; and that the Engliſhmen were not paſt foure hundred horſſemen, which toke vpon them that enterpriſe; whoſe capteins (as he reciteth) were theſe: Robert de Stuteuill, Ranulfe de Glanuill, Bernard de Ballioll, and diuerſe other.

The ſame author writeth, that after the taking of the king, there roſe a mutinie amongſt the Scots: for whereas the Iriſh Scots bare a naturall grudge againſt the Engliſh Scots, yet whileſt the king was preſent amongſt them, they durſt not vtter their malicious intentions: but now that he was thus taken from them, ſo manie of the Engliſh Scots as fell into the hands of the Iriſh, paid derelie for the bargaine, being cruellie murthered and ſlaine: ſo that the reſidue were conſtreined to get them out of the waie into caſtels and towers, where they might be receiued. But now it is to be conſidered, that bicauſe there was no great ſlaughter made at the taking of king William, the warres notwithſtanding continued betwixt England and Scotland: for the two before ſpecified chiefteins Gilcriſt and Rowland ſtoutlie withſtood the Engliſhmen, and beat them backe as they enterpriſed to enter into Cumberland. At length a peace was taken, during the time that king William remained in captiuitie; vnder theſe conditions, that Northumberland ſhould continue vnder the dominion of the Engliſhmen, and Cumberland (with the earledome of Huntington) to remaine (as before) vnder the gouernance of the Scotiſhmen.

Immediatlie vpon the taking of king William thus at Anwike, his brother Dauid earle of Huntington, thorough licence of king Henrie came into Scotland, to haue the gouernement of the realme, till the king his brother might be redeemed. So ſone therefore as he had once eſtabliſhed the realme in good quiet and iuſtice, he ſent Richard the biſhop of ſaint Andrewes, with diuerſe other noble men, ouer into Normandie, to take order there with K. Henrie for the ranſome of the king his brother, which was agreed in this manner. Firſt, it was accorded, that king William ſhould become and acknowledge himſelfe to be the king of Englands liege man, againſt all men for the realme of Scotland and his other lands; and for the ſame ſhould doo fealtie to the ſaid king of England, as to his liege ſouereigne lord, in like ſort as other his liege people were accuſtomed to doo. And further, he ſhould alſo doo fealtie vnto the lord Henrie, the king of Englands ſonne, (ſauing alwaies the faith which he owght the king his father.) And in like manner it was couenanted and agreed, that all the prelats of Scotland, and their ſucceſſors, ſhould recogniſe their wonted ſubiection to the church of England, and doo fealtie to the king of England, ſo manie of them as he ſhould appoint. And likewiſe the earle and barons of Scotland, and their heires for their part, ſhould doo their homage and fealties vnto the ſaid king of England, and to the lord Henrie his ſonne, ſo manie as therevnto ſhould be required.

Moreouer, the king of Scots ſhould paie for his redemption one hundred thouſand pounds ſterling, the one halfe to be paid in hand: and for ſure paiment of the other halfe, the earledomes of Cumberland, Huntington, and Northumberland ſhould be deliuered vnto king Henrie in pledge or mortgage, till the time that the ſame ſumme was paid. And for the more ſuertie of theſe couenants, and that the Scots ſhould moue no warre againſt the Engliſhmen, foure of the ſtrongeſt caſtels within Scotland, that is to ſaie, Berwike, Edenburgh, Rorburgh, & Striueling, were deliuered into the Engliſhmens hands. Theſe things being thus ordered the eight day of December 1175, & the king reſtored home, there followed a new ſtirre in Scotland, for Gilbert of Galloway, a right cruell and moſt miſchiefous perſon, purpoſing to conquer the crowne by force, made great ſlaughter of all them that withſtood his deſire. And becauſe his brother reproued his doings, he put out his eies, and cut off his hands. Againſt this Gilbert was Gilcriſt ſent with an armie by the king. There was fought a ſore battell betwixt them, for the moſt part of thoſe that followed Gilberts commandement, were deſperat fellowes, ſuch commonlie as for murder and other heinous crimes by them committed were in danger of the lawes, and therefore vpon hope of pardon deſired a change; but yet in the end, Gilcriſt with multitude wan the field of them, and ſlue more in the chaſe than in the battell. Gilbert himſelfe eſcaped and got ouer into the Ile of Man, and fled from thence into Ireland. Wilhelmus Paruus reporteth this matter ſomewhat otherwiſe, as thus: In the armie of king William (ſaith he) when he was taken nere vnto Anwike, were two brethren, Gilbert and Hared, that were lords of Galloway, hauing there with them a great retinue of their countriemen. Theſe were the ſonnes of Fergulius, ſometime lord of that prouince; after whoſe deceaſſe the king of Scots that is ſuperiour lord thereof, diuided the countrie betwixt theſe two brethren. But Gilbert the eldeſt brother found himſelfe much grieued to haue anie part of thoſe lands (which were his fathers) giuen from him; yet doubting puniſhment at the kings hands, he durſt not attempt anie thing againſt his brother, till it fortuned the king to be taken. And then deliuered of the feare which had ſtaied his miſchiefous purpoſe, he taketh his brother at vnwares, and cruellie murdered him, after no common maner; but rather martyred him in beaſtlie wiſe, ſo to ſatiſfie the inſtinct of his diueliſh nature. And immediatlie after inuading the vpper countries, he exerciſeth great ſlaughter of men on each hand. But his brother had a ſonne called Rowland, which proouing a valiant young gentleman, boldlie reſiſted his vncles rage, with the aſſiſtance and aid of his fathers friends. And thus was Scotland brought into trouble (as Wilhelmus Paruus recordeth) till by the foreſaid Gilcriſt the murderer was expelled, as before is expreſſed. In the yeare following came Hugo cardinall of ſaint Angelo as legat from the pope into England, with authoritie to reforme the Engliſh churches, in ſuch caſes as were thought requiſit; and after he had made an end there, to doo the like in Scotland.

They came according to his appointment, and being aſſembled there in conſiſtorie, he went about in moſt earneſt wiſe to perſuade them to receiue the archbiſhop of Yorke for their metropolitane. But one Gilbert a yoong man, howbeit ſigularlie well learned, and for his holineſſe of life much commended (as Hector Boetius writeth) being ſent of purpoſe by king William vnto this conuocation, to foreſee that nothing were concluded in the ſame, prætudiciall to the ancient liberties and franchiſes of the realme of Scotland, did argue ſo ſtifflie to the contrarie, that the cardinall left off the purſute of ſuch maner of matter, and brake vp that councell without determination of anie thing to the purpoſe in that behalfe.

This Gilbert that thus defended the cauſe and liberties of the Scotiſh clergie, was afterwards made biſhop of Cathnes, and finallie after his departure out of this tranſitorie life, regiſtred for his ſuppoſed perfect holineſſe of life among the number of ſaints. The chiefeſt cauſe that moued the Scotiſh cleargie to withdraw their obedience from the primaſie of Yorke, was the diſſention and continuall enimitie betwixt the two nations for ſuperioritie in temporall cauſes. The ſame yeare that this councell was holden at Northampton, ſundrie vnketh wonders were ſéene in Albion. On Midſummer day being the feaſt day of the natiuitie of ſaint John the Baptiſt, there fell ſuch a ſtorme of haile, that it killed manie ſhéepe and ſmall cattell: people that were out of houſes, and from vnder couert anie where abroad, were beaten to the earth with violence of that ſtorme. The ſunne in September about nonetide was darkened for the ſpace of two houres togither, without anie eclipſe or cauſe naturall by interpoſition of clouds. In Yorkeſhire was ſuch terrible thunder with ſtrange lightening, that manie abbeies and churches were conſumed with the fire.

About this ſeaſon, the abbeie of Arbroth was built in moſt magnificent wiſe, and indowed with lands and reuenues in ſuch ample ſort, that few houſes within the bounds of Albion might compare therewith. The church was dedicated in the yeare of Grace 1178, by king William, in honor of Thomas Becket archbiſhop of Canturburie, with whome (as is ſaid) he had great familiaritie in time of his yoong yeares. At the ſame time the abbeie of Hadington was founded by Adhama the mother of king William, and ſhortlie after ſhe had built it, ſhe died. Not long after, king William ſent as ambaſſadors John biſhop of ſaint Andrews, and Reignald abbat of Arbroth vnto pope Alexander the third, to preſent vnto him his obeiſance, according as he thought ſtood with his duetie. The pope ſéeming to reioiſe thereat, ſent ſhortlie after vnto the king a roſe of gold, filled with balme, and certeine new priuileges concerning the libertie of the church of Scotland. At the ſame time Gilcriſt, hauing his wife in ſuſpicion of adulterie, droue hir out of doores, and afterwards ſtrangled hir in a village called Nants, not paſt a mile from Dundée. The king (for that ſhe was his ſiſter) toke ſuch indignation therewith, that he ſeized vpon all his lands and goods, purpoſing to haue put him to death if he might haue got him into his hands: but when he ſaw he could not be found, he proclamed him traitor, and raced his caſtell (wherein he had dwelled) quite to the ground, in ſuch wiſe that vnneth remaineth anie token at this day where it ſtood. This Gilcriſt had a brother that hight Bzedus, who before this miſchance had got the lands of Ogilnie: of whome the houſe of the Ogiluies toke

About this time alſo, the quæne, king William his wife, deceaſſed. By this mariage and aliance, the peace was newlie confirmed betwixt England and Scotland, in ſuch wiſe, that neither part might receiue anie rebels to the other, by means whereof Gilcriſt, that before was fled into England, was conſtreined to returne into Scotland, diſguiſed in poore weed, with two of his ſonnes, and there paſſed forth his life a long time in great miſerie amongeſt the woods and in out places, vnknowen to anie man what he was, by reaſon of his poore and ſimple habit. Somewhat before the aboue remembred mariage, Henrie king of England at the motion of Hugh biſhop of Durham rendered vp the caſtell of Edenburgh into K. William his hands.

About this time the Souldane named Saladine proſpered hugelie againſt the chriſtians in the holie land, making ſuch cruell ſlaughter of them, that to heare thereof, all chriſtian hearts were moued to pitifull commiſeration and dolorous teares: in ſo much that Henrie king of England vowed to go thither with an armie to relieue the common neceſſitie of the chriſtian publike weale, and had gone in deed, if he had not béene hindered by the conſpiracie of his ſonne, whome latelie before he had cauſed to be crowned king, that went about to vſurpe the ſole adminiſtration to himſelfe now in his fathers life time. About the ſame time William went with an armie into Roſſe, againſt Makulzen and Makbein, two capteins of the weſterne Iles, which vſed vpon occaſion to paſſe ouer into Roſſe, Cathnes and Murrey land, ſpoiling and waſting thoſe countries; & when they heard of anie power comming againſt them, they would ſtreight returne to their ſhips, and repaſſe againe into the Iles. But at this time, the king had ſent forth a nauie to burne all thoſe veſſels, wherein the robbers had paſſed ouer and had left at anchor, by reaſon whereof when they were incloſed in on euerie ſide by the king, and taken priſoners, they after had ſuffered death on the wheéle, according to the maner of the ciuill law.

The king in his returne from this iournie, came by the abbeie of Abirbrothoke, to view the worke of that houſe, how it went forwards, commanding them that were ouerſéers and maiſters of the works to ſpare for no coſts, but to bring it vp to perfection, and that with moſt magnificence. After his departure from thence, he toke the way toward Bertha, and by aduenture eſpied where Gilcriſt was deluing vp turfes, togither with his two ſonnes. And though he knew not what they were, yet he muſed to ſée two ſuch goodlie yoong men, as by reſemblance they appeared to be, to be thus occupied in ſuch toiling and baſe labour. Incontinentlie herewith Gilcriſt with his bald head came afore him, and falling downe on his knees at the kings féet, ſaid: If there be anie mercie in thée (moſt ruthfull prince) for them that are brought through their offenſes into extreme miſerie, hauing ſuffered condigne puniſhment for the ſame; I beſéech thée for the loue that Chriſt had to all ſinfull people, not ſparing to ſhed his moſt pretious blood for their redemption, to haue ſome pitie & compaſſion on me, & theſe my poore & miſerable ſons, which with me haue ſuffered much griefe and penurie, not hauing deſerued the ſame by anie crime by them

At the laſt, when king William had inquired of him what he was, and how it chanced he fell into ſuch kind of miſerie, the teares came ſo faſt trickeling from his eies, that of a long time he was not able to declare his owne name. At length being come to himſelfe, he ſaid: I am Gilcriſt (noble prince) the moſt ſorrowfull creature on earth, which (alas) put my hands in thy blood, and was therefore diſherited of all my lands, and baniſhed with theſe my two ſonnes out of thy realme, whereupon we remained in England for a time, till through proclamation made againſt outlawes, I was conſtreined to come hither againe with my ſaid ſonnes, where we haue liued by rots all the ſummer ſeaſon, and now in the winter are glad to get our liuing with trauell of hand thus in digging and deluing of clods. Therfore if anie ruth or pitie haue place in thy heart, or that thine indignation be qualified, haue mercie on our ſorrowfull eſtate, and remit the offenſe, wherby thou maieſt not onelie purchaſe great honor and fame by example of pitie, being highlie renowmed for that vertue amongeſt all nations, but alſo win great merit afore God, for ſhewing thy ſelfe the follower of Chriſt, the giuer of all mercie, grace, and peace.

The king moued by theſe words, and remembring the good ſeruice which Gilcriſt had imploid ſo oftentimes afore in defenſe of the realme; and againe pitieng his caſe, to conſider from what degree of honor he was fallen into the deepeſt bottome of extreme miſerie, he toke him wholie to his fauour, and not onelie forgaue him his former offenſes, but alſo reſtored vnto him, and to his ſonnes, all ſuch lands as ſometimes apperteined vnto them, except ſo much as the king had alreadie giuen vnto the abbeie of Abirbrothoke. Gilcriſt euer after perſeuered in due obedience to his prince. And forſomuch as his eldeſt ſonne deceaſſed before him without heires, & that his yonger ſonne, by reaſon of ſome impediment which he had, was vnmeet for mariage, he gaue the moſt part of his lands after his owne deceaſſe vnto the ſaid houſe of Abirbrothoke. His yonger ſonne alſo, no leſſe well affectionated towards the ſame houſe, gaue the reſidue of his lands thereunto. The father and both his ſonnes are buried before the altar of S. Katharine within the church of this abbeie, as the ſuperſcription of their tombes ſheweth.

Though king William was earneſtlie occupied in the aduancing forward of the building of Abirbrothoke, yet did he not forget his dutie in the adminiſtration of his lawes; but diligentlie cauſed iuſtice to be executed, to the puniſhing of the wicked, and the rewarding of them that well deſerued. He made alſo ſundrie new lawes for the reſtreining of theeues and oppreſſors of the people, ſo rigorous, that they might be in feare to heare him named. Furthermore, where as the church of Scotland was ſubiect to the church of Yorke, he obteined of pope Clement the third of that name, letters of exemption for his clergie, whereby the church of Scotland (within the which were conteined the biſhops ſees of ſaint Andrews, Glaſco, Dunkeld, Dublaine, Brighne, Aberden, Murrey, Roſſe, and Cathneſſe) was declared exempt from all other forrein iuriſdictions, except onelie from that of the ſee of Rome, ſo as it might not be lawfull from thenceforth for any that was not of the realme of Scotland, to pronounce ſentence of interdiction or excommunication, or otherwiſe to deale in iudgement of eccleſiaſticall cauſes, except ſuch one as the apoſtolike ſee of Rome ſhould ſpecialle appoint, and ſend thither with legantine power. The date of the ſaid bull or letters of exemption thus obteined was at the popes palace of Laterane, the third Ides of March, and firſt yeere of the ſaid pope Clements gouernment. K. Richard.

King Richard, after his coronation, prepared himſelfe to paſſe with an armie into the holie land, and therefore made peace with all his neighbors, that no trouble ſhould follow to his realme by reaſon of his abſence: and hereupon to keepe the Scots in friendſhip, rather by beneuolence than by feare, he rendred into their hands the caſtels of Rorburgh, Berwike, and Sterling: and moreouer that part of Northumberland which his father had taken from king William when he toke him priſoner. He alſo deliuered the earledomes of Huntington & Cumberland; but vnder condition, that all the caſtels and holds within them, ſhould be in the keeping of his capteins and ſouldiors, ſuch as he ſhould appoint. He releaſed to king William alſo the reſidue of ſuch ſummes of monie as were due for the foure caſtels laid to gage, ten thouſand pounds onelie excepted, which he receiued in hand at that preſent towards the charges of his iournie. When king William had thus receiued his lands and caſtels by ſurrender, he made his brother Dauid earle of Huntington, who thereupon doing his homage vnto king Richard, according to the old ordinance deuiſed by king Malcolme the firſt, went with him alſo in that voiage with fiue hundred Scotiſhmen, or rather fiue thouſand (as the tranſlator of Hector Boetius ſaith) if no fault be in the printer.

As the chriſtian armie laie at ſiege before the citie of Acres, otherwiſe called Acon, it chanced that one Oliuer a Scotiſhman borne, was within the towne reteined in ſeruice among the Saracens; for being conuict of felonie in his natiue countrie he was baniſhed out of the ſame, and fled to the Saracens, remaining ſo long amongſt them, that he had learned their tong verie perfectlie, ſo that as then few knew what countriman he was. It fortuned that this Oliuer had one of the gates in keeping, on that ſide the towne where was but a ſingle wall, without trenches, or anie other fortification. He happened by ſome good aduenture to eſpie amongſt the watch of thoſe that were of the retinue of Dauid earle of Huntington, one of his owne kinſmen named John Durward, with whom of long time before he had béene moſt familiarlie acquainted; and incontinentlie he called to the ſame Durward, deſiring vnder aſſurance to talke with him. After certeine communication, for that this Oliuer had not as yet vtterlie in his heart renounced the chriſtian faith, he appointed with Durward to giue entrie at a certeine houre vnto earle Dauid, and to all the chriſtian armie, vpon condition that earle Dauid would ſée him reſtored againe vnto his land and heritage in Scotland. The houre ſet, earle Dauid came with a great power of men to the gate before reherſed, where he was ſuffered to enter according to appointment, and incontinentlie with great noiſe and clamour brake into the midſt of the citie.

In the morning betimes, king Richard perceiuing the citie thus woone, entred the ſame, and ſhortly after wan a tower, which the Saracens for a while manfullie defended. Thus was the citie of Acres woone from the Saracens, chieflie by means of the Scotiſhmen. But now touching their returne from this voiage (for ſith in other places more large mention is made of ſuch exploits as were atchiued therein, I paſſe ouer to make anie longer diſcourſe thereof in this place) ye ſhall vnderſtand, that in that ſtreinable tempeſt, in the which king Richards nauie was diſperſed in his comming homewards (as in the the historie of England is more at large expressed) the ship also that earle Dauid was in, chanced to be throwne on land on the coasts of Aegypt, where being taken prisoner, and led into Alexandria, at length he was redéemed by certeine merchants of Uenice, and first conueied vnto Constantinople, and after vnto Uenice, where he was bought out & redéemed by the English merchants, and in the end suffered to depart home. At his comming into Flanders, hée hired a vessell at Sluis, therwith to returne into Scotland; but being losed a little off from the shore, such a vehement tempest suddenlie arose, that droue him, not without great danger of life, néere to the coasts of Norwaie and Shetland.

Earle Dauid taken prisoner

He is redéemed.

He went to Scotland.

Here in the midst of this extreame ieopardie (as hath béene reported) after he had made a vow to build a church in the honor of the virgin Marie, if he might escape that danger of seas, he arrived at length in Taie water beside Dundée, not far from saint Nicholas chappell, without either rudder or tackle. The place where he arrived before that time hight Alectum, but he as then changed the name, and called it Dundée, which signifieth as though ye should say, The gift of God. When his brother the king heard that he was returned, supposing long time before, that he had béene dead, he came spédilie vnto Dundée to welcome him home, shewing himselfe most glad of his returne, insomuch that he caused publike processions to be celebrate through the realme, to giue God thanks that had thus restored his brother home into his countrie. Earle Dauid, according as he had vowed, builded a church in the field commonlie called the wheat field, and dedicating it in honor of the virgin Marie, made it a parish church. At a parlement also holden after this at Dundée, licence was granted vnto him to build an abbie in what place it shuld please him within Scotland, and to indow it with lands and rents as hée should thinke good. There were also manie priuileges granted the same time vnto Dundée, which indure to this day.

Earle Dauid not refusing the grant and benevolence of the king his brother, builded an abbeie called Lundoris, for monks of the order of saint Benet. One thing there is much to be wondered at, as a strange singularitie. For whereas that house standeth in a vallie, inclosed on each side with wood and water, by reason whereof there is great abundance of adders; yet doth no man catch hurt by anie of them, insomuch that ye shall see yong children play and run vp and downe amongst a great number of them, without anie skath or hurt following vnto them thereof. In this meane while, Richard king of England (who also in his returne out of the holie land was taken prisoner by the emperour of Almains) was deliuered for a great summe of monie, and so returned into his countrie. King William hearing of king Richards returne into England, to congratulate the same, toke his brother earle Dauid with him, and came vnto London, where, in token of ioy, that he had vnfeinedlie conceiued for his safe comming home, after all troubles and dangers which he had passed, he gaue vnto him two thousand markes sterling, for that he knew at what great charges he had béene, aswell for furnishing of his voiage, as also for redéeming of his libertie.

The gift of king William to king Richard.

By these friendlie points of humanitie shewed, there followed great amitie and loue betwixt these two kings. But king William fell sicke in England, and as it often happeneth, such as were vnquiet persons, desirous to be deliuered of all feare of lawes, were streight way put in an vntrue beliefe, that he was dead: and causing it to be bruted abrode, began to exercise all kind of misdemeanors by inuading the poore and simple people, with spoilings and slaughters in all parts. But after it was certeinlie knowne, that the king was not onelie aliue, but also recouered of his infirmitie, and comming homewards, those raskals and wicked rebels withdrew vnder the conduct of one Herald the thane of Cathnes, and erle of Orkenie, vnto the vttermost bounds of Scotland. Howbeit the king pursued them in such diligent and earnest maner, that he apprehended the most part of them in Cathnes, and commanded iustice to be done on them, in such wise, that mercie was not yet wanting: for such as were thought to be after a sort giltlesse, were pardoned, and the other punished, euerie one according to the measure of his offenses.

But the principall leader of them, that is to say, the forenamed Herald, for that time escaped into the westerne Iles, but shortly after, returning to Cathnes, he was taken and brought to the king, who caused his eies first to be put out, then gelded, and lastlie to be hanged on a paire of gallowes. Also all those of his linage that were men, were likewise gelded, that no succession should follow of so wicked a wéed. In the yeere next insuing was more dearth felt in Scotland, than euer was heard of before: for a measure of barlie, in Scotish called a boll, was sold for fiue crownes; and yet in the yeere next following, accounting from the natiuitie of our Sauior 1199, was more plentifull abundance than euer had béene séene afore. The same yeere king Williams wife Ermengard was deliuered of a yong sonne named Alexander. The same yeere also died Richard king of England, & his brother Iohn succeeded in his place. About three yeeres after this, was the foresaid Alexander the kings sonne created prince of Scotland. And the same yeere came a legat from the pope sent to K. William, presenting vnto him a sword, with a sheath & hilts of gold set full of rich pretious stones. He presented vnto him also a hat or bonet, made in maner of a diademe of purple hue, in token (as it should meane) that he was defender of the church. Manie indulgences and priuileges were granted at the same time by the pope, for the libertie of the church of Scotland. It was ordeined also the same time, that saturdaie should be kept as holidaie from noone forward, and great punishment appointed for them that transgressed this ordinance, in doing anie bodilie worke from saturdaie at noone, vntill mondaie in the morning.

After this, king William returned againe into England to do his homage vnto king Iohn, for the lands of Cumberland, Huntington, and Northumberland. Immediatlie whereupon king Iohn willed him to passe with him into France, to make warres against the Frenchmen. And bicause he refused so to do, king Iohn made claime to all the foresaid lands as forfeited to the crowne of England, and caused a great bootie of goods to be fetched out of the same: so that open warres had immediatlie followed, if the English lords had not compelled K. Iohn to make restitution of all the goods so taken; bicause they thought it not expedient in anie wise to haue wars with the Scots at the same time, being alreadie in trouble with the Frenchmen. In the winter following, the frost was so vehement, & continued so long, that till mid March, no plough might be put into the ground. Ale was frozen in such wise within houses, and cellers, that it was sold by weight. Such a great snow fell also therewith, that beasts died in manie places in great numbers. Moreouer, from the Twelfthtide till Februarie, there was euerie day verie terrible earthquakes.

After the end of winter, king Iohn hauing made an end of his warres with France, began to build a castell a caſtell in Northumberland ouer againſt Berwike, vpon purpoſe to haue ſome quarell to fall out with the Scots. King William being aduertiſed thereof, ſent his ambaſſadors vnto king John, requiring him to deſiſt from ſuch attempts, and not to ſeeke a nie occaſion of new trouble: but forſomuch as he receiued no towardlie anſwer againe from K. John, he aſſembled a power, & comming to the caſtell which king John had cauſed to be builded, he ouerthrew the ſame, and raced it to the earth. King John ſore offended herewith, raiſed a mightie armie, and came towards Scotland, but at his comming to the borders, he found his aduerſarie king William readie to receiue him by battell, if he had come forward; howbeit through mediation of prudent men, the matter was taken vp betwixt them, ſo that on either ſide the armies were diſſolued, & both the kings repairing to Yorke, eſtabliſhed a peace there, with theſe conditions, that Margaret and Iſabell daughters to king William, after the tearme of 9 yéeres then next inſuing were once expired, ſhould be coupled in mariage with Henrie and Richard the ſons of king John, vpon this paction and couenant, that if the one died, the other ſhould ſucceéd to the crowne. For the which it was couenanted, that king William ſhould giue a right large dower. Alſo the caſtell which king John had builded, and king William raced, it was agréed that it ſhould remaine ſo defaced, and neuer after againe to be repared. For the ſure performance of theſe articles thus betwixt the two kings concluded, nine noble men of Scotland were appointed to be deliuered as hoſtages vnto king John. In that aſſemblie there at Yorke, King William alſo ſurrendered into the hands of king John, the lands of Cumberland, Huntington, and Northumberland; to the intent he ſhould aſſigne thoſe lands againe vnto his ſonne prince Alexander, and he to do homage for the ſame, according to the maner and cuſtome in that caſe prouided, for a knowledge and recognition that thoſe lands were holden of the kings of England, as ſuperior lords of the ſame. During the abode of theſe two kings at Yorke, there was brought vnto them a child of ſingular beautie, ſonne and heire to a gentleman of great poſſeſſions in thoſe parties, being ſore vexed with diuerſe and ſundrie diſeaſes; for one of his eies was conſumed & loſt through an iſſue which it had of corrupt and filthie humors, the one of his hands was dried vp; the one of his féet was ſo taken, that he had no vſe thereof; and his tong likewiſe that he could not ſpeake. The phyſicians that ſaw him thus troubled with ſuch contrarie infirmities, iudged him incurable. Neuertheleſſe, king William making a croſſe on him, reſtored him immediatlie to health. By reaſon whereof, manie beléeued that this was done by miracle, through the power of almightie God, that the vertue of ſo godlie a prince might bée notified to the world.

After his returne from Yorke into Scotland, he indowed the churches of Newbottell, Melros, Holie rod houſe, Dunfirmling, and Aberden, with manie faire poſſeſſions, as the letters patents made therof by him beare manifeſt teſtimonie. He alſo erected one new biſhops ſee called Argile, giuing therto ſufficient lands towards the maintenance and ſuſtentation thereof. After this, comming vnto the towne of Bertha, he had not remained there manie daies, but there chanced ſuch a floud, by reaſon of the riſing and inundation of the two riuers, Taie & Almond, that through violence of the ſtreme the towne wals were borne downe, and much people in the towne drowned, yer they could make anie ſhift to ſaue themſelues, inſomuch that though the king with his wife, and the moſt part of his familie eſcaped out of that great danger and ieopardie, his yongeſt ſonne yet named John, with his nurſſe and twelue other women periſhed, and twentie other of his ſeruants beſide. Héere was heard ſuch clamor, noiſe, & lamentable cries, with bitter rorings and dreadfull ſhrikings, as is vſed in time when anie towne is ſuddenlie taken and ſurpriſed by the enimies: for as the cõmon prouerbe witneſſeth; Fier & water haue no mercie: and yet of theſe two, water is more terrible and dangerous: for there is no force or wit of man able to reſiſt the violence of inundations, where they ſuddenlie breake in.

King William, after that the towne of Bertha was thus deſtroied and ouerflowed with water, began the foundation of an other towne, which was after called Perth, by a man of that name that owght the ground where the ſame towne was builded. Furthermore, to aduance the dignitie and augmentation of this towne, the king granted ſundrie beneficiall priuileges and frædoms thereto, that it might the ſooner riſe in riches and wealth. The firſt foundation thereof was laid after the incarnation of our Sauiour 1210 yéeres, but the name was changed afterwards, and called ſaint Johns towne, which name it beareth euen vnto this day. About the ſame time there roſe eſtſones new trouble in Cathnes, for one Gothred the ſonne of Makuilzen (of whoſe rebellion ye haue heard before) ſpoiled with often incurſions and rodes the countrie of Roſſe, and other bounds there abouts. His companie increaſed dailie more and more, by repaire of ſuch number of rebels as came vnto him out of Lochquhaber, & the weſterne Iles. King William, to repreſſe theſe attempts, ſent forth the earles of Fife and Atholl, with the thane of Buchquhane, hauing ſix thouſand in their companie, the which incountering with the enimies in ſet battell, gaue them the ouerthrow, and taking Gothred their chiefe capteine priſoner, brought him vnto the king, who cauſed both him and diuerſe other which were likewiſe taken priſoners, to loſe their heads. Gothred himſelfe was ſore wounded, before he was taken; ſo that if his takers had not made the more ſpéed in the conueieng of him to the king, he had died of his hurts before execution had thus béene done on him accordinglie as was appointed.

About this time aroſe the diſſention and variance betwixt John king of England, and pope Innocent the third, for that the Engliſh cleargie refuſed to aid the ſaid John with ſuch ſummes of monie as he demanded of them. Shortlie after, William king of Scotland, worne with long age, departed out of this world at Striueling, in the 74 yéere of his age, and in the 49 yéere of his reigne, and after the incarnation of Chriſt 1214 yéeres. He was buried in Aberbrothoke, before the high altar within the quier. The yéere afore his death, two comets or blaſing ſtarres appéered in the moneth of March, verie terrible to behold; the one did ſhine before the riſing of the ſunne, and the other before the going downe thereof. The yéere next following, there was a cow in Northumberland that calued a verie monſtruous calfe; for the head and necke reſembled a verie calfe in déed, but the reſidue of the bodie was like vnto a colt. In the winter after, there were ſéene alſo two moones in the firmament, the one being ſeuered from the other, and in ſhape naturallie horned, as ye ſée the moone in hir increaſing or waning. King William in his life time founded the abbeie of Balmernocht, but his wife quéene Ermengard indowed it with lands and poſſeſſions after his deceaſſe. In the 46 yéere of this king Williams reigne, two monks of the Trinitie order were ſent into Scotland by pope Innocent, to whome king William gaue his palace roiall in Aberden, to conuert the ſame into an abbeie for them

Alexander.

After the deceaſſe of king William, his ſonne Alexander the ſecond of that name ſucceaded, and was crowned at Scone with all due ſolemnitie; which being finiſhed, he went vnto Abirbrothoke, where he remained 14 daies, in attending the funerall obſequies of his father, and commanded that no publike plaies nor great feaſts ſhould be vſed or kept in all that yeere, to the intent the death of his father might be lamented through the whole realme. The king himſelfe, and all his ſeruants alſo, were clothed in mourning weed, during the ſpace of one whole yeere. The firſt parlement which he called, was holden at Edenburgh, in the which he confirmed all the acts and ordinances deuiſed by his father; and further appointed that all ſuch as had borne offices vnder him, ſhould ſtill inioy the ſame. Namelie he commanded that William Wlod biſhop of Dunblaine ſhould ſtill continue lord chancellor, and Alane of Galloway high conſtable, which is an office of moſt honor & reputation next to the king, as he that hath power of life and death, if anie man draw blood of an other by violence within two miles of the court.

When this parlement was ended, becauſe the old quarne his mother determined to remaine, during the reſidue of hir life, in the place where that holie woman quarne Margaret ſometime led hir life, he gaue vnto hir towards the maintenance of hir eſtate, the caſtels & townes of Foxſair, with the lands and poſſeſſions to the ſame belonging. He alſo appointed certeine ſage and moſt graue perſonages, to be choſen ſmith as iudges, which ſhould be reſident in euerie citie and good towne of his realme, for the hearing and due determining of all quarrels and matters in controuerſie betwixt partie and partie. In this meane time great diſſention roſe betwixt John king of England, and his barons, by reaſon whereof great warres inſued, as in the Engliſh hiſtorie doth appeare. The barons made ſute both to the French king, & to the king of Scots for aid, ſo that at length Lewes the French kings ſonne came ouer to ſupport them, whereof when king Alexander was aduertiſed, he likewiſe came with an armie through England vnto London, cauſing his ſouldiers by the waie to abſteine from doing anie kind of damage to the people. By his comming things were partlie quieted for a time, and ſhortlie after that he had communed with Lewes touching ſundrie affaires perteining to both the realmes, they paſſed the ſeas with ten veſſels ouer into France, leauing their powers behind them to aſſiſt the Engliſh lords.

Diſſention betwixt king John and his nobles.

The French king aduertiſed thereof, came downe to Bullongne, where finding his ſon and king Alexander, he renewed the ancient bond of amitie betwixt France and Scotland, with the ſame Alexander, according to the conuenants of the old league, with this addition, that neither prince ſhould receiue the enimies of the others realme, nor to marrie with anie ſtranger, the one not making the other priuie thereto. Theſe things being ratified, king Alexander and Lewes returned into England: ſhortlie whereupon, king John died, more through anguiſh of mind and melancholie, than by force of anie other naturall diſeaſe. His ſon Henrie, the third of that name, ſucceeded him. And in the meane time had the pope accurſed both Lewes, and king Alexander, with all thoſe that fauoured their cauſe againſt king John, which curſſe was pronounced in a generall councell, which was holden at Rome by pope Innocent, there being preſent foure hundred and twelue biſhops, and eight hundred abbats. King Alexander after the deceaſſe of king John, returning homewards with his armie, thought he might haue paſſed quietlie without anie annoiance by the waie, through meanes whereof he loſt a certeine number of his men, being ſuddenlie inuaded by ſuch Engliſhmen, as watched their time to take the Scots at ſome aduantage, in ſtraieng abroad out of order: with which iniurie king Alexander was ſo moued, that he ſpoiled and harried all the countries by the which he paſſed, till he was entered within the confines of his owne dominion.

Shortlie after, Cardinall Gualo came into England furniſhed with the popes authoritie, to denounce the excommunication aboue remembred, againſt Lewes and Alexander, with all their fautors, whereupon he accurſſed not onelie the foreſaid perſons, but alſo interdicted all the places where they came, inſomuch that in the end Lewes was conſtreined to buy an abſolution with no ſmall ſummes of monie, of that auaricious cardinall Gualo: and after vpon a greement alſo made with king Henrie, he returned into France. Not long after came K. Henrie with an armie into Scotland, ſore indamaging the countrie: but ſo ſone as he was aduertiſed that king Alexander had aſſembled all the power of his realme to giue him battell, he retired with all ſpeed into England. The king of England had in his armie at the ſame time 1200 men of armes, verie perfectlie appointed and furniſhed with armor and weapon as was requiſit, and the king of Scots but onelie fiue hundred. But of footmen there were in the Scotiſh armie 60000 able perſonages well appointed, with ares, ſpeares, and bowes, readie to die and liue with their prince, conſtantlie beléeuing, that to loſe this preſent life heere in his defenſe, was an aſſured waie to be ſaued in an other world.

King Henrie inuadeth Scotland.

Ex codice manuſcripto S. Albani, ſcripturn by Mat. Paris (as I take it.)

After that king Henrie was gone backe into England, king Alexander followed after him into Northumberland, where he ouerthrew & beat downe manie caſtels and ſtrengths, which the Engliſhmen held. Then marching through the countrie vnto Carleill, he wan that citie, and garniſhed it with his people. After this, laieng ſiege vnto Norham caſtell, when he had continued at the ſame a certeine time, and perceiued how he loſt but his trauell, he left it, and returned home with great honor and triumph for his other atchiued enterpriſes in that iournie. King Henrie being once aduertiſed that king Alexander had broken vp his campe, incontinentlie got togither his people togither, and comming to Berwike, wan both the towne and caſtell. After entring into Scotland, he burned and ſpoiled the countrie alongſt by the ſea coaſts, till he came as farre as Hadington, putting all ſuch to the ſword as were found in the waie; women, prieſts, and children onelie excepted. He aſſaied to haue woone the caſtell of Dunbar, but miſſing his purpoſe there, he returned into England.

In the meane time, the ambitious prelat Gualo, vpon truſt to purchaſe ſome large portion of monie in Scotland, put the ſame vnder protecſſe of interdicting, & namelie he accurſſed king Alexander moſt terriblie, for that he had inuaded England, and (as he alleged) ſpoiled churches as well as prophane places. Theſe curſſes ſo inflamed the hearts of the Scotiſhmen with hatred againſt the Engliſhmen, that the ſame was not like to haue ended without the bitter deſtruction and ruine of both their realms. Nevertheleſſe at length, by the diligent trauell of the biſhops of Yorke and Saliſburie, which came vnto king Alexander to treate an agreement, a ſmall peace was concluded, vnder theſe conditions. Firſt it was agreed, that king Alexander ſhould render the citie of Carleill into the Engliſhmens hands, and king Henrie the towne of Berwike vnto the Scots. halfe of Northumberland, to the Kercroſſe. And further, that king Alexander ſhould be abſolued of the cenſures of the church, which Gualo the cardinall had denounced againſt him.

Thus the two kings being accorded, the two foreſaid biſhops comming vnto Berwike, abſolued king Alexander, and deliuered his realme of interdiction, by ſuch authoritie as they had procured of the cardinall Gualo. But yet the ſame cardinall, not minding to depart with emptie hands, ſummoned all the prelats of Scotland to appeare before him at Anwike, there to receiue their full abſolution, to the intent by ſuch means to trouble them, till they had diſburſſed to his vſe ſome large portion of monie. Sundrie of them which loued quietneſſe more than contention, ſatiſfied his mind; but others refuſed vtterlie ſo to do, taking great indignation that ſpirituall cauſes were thus diſpatched for monie, and eccleſiaſticall preferments bought and ſold, no otherwiſe than ſecular poſſeſſions and prophane dignities. Incontinentlie thereupon Gualo cited them to Rome, ſuppoſing that rather than to take vpon them ſo long a iournie, they would haue compounded with him at his pleaſure. Notwithſtanding they being nothing in doubt thereof, went vnto Rome, and at their comming thither, made vnto the pope their complaint in moſt grieuous maner, of the inſufferable iniuries attempted in England and Scotland, by his moſt couetous legat the foreſaid Gualo: by reaſon of which complaint, and of ſundrie ſuch letters & informations as dailie came out of England and Scotland, from other biſhops & abbats, conteining right grieuous accuſations, concerning the inſatiable auarice of Gualo, the pope reuoked him home to Rome, to make anſwere in his preſence vnto ſuch matters as were laid to his charge.

And thoſe Scotiſh biſhops, which were come for their abſolution, were abſolued by the pope, and ſuffered to depart in peace. In this meane time, Dauid earle of Huntington, brother to William late king of Scots, (of whome ye haue heard before how he went in the iournie made by the chriſtian princes into the holie land) deceaſſed, and was buried within an abbeie in England. Henrie king of England, after he came to yeares of perfect diſcretion, ſhewed himſelfe to be more deſirous of peace than of warres. Whereupon at Yorke there was a meeting appointed betwixt him and king Alexander, where mutuall alliance was accorded betwixt them on this wiſe. Jane the ſiſter of king Henrie was promiſed to be giuen in mariage to king Alexander, and two ſiſters of king Alexanders were eſpouſed vnto two great princes of the Engliſh nobilitie. In the yeare next following, came a legat into Scotland from pope Honorius, with buls to gather a ſumme of monie towards the furniſhing forth of an armie againſt the Turks or rather Saracens. This legat was a cardinall, and named Egidius, who hauing purchaſed no ſmall quantitie of coine both of the cleargie and laitie of Scotland, ſpent the ſame in riot and outragious inſolencie, making his excuſe at his returne to Rome, how it was taken from him by certeine Brigants and robbers. Within ſhort while after, was an other legat with ſemblable commiſſion ſent into Scotland from the foreſaid pope. But king Alexander, being aduertiſed of his comming, called a councell, in the which one of the biſhops (as ſhould ſeeme) toke great indignation, to ſee how couetouſneſſe reigned in moſt ſhamefull wiſe amongeſt the Romiſh legats, and ſpake in maner as followeth.

Albeit ſundrie conſiderations there are which might ſtay me from vttering ſuch things as be moſt preiudiciall to the common-wealth, yet (moſt noble prince) when I conſider thine humanitie, faith, and conſtancie, giuen to nothing more than to the defenſe and weale of thy true liege people, I cannot but (for the zeale I beare to common libertie) declare the truth. For ſith all maner of tyrannie is intollerable, yea euen that which is exerciſed by kings or princes deſcended by lineall ſucceſſion to their rightfull heritage: much more is that tyrannie to be deteſted, which is exerciſed by men of vile and baſe linage. Therefore, if the ſundrie and manifeſt wrongs done to vs theſe manie yeares now paſſed, had come by the popes themſelues, the ſame might ſomewhat more ſufferablie haue béene borne: but ſith naughtie & vile perſons, of baſe birth and obſcure linage, promoted to benefices and eccleſiaſticall dignities onelie for their wicked and horrible vices, haue not onelie interdicted our realme, without lawfull commiſſion; but haue alſo conſumed in maintenance of their wanton and inſolent vices, that monie which they gathered in our countrie by the popes authoritie, vnder colour of raiſing an armie to go againſt the Turks and Infidels; I am of this opinion, that their curſſed auarice ought to haue no further place amongeſt faithfull people, ſpeciallie amongeſt vs, whoſe ſimplicitie and humbleneſſe they haue in contempt. In the yeares paſſed, ye complained of the iniuries done by Gualo, when he had put your realme vnder the cenſure of interdicting, and the moſt part of your prelats vnder the curſſe; becauſe they would not anſwer him with monie, according to his couetous demands, wherewith he might mainteine his outragious luſts. Which Gualo alſo (as ſhould appeare) by moſt certeine coniectures, was of ſuch a diueliſh nature, that though he were ſent to treate a concord betwixt the Engliſhmen and Scots; yet to ſatiſfie his auaritious deſire, he miniſtred ſuch occaſion of warre betwixt them, that both the realmes (had not the matter béene the ſooner taken vp) were at a point to haue entered ſo far into malitious hatred the one againſt the other, that it was not like that anie peace would haue taken place, till the one or both had béene vtterlie deſtroied. But ſince theſe heinous and terrible déeds are manifeſt inough; to what end ſhould I here remember them, ſith the ſame cannot be done without your great griefe and diſpleaſure? Moreouer, after we were deliuered of this Gualo, ſhortlie after commeth another, one ſhewing himſelfe to come forth of the ſame ſhop; for in conuerſation of life he was to be iudged no whit better, but rather worſe: for after that he had got vp amongeſt vs of this realme large ſummes of monie, vnder pretenſe of redéeming the chriſtian priſoners out of the Saracens hands, and waging of new armies againſt them; he waſted the ſame monie in riotous luſt and inſolencie, feining, when it was gone, that it was béreft him by Brigants. Therefore ſith we haue had experience, and are alreadie ſufficientlie taught by the doings of the two fore-remembred legats, to our heauie griefs and no ſmall damages; we may be worthilie reputed vnwiſe and verie fooles in déed, if we now admit the third. For it is not to be thought, that this new legat ſhall vſe the matter in anie better ſort, than his fellowes haue done before him. And verelie, if anie man ſhuld demand of me, what I thinke ought to be done in this matter, I do for my part proteſt, that neither this legat, nor anie other in times to come,

If there be anie amongſt you that hath moze monie than he knoweth which way well to ſpend, he may (in the name of God) beſtow it vpon the poze, rather than to the vſe of ſuch vicious legats, as ozder it in ſuch ſoꝛt, that all men haue cauſe to thinke what ſoeuer commeth into their hands, is but caſt away and cleareſie loſt.

These wozds of this biſhop (whatſoeuer he was) were liked ſo well of all the councell, that the legat could not be receiued into the realme. After the breaking vp of this councell, the mariage was conſummat betwixt king Alexander and Jone, ſiſter to Henrie king of England; alſo betwixt Hubert de Burgh high iuſtice of England, and Margaret ſiſter to king Alexander, by reaſon of which mariages, the peace was confirmed with the Engliſhmen, and as it had bæne ſealed vp foꝛ a moze full and certeine aſſurance. Shoꝛtlie after followed ciuill warres in Scotland, by the motion of one Gileſpie Roſſe, who hauing liued moſt licentiouſlie in riotous outrage, at length arreared open warre againſt the king, and firſt fleaing diuerſe ſuch of his companions as had kept him companie afoꝛetime in his lewd miſdemeanoꝛs, foꝛ that they refuſed now to ſticke to him in this rebellious enterpꝛiſe, he went with the reſidue that offered to take his part vnto the towne of Enuernes, which he toke and burned, with diuerſe other places being of the kings poſſeſſions, till at length John Cumin earle of Buchquhane coming againſt him with an armie deliuered to him by the king, purſued the ſaid Gileſpie in ſuch earneſt wiſe, that finallie he toke him with two of his ſons, and ſtriking off all their thꝛée heads, ſent the ſame to the king as a witneſſe how he had ſped.

This buſineſſe being thus quieted, an other inſued after this maner: The men of Cathnes ſoꝛe offended with their biſhop named Adam, foꝛ that vpon refuſall to pay their tithes he had accurſſed them, fell vpon him within his owne houſe, and firſt ſcourging him with rods, at length ſet fire vpon him and burnt him within his owne kitchen. Which act being repoꝛted to the king, as then ſoiourning at Edenburgh, he haſted foꝛth with all ſpæd to puniſh the offendoꝛs, not ceaſſing till he had taken foure hundꝛed of them, all the which number he cauſed to be hanged; and foꝛ that he would haue no ſucceſſion to come of ſuch a wicked ſæd, he appointed all their ſons to loſe their ſtones. The place where they were ſo gelded, is called euen to this day the ſtonie hill. The earle of Cathnes, foꝛ that he neither ſuccoured the biſhop in time of nëed, noꝛ yet ſought to puniſh the offendoꝛs that did this cruell dëed, was depꝛiued of his earledome, and the lands belonging to the ſame. The pope highlie commended king Alexander foꝛ this puniſhment taken of them, that had ſo cruellie murthered their biſhop.

After this, king Alexander comming vnto Aberden, gaue manie large gifts and pꝛiuileges therevnto, although the ſame befoꝛe this time inioied ſundꝛie notable commodities and endowments giuen and confirmed by other kings his pꝛedeceſſoꝛs. The buls which were granted by ſundꝛie popes concerning the liberties of the churches in Scotland, were committed by the king to the cuſtodie of one Gilbert archdeacon of Murrey, who ſucceëded next after the foꝛeſaid Adam in the ſëe of Cathneſſe. In the third yeare after, as king Alexander with his mother Ermingard were ſitting at their banket on the twelfe day in Chꝛiſtmas, otherwiſe called Yule, the earle of Cathnes, hauing good oppoꝛtunitie thereto, pꝛeſented himſelfe befoꝛe the king, and beſought him of grace and pardon foꝛ his paſſed offenſe. King Alexander taking ruth & pitie of him, reſtoꝛed him (vpon his fine to be paied in maner as was agrëed betwixt them) vnto all his foꝛmer honoꝛs, lands and poſſeſſions. Neuertheleſſe the offenſe that was pardoned by man, was afterward puniſhed by the iuſt iudgement (as ſome thought) of almightie God: foꝛ he was ſlaine as he lay in bed one night by his owne meniall ſeruants, whome he had roughlie intreated, as the fame went. The houſe alſo wherein he was thus ſlaine, was likewiſe ſet on fire and burnt ouer him, that no man ſhould haue ſuſpicion of his ſlaughter, but that it might ſëeme as though it had come by ſome ſudden aduenture.

About this time, oꝛ ſomewhat beforе, there came into Scotland (ſent by ſaint Dominicke) certeine blacke friers, of which oꝛder the ſame Dominicke was the firſt authoꝛ. These men that were firſt ſent by him, liued accoꝛding to his inſtitution, moze perfectlie than ſuch as followed: foꝛ as it often happeneth, althings commonlie from a good beginning fall into woꝛſe eſtate, ſo that the ſucceſſoꝛs of thoſe men declined from all good religion, into moſt inſolent abuſes and miſoꝛders, and ſo continuing in vicious liuing the ſpace of thꝛée hundꝛed yeares, at length were perfectlie reformed into a better rule, by a frier named John Adamſon, that pꝛoceëded doctoꝛ in the pꝛofeſſion of diuinitie in the vniuerſitie of Aberden, at the ſame time that Hector Boetius the Scotiſh chꝛonographer pꝛoceëded there in the ſame faculties. On the ſame maner, about the ſelfe ſame time, were ſent into Scotland, as well as into all other parts of the chꝛiſtian woꝛld, friers minoꝛs, of ſaint Francis his oꝛder. Manie of them alſo after his deceaſſe fell to diſſolute liuing, këeping no ſuch ſtreict rules, as both he pꝛeſcribed, and alſo obſerued.

But now to returne to the reſidue of the hiſtoꝛie. The Scotiſh people inioied peace a long time after the appeaſing of the trouble in Cathnes, till time that Alane loꝛd of Galloway and conſtable of Scotland departed out of this life; and foꝛ that he had diuided his lands beforе his death amongeſt his thꝛée daughters, his baſtard ſonne gathered an armie of 10000 men, in hope to atteine the poſſeſſion of Galloway by foꝛce of armes; but at length, after he had wꝛought much ſcath in the countrie by his violent inuaſion, he was ſlaine with fiue thouſand of thoſe that toke his part, by the earle of March, and Walter Steward of Dunwald, which was ſent againſt him with a powꝛer. The eldeſt daughter of the aboue mentioned Alane of Galloway, was giuen in mariage vnto Roger Quincie earle of Winchеſter, who after his father in lawes deceaſſe, was made conſtable of Scotland, which office continued in the hands of his ſucceſſion, till king Robert the ſecond his daies; in whoſe time this Roger of Quincies poſteritie was diſherited and extinguiſhed, foꝛ certeine offenſes committed againſt the kings maieſtie, and then afterwards the office of the conſtable was giuen to the Hayes of Arroll. The ſecond daughter of the foꝛeſaid Alane was maried vnto John Baliol; & the third to the earle of Albemarle. Thus was the loꝛdſhip of Galloway diuided into thꝛée, by reaſon whereof the inhabitants of that countrie, taking diſpleaſure therewith, cleaued vnto the aboue mentioned baſtard, till he was vanquiſhed and ſlaine, as beforе ye haue heard. This trouble being appeaſed thus within the realme, K. Alexander was aduertiſed of great diuiſion riſing betwixt king Henrie of England and his nobles, and therefoꝛe to helpe towards an agrëement betwixt them, he went to London with his wife quëene Jane, and Iſabell his ſiſter. Thꝛough his earneſt diligence, all the debates and quarels were remoued, and the parties thꝛoughlie accoꝛded. Which being done, he maried

In the yeare next following, which was after the incarnation 1239, king Alexander (becauſe he had no ſucceſſion begot of his bodie) maried at Rockſburgh the daughter of Ingelram lord of Coucie, a virgine of excellent beautie named Marie, on whome he got a ſonne named Alexander, which ſucceeded after his deceaſſe in the gouernement of the realme.

John Cumin earle of Angus departeth this life.

About the ſame time, John Cumin earle of Angus, being ſent in ambaſſage to Lewes the French king, died by the way. Alſo at Hadington was holden a rotall tornament, where knights and eſquiers aduanced themſelues by valiant proweſſe to win honor: neuertheleſſe the end of all that pleaſure and paſtime ended in ſorow. For Patrike Cumin earle of Atholl was ſlaine within his lodging in the night, and the houſe ſet on fire and burned ouer him, to the intent no ſuſpicion ſhould riſe, but that it happened by ſome euill miſfortune, and negligence of fire. But yet was John Billart, with Walter Billart his vncle ſhrewdlie ſuſpected for the matter, inſomuch that though no euident proofe could be had againſt him, yet were they baniſhed the realme, and loſt all their goods by confiſcation to the kings vſe. After theſe things were thus paſſed, a conuocation was called of the cleargie at ſaint Johns towne. In the which were diuerſe prouinciall ordinances and ſtatutes, made by conſent of the king and nobles of the realme, which were obſerued in the church of Scotland vnto theſe late daies. About the ſame time alſo, one Somerled thane of Argile, the ſonne of that Somerled of whome ye haue heard before, following his fathers ſteps, rebelled againſt the king, ſore indamaging by rodes & forages the parts bordering vpon the confines of his countrie of Argile, till at length the earle of March brought him to the brinke of ſuch extreme neceſſitie, that he was faine to yéeld himſelfe, with a cord about his necke in token of ſubmiſſion; and being ſo brought before the king, obteined pardon of his heinous offenſe.

In the ſame ſeaſon, Henrie king of England, prouoked by the ſetting on of ſuch ſeditious perſons remaining in his court, as truſted by wars to aduance their priuat gaine (during which time law and iuſtice haue no place) began to build a caſtell iuſt againſt Berwike, in the ſame place where the other was begun afore by king Richard, which (as before is ſhewed) was raced and throwen downe by king William, by the articles of agréement with couenant that it ſhould neuer be builded vp againe. This attempt of the Engliſhmen had miniſtred ſufficient occaſion of warre, if the nobles of England (conſidering that the building vp of this caſtell was contrarie to their bond and promiſed faith) had not ſtaied the worke, and ſo therevpon that beginning of new trouble betwixt the Engliſh and Scotiſh nations for that preſent ceaſſed.

Matth. Paris diſagréeth frõ the Scotiſh writers touching the occaſion of this warre, as in the Engliſh chronicles ye may read.

In the yeare following came ambaſſadors forth of France into Scotland, declaring that K. Lewes was readie to paſſe forward on that iournie, which he had taken in hand to make into Jewrie, and therefore deſired aid of king Alexander, to ſupport him in thoſe warres againſt Gods enimies. With theſe ambaſſadors were ſent ouer into France, certeine choſen bands of men of warre vnder the leading of Patrike earle of March, Dauid Lindſeie of Glenneſke, and Walter Steward of Dundonald, three capteins of great wiſdome, and perfect experience in feats of chiualrie. The moſt part of all thoſe Scotiſhmen, that thus went forth in that iournie, periſhed in Aegypt either on the ſword or by ſickeneſſe, ſo that few or none of them returned home againe. From henceforth, king Alexander liued not long: but falling into a ſore and grieuous ſickeneſſe within a certeine Ile called Carnere, not far diſtant from the coaſt of Argile, deceaſſed in the ſame Ile ſhortlie after, in the 51 yeare of his age, the 35 of his reigne, and of our redemption 1249, his bodie (according as he had commanded in his life time) was buried in Melroſſe.

After that Alexander the ſecond was thus dead and buried, his ſonne Alexander the third of that name, not paſſing nine yéeres of age, was proclamed king. There was no ſmall adw on the daie of his coronation amongeſt the nobles, for that by reaſon of the obſeruation of ſtarres, it was iudged to be an infortunate daie for him to receiue the diademe. And againe ſome held opinion, how he ought to be made knight firſt, before he were crowned; ſo that thus they were at ſtrife togither, in ſuch earneſt maner, that it was doubted, leaſt this contention would haue bred ſome great inconuenience, had not the earle of Fife preuented the ſame, in cauſing vpon a ſudden the crowne to be ſet vpon the kings head, being placed in the marble chaire, according to the cuſtome, without regard to the friuolous allegations of them that ſpake to the contrarie. When the ſolemnitie was ended, there came before him an Hillandman (for ſo they call ſuch as inhabit the mounteine countries of Scotland) who in a kind of méeter of the Iriſh language, ſaluted him as king, thus: Bennach de re Albin Alexander, mak Alar, mak William, mak Henrie, mak Dauid, and ſo forth (reciting in maner of a gencalogie or pedegrée, all the kings in order of whome he was deſcended, till he came vp to Gathelus the firſt beginner of the Scotiſh name & nation.) The words in Engliſh are as followeth: Haile king of Albine, Alexander the ſonne of Dauid, the ſonne of Alex, the ſonne of William, the ſonne of Henrie, the ſonne of Dauid, and ſo forth as before. This Hilland Scot was highlie rewarded by the king for his labour, according as was thought requiſite.

In the ſecond yéere of his reigne, king Alexander (or rather ſuch as had the gouernement of the realme vnder him) aſſembled togither all the prelates and barons of the realme at Dunfirmling, and there ordeined to take vp the bones of his grandmother queéne Margaret, which being donne, he cauſed them to be put into a ſhrine of ſiluer, the 21 day of Julie, and minding to place the ſame where it reſteth at this preſent, as it was borne forth toward that place, when the bearers came againſt the ſepulchre of hir huſband king Malcolme, they were not able to remoue the relikes anie further, till by the councell (as is ſaid) of an aged man that was then & there preſent, they toke vp the bones of the ſame Malcolme alſo, and bare them forth with hirs to the place aforeſaid, where they after reſted in great veneration of the people. Such as were appointed gouernors (during the minoritie of king Alexander) doubting leaſt the tender yéeres of their ſouereigne might imbolden the enimies of the relme to attempt ſome inuaſion, ſent ambaſſadors vnto Henrie king of England, requiring that the peace might be ratified anew with him and his people, and further to make a motion of mariage to be had betwixt king Alexander and a daughter of king Henries.

They were affianced in the daies of king Alexander the faire, as in the Engliſh chronicle it may appeare.

Shortlie after, vpon this motion, both the kings met at Yorke with a great number of lords, as well ſpirituall as temporall of both the realmes, where king Alexander (according to the promiſe before that time made) maried the ladie Margaret daughter to the forenamed king Henrie, on ſaint Stephans day

The charges whereof were borne partlie by king Henrie, & partlie by the archbiſhop, who in feaſting thoſe princes ſpent right liberallie. At length, king Alexander after he had ſolaced himſelfe in the companie of his father in law king Henrie a certeine time, returned into Scotland with his new maried wife. During the minoritie of K. Alexander, the realme of Scotland was gouerned in great proſperitie by the nobles: but after his comming to ripe age, he was informed of certeine extortions done by ſome of the péeres of his realme againſt the poore people, and therevpon determined to ſée redreſſe therein. Amongſt other there were accuſed of ſuch trangreſſion, the earles of Penteith, Atholl, and Buchquhane, with the lord of Strabogie, which were of one ſurname, that is to ſaie, of the Cumins. Theſe being ſummoned to appeare before the iuſtices, with one Hugh Aberneth, and other of their complices, vpon their contempt ſo to do, were proclamed traitors, and as the Scotiſh men tearme it, put to the horne.

The Cumins put to the horne.

The foreſaid lords moued with this diſpleaſure, purpoſed to reuenge the ſame, and aſſembling their powers in ſecret wiſe, toke the king at Kinroſſie, and brought him vnto Striueling, where they kept him as captiue in ward a long time after. Through which aduenture much harme inſued, by reaſon of miſruled perſons, that wrought manie oppreſſions againſt the people, in hope to eſcape the due puniſhment for their miſchiefous acts prouided, ſith the king who ſhould haue ſéene iuſtice miniſtred, was holden in captiuitie by his preſumptuous aduerſaries. But of this matter ye maie ſée more in the Engliſh chronicles, about the 39 yéere of Henrie the third. The houſe of the Cumins was in thoſe daies of great power within the realme, both in multitude of of ſpring, riches, lands, poſſeſſions, and mainrent. There were at the ſame time to the number of 32 knights of that ſurname within the realme, all men of faire poſſeſſions and reuenues. But as it often happeneth, that men of great poſſeſſions and dominion are had in ſuſpicion with the prince, whereby the ſame is for the more part the cauſe of their ruine and fall, ſpeciallie when they preſume too farre vpon their high power: ſo it chanced here. For within a ſhort time after that the king was thus taken (as before is ſhewed) the chiefe author of the whole conſpiracie, that is to ſaie, the lord Walter earle of Penteith, who was higheſt in authoritie among all thoſe Cumins, was poiſoned (as was thought) by his owne wife, through which miſchance the reſidue of the Cumins were ſo eranimated, that obteining their pardon, for all offenſes paſſed of the king, they did ſet him againe at libertie.

This woman did thus make awaie hir huſband the erle of Penteith through inſtigation of an Engliſhman called John Ruſſell, as by coniectures it was ſuſpected; namelie, for that refuſing to marrie with anie of the Scotiſh nobilitie, ſhe toke the ſaid Ruſſell to huſband, though in eſtate to be compared with hirs, he was iudged a match farre vnmeet, and therevpon conſtreined to flie with him into England, ſhe died there in great miſerie. About this time pope Vrbane the fourth of that name inſtituted the feaſt of Corpus Chriſti, to be celebrated each yéere on the thurſday after Trinitie ſundaie. The Carmelite friers came at this time into Scotland, and erected a chappell of our ladie without the walles of ſaint Johns towne, which the biſhop of Donkeld appointed them, therein to celebrate their ſeruice. It was alſo ſaid, that in this ſeaſon a monke of Melroſſe was admoniſhed in a dreame, where he ſhould find a part of the holie croſſe, not far from Peplis in Louthian, incloſed in a caſe ingrauen with the title of S. Nicholas. And not farre from the ſame was likewiſe found a ſtone cheſt, right cunninglie wrought and ingrauen, wherein were found certeine bones wraped in ſilke, but whoſe bones the ſame were it was not knowne. As ſone as the caſe was opened, within the which the croſſe was included, manie miracles were wrought (as it was then beléeued.) King Alexander for deuotion hereof, builded an abbeie in honor of the holie croſſe, in the ſame place where that péece of the croſſe was ſo found. In this abbeie afterwards there were monks inhabiting of the order of the Trinitie.

Not long after, the two kings of England and Scotland met togither at Warke caſtell, accompanied with a great number of the nobles and gentlemen of both their realmes, for the redreſſe of certeine miſorders committed betwirt the borderers. Such reformation alſo was here deuiſed, and recompenſe made on either ſide, that both the realms continued afterwards in more perfect tranquillitie for a certeine ſpace, than euer was ſéene in anie kings daies before that time. In this ſeaſon was the church of Glaſco finiſhed in that perfection as it ſtands to be ſéene at this day, right ſumptuouſlie builded, for the moſt part at the charges of William biſhop of that ſée, who liued not long after the finiſhing of the ſaid worke. In the yéere following, which was the yéere after the birth of our Sauiour 1263, there fell a great dearth through both the realmes of England and Scotland, by reaſon of the wet harueſt preceding, ſo that the corne and graine was quite marred and corrupted before it could be got beſide the ground.

In interuiew Matth. Paris writeth that in the yeare 1256, both K. Alexander & his wife came into England to viſit king Henrie, whom they found at Woodſtoke, as in the Engliſh chronicles further appeareth.

Acho king of Norwaie, being informed how the Scots were thus oppreſſed with famine and other miſeries, by report of them that made the ſame more than it was in deed, ſuppoſed to find time and occaſion fit for his purpoſe, to ſubdue them wholie to his dominion. Herevpon, preparing an armie and a fléet of ſhips conuenient for ſuch an enterpriſe, he landed with the ſame in the weſterne Iles, on Lammas day otherwiſe called Petri ad Vincula. Thoſe Iles continued vnder ſubiection of the Norwegians and Danes, from king Edgars time vnto the daies of this Acho. From thence the ſaid Acho with a mightie power of his Danes and Norwegians came ouer into Aran and Bute, which are two Iles, and onelie at that time amongſt all the reſidue were vnder the dominion of Scots. But Acho hauing quicklie ſubdued them at his pleaſure, in hope of more proſperous ſucceſſe, tranſported his whole armie ouer into Albion, and landed with the ſame on the next coaſts, where after he had beſieged the caſtell of Aire a certeine time, hée toke the ſame, and began to waſte and ſpoile all the countrie thereabouts.

When king Alexander had heard what the answer of his enimie was, he was therewith sore moued, & perceiuing no waie to eschue the battell, but that he should be constreined to trie fortunes chance, he assembled togither an armie of fortie thousand men, that though he were not able to match his enimies in prowesse, he might yet passe them in number. He diuided his host into three battels. In the right wing was Alexander Steward, a verie valiant knight, ne- phue to that Alexander which indowed the abbeie of Paslie. He had with him all the men that came forth of Argile, Leuenor, Atholl, and Galloway. In the left wing was Patrike Dunbar, hauing with him the men of Louthian, Fife, Mers, Berwike, and Stri- ueling shire. In the middle ward was the king him- selfe, with all the remnant people of the other parts of Scotland, to succour the wings when danger ap- peered. These battels were ordered in such arraie, that euerie band had a capteine assigned to them of their owne language, to exhort them to manhood, thereby to win praise and honor.

The king in the middle ward.

At his entring into the confines of Conningham, where he came first within sight of his enimies, he called his people togither, and exhorted them to do their dutifull indeuors like hardie and valiant men, against those enimies that inuaded their countrie without anie iust cause or title of warre, and to put their trust in almightie God, desiring him to grant victorie vnto that part, which had most right and iu- stest cause of battell. He further shewed how neces- sarie it was for them to behaue themselues valiant- lie, and how much it stood them in hand to fight with manlie courages, in defense of their wiues, children, liberties, and lands, hauing no hope of suertie of life but in the valiant vsing of their able hands, so that their whole safegard rested in this point, either to vanquish their enimies with manhood, or else to liue in seruile bondage as their slaues and miserable thrals, and to suffer their wiues and daughters to be abused at their lust and pleasure. He willed them therefore to consider, that not onelie he, but all Scot- land should see them fight that day, noting both their manhood & cowardise. But sith their cause was iust, and moued onlie in defense of their native countrie and ancient liberties, he trusted they would shew the more hardinesse and courage, namelie against them that sought onelie bloud and spoile. These with other the like words king Alexander vttered with bold spirit, to incourage his people. And on the other part king Acho likewise thought it expedient to vse some exhortation vnto his armie, that they should not be afraid of the great number and huge multitude of the Scots.

King Alexander exhorteth his people to do valiantlie.

Seekers of bloud & spoile.

Achos exhor- tation to his people.

The chiefest point to incourage them to do vali- antlie, he supposed was the hope of spoile, and there- fore he put them in remembrance, how by victorie not onelie all such riches as the Scots had brought thither with them (which could not be small) but also all the whole substance and treasure of the realme to be at their commandement, yea and the realme it selfe, if they minded to inioy it: so that this was the day which they had so much desired, wherein sufficient opportunitie was offered to shew what reward should follow to ech man for his good and valiant seruice. But for that high enterprises and famous exploits might neuer be atchiued without extreme ieopardie, it behoued them to atteine to these so great commodities by persing thorough, and ouerthrowing by dint of sword the arraied battels of their enimies, which how easie a matter it should be for them to bring to passe, such as well considered the circumstances, might soone coniecture. For through dearth and famine which so long hath reigned amongst the Scotish people, their bodies and forces (saith he) are so wonderfullie infeebled, that they appeere to representent rather shadowes than full personages of men able to make resistance.

High enterprises atchiued with extreme perill.

Againe, in consideration how necessarie it was for euerie man to fight without fainting, sith they were inuironed on ech part without meane to escape, he desired them, that if it so fell out, that they should chance to be ouercome (which as he trusted should not come to passe) that in such misaduenture they would yet sell their liues derelie, and not to die vnreuenged. Thus hauing opened vnto them what prosperous hap followed by victorie, and what danger by the ouerthrow, he thought to haue sufficientlie instructed them to put all feare aside, and to dow what lay in their vttermost forces to vanquish the enimies.

The ordering of the battels.

The kings on either side, hauing thus exhorted their people to dow their indeuors, they arraie their battels. Acho disposed all his best souldiers and whole force of his armie in the middle ward, for that he had knowledge how the Scotish king was placed in the middle battell of his people: wherefore he supposed, that if he might ouerthrow and vanquish that part where the king stood, he should easilie then put the residue to flight. His wings (bicause he had not number sufficient to furnish them fullie) were arraied more weakelie in slender and thin ranks: but yet at the first incounter there was a terrible fight betwixt them, especiallie where the two kings fought: for they preassed still with great violence on that part where they saw anie danger, not ceassing to exhort & incourage their men to stand to the bargaine with manlie stomachs, so that on either side these two kings plaied the parts of verie valiant capteins.

The battels ioine.

The valiancie of the kings.

Acho with a band of verie hardie souldiers assaied sundrie times to perse and disorder the battell where king Alexander fought: notwithstanding he had so great number of people there with him, that he stuffed euen the ranks with fresh men where he saw it needfull. Also betwixt the wings, there was no lesse crueltie shewed on either side in the beginning of the battell, till at length the Norwegians, perceiuing themselues ouerpressed with multitude, and compassed in on euerie side, did somewhat begin to shrinke, and first those in the left wing, constreined to breake their order, fell to running awaie. Alexander Steward therfore, that had the leading of the right wing of the Scots, hauing pursued the enimies a certeine space, and slaine Achos nephue, a man of high reputation and authoritie amongst the Norwegians, caused the retreat to be sounded, and gathering his men againe into araie, brought them against the enimies of the middle ward, where was hard hold betwixt the two kings, the battell continuing with great slaughter on both parts, and vncerteine a long while to whether part the victorie would incline: but the Norwegians being now assailed on the backs by a new power of their enimies, at length they began to flee amaine.

The maine battell of the Norwegians fleeth.

In the meane time, the left wing of the Scots, whereof one Patrike had the leading, was in great danger, by reason the capteine himselfe was sore wounded, and thereby all the companies in the same wing sore discomforted: but after they once beheld how the middle ward of their enimies was put to flight, they recouered new courages, and with great force caused their aduersaries, with whom they were matched, to giue backe also: and so were the Danes and Norwegians chased by the Scots, with verie cruell slaughter through all Cunningham, not ceassing from the pursute of the enimies, till night made an end of that daies worke. King Acho with a few other escaped out of danger, and comming to the castell of Aire, which (as ye haue heard) he had wone before, he was there informed of an other losse which he had susteined: for his fleet conteining the number of an hundred and fiftie ships, were so beaten with an outragious tempest, that there were not past foure of all that number saued, the residue being drowned and broken against the rocks and cliffes. The mariners also, being constreined to come on land for safegard of their liues, were slaine by the people of the countrie, so that few of them or none at all escaped.

Acho being thus abashed with these two infortunate mischances, aswell for the losse and discomfiture of his armie by land, as for the perishing of his nauie on the seas, got him vnto those foure ships that were saued, and sailed with them about the coast, till he arrined in Orkneie. In this battell, which was fought at Largis on the third day of August, in the yeere 1263, there were slaine of Danes and Norwegians 24 thousand, and of Scots about fiue thousand. Thus saith Hector Boetius. But Fourdon séemeth not to agrée altogither herewith, who writing of this inuasion made by the Norwegians into Scotland, saith, that they were but twentie thousand men of warre in all, imbarked in foure score ships, which comming to the new castell of Aran, besieged as well the said castell of Aran, as the castell of Bute, and toke them both, spoiling also the churches alongst the sea coast, and after arriuing at Largis in Cunningham, on the feast of the natiuitie of our ladie, lost the most part of their vessels, which were drowned togither with thousands of men in the same. The residue that got to land, incountring with the Scots led by Alexander Steward of Dondonald, were discomfited, put to flight, chased & drowned in the sea, into the which they were driuen. Amongest other that were slaine, a nephue of king Acho was one, a yong gentleman of great valiancie, and sore lamented of his vncle. Acho had much adow to escape himselfe, he was so egerlie pursued of his enimies.

Iohn Fourdon.

Thus haue I thought good to shew the diuersitie of writers in this behalfe, that it may appéere how things are sometimes amplified by Boetius, to aduance the glorie of his countriemen, further perhaps than by the simple veritie of those that did write before him, may in some points be well auerred. But now to procéed. King Acho at his comming into Orkneie, sent into Norwaie and Denmarke for a new armie, prouiding ships & all other things necessarie, to haue made a new inuasion into Scotland against the nert spring: but for that he himselfe departed out of this life in the beginning of the yeere nert following, all that purueiance and great preparation was dashed, and came to none effect. The same day that Acho deceassed, that is to saie, the 21 day of Januarie, Alexander prince of Scotland, the eldest son of king Alexander, whome he begot on his wife quéene Margaret, the sister of Henrie king of England, was borne, to the great reioising of the people. For the people conceiued double ioy & gladnesse

Alexander prince of Scotland, as eldest sonne to the king is borne.

neſſe héereof, bicauſe that both a new prince was borne, and that enimie dead which ſought the deſtruction of the whole realme. After the deceaſſe of king Acho, his ſonne Magnus ſucceéded him, a verie faithfull prince, and one that had the feare of God before his eies.

Imbaſſadors ſent from Magnus K. of Norwaie to king Alexander.

In the ſecond yeere of his reigne, he ſent his ambaſſadors (of whome the chiefe was the chancellor of Norwaie) vnto king Alexander, whome they found at ſaint Johns towne, and there ſignified vnto him, that king Magnus their maiſter would willinglie giue ouer all his title, right, and claime vnto Aran and Bute, ſo that the reſidue of the Iles might remaine in quiet poſſeſſion of him and his ſucceſſors in time comming. Héerevnto was anſwer made by king Alexander, that the Iles by right of old inheritance perteined vnto him and his progenitors kings of Scotland, and therefore he might not make anie agréement with the Danes or Norwegians, till he had recouered the full poſſeſſion of the ſame Iles.

In time of the trouble betwixt the ſons of Malcolme Cammore and their vncle Donald Bane Magnus K. of Norwaie the ſon of Olaue ſubdued theſe Iles. Richard Southwell.

The ambaſſadors being diſpatched and ſent awaie with this anſwer, incontinentlie Alexander Steward of Paſleie, and John Cumin were ſent with an armie ouer into Man, which Ile they then recouered (though not without bloud) forth of the hands of the Danes and Norwegians, who had kept the ſame in poſſeſſion now for the ſpace of 167 yéares paſſed, but not without ſome alteration and trouble, as may appeere by the annales of Richard Southwell, a writer (as ſhould ſeeme) well inſtructed in matters as well touching Scotland, and the north parts, as alſo concerning the ſtate of the out Iles. And therefore that the ſame may the better appéere to the readers, I haue thought it not impertinent to ſet downe what I haue read in the ſame Southwell, touching the kings, or rather viceroies of Man, and thoſe Iles which for a ſeaſon (as ſhould ſéeme in déed) were ſubſtituted by the kings of Norwaie, though it may alſo appéere, that ſometime there was a certeine ſucceſſion in them, as from the father to the ſonne, & from the brother to the brother, &c: in manner as if it had bæne by waie of inheritance.

In the daies of king John therefore (as ſaith the foreſaid Southwell) one Gothred reigned as king in Man. And in the yeere 1228, one Reginald being king of thoſe Iles, was murthered by wicked perſons, & then his brother Olaue reigned in his place. In the yéere 1230, the king of Norwaie appointed one Huſbac, the ſonne of Olmund (ſurnamed Hacon) to gouerne the ſaid Iles called Sodorenſes, that is to ſay, the Ile of Man, & the other Iles there abouts the coaſts of Scotland; the which Huſbac, togither with two other capteins Olaue and Godred, ſurnamed Don, came by ſea, and arriued at Bute, where they wan the caſtell: but Huſbac was ſlaine with a ſtone that was throwne downe vpon him. And then after this, the foreſaid Olaue and Godred came vnto the Ile of Man, where they diuided the kingdome of the Iles betwixt them, ſo as Olaue had Man alotted to him for his part, and Godred the other Iles. But after that Godred was alſo ſlaine, Olaue gouerned both in Man, and in all the other Iles (thoſe excepted which the ſonnes of Somerled held in poſſeſſion.)

Olauus and Godredus diuide the kingdome of the Iles betwixt them.

In the yéere 1237, in the moneth of Maie, Alane king of Man, the ſonne of Godred, & brother to Reginald, departed this life, after whoſe deceaſſe his ſonne Harold ſucceéded him, and reigned 12 yéares, being but 14 yeeres of age when he began his reigne.

1247. Harold paſſeth into Norway. Is drowned in his returne.

In the yeere 1247, Haco king of Norwaie ſent for Harold king of Man to come vnto his coronation, who comming thither, was honorablie receiued, and obteined king Hacos daughter in mariage: but as he returned from thence, in the yéere 1249, togither with his wife, they periſhed in the ſeas by a tempeſt on the coaſts of Ireland. Then ſucceéded his brother Reginald, who reigned but 27 daies, for he was ſlaine the firſt of June the ſame yéere, by the ſeruants of a knight called Puarus. Then Harold the ſonne of Godred Don gouerned Man one yéere, being remoued by the king of Norwaie: & after him Magnus the ſonne of Olaue began his reigne ouer Man & the other Iles, by conſent of the Manſkemen themſelues. But in the yeere 1254, one Puarus was ordeined king, or rather viceroy of thoſe Iles, & gouerned the ſame, till the foreſaid Magnus king of Norwaie reſigned his title to all the ſaid Iles vnto king Alexander (as ye haue heard) who placed his lieutenants there, of whome the firſt was called Godred mac Mares, the ſecond Alane. And after him Maurice Okarfaire ſucceéded; and then followed one that was the kings chaplaine.

1249. Reginald. He began to reigne the firſt of Maie. Puarus. Harold. Magnus. 1254. Puarus. Lieutenant or bailife of the Ile of Man vnder the Scots.

For the time of the reſignation made, I follow Hector Boetius, by reaſon of ſome contrarietie which appeareth in Southwell in the account of the yeares aſſigned to the reignes of thoſe Iland kings, if you confer the ſame with the time of the foreſaid reſignation. But now to the matter. The lieutenant appointed to haue the rule of thoſe Iles, now that they were thus come into the hands of the Scots, was bound by his office to be readie with thirtéene ſhips, and fiue hundred mariners to come to the aid of the Scots, at all times when he ſhould thereto be required. After this, were the earles of Atholl, Carrike, and March, Alexander Steward, with the thanes of Argile, and Lennox, ſent with a puiſſant armie vnto the other of the weſterne Iles, the which thoſe that were greateſt, they brought with much a doo vnder the obeiſance of the crowne of Scotland, the reſidue ſubmitted themſelues.

The weſterne Iles recouered out of the hands of the Norwegians

The chancellor of Norwaie ambaſſador to king Alexander.

Magnus king of Norwaie informed hereof, ſent eftſoones his chancellor in ambaſſage vnto king Alexander, to trie if he might by treatie recouer againe thoſe Iles: and if he might not bring that to paſſe, yet to compound with him for a yærelie tribute. The firſt motion of the chancellor would in no wiſe be heard, therefore surceaſſing to ſpend anie longer time about it, they fell in communication touching the ſecond, which toke effect at length in this wiſe. King Magnus by his letters vnder his great ſeale, renounced and gaue ouer his right or claime that he had or might haue, both for him and his ſucceſſors to all the Iles of Scotland. And king Alexander for this reſignation was agreed to paie the ſaid king of Norway, foure thouſand marks ſterling, togither with a penſion or tribute of an hundred marks by yeare. And for the more confirmation of loue and amitie betwixt the two kings and their people, Margaret the daughter of king Alexander, being not paſt one yeares of age, was promiſed in mariage vnto Hanigo, the ſonne of king Magnus, the ſame mariage to be conſummat when ſhe came to yeares mariable. Further, in place where the greateſt ſlaughter of Danes and Norwegians had béene made, it was couenanted that an hoſpitall ſhould be erected & founded there, for the ſuſtentation of poore folks.

About this ſeaſon, there were great warres in England betwixt king Henrie and his barons, of whome the chiefe was Simon Mountfort earle of Leiceſter, and diuerſe other. K. Henrie being not well able to withſtand his aduerſaries attempts, requeſted K. Alexander to ſend him ſome aid of Scots to ſubdue the rebels of his realme, that had arreared warres againſt him. Herevpon ſhortlie after, was Alexander Cumin, with fiue thouſand choſen men, ſent by king Alexander into England, who right valiantlie bare themſelues in that war which king

In theſe daies (as the tranſlator of Hector Boetius hath written) that notable and moſt famous outlaw Robin Hood liued, with his fellow little John, of whome are manie fables and merie ieſts deuiſed and ſong amongſt the vulgar people. But Iohn Maior writeth that they liued (as he doth geſſe) in the daies of king Richard the firſt king of England, 1198.

In the yeare next and immediatlie following, after that Henrie king of England had ſubdued his domeſticall enimies, there came a legat from pope Clement the fourth, requiring him to haue a collection of monie in Scotland towards the charges of leuieng an armie againſt the Saracens. But this legat was not receiued into the realme, but commanded to ſhew his meſſage vpon the borders. He demanded therfore of euerie pariſh-church in Scotland foure marks ſterling, and of euerie abbeie foure ſcore marks. And to the end he might the ſooner purchaſe fauor to the furtherance of his purpoſe, he deuiſed by the way certeine ſtatutes and ordinances right profitable to be vſed in the realme of Scotland, as he iudged. But king Alexander for answer hereunto alledged, that the Scots minded not to receiue anie ſtatutes or decrees, other than ſuch as were ordeined by the pope, or ſome generall councell: for by a generall rule; The more precepts, the more offendors are alwaies found. And as touching the requeſt made for the collection of ſo great ſummes of monie, it was not thought neceſſarie, that ſo much coine ſhould go forth of the realme: neuertheleſſe if it were thought expedient, he would be contented to ſend forth at his owne proper coſts and charges, a number of armed men to go with the chriſtian armie againſt the Turks: but for monie otherwiſe forth, the realme would not depart with anie, leaſt it ſhould be waſtfullie ſpent, or taken by the way of théeues, as it had béene aforetime.

Henrie king of England praiſed much the wiſedome of king Alexander for this his anſwer, as he declared ſhortlie after by his ſonne prince Edward, who came to viſit his ſiſter the queene, and his brother in law king Alexander at Roxſburgh, where they met him; for ye muſt vnderſtand that K. Henrie had alſo learned by experience to be wiſe in that behalfe, as well as others. King Alexander yet after this ſent vnto the pope a thouſand marks in ſiluer: and vnto Lewes the French king, that required his aid in that iournie which he made into Affrike againſt the Saracens there, a thouſand ſouldiers, vnder the leading of the earles of Carrike & Atholl, Iohn Steward brother of Alexander Steward, Alexander Cumin, Robert Keth, George Durward, Iohn Quincie, & William Gordon. All theſe going ouer with K. Lewes into Affrike, died there, either vpon the enimies ſword, or by the intemperat heat of that countrie (whereto they had not béene accuſtomed) in the yeare after the incarnation 1270. The earle of Carrike, whoſe name was Thomas, periſhing thus amongſt the reſidue in Affrike, left no inheritor behind him to inioy his lands, ſauing a daughter named Martha, being then about fifteene yeares of age. This yong ladie, chancing to ride on hunting in the woods for paſtime and ſolace, as the vſe is, fortuned by aduenture to méet with a noble yong man one Robert Bruſe the ſonne and heire to Robert Bruſe the lord of Anandale in Scotland, and Cleueland in England, begot of Iſabell the ſecond daughter of Dauid earle of Huntington. The ladie immediatlie became ſo inamored of this yong gentleman, that ſhe led him with hir home vnto Carrike, where (without making hir friends priuie to the matter) ſhe maried him in all haſt, leaſt anie man ſhould be about to hinder hir determined purpoſe. Of this mariage was borne that Robert Bruſe which afterwards (through want of heires of the linage of king Alexander) atteined the crowne of Scotland. As ſoone as Alexander was aduertiſed hereof, he tooke ſuch indignation that ſhe ſhould beſtow hir ſelfe ſo lightlie vpon one whom ſhe neuer ſaw before, that he ſeized hir caſtell of Turneberie into his hands, with all hir other lands and poſſeſſions, as it were by eſcheat, for that ſhe had maried without his conſent. Notwithſtanding, within ſhort while after he tooke pitie on hir caſe, and for an eaſie compoſition of monie which ſhe paied for hir mariage, reſtored to hir againe all hir lands and liuings, ſuffering hir to inioy hir huſband without anie more trouble or veration. In the third yeare after, the ſaid ladie was deliuered of the afore-remembred Robert Bruſe that was after king of Scotland. And the ſame yeare, which was the yeare after the birth of our Sauiour 1274, Dauid the ſecond ſon of king Alexander deceaſſed; and the third yeare after, the brethren of Edward king of England came into Scotland to viſit the queene their ſiſter, & their brother in law the K. & after did attend them in their iournie to London, whither they went to be preſent at the coronation of the foreſaid Edward, as then returned forth of Affrike after the deceaſſe of his father king Henrie, to take vpon him the gouernement of the kingdome deſcended vnto him by right of inheritance. He was crowned the ſame yeare on the day of the aſſumption of our ladie in Auguſt, with great ſolemnitie and triumph.

At the ſame time there was a Norman in king Edwards court, of ſuch paſſing ſtrength of bodie, that he ouerthrew all men with whome he wreſtled, till at length one Ferquhard a Scotiſhman borne, of the countrie of Roſſe, deſcended of noble parentage, vanquiſhed him to his great praiſe & aduancement in honor: for king Alexander in guerdon of ſo worthie a déed there done in the preſence of ſo honorable an aſſemblie, gaue vnto him the earledome of Roſſe for euermore. Of this Ferquhard ſucceéded fiue earles all of his ſurname, but the firſt earle was named William Roſſe, otherwiſe Leſlie, in whoſe ſonne the ſeuenth earle failed the dignitie of that houſe for fault of ſucceſſion. At the ſame time prince Alexander king Alexanders ſonne did homage vnto king Edward for the earledome of Huntington, as the Scotiſh writers do teſtifie. Shortlie after that king Alexander was returned forth of England at that time into Scotland, his wife queene Margaret deceaſſed, and was buried in Dunfirmling. She bare by him two ſonnes, Alexander and Dauid, and one daughter named Margaret, the which (according to the aſſurance before made) was maried about three yeares after hir mothers deceaſſe, vnto Hanigo, or rather Aquine king of Norwaie, and deceaſſed in the ſecond yeare after the ſolemnization of the mariage, leauing behind hir a daughter named alſo Margaret.

For firſt his eldeſt ſonne prince Alexander, being not paſt twentie yeares of age, departed out of this world, without leauing anie iſſue behind him; and not long after, his daughter Margaret queene of Norwaie deceaſſed alſo, leauing behind hir one onelie daughter (as before is mentioned) being as yet but an infant.

In the ſame yeare was a generall councell holden at Lions, the pope and a great multitude of the prelats of chriſtendome being there aſſembled. To this councell were ſummoned to appeare all the prouincials, wardens, and miniſters of the begging friers. And for that there were ſo manie ſundrie orders of them, each man deuiſing of his owne braine ſome new alteration; all thoſe orders were reduced into the foure orders, which after by the church of Rome were approued and allowed. A generall commandement was alſo giuen, that no man ſhould go about to begin anie new forme of ſuch vaine ſuperſtitious orders, which appoint themſelues to eſchue labor, to the end they may liue in pleaſure, luſt & idleneſs, vpon the trauell of other mens browes. In this mean time, after that the chriſtian armie was returned home out of Affrike, by reaſon of a truce concluded with the Soldan, the ſame Soldan (that truce notwithſtanding) ceaſſed not to make great ſlaughters and inuaſions vpon thoſe chriſtian men that remained behind. The chriſtian princes ſore moued herewith, made their appreſts for a new expedition into the holie land. The Scots gaue the tenth penie of all their lands, or rather (as ſome bookes ſay) the tenth part of all tithes belonging to churches, to the furtherance of this iornie: notwithſtanding through ſuch enuie and contentions as roſe amongſt the ſaid princes, that iornie brake, to the great damage and preiudice of the chriſtian faith.

King Alexander hauing loſt his wife and children, in maner as is before expreſſed, not onelie hee himſelfe, but alſo all Scotland was in great penſiuenelſe and ſorrow, each man by a certeine foreiudgement and miſgiuing in mind, doubting the miſhap that might thereof inſue. But yet did king Alexander, by the aduiſe of his nobles, in hope of new iſſue, marie the daughter of the earle of Champaigne in France, named Iolant. The mariage was celebrated at Jedburgh with great feaſting and triumph: but that ioy and blithneſſe indured not long after. For the ſame yeare on the 18 day of Aprill, as he was galloping vpon a fierce horſſe at Kingorne, forcing him in his race ſomewhat raſhlie, he was throwne ouer the weſt cliffe towards the ſea by a wonderfull miſfortune, ſo rudelie, that he brake his necke, and ſo therewith immediatlie died in the 42 yeere of his reigne. He was buried at Dunfirmling, in the yeere after the incarnation 1290. It is ſaid, that the daie before the kings death, the earle of March a little before night, demanded of one Thomas Leirmont, otherwiſe named Thomas the rimer, or (as the tranſlator of Hector Boetius ſaith) Thomas Erſilton (who in thoſe daies was reputed for a noble prophetier) or (as we may call him) a ſoothſaier, what weather they ſhould haue on the morow? Thomas of Erſilton or the rimer.

On the morrow when the ſkie appeared cleare and bright, without cloud or anie other ſigne of foule weather, and that it drew neere vnto the midſt of the daie, and no wind heard from anie ſide, but all calme and quiet, the earle of March ſent for the forenamed Thomas, and told him that he had miſtaken his marks, in propheſieng of anie ſuch notable tempeſt as he had ſpoken of the night before, conſidering it proued ſo lithe a daie, without appearance of anie tempeſt to inſue. This Thomas ſaid little thereto, ſauing that he ſaid it was not yet paſt none. And incontinentlie herevpon came a poſt to the caſtell gate of Dunbar, where this earle of March as then laie, bringing word of the kings ſudden death, as before is recited. Then ſaid the propheſier: That is the ſcathfull wind and dreadfull tempeſt, which ſhall blow ſuch calamitie and trouble to the whole ſtate of the whole realme of Scotland. This Thomas was a man in great admiration of the people, ſhewing ſundrie things, as they afterward chanced: howbeit they were euer hid and inuolued vnder the veile of darke and obſcure ſpeeches.

Manie ſtrange wonders and vnketh ſights were ſeene in the daies of this Alexander the third. In the 17 yeere of his reigne, there was ſuch an infinit number of wormes through all the parties of Albion, that not onelie the leaues and fruits of trees, but alſo flowres & herbs in gardens were eaten vp and conſumed with them. And in the ſame yeere, the waters of Forth and Taie roſe with ſuch high tides in flowing ouer the banks, that manie townes and villages were drowned, to the great deſtruction both of men and beaſts. In the 20 yere of his reigne, there was a comet or blaſing ſtarre ſeene of a meruellous quantitie, ſhining euerie day toward the ſouth, euen about none daies. On the Epiphanie day next after, roſe ſo great winds, with ſtormes of ſuch vnmeaſurable great haileſtones, that manie townes were throwne downe by violence thereof. In the meane time, roſe through the vehement rage of winds, a ſudden fire, in manie bounds within the realme of Scotland, that did much hurt to buildings and edifices, burning vp ſteeples with ſuch force of fire, that the belles were in diuerſe places melted, as though it had beene in a furnace. Amongeſt other, thoſe of the abbeie of Abirbrothoke were moſt pretious, which were as then conſumed togither with the ſteeple wherein they hong. The townes of Aberden and Perth were burned the ſame time: alſo part of Lainrike, with the temple, and all the townes and villages in Clow, a part of Angus: and likewiſe manie townes and other buildings in Louthian, and in diuers other parts of the realme, too long here to rehearſe.

In the 31 yeere of his reigne, was the firſt comming of the peſtilence into Scotland, with great mortalitie of the people, where it had not bene heard that euer this ſickneſſe had come within that realme before that time. In the ſolemnization of the ſecond mariage of king Alexander, as the bridegroome (according to the manner) led the bride in a danſe, a great number of lords and ladies following them in the ſame danſe, there appeared to their ſight as it were cloſing vp the hindermoſt of the danſers, a creature reſembling death, all naked of fleſh & lire, with bare bones right dreadfull to behold. Through which ſpectacle, the king and the reſidue of all the companie were ſo aſtonied, and put in ſuch fright & feare, that they had quicklie made an end of their danſe for that time. In the daies of this Alexander the third, liued ſundrie great clearkes. Amongſt other, Michaell Scot was reputed for an excellent phyſician, and for his ſingular practiſe & knowledge in that profeſſion was no leſſe eſteemed and had in high fauour with Edward king of England, than with king Alexander, during his life time.

The lawes of Alexander the third.

* This Alexander made manie healthfull and good lawes, whereof moſt by the negligence of men, and longneſſe of time are worne away; ſo that things ſo profitablie by him deuiſed, ſéeme rather by report to haue béene ordeined, than that they are by cuſtome practiſed. He diuided the kingdome into foure parts, through which he made his progreſſe almoſt euerie yéere, remaining about thrée moneths in euerie place, there to ſit in iudgement, and to heare the complaints of the poore, at what time the meaneſt perſon might haue frée acceſſe vnto him. As often as he went into anie prouince to giue ſentence of law, he commanded the gouernor of that place to receiue him with a choſen companie; and when he departed thence, to bring him to the borders of his iuriſdiction, where he was honorablie receiued of the next gouernors. The which trauelling about his realme he vſed, to the end that he might know all his nobilitie, and that he might alſo be knowne of all others. During which time of his progreſſe, no great traine or multitude of courtiers did follow him; bicauſe he would not charge his people in receiuing of them; and for that cauſe alſo abated and reſtreined the troupe of horſemen which followed the nobilitie, and brought them into a certeine & meane number, bicauſe he ſuppoſed that the multitude of horſſes (whereof in warre there was no vſe) were néedleſſe deuourers of meat. Further, he forbad his people to trauell by ſea for gaine or merchandize, when he conſidered that through the vnſkilfulnes of ſailing, the raſhneſſe that men vſed in committing themſelues to the ſeas, and the rapine of pirats, manie men were loſt, and their goods ſpoiled: whereby the merchants were driuen to extreame pouertie. Which precept when it had continued almoſt a whole yéere, and by manie mens ſpéeches was reprehended as dangerous and hurtfull to the weale publike, at the length there arriued ſuch plentie of ſtrange merchandize in Scotland, that the abundance and cheapeneſſe thereof did exceed the memorie of anie former age. But yet to take order with and for the benefit of the merchants, he forbad his people to buie anie thing brought in by ſtrangers, but ſuch as were merchants of his land, and that all the other people ſhould buie of them ſuch things as they néeded.)

Scotland without a K. and gouernor.

King Alexander the third, being in ſuch miſerable wiſe deceaſſed, as before is ſpecified, the realme remained in great diſcomfort, by reſon he had neither left anie iſſue behind him to ſucceed in the gouernement thereof, neither taken order in his life time by teſtament, or otherwiſe, for anie other to ſupplie the rome of a gouernor, ſo that hereof inſued ſuch infinit miſorders, by the preſumption of wicked and vngratious perſons, the which vpon hope to eſcape vnpuniſhed (bicauſe iuſtice was like to want due proceſſe) ceaſſed not to attempt manie vnlawfull acts, to the grieuous oppreſſion of the people: which miſruled demeanors and diſordered enterpriſes of thoſe outragious perſons, when ſuch as had anie zeale to the wealth of their countrie vnderſtood dailie to multiplie and increaſe, they thought it apperteined to their duties to prouide ſome remedie in due time, and thereupon called a councell togither, wherein after ſundrie conſultations had, and manie matters debated touching the rule of the realme, it was finallie agréed, that ſix gouernors ſhould be elected and choſen, of the which thrée ſhould haue the adminiſtration and rule of the north parts, and theſe were William Fraſer biſhop of ſaint Andrews, Duncane earle of Fife, & John Cumin earle of Buchquane. The other thrée were appointed to the gouernance of the ſouth countries, that is to ſay, Robert biſhop of Glaſcow, ſir John Cumin (a man of high eſtimation for his wiſdome and experience as well in matters concerning peace as warre) and James high ſteward of Scotland.

But in the meane time Edward king of England, ſurnamed Longſhanks, caſt in his mind, how he might make ſome conqueſt of Scotland, now the ſame was thus deſtitute of an head to gouerne it. And for that he well vnderſtood that the daughter of Norwaie (of whom before ye haue heard) was right inheritor to the crowne of Scotland, though ſhe were but verie yong in yéeres, & not able for marriage: yet to compaſſe his purpoſe that waies forth, he ſent his ambaſſadors vnto the lords of Scotland, requiring to haue hir to wife, and the realme withall, as due vnto hir by good title and right of inheritance. The lords, after long deliberation herein had, conſented to his deſire, vnder theſe conditions, that the realme ſhould remaine in all freedoms and liberties, without anie kind of ſeruile ſubiection, in the ſame maner and ſtate as it was vſed in the daies of king Alexander laſt deceaſſed, and other his noble progenitors: and if it chanced, that no iſſue came of this mariage to ſucceed them, then ſhuld the crowne returne by remainder ouer to the next heirs of king Alexander, without anie claime or pretert of title to be made by king Edward, or anie of his ſucceſſors in time to come.

How can this be true, when K. Edward had a wife at that time? but verelie the Scotiſh writers ſhew themſelues ouercome with too much malice in moſt things which they write in the defamatiõ of K. Edward.

Immediatlie herewith, two noble knights, ſir John Scot of Albanie, and ſir James Wemis, were ſent into Norwaie to fetch the bride ouer into Scotland: but before their comming thither, ſhee was deceaſſed, & ſo they returned backe into Scotland againe without effect of their errand. And thus by means of hir death, all amitie betwixt Engliſhmen and Scots ceaſſed. Then began to inſue great trouble and buſineſſe in Scotland, by reaſon of the contention which ſprang betwixt the kinſmen of king Alexander, for the title and claime which they ſeuerallie made and pretended to the crowne. There were thrée chiefelie that ſéemed by néereneſſe of bloud to haue moſt right, and therefore made moſt earneſt ſute in their claime: John Baliol, Robert Bruſe, and John Haſtings. This Robert Bruſe was ſonne to the ſon of that Robert Bruſe, which maried Iſabell the yongeſt daughter to Dauid earle of Huntington, on whom he got a ſon named alſo Robert, that maried the inheritor of Carrike, as we haue ſhewed before, whoſe ſonne this Robert Bruſe was, that now claimed the crowne. John Baliol came of Margaret, eldeſt daughter to the foreſaid Dauid earle of Huntington: for Alane lord of Galloway, which maried the ſaid Margaret, begot on hir two daughters, of the which the eldeſt named Deruogill, was giuen in mariage vnto ſir John Baliol, father vnto this John Baliol, that thus made claime to the crowne: alledging that forſomuch that he was come of the eldeſt daughter of earle Dauid, the brother of king William, he ought by reaſon to be reputed as next heire to the ſame king William, ſith none other perſon alriue approched ſo néere vnto him in bloud.

* Here I thinke it conuenient before any more be ſpoken of this hiſtorie, to interlace ſomewhat (beſides that which is alredie ſpoken, being here in part repeated (of the deſcent of this Deruogill, the daughter of Alane lord of Galloway, beginning the ſame ſomewhat higher, in this ſort. In the reigne of William K. of Scots, which began in the yere of Chriſt 1160, as ſaith Leſleus, lib. 6. pag. 226, Fergulius gouernor of Galloway left two ſons, Gilbert, and Ethred, who after the death of their father, fell at variance for the lands of Galloway, to be diuided betwixt them in equall portions. quench thoſe flames of vnkindneſſe betweene the ſaid brethren, and for that cauſe with indifferencie (as he ſuppoſed) he ment to pacifie and ſatisfie each part, by diuiding the inheritance equallie betweene them. But Gilbert highlie taking this partition in grudge (bicauſe he was eldeſt, & that the whole inheritance belonged to him) did with like hatred purſue both the king and his brother, the one as enuious againſt him, and the other as an vnequall iudge, in giuing his right from him. Wherfore when king William was taken priſoner of the Engliſhmen, this Gilbert being of bold ſpirit (and now by the kings miſhap out of all danger, being deliuered from the feare of anie law) began to vtter his conceiued hatred till this time couertlie concealed. For vpon the ſudden, he toke his brother priſoner, put out his eies, cut out his tong, and not contented with a ſimple death (to be giuen vnto him at one inſtant) did moſt miſerablie a long time togither put him to paine, by diſmembring the ſeuerall parts of his bodie, before he ſhould die. After which wretched fact againſt his owne brother, he ioined himſelfe to the Engliſh nation, and taking preies on the borders, he did vnnaturallie and traitorouſlie (as it were an vtter enimie to his countrie) rage againſt his owne citizens, with all kind of murther and ſlaughter of battell. In which he did ſuch harme, and ſo great oppreſſion, as if he had not bene reſiſted by his nephue Rowland (gathering a ſtrong power to him of ſuch common people as remained ſtedfaſt in dutifull obedience to the impriſoned king) he had vtterlie ſpoiled all the countries adioining to England, or elſe would wholie haue brought them into his ſubiection. For this Rowland a luſtie yong gentleman, bold of ſpirit, indued with noble ſtrength of mind and bodie, did not onelie beat downe the force of his vncle, but did manie times (and that ſometimes moſt happilie) fight with the Engliſh, when they ſpoiled his natiue ſoile, or that he made anie inuaſion into their borders.

Of this matter though not ſo fullie is ſomewhat intreated before, pag. 275.

The crueltie of one brother to another.

At length when king William was deliuered of reſtreint, and returned into Scotland, this Gilbert (notwithſtanding all his former euils) by the mediation of his friends, found fauor in the king, and was pardoned of all his offenſes, but yet ſo as he promiſed to make recompenſe of all ſuch damages as he had committed; for the ſure performance whereof, he found ſufficient pledges to the king. But Gilbert ſhortlie after departing this life, they which had ſerued vnder him, giuen by continuall vſe vnto theſt and blood, did yéeld themſelues to the fauourable protection of the king of England, either for inconſtancie of mind, or feare of puniſhment, being touched with remorſe of conſcience for the euill which they had before committed. Theſe men thus ſhadowed vnder the wings of England, did againe take armes againſt their countrie, vnder the conduct of Gilpatrike, Henrie Kennedie, and Samuell, who before had bæne authors and executors to Gilbert, of all ſuch euils as were by him performed. Againſt whom was Rowland ſent with an armie, who in a ſet battell ſlue the capteine, and a multitude of both kinds of the common people. They which eſcaped the conflict, did flie to the refuge of one Gilcombe, capteine of ſuch perſons as liued vpon ſpoile and pilfering, who by continuance of followers, & increaſe of people, were now growne to ſome number, & did wander ouer all Louthian, robbing & ſpoiling in euerie place where they ſet fot: and not ſo content, did from thence paſſe into Galloway, where this Gilcombe toke in hand the defenſe of Gilberts cauſe (now vtterlie forſaken of all men) vnder colour whereof, he not onelie challenged the inheritance belonging to Gilbert, but alſo behaued himſelfe as chiefe lord of all Galloway. At length incountering with this

The king of England highlie offended therwith (bicauſe the yere before they had ſworne themſelues to ſerue faithfullie vnder him againſt their owne bloud) came in haſte with a maine armie to Carleill to ſéeke reuenge thereof. Which when William king of Scots vnderſtood, he laboured by all the meanes he could, to appeaſe the king of Englands diſpleaſure, and to reconcile this Rowland vnto him. In the end the king of Scots wrought ſo with the Engliſh, that Rowland was admitted to come to Carleill to the preſence of the king of England; the which Rowland did accordinglie. At what time before the king of England, refelling the ſlanderous accuſations of his aduerſaries (and further declaring that he had done nothing either raſhlie, or vniuſtlie againſt his and the common wealths enimie) he was honorablie by the Engliſh king ſuffered to depart from Carleill. Theſe things thus done, & king William returned into Scotland, he called to remembrance the continuall conſtancie and good ſeruice, which Ethred the father of Rowland had manie times done to him and to the realme; therewithall not forgetting the worthie exploits which this Rowland had of late performed for the common wealth: for which conſiderations he worthilie recompenſed the ſaid Rowland, in beſtowing on him the whole countrie of Galloway. And further (although he did not merit the ſame by reaſon of his fathers euils) yet the king mildlie conſidering, that the ſonne was not to beare the offenſe of the father (but hoping by this vndeſerued liberalitie, to bind him faithfullie to ſerue him) did giue the lands of Carrike vnto the ſonne of the ſaid Gilbert. All which William Paruus reporteth to haue happened in the yéere of Chriſt 1183.

Rowland being thus made lord of Galloway, maried the ſiſter of William Moruill conſtable of Scotland, who dieng without iſſue, obteined the ſame office by inheritance in right of his wife, from whome did iſſue Alane lord of Galloway, and conſtable of Scotland, by inheritance from his mother, a valiant gentleman, and ſuch a perſon as for his notable ſeruice (imploied in Ireland on the behalfe of John king of England) was rewarded by the ſaid king with honorable and rich reuenues: for which by the permiſſion of William king of Scotland, he profeſſed himſelfe the liege man of John king of England, and ſware fealtie vnto him. This Alane (as is before ſaid) maried Margaret the elder daughter of Dauid earle of Huntington, of whome he raiſed three daughters, whereof the eldeſt being Dornagill, was maried to Balioll, the ſecond to Bruſe: in right of which Dornagill, the ſonne of this Balioll challenged the crowne of Scotland, as deſcended from the elder ſiſter.) On the other ſide Robert Bruſe, albeit he was deſcended of the yongeſt daughter to earle Dauid, yet was he come of the firſt iſſue male, for his father was firſt borne, and therefore if king William had deceaſſed without iſſue, the crowne had deſcended to him: for which conſideration he mainteined that he ought now to be preferred. Haſtings alſo for his part, bicauſe he was come of the yongeſt daughter of king Dauid, maried to his father Henrie Haſtings, wanted not allegations to propone, why he ought to be admitted. Beſide theſe, there were other alſo, that made claime to the crowne of Scotland, and had matter ſufficient to mainteine their ſute. This controuerſie being brought before the gouernors, was at ſundrie times argued with much contention, not without the assistance of the nobles fauoring the parties, as occasion of friendship or kinred moued them, namelie Baliol and Bruse had no small number that leaned vnto their parts, by reason whereof, the gouernors were in doubt to proceed to anie definite sentence in the matter, least if they declared one of them king, an other would attempt to vsurpe the crowne by force.

The doubt of the gouernors

Herevpon they iudged it best to referre the decision of all this whole matter to some mightie king, which was of puissance able to constreine the parties repugnant to obeie his sentence. Hereunto was none thought so meet as Edward king of England, and therfore they chose him [Of whose faith and loue towards them, they did not anie whit mistrust, bicause Alexander the last king of Scots had found the father of this Edward, both a louing father in law to himselfe, and vpright tutor to his realme. Whereunto also they ioined this cause of hope in king Edward, for that the said Edward had of late before tried the fauor of the Scots towards him, by a singular testimonie, in that they so easilie consented to ioine the heire of Scotland with the son of the said Edward.] Whereupon king Edward toke this charge vpon him, as competent iudge, & promised by a certein day to come vnto Berwike, willing that their councell might be assembled there against that time. At his comming thither, at the day assigned, and hauing heard what could be said on ech part, and throughlie considering at length their allegations, he perceiued the same doubtfull, and required a longer time to discusse the truth by good aduise of counsell: and therefore required to haue twelue Scotishmen, the best learned and most skilfull lawiers of all the realme to be associat with twelue Englishmen, which he promised to chose forth of the most perfect and wisest clerks that might be found within all his dominions, to the intent that by their ripe and aduised debating of the matter, the truth might appere, according to the which he minded to giue sentence, without fauor either of one part or other. [Before which he toke a solemne oth of the ambassadors of Scotland, and such nobles as were there to stand to his definitiue sentence, further therevpon requiring a writing to be made, sealed with the seales of the same nobles.] After when all such matters and proues as were proponed by the parties, alledged by them for furtherance of their titles were put in writing, as matter of record, he returned backe againe into England.

Fr. Thin. Buchanan.

The nobles sweare to stand to the order of king Edward.

The title doubtfull.

¶ Here the Scotish writers report, that king Edward vsed himselfe nothing vprightlie in this matter, but accordinglie (as it often happeneth) had the eies of his conscience blinded, vpon hope to gaine somewhat by this credit thus to him committed. But how vniustlie he is slandered in this behalfe, I leaue to the indifferent readers to consider, by conferring that which the Scots do write thereof, with that which is to be found in our English historie. But to proceed as we find it in the Scotish writers. King Edward to be satisfied in knowledge of the truth, sent into France for men learned and of great experience in the lawes, that he might haue their opinions in the demands of the parties for their doubtfull rights. But (saith Hector Boetius) he first commanded them in no wise to agree vpon anie resolute point, but rather to varie in opinions, that when the plee should seeme doubtfull by reason of their contrarietie in deciding thereof, he might the better vnder that colour, giue iudgement with which partie he thought most expedient to serue his purpose.

This report of the Scotish writers smelleth altogither of malice conceiued against him, for that he scourged them so sore for their vntruths.

Respect of persons in deciding controuersies is not to be considered.

Howbeit the most part of the lawiers iudged with Robert Bruse, both for the worthines of his person, and also for that he was come of the first issue male. But some there were that gaue sentence with John Baliol, for that he was descended of the eldest sister. King Edward supposing this to be the time most conuenient for his purposed intention to conquer the realme of Scotland, returned to Berwike, where he had appointed the 24 learned men before specified, to be present, that finall sentence might be giuen, according as he had before promised. When he was come thus vnto Berwike, and the foresaid 24 learned lawiers assembled as assistants with him, and the parties appering before him in a chamber prouided for the purpose, he caused the dores to be suerlie kept, and the entries stronglie warded, that no man might come in or out, but by his appointment and licence. His purpose was to make him king, that would be sworne to hold the crowne of Scotland of him, as superior lord thereof. And bicause he knew that Robert Bruse was a man of singular manhod and wisedome, he thought best to assaie him first, and if he found him not conformable to his purpose, then he minded to trie what the Baliol would do.

K. Edward commeth to Berwike.

The purpose of king Edward, as the Scots do vntrulie report.

When Robert Bruse had throughlie heard king Edwards motion, he answered that he weied the libertie of his countrie, more than his priuate preferment, and therefore minded not to deliuer his countrie (which euen to that day had beene free) into the bondage and seruitude of the Englishmen. King Edward perceiuing his stoutnesse of stomach, brake off with him, and fell in talke with the Baliol, who had such blind desire to atteine the crowne, that he passed not whether he inioied the same in libertie or seruitude, so he might haue it. Heere vpon when this Baliol had giuen his faith by assured oth vnto king Edward, that he would do homage vnto him for the realme of Scotland, and acknowledge to hold the same of him as superior lord, king Edward gaue sentence with him, to haue most right to the crowne and realme of Scotland, now thus in controuersie.

The answer of Robert Bruse.

The Baliol promiseth to do homage to king Edward

It is said, that the earle of Gloucester, a man of great prudence and authoritie in England (seeing the Baliol thus made king, and Robert Bruse without reason put backe) spake in this sort to king Edward: Oh king, remember what is done by thee this day, sparing to giue righteous sentence in this matter; for though the same be now couered and hid, it shall be reuealed, when the great iudge that searcheth consciences, and the secrets of euerie mans mind, shall cause thee to answer for it at the dreadfull day of that vniuersall iudgement: thou hast now giuen sentence on a king, but then shall iudgement be giuen on thee. Shortlie after, John Baliol went in great arraie vnto Scone, where he was crowned king of Scotland on saint Andrewes day, in the yeere from the incarnation 1292. In the yeere next insuing, on saint Stephans day in Christmasse, he came to Newcastell vpon Tine, and there did homage vnto king Edward for the realme of Scotland, contrarie to the mind and consent of all his nobles, for that by this meanes, he seemed to submit his realme (which had remained in freedome vnto those daies) into the seruitude of the Englishmen: but small felicitie succeeded therof. * And heere it appereth by Buchanan, that the nobilitie of Scotland, which held with Baliol, did also their homage: for being farre from home, they durst not contend against the power of two kings. Whereof some taking it greeuouslie in their hart, dissembled with the present time, and couered their anger vnder the cinders of a faire countenance, which yet in the end burst out, notwithstanding this painted shew. For the declaration and proofe whereof, there was shortlie after occasion offered to Makduffe, by the death of the earle of Fife, being (in the time when there was no king) made one of the six gouernors of the realme: for this earle was not onelie killed by these of Abirnethie (which (which familie did then greatlie flouriſh in riches and authoritie within Scotland) but the brother alſo of the ſaid earle was called into law by the Abirnethians, for whome the king in aſſemblie of the ſtates did giue ſentence againſt the other. This Makduffe after the land thereof the contention grew was ſo adiudged, ſuppoſing therein the king to be more vniuſt againſt him than was cauſe, and that the king was not ſo ſeuere a reuenger of his brothers death, as he hoped that he would be; forſoke the Balioll, and appealed to the king of England, before whom he commenſed his ſute againſt Balioll. The deciding whereof was appointed to be holden at London, where was an aſſemblie or parlement of the nobilitie, after the Engliſh manner, amongſt whome this Balioll had his place alſo.

John Balioll king of Scots anſwered a ſute cõmenſed againſt him in the parlement of England as an inferior perſon ſhould.

The parlement begun and Balioll there ſummoned or cited, would haue anſwered by his proctor or attornie: but this (not being allowed) Balioll was compelled to riſe out of his ſeat, and to defend his cauſe himſelfe in an inferior place. Which contumelie when he durſt not at anie time reuenge, ſecretlie he ſtill bare in mind, vntill fit opportunitie might anſwer the reuenge thereof. But when he would, and then could not deliuer himſelfe of ſuch diſgrace; he returned home with a mind of deadlie anger, rolling mounteins of choler therein, who ſtill bending himſelfe on euerie ſide to ſatiſfie his anger, dwelled on this point; how he might reconcile the hearts of his ſubiects: and offend the ſtate of the Engliſh. Whileſt Balioll with this meditation was feeding his hot ſtomach, a fit means was now offered to performe his deſire, by reaſon of the wars newlie growen betweene England and France, as after ſhall appeare. For vpon this occaſion of wars, king Edward of England commanded this Balioll by tenure of his land, & tenure of his homage, to come with all the power he could prepare to aid him in his warres againſt the king of France.)

Ambaſſadors into England

King John Balioll incontinentlie herewith became repentant, in that he had indangered himſelfe thus by doing his homage; and therevpon ſent his ambaſſadors to king Edward, as then ſoiourning at London, to renounce his act touching the ſame homage, alledging that for ſomuch as it was done without the aduiſe of the three eſtates of Scotland, it was of no ſtrength in it ſelfe, and not meete to be obſerued being done by force; for which cauſe he would renounce his friendſhip and alliance, aſwell for manie other iniuries done vnto him and his; as for that he would ſeeke to reſtore his countrie to his former libertie. Which meſſage when none of the better ſort durſt take in hand to execute, a certeine monke (or as other haue the abbat of Alberbrothie) caried theſe letters into England, vpon the receit whereof, king Edward anſwered the ambaſſadors (whom he tawnted with innumerable contumelies) that ſince we perceiue (ſaith he) your king will not come vnto vs, we intend ſhortlie to come vnto him, wherewith the ambaſſadors departed. Butus (ſaith Buchanan) could ſcarſelie returne home in ſafetie: being at his returne into Scotland rather had in contempt of his owne people, than ante iot reuerenced for ſuch an ambaſſage.

The league renewed betwixt France and Scotland.

After this, king Edward the better to accompliſh his purpoſe againſt the Scots, found meanes to conclude a peace with the king of France, and for the more confirmation of the ſame peace, the French kings daughter was giuen in mariage vnto king Edward his ſonne. Puertheleſſe (as ſaith the Scotiſh chronicle) he purpoſed (when he had wrought his will once againſt the Scots) to inuade France as fiercelie as before, notwithſtanding anie bond of amitie or mariage by him contracted. After this, he procured the friendſhip of Robert Bruſe, and vpon promiſe (as it is to be thought) to make him king, the ſame Robert deliuered into king Edward his hands all ſuch caſtels as he held in Scotland. John Balioll the Scotiſh king, vnderſtanding that king Edward minded to make a conqueſt vpon him, ſent William biſhop of ſaint Andrews, and Matthew biſhop of Dunkeld, with ſir John Sowlis, and ſir Ingram Umfraiuile into France, to renew the ancient league betwixt him and Philip the fourth, as then king of France; which accordinglie was done: and for the more corroboration thereof, the eldeſt daughter of Charles earle of Vallois and Anion, brother to king Philip, was promiſed in mariage vnto Edward Balioll, the ſonne of king John, which Edward ſhould inioy lands of yearelie rents & reuenues to the ſumme of fiftéene hundred pounds ſterling, in places not of the demeſnes belonging to the crowne, as Ballieuille, Dampiere, Harecourt, and Norreie, which his father held in France with Lanarke, Kidon, Maldeſeie, Cuningham, and the caſtell of Dundæ, with the appurtenances in Scotland: and hereto was annexed a prouiſo, that if thoſe ſeigniories and places exceeded the value of fiftéene hundred pounds of yearelie reuenues, then ſhould the ſurpluſage remaine to the K. of Scotland: but if the ſame amounted not to that ſumme, then ſhould the ſaid king make them good, and ſupplie the ſame with other rents in Scotland, or otherwiſe, as ſhould be thought meet. And further, the ſaid ſumme of fiftéene hundred pounds in yearlie rent was aſſigned as it were the dower of the ſaid ladie, to inioy to hir ſelfe during hir life after hir husbands deceaſſe, if hir hap were to ſuruiue him.

Ex chron. Abindon, as I take it.

In conſideration whereof, king Philip couenanted to content and pay vnto king John in name of the mariage monie, the ſumme of 40000 crownes, or (as other write) 25000 pounds Turnois. The charter conteining the articles, couenants, and agreements of this mariage and league aboue mentioned, beareth date at Paris, the 23 day of October, in the yeare of our Lord 1295. And the letters procuratorie made by king John to the ſaid biſhop of ſaint Andrewes, & the other his aſſociats, bare date at Striueling, the third nones of Julie the ſame yeare. Shortlie herevpon, king John was aduertiſed that king Edward purpoſed to come and beſiege Berwike; wherefore by aduiſe of his nobles he ſent the moſt part of all the lords and gentlemen of Fife and Louthian vnto Berwike, to defend the towne againſt the enimie, if he came to beſiege it. The Engliſhmen came not onelie with a mightie power by land, but alſo with a great nauie by ſea towards the ſaid towne of Berwike. Of whoſe comming the Scots being aduertiſed, came forth againſt thoſe that approched by ſea, toke 17 of their ſhips, and chaſed awaie the reſidue.

King Edward rather prouoked than feared with this miſaduenture, came with a farre greater puiſſance than before, to renew the ſiege: but when he perceiued his purpoſe toke not ſo ſpeedie effect as he hoped it ſhould haue done, he deuiſed how to take this towne by ſome ſlightfull policie. Herevpon he feined as though he would haue broken vp his ſiege, and ſo raiſing his campe, withdrew a little from the towne, and then hauing prouided banners and enſignes, reſembling altogither ſuch as diuerſe noblemen in Scotland vſed, he ſuddenlie returned toward the towne, euerie one of his ſouldiers wearing a croſſe of ſaint Andrewes aboue on their harneſſe, after the manner of the Scotiſhmen. There were alſo ſent before vnto the towne, certeine Scots that ſerued the king of England, which gaue knowledge to the capteins within the towne, that their lord king cors. The Scots that were within the towne, beleeuing it had bene moſt true, ſet open the gates, and came forth againſt their king (as they ſuppoſed) to haue receiued him with all ioy and gladneſſe.

The Scots deceiued and intrapped.

But when they came nere vnto the Engliſhmen, they perceiued both by their language and habit what they were: but this was not before the Engliſhmen were hard at the gates, ſo that when the Scotiſhmen would haue fled backe to haue got into the towne againe, the Engliſhmen purſued them ſo faſt at the heeles, that they entered the gates with them, and ſo tooke the towne with great ſlaughter, as well of the ſouldiers and men of warre, as alſo of women, children, and aged perſons, without all ruth or compaſſi-on, ſo that they left not one creature aliue of the Scotiſh bloud within all that towne. Thus was Berwike woone the 30 day of March, in the yeere 1296. Such abundance of bloud was ſpilled thorough all parts of the towne (as the Scotiſh chronicles teſtifie) that where at the falling tide the water was not able to driue about the mils, ſome of the ſame mils yet, were now at a low water ſet on gate, by reaſon the ſtreames were ſo hugelie augmented with bloud. There were ſlaine aboue ſeuen thouſand perſons that day, with the greateſt part of all the nobles and gentlemen of Fife and Louthian.

King John hearing of this ſlaughter of his people at Berwike, in great deſire to be auenged, gathered his power, and ſent the ſame forth againſt king Edward, with whome they met not farre from Dunbar, and there incountring with him in battell, the Scotiſh hoſt was diſcomfited, the moſt part of the Scots being either ſlaine or taken. The earles of March and Menteth, with 70 knights, fled to the caſtell of Dunbar, but they were beſieged ſo ſtreictlie by the Engliſh power, inuironing the caſtell on each ſide, that in the end they were conſtreined for lacke of victels to yeeld themſelues to king Edward, on condition to haue their liues ſaued, which couenant was not ob-ſerued; as the Scotiſh writers affirme: for king Edward hauing got them into his hands, cauſed them forthwith to be put to death. It was reported that Robert Bruſe vpon ſecret conference had with king Edward before this battell at Dunbar, ſollicited all his friends in the Scotiſh armie, to flee vpon the firſt ioining, which the reſidue perceiuing, were ſo diſcomforted, that incontinentlie they threw awaie both armor and weapon, and ſo were vanquiſhed without reſiſtance.

Robert Bruſe occaſion of the ouerthrow of Scots at Dunbar.

Truth it is, that after this victorie, Robert Bruſe ſubmitted himſelfe vnto king Edward, requiring him to performe his promiſe touching the right which he had to the crowne of Scotland: howbeit he recei-ued no anſwer to his liking touching that requeſt:
for K. Edward had no leſſe deſire to inioy the kingdome of Scotland, than Bruſe, as the Scotiſh writers affirme. Therefore to caſt off Robert Bruſe concerning his demand, he anſwered thus, as is ſaid; Beleeueſt thou that we haue nothing elſe a do but to conquere realmes, and to deliuer them ouer againe vnto thee? Robert Bruſe hereby perceiuing the ſubtile meaning of K. Edward, returned right ſorrowfull vnto his lands in England, hauing great indignation in his mind, that he had obeied king Edwards requeſts: but yet conſidered with him-ſelfe that he muſt ſuffer for the time, till occaſion ſerued to reuenge the iniuries receiued, which he minded to do, and that in moſt cruell maner, as afterwards it will appeare. King Edward after he had thus woone the caſtell of Dunbar, got likewiſe both the caſtels of Edenburgh and Striueling, and purſued king John, till he had conſtreined him to take for his refuge the caſtell of Forfaire. Herewith

Shortlie after, by a politike practiſe of the ſame John Cumin, king John with his ſonne Edward came to Mountros, where perceiuing himſelfe vnwiſelie to be fallen into the hands of king Edward, through feare of death which he doubted by reaſon of the menacing words of king Edward, he ſuffered himſelfe to be ſpoiled of all his kinglie abiliments, and with a white wand in his hand (as the maner is) preſented himſelfe before king Edward, reſigning there vnto him all his right and title which he had to the crowne of Scotland, vtterlie renouncing the ſame both for him and his heires for euer. Hereof was a charter made in moſt ſufficient wiſe, confirmed with the hand and ſeale of king John, and other the nobles of Scotland ſubſtantiallie as might be deuiſed, bearing date the fourth yeare of his reigne. After this, king Edward aſſembled all the lords and barons of Scotland at Berwike, where he cauſed them to be ſworne his liege men, and to do homage vnto him as to their ſouereigne lord and ſupreme gouernor. Which William Dowglaſſe (a man of noble birth and famous for his deeds) refuſed to do, and for his obſtinacie was caſt into priſon, where after a few yeares he ended his life. And for the more ſuertie of their allegiance, he conſtreined them to ſurrender into his hands all the ſtrengths & holds of the realme, both as well thoſe that ſtood on Homage of the barons of Scotland to king Edward

Fr. Thin.

The holds of Scotland deliuered into king Edwards hands.

These things done, and order taken in each behalfe as was thought requiſit for the quiet keeping of the countrie, he ſent king John and his ſonne Edward Baliol vnto London, where they were kept in ſtrong ward; till at length he ſuffered the ſaid king John to returne into Scotland: but leauing ſtill his ſonne in pledge behind him, leaſt he ſhould attempt anie new rebellion after his departure; which after was deliuered at the requeſt of the pope. King John vpon his returne into Scotland, perceiuing that he was in the hatred both of his lords and commons, he withdrew againe of his owne accord into England, forſaking wholie the adminiſtration of the Scotiſh dominion, and final-lie went ouer into Normandie to his ancient inheritance and lands there, where at length falling blind, and waſting away by long age, he departed out of this world in the caſtell Galliard, leauing thoſe lands which he poſſeſſed on that ſide the ſea, vnto his ſonne Edward Baliol, who being releaſed out of captiuitie, was come ouer to his father before his deceaſſe.

He returneth into France, and deceaſſeth in caſtell Galliard.

In the meane time, king Edward hauing well in remembrance the warres which he had intended to make againſt France, had be not bin ſtaied through the buſineſſe of Scotland, purpoſed now to purſue the ſame with all diligence; & therefore garniſhing all the ſtrengths & forts in Scotland to withſtand the Scots, if they attempted anie rebellion againſt him in his abſence, he appointed Hugh Creſſing-ham regent there, whileſt he ſhould be occupied in France, which Creſſingham before was treaſurer.
Then hauing prouided a great nauie of ſhips, he paſſed ouer into France, truſting that the Scots would not ſtur, ſith they had of late ſuſteined ſo manie ouerthrows and ſore loſſes one after an other by the laſt wars: but tyrannie is of ſuch a nature, that by no kind of prouiſion it may anie long time be ſuerlie defended. For thoſe people that be oppreſſed by anie tyrannicall ſeruitude, will not faile to ſeeke to deliuer themſelues from the yoke of that importable burden when ſoeuer opportunitie of time and occaſion ſerueth. Therefore the lords of Scotland hauing knowledge that king Edward was passed ouer the seas, they got them all togither straightwaies, and assembled in councell at Striueling, where by generall agréement, twelue noble men were chosen to be gouernors of Scotland, euerie one in their limits appointed, that they might the better prouide to resist the enimie. Amongest these gouernors, John Cumin earle of Buchquhan was principall, a man of great wisedome and singular knowlege in all affaires, as well of peace as of war.

Twelue gouernors elected in Scotland.

John Cumin.

This earle of Buchquhan raised a mightie armie, and with the same entered into Northumberland, where he wasted with fier and sword all that countrie. After this, he laid siege to Carleill, but he wan nothing there, the towne was so well defended. In that season also, the fame of William Wallase began to spring, a yong gentleman of so huge stature and notable strength of bodie, with such skill and knowledge in warlike enterprises, and hereto of such hardinesse of stomach in attempting all maner of dangerous exploits, that his match was not ante where lightlie to be found. He was sonne to one sir Andrew Wallase of Cragie, knight, and from his youth bare euer an inward hatred against the English nation. Sundrie notable feats also he wrought against the Englishmen in defense of the Scots, and was of such incredible force at his comming to perfect age, that of himselfe alone, without all helpe, he would not feare to set vpon three or foure Englishmen at once, and vanquish them.

William Wallase beginneth to wax famous.

When the fame therefore of his worthie acts was notified thorough the realme, manie were put in good hope, that by his means the realme should be deliuered from the seruitude of the Englishmen within short time after. And herevpon a great number of the Scotish nation as well of the nobilitie as other, were readie to assist him in all his enterprises. By reason whereof he might not easilie be intrapped nor taken of the Englishmen, that went about to haue got him into their hands. At length, when occasion serued to vse the helpe of such a notable chieftaine, he was chosen by generall consent of the Scotishmen as gouernour vnder John Baliol, to deliuer his countrie from bondage of the English nation. At the same time manie abbeies & spirituall benefices in Scotland were in Englishmens hands. Neuertheless, this William Wallase by commission had of William Fraser bishop of saint Andrews, auoided and put them forth of all parts of Scotland, leauing neither temporall nor spirituall person of their bloud within that realme. For shortlie after, by publike authoritie, he receiued the armie that John Cumin earle of Buchquhan had led before, and constreined those Scots that fauored king Edward, to obeie his commandements, in renouncing all such faith and promise as they had giuen or made vnto him.

Castels won by William Wallase.

This done, he passed forth with great puissance against the Englishmen, that held sundrie castels within Scotland, and with great hardinesse & manhood he wan the castels of Forfair, Dundée, Brechen and Mountros, sleaing all such souldiers as he found within them. Wallase now toifull of this his prosperous successe, and hearing that certeine of the chiefest capteins and officers of those Englishmen that kept the castell of Dunoter, were gone forth to consult with other Englishmen of the forts next to them adioining, came suddenlie to the said castell, & tooke it, not leauing a man aliue of all those whome he found as then within it. Then after he had furnished that hold with his owne soldiers in most defensible wise, he went to Aberden. The towne he found in maner void of all the inhabitants, but the castell was so stronglie garnished with men and munition, that considering it might not be woone without great murder, he raised from thence, and returned into Angus. King Edward as then being in France, hearing of these exploits atchiued by this Wallase his aduersarie, sent diuerse noble capteins vnto his lieutenant Hugh Cressingham, with an armie into Scotland to redresse the matter.

Hugh Cressingham sent into Scotland

Wallase in the meane time had laid siege vnto the castell of Couper, but now being aduertised of the comming of this armie against him, he raised his siege, & went to Striueling to defend the bridge there, that Hugh Cressingham with his armie shuld not passe the same, according as the report went his intent was to do. Here incountring with the enimies, the third Ides of September, he obteined a verie worthie victorie, for he slue not onelie the foresaid Cressingham with a great part of his armie being passed the riuer, but also forced the residue to flee, in such sort, that a great number of them were drowned, and few escaped awaie with life. Thus hauing gotten the vpper hand of his enimies here at Striueling, he returned againe to the siege of Couper, which shortlie after vpon his returne thither, was rendred vnto him by those that were within in garrison. There were manie of the Scotish nobilitie the same time, that sent vnto him, offering to leaue the king of Englands part, and to aid him with monie and vittels, if he would onelie receiue them into fauour, whereunto he granted. By which meanes, sundrie other castels were yéelded vnto him, the which after he had garnished with men, munition, and vittels (according as was thought requisit) he brake vp his campe, and went with sundrie of his most faithfull friends vnto the castell of Striueling.

The castell of Couper rendred to Wallase.

Afterwards perceiuing that through scarsitie of corne, great dearth arose on each side within the realme of Scotland, he deuised which way he might best relieue the peoples necessitie and lacke in that behalfe, and herevpon he determined to passe with a mightie armie into England, and to soiourne there the most part of the winter, in susteining the whole number of his men of warre on such prouision as they might find within the bounds of their enimies countrie. He commanded therefore that all the Scots, appointed to go with him in that iournie, should be readie at a certeine day and place prefixed. But diuers of the northerne Scots (as they of Aberden and other) for that they disobeied his commandements set forth by letters and proclamations, were hanged as rebels and traitors to their countrie. By whose example, other being put in feare, his commandements were the better obeied, so that hauing got togither an huge host of men, he entered with the same into Northumberland, wasting and spoiling the countrie euen vnto Newcastell. Thus putting the enimies in great feare and terror of his awfull name, he brought his armie backe againe into Scotland, loden with spoile and glorie of their prosperous atchiued iournie. They entred into England (as Io. Maior writeth) about the feast of All saints, and remained there till Candlemas after, liuing still vpon the spoile of the Englishmens goods.

Wallase inuadeth Northumberland.

Fr. Thin.

Edward king of England, being informed of the great slaughter of his people, and what damage the Scots had done in Northumberland, returned in great displeasure out of France into England, and sent his ambassadors vnto Wallase, sore menacing him, for that he had inuaded his realme in such cruell wise in his absence, which he durst (as he sent him word) full little haue done, if he had béene at home himselfe. Wallase hereunto answered, that he had taken the aduantage for the atchiuing of his interprise, touching the inuasion of England, in like sort as king Edward had done for the conquest of Scotland, at ſuch time as he was choſen by the nobles of the realme as indifferent iudge in deciſion of the right and lawfull title of the parties that ſtroue and were at contention for the crowne. And further, to the end it might appeare vnto king Edward, that he inuaded England in defenſe of his owne natiue countrie, and that he was fullie bent to implote his whole indeuor to deliuer the ſame from all maner of ſubiection to any forreine power, and to reuenge the iniuries done to them by the Engliſhmen in times paſt; he willed the Engliſh ambaſſadors to declare from him vnto king Edward, that he purpoſed to hold his Eaſter in England (if God afforded him life) and that in deſpite of king Edward, and all ſuch as would beare armor againſt him.

Wallaſe entred England with an armie of 30000 men.

And vndoubtedlie according to his promiſe he kept his day: for aſſembling togither an armie of 30000 men, he entred into England at the time before appointed, where king Edward was readie with an armie vpon Stanelmore, double in number to the Scots, to giue them battell: but when the time came that both parties were readie to haue ioined, the Engliſhmen withdrew, hauing no luſt (as ſhould ſeeme) to fight with the Scots at that time) who perceiuing them to giue backe, incontinentlie would haue ruſhed forth of their rankes to haue purſued in chaſe after them: but Wallaſe (doubting leaſt the Engliſhmen had ment ſome policie, and ſaieng (as writeth Io. Ma. lib. 4. cap. 14.) that it was honor inough for him that he had inforced ſo mightie a prince in his owne countrie to forſake the field) cauſed the Scots to keepe togither in order of battell, and ſo preſeruing them from the deceitfull malice of their enimies, brought them backe into Scotland with liues and honors ſaued, beſides the infinit ſpoiles and booties which they got in this iornie.

Wallaſe is enuied.

But as in the beginning all men were glad to ſupport Wallaſe in all exploits and enterprizes which he toke in hand, ſo afterward when his fame began to wax great, to the derogation of other mens renowmes, ſuch as were farre his ſuperiors in birth and linage, that fauor which manie bare him at the firſt, was now turned into enuie, hauing no ſmall indignation, that a man of ſo baſe parentage ſhould ſo ſurmount them in all honor and dignitie. Thoſe that enuied him moſt, were of the Cumins bloud, and Robert Bruſe. King Edward being aduertiſed of this enuious grudge, and new ſedition amongſt the nobles of Scotland, had ſecret conference by his agents with the chiefeſt amongſt thoſe that thus enuied the high glorie of Wallaſe, and vpon truſt of ſuch practiſe as was concluded by reſon of the ſame conference, he came with a mightie armie into Scotland, and at Falkirke met with this Wallaſe, who miſtruſting no guile, had raiſed a power to reſiſt him: but now being come in ſight of the Engliſhmen, there roſe a right odious contention betwixt the head capteins, who ſhould haue the leading of the vantgard, which is reputed a moſt high honor among the Scotiſhmen. And among other, John Steward, and John Cumin, thought ſcorne, that Wallaſe a man of ſo low beginning, ſhould be preferred before them in that honour: but on the other part, Wallaſe conſidering that the charge of the whole was giuen vnto him by agrement and conſent of the three eſtates, thought it no reaſon that he ſhould giue place to anie of them, though vnto his face, as ſaith Iohn Maior, the lord Steward had before vpbraided him with his pride, comparing him to an owle, which from his originall had begged a feather of euerie bird, and being now inriched with abundance of feathers, did aduance himſelfe aboue all other birds.

Strife for the leading of the vantgard.

In the meane time came the Engliſhmen vpon them right fiercelie, before the Scotiſh chiefteins (hauing their breſts filled with more malice one againſt another, than with deſire to defend their countrie againſt their enimies) could bring their men into anie perfect araie. Herewith at the comming to the point of ioining, the Cumins with their retinues fled out of the field, and left the reſidue of the Scots in all the danger. Robert Bruſe ſeruing that day among the Engliſhmen, fetched a compaſſe about an hill, and came on the backs of the Scots, ſo that they were in maner compaſſed in, and beaten downe on each ſide: yet Wallaſe left nothing vndone that might perteine to the dutie of a valiant capteine. But at length, all his indeuors notwithſtanding, the Scots (ouerſet with multitude of enimies, as the Scotiſh writers affirme) were ſlaine in ſuch huge numbers, that he was conſtreined to draw out of the field, which ſuch ſmall remnants as were left aliue. The Engliſhmen purſued fiercelie after him, namelie one valiant capteine named Frere Brian Jaie, a templer, whome Wallaſe perceiuing to be within his danger, ſtepped forth vnto him, and ſlue him there in ſight (as it is ſaid) of all the Engliſh armie. Which valiant act of Wallaſe cauſed the Engliſhmen ſomewhat to ſtaie, for doubt of further perill by their vnwiſe purſute likelie to befall them. In this infortunate battell, were ſlaine on the Scotiſh ſide, John Steward of Bute, with his Brandans (for ſo they name them that are taken vp to ſerue in the warres forth of the Stewards lands) Makduffe earle of Fife, with ſir John Graham, whoſe death was much lamented by Wallaſe, as one whome he highlie eſteemed for his great experience in warlike knowledge. Manie other noble and valiant men died in this conflict, whoſe names would be too long to rehearſe. This battell was ſtriken on Marie Magdalens daie, in the yeere of our Lord 1298, and therefore the Engliſhmen haue holden it euer ſince an happie day for to fight againſt the Scots.

✻ When William Wallaſe was paſſed the riuer Carran, where he might defend himſelfe, and gather his diſperſed people, Bruſe deſired to ſpeake vnto him, which Wallaſe did not denie. Whereupon each of them (drawing alone by themſelues without any arbitrers to the bankes of the riuer, in ſuch place as it was narroweſt, and they might without anie companie beſt heare one another; Bruſe began to ſay as followeth. I doo much muſe, thou moſt valiant of all men, what came into thy mind to be caried away by the vncerteine fauor of the common people, and to ſtand againſt the mightieſt king of our age, ſupported with the greateſt forces of the Scots: and dailie to offer thy ſelfe to euerie danger, and that for no reward aſſured to thee for all thy labors. For if thou ſhouldeſt ouercome king Edward, the Scots will neuer aduance thee to the kingdome, and if thou be ouercome, there reſteth no refuge for thee, but onelie the mercie of thine enimie. And doſt thou not ſee the Cumins, and mee, and the moſt of the nobilitie, to follow the Engliſh faction? Neither doſt thou conſider the malice of the princes conceiued againſt thee? Looke vnto thy ſelfe, and thou haſt but a few of the nobles thy partakers, and a ſmall number of the commons (which are more vncerteine than the wind) to follow thee, whoſe fortune is now almoſt ouerthrowne. All theſe words Iohn Maior ſuppoſeth that Robert Bruſe did ſpeake, to ſerch the mind of Wallaſe, whether he ment to aſpire to the crowne or no: being in deed rather contented that Wallaſe had left the field, than otherwiſe to reduce him to the part of king Edward.

Fr. Thin. Iohn Maior lib. 4. cap. 14. Buchan. lib. 8. Leſleus epiſ. Roſſ. li. 6. p. 235. Conference betweene Wallaſe & Bruſe.

To whome Wallaſe anſwered in this ſort. The end of all my trauell was not to atteine the kingdome;

"done; for my birth and fortune neither did or could deſerue it, and my mind did neuer deſire it: but the "negligent ſlouth of thée (to whome the right of that diademe doth apperteine, and who doth græðilie hunt "thereafter) made my citizens (perceiuing themſelues deſtitute of faithfull gouernors) to follow me, and "cauſed me (when I ſaw them in that miſerie, rather "butcherlie tone, than in honeſt ſeruitude to be oppreſſed) to ſéeke for libertie. Which ſuerlie I had obteined for them and you, if the nobilitie had not ſo euillie ſtriued againſt me, reſtrained themſelues for comming into the field, and had but ſent their hinds (which till their land) forth to the battell, at which time I had ſcarſe 10000 men, & thoſe of cõmon ſort. "Trulie if the princes had not béene impediment thereto, I could haue brought forth to fight a hundred thouſand bold and chéerefull ſouldiers. But now in truth I perceiue the hatred of the nobles againſt me this day. Wherefore if thou pretend to poſſeſſe the "kingdome, I giue thée faithfull warning, eſpeciallie to beware of the Cumins: who if they had more regarded the glorie of their countrie, than of ſecret malice to others, would not ſo wickedlie haue forſaken the field, what hate ſoeuer they had conceiued againſt me. If they haue giuen their faith to the king of England, they are not bound to kéepe it: in a wicked promiſe no oth is to be performed. I am now weарie of my life, and rather deſire to die, than to liue in this ſort, to ſée the miſerie of my beloued countrie. Wherefore imbrace you this thraldome (which is ſo much eſtéemed of you) to whome filthie ſeruitude with eaſe ſéemeth more pleaſant, than honeſt libertie with danger: for I had rather chooſe willing death with fréedome (in which I meane to ſpend my bloud) than to doo as you haue done, becauſe the loue of my countrie ſhall not depart from my hart, before the life of my bodie depart from his office. Which being ſaid, Bruſe burſt forth in teares, conſidering the nobilitie of the mind of Wallaſe, although perhaps he nothing miſliked the miſfortune of the man, as doubting the end of all his pretenſe to be, to atteine to the crowne. This being thus done, they both depart to their companies. By which conference (ſaith Leſlee biſhop of Roſſe) this good was wrought to Scotland (to recompenſe the ouerthrow of Falkirke) that Wallaſe partlie by the bitternеſſe of his words, and partlie for the loue of his countrie, did now draw Bruſe from the Engliſh, to take part with the Scots.)

1298. But notwithſtanding all theſe valiant ſpéeches of Wallaſe, when he conſidered the infortunat diſcomfiture by him ſo treacherouſlie receiued, he came to Perth, and there vttering by complaint the iniurious enuie of the nobles againſt him, he renounced and diſcharged himſelfe of all the authoritie which had béene committed to his hands, touching the gouernance of the realme, and went into France, as ſaith Leſleus. But Iohannes Maior ſaith, that he neuer came there, although he will not flatlie denie it. The ſame time, Philip king of France, the fourth of that name, and ſurnamed le Beau, hauing great ruth in his hart for the miſerable calamities thus chanced to his ancient confederat friends the Scots, and that chieflie for the quarrell of France, ſent his ambaſſadors vnto Edward king of England, who had latelie before maried his daughter, requiring that there might be ſome peace or abſtinence of warre granted. At his requeſt therefore a truce was taken betwixt the Scots and Engliſhmen, to indure from the feaſt of All ſaints, till the feaſt of Pentecoſt next following.

The Scots in the meane time ſore oppreſſed by reaſon of long warres, ſent ambaſſadors to pope Boniface, in preſenting a verie grieuous complaint vnto him, for the great affliction done to them by king Edward, who was fullie bent by iniurious meanes (as they alledged) to conquer their realme, and therefore they beſought him to conſtreine king Edward by vertue of his prerogatiue, which he pretended to haue ouer the realme of England, to ſtand to his order in deciding the right concerning the liberties of Scotland, which might no other waies be determined, but by intollerable damage falling to the people through blind deſire and couetous ambition of the nobles, contending for the crowne. The pope (as is ſaid) after he had by good and deliberat aduiſe heard the matter, gaue ſentence with the Scots, that they had full cauſe of warres in defenſe of the liberties of their countrie, againſt K. Edward and his fautors. ¶ But for this matter, looke in the Engliſh chronicles, where it ſhall well appéere, that the pope by theſe letters of king Edward, was fullie ſatiſfied of his ſuperioritie ouer Scotland.

The Scots ſomewhat recomforted herewith, ſhortlie hereupon choſe John Cumin to their gouernor, in purpoſe to trie with the Engliſhmen for their liberties. Whereof king Edward being aduertiſed, ſent forthwith an armie into Scotland, which paſſed through the countrie to ſaint Johns towne, with great damage of thoſe that were adiudged rebels to king Edwards empire. All the countrie in manner vnto Forthrie, at this ſeaſon was ſubiect to the Engliſhmen, ſauing ſuch few of the inhabitants, as liued within the woods, hauing more regard to the ancient liberties of their countrie, than to anie deſire of preſeruing their goods or liues. John Cumin therefore, deſirous to redreſſe this heauie miſerie and lamentable caſe of his countrie, admitted Simon Fraſer fellow with him in the adminiſtration of the warres againſt the Engliſhmen, and therewith gathering an armie of eight thouſand hardie men of warre, ſetteth in hand to reuenge the iniurious doings of the enimies, chaſing out of the realme all ſuch officers with their ſeruants, as king Edward had placed in anie roomes within the bounds of Scotland; and ſuch as reſiſted, he purſued in moſt cruell wiſe, not ſparing to put them vnto the ſword in all places, where he might find them.

King Edward ſore kindled in diſpleaſure with theſe attempts of ſuch deſperat perſons, raiſed an armie of thirtie thouſand men, and ſent the ſame into Scotland, vnder the leading of a verie ſtout and valiant capteine, named Radulph or Rafe Confraie. This Radulph at his comming into Scotland, toke ſmall regard to the ordering of his field, but diuided his armie into three parts, euerie part conteining ten thouſand men, and appointed them to paſſe forth to forraie the countrie, and to meet altogither at Roſlin, in ſuch ſort and time as he preſcribed. John Cumin and Simon Fraſer being aduertiſed hereof, gathered their powers togither, to the number of ſeuen or eight thouſand men, and determined to trie the chance of battell with one part of the Engliſh armie firſt, truſting that if they happened to haue the vpper hand of one of the three parts, the other two would be the more eaſie to deale with. The Scotiſh capteins reſolued thus vpon that point, exhorted their people to remember how they were to fight in defenſe of their wiues, their children, their goods, and liberties of their countrie, againſt ſuch as ſought to bring them into thraldome and vile ſeruitude.

With which words the Scots were ſo imboldened, that minding either to die or to win the victorie, they gaue the onſet ſo fiercelie on their enimies, that the firſt battell of the Engliſhmen was quicklie ouerthrowen and vanquiſhed. But ſcarſelie had they gathered the ſpoile, when an other part of the Engliſhmen came vpon them with more fiercenеſſe than the other other before: neuertheleſſe, the Scots incouraged with their freſh wonne victorie, got themſelues ſpéedilie into arraie, & receiued their enimies with ſuch incredible manhood, that they had quickly got the vpper hand of theſe alſo. But ſcarſe had they made an end with this ſecond battell, when the third part was at hand readie to charge them, being now ſore infeebled, what thorough wearineſſe and wounds receiued in the two former incounters, beſides the want of ſuch of their numbers as were ſlaine: yet by exhortation of their capteins, and the valiant preſence of the officers of bands beſide, they ruſhed forth on their enimies with ſuch earneſt forwardneſſe to receiue them, that after a verie ſharpe bickering, they put the whole number of them to flight. Few of the Engliſhmen had eſcaped the Scotiſhmens hands, had they not béene ſo wearied with continuall fight, that they were not able to follow anie great waie in the chaſe.

The third battell of the Engliſhmen vanquiſhed at Roſlin.

This victorie fell to the Scots in manner as is before rehearſed, vpon ſaint Matthewes day, in the yéere after the birth of our Sauiour 1302. The glorie of this victorie was great, conſidering that thirtie thouſand Engliſhmen well furniſhed, & thoroughlie appointed for warre, ſhould be thus in one day vanquiſhed with an handfull of Scotiſhmen. For as their hiſtories make mention, they paſſed not eight thouſand at the moſt: and therefore all men ſuppoſed that it came to paſſe by the ſingular fauour and grace of almightie God. But yet the Scots did not long inioy the benefits of ſo notable a victorie. For king Edward hearing of this diſcomfiture of his people at Roſlin, gathered a mightie armie of Engliſhmen, Gaſcoigns, Iriſhmen, and ſuch Scots as tooke his part, and hauing all his furniture and purueiance readie both by ſea and land, he ſet forward with the ſame to inuade the Scots on ech ſide. The Scots perceiuing they were not of puiſſance able to reſiſt his inuaſion, withdrew to their ſtrengths: by means whereof the Engliſh armie paſſed through all Scotland, euen from the ſouth parts to the north, & found few or none to make reſiſtance, except Wallaſe, and ſuch as followed his opinion, which were fled to the mounteins and woods, to eſchue the malice of the Engliſhmen.

The matter is amplified by the Scots to the vttermoſt.

It is ſaid, that king Edward required by a meſſenger ſent vnto this Wallaſe, that if he would come in and be ſworne his liege man and true ſubiect, he ſhould haue at his hands great lordſhips and poſſeſſions within England, to mainteine his port as was requiſit to a man of verie honorable eſtate. But Wallaſe refuſed theſe offers, ſaieng that he preferred libertie with ſmall reuenues in Scotland, before anie poſſeſſion of lands in England, were the ſame neuer ſo great; conſidering he might not inioy them, but vnder the yoke of bondage. The caſtell of Sterling at the ſame time was in the kéeping of one ſir William Athred knight, who would not render it to king Edward by anie ſummons or other meanes, till after three moneths ſiege he was conſtreined to giue it ouer vnder theſe conditions; That all perſons being within the caſtell, ſhould depart by ſafe conduct with bagge and baggage at their pleaſure. Neuertheleſſe king Edward cauſed the ſaid ſir William Athred to be conueied to London, where he remained as priſoner manie yeeres after.

Sundrie other caſtels were taken by force the ſame time by king Edward, and all ſuch as reſiſted, being found within anie of them, ſlaine without mercie or ranſome. Amongeſt other, the caſtell of Urquhard in Murrey land was taken by force, and not one left aliue that was found in the ſame (one gentlewoman onelie excepted) who being great with child, was in that reſpect preſerued. She was the wife of Alexander Boyis, lord of that houſe, though by reaſon ſhe was got into poore apparell, the Engliſhmen tooke hir but for ſome other woman of meaner eſtate. She therefore with hir life ſaued, being ſuffered to depart, got hir ouer into Ireland, where ſhe was deliuered of a ſon, that was named at the font-ſtone Alexander, who when Scotland was recouered out of the Engliſhmens hands, came to king Robert le Bruſe, requiring him to be reſtored vnto his fathers heritage, being as then in the occupation of other poſſeſſors. King Robert doubtfull what to dow héerein, for he thought it neither conuenient that a prince ſhould take lands or poſſeſſions from noble men, which had béene giuen to them in reward of their manhood, ſhewed in defenſe of the realme; neither iudged he it reaſon to kéepe him from his rightfull inheritance that had loſt his father, his friends, and all his whole ſubſtance in the like cauſe and quarell by iniurie of the common enimies.

The castell of Urquhard taken by force.

Wherefore to qualifie the matter, he deuiſed this meane: he gaue vnto this Alexander Boyis certeine other lands in Mar, nothing leſſe in value (conſidering the largeneſſe and fertilitie) than the other of Urquhard were: and willed him to content himſelfe with thoſe, in recompenſe of ſuch as belonged to his father: to the intent that all parties might be ſatiſfied, and no man ſhould ſéeme to haue wrong in being depriued of his rightfull poſſeſſions. This Alexander Boyis had afterwards his name changed, and was called Forbeſſe, for that he ſlue a beare in thoſe parties, by great and ſingular manhood. And ſo the ſurname of the Forbeſſes had beginning, as deſcended from him. Scotland being ſubdued by the mightie puiſſance of king Edward, he went about to aboliſh all the old ſtatutes and ancient conſtitutions of the realme, truſting by that meanes, that Scots liuing togither with Engliſhmen, vnder one vniforme maner of lawes, they ſhould finallie ſort themſelues to be of one mind and opinion, as well touching the ſupreme gouernement of their publike weale, as alſo in all other things, touching the friendlie ſocietie of life.

The beginning of the name of the Forbeſſes.

He burnt all the chronicles of the Scotiſh nation, with all manner of bookes, as well thoſe conteining diuine ſeruice, as anie other treatiſes of profane matters, to the end that the memorie of the Scots ſhould periſh: and thereto appointed greeuous puniſhments for them that ſhould diſobeie his commandements héerein, in kéeping anie of the ſaid bookes vndefaced. And he ordeined alſo, that the Scots ſhould occupie church bookes after the vſe of Sarum, and none other. Moreouer, he compelled all ſuch Scotiſhmen as were of anie ſingular knowledge in learning or literature, to be reſident in Oxford, doubting leaſt the Scotiſh nobilitie increaſing in politike prudence by their inſtructions, ſhould ſeeke to throw off the yoke of bondage. Thus king Edward going about (as the Scotiſh writers doo report) to extinguiſh the name of Scots, togither with their rule and empire, paſſed through the moſt part of all the bounds of Scotland. And vpon verie hate which he had to the Scotiſh antiquities, at his comming to Camelon, he commanded the round temple ſtanding ouer againſt the ſame, to be throwen downe, which was builded (as before is ſhewed) in the honor of Claudius the emperor, and the goddeſſe Victoria. But for that his commandement was not immediatlie put in execution, he changed his purpoſe, and appointed onelie that the monuments of Claudius, with the ſuperſcription of his name, ſhould be taken awaie; and in place thereof, the armes of king Arthur, with his name to be ſet vp; commanding the place to be called Arthurs hoif (as ye would ſay) Arthurs

The marble chaire is conueied into England, and placed in Westminster.

Moreouer king Edward at his returning into England, toke the chaire of marble with him, and causing it to be conueied vp to London, did place it at Westminster, where it remaineth yet vnto this day. Furthermore, before his departure out of Scotland, he appointed all the Scotish lords to assemble at Scone, where he caused them to take a new oth, that from thencefoorth they should take him for their souereigne lord, and to obeie him in all things as lotall subiects. The nobilitie of Scotland was sworne to him that day (Wallase onelie excepted) who eschued more than the companie of a serpent, to haue anie thing to doo with the Englishmen, touching anie agreement to be made with them, agreeable to their desires. Moreouer, to keepe the Scots from rebellion, king Edward ordeined Odomare de Valence to be gouernour there, as his generall lieutenant ouer the whole realme of Scotland in his absence. And hauing thus set all things in good and quiet order (as he supposed) he returned into England with great ioy and triumph.

Odomare or Aimer de Valence gouernour of Scotland vnder king Edward

In the meane time, Iohn Cumin surnamed the red, and Robert Bruse hauing conference togither, complained the one to the other of the miserable seruitude wherein the realme of Scotland as then stood by the oppression of king Edward. And at length vpon offers made betwixt them, it was agreed, that if by anie meanes they might deliuer the realme out of the Englishmens hands, the one of them should be king, that is to say, the Bruse, and the other, that is to say, the Cumin, should inioy all the Bruses lands and possessions, with manie other preferments of honors and dignities, as next vnto him in all authoritie touching the gouernement of the realme. There were indentures made betweene them, subscribed with their names, and sealed with their seales interchangeablie, for the full ratifieng of couenants agreed in this confederacie betwixt them. Shortlie after, vpon deliuerie of those writings, Bruse went into England, for he might not remaine long in Scotland, for doubt of suspicion which king Edward had in him, because of the title which he had to the crowne of Scotland (as before is specified) so that (as was thought) king Edward would haue put both him and his brethren vnto death long before, if he might haue once got them all into his hands.

Indentures of agreement betwixt Cumin & Bruse, touching the conspiracie.

John Cumin (after that he and Bruse were thus agreed vpon articles, and departed the one from the other) began to doubt, least this conspiracie deuised betwixt them, would not sort to anie luckie conclusion for his purpose, either for that he feared the great puissance of king Edward, either else for that his authoritie and power (as he mistrusted) would not be great, if the Bruse once atteined the crowne: and hereupon he sent one of his seruants to king Edward, with his counterpane of the indenture, conteining the couenants of the conspiracie, signed and sealed with Bruses owne hand and seale. The messenger deliuered this writing in secret wise to king Edward, declaring vnto him the whole matter, as it was passed and concluded betwixt the Bruse and his maister, according to instructions giuen him in that behalfe. But king Edward at the first gaue light credit either to the writings or words of the Cumin, supposing that the same proceeded onelie through enuie, which he bare towards the Bruse, euer dreading lest he should beare no rule in Scotland, if the Bruse once atteined anie authoritie within the same. Yet at length, king Edward pondering with himselfe the whole circumstance, and being in some doubt of the matter, he shewed the counterpane of the indenture vnto Bruse himselfe, questioning with him, if he knew his owne hand: Bruse stoutlie denied that he was priuie to anie such deuise or writing, and therefore desired of king Edward to haue the same for one night, to peruse and scan ouer at leasure, & then if he were not able to proue that it was forged, and maliciouslie deuised vpon an enuious purpose, to put him in danger of life, he would forfait all his lands and liuings that he held either within the realme of England, or elsewhere. King Edward, because he coniectured at the first how this accusation of Cumin was nothing like to be true, granted his request, wherein manie iudged he did vnwiselie: but such was the ordinance of almightie God, that Bruse should escape that danger, to accomplish that wherevnto he was appointed. The earle of Gloucester immediatlie after that Robert Bruse was departed from the kings presence, sent vnto him twelue sterling pence, with two sharpe spurs, whereby he coniectured his meaning to be, that the best shift for him was to auoid out of the waie in most spéedie wise, whereupon he causing a smith to sho three horsses for him, contrarilie with the calkins forward, that it should not be perceiued which waie he had taken by the tract of the horsses, for that the ground at that time (being in the winter season) was couered with snow: he departed out of London about midnight, accompanied onelie with two trustie seruants.

He denieth his writing.

Robert Bruse doth flée.

It chanced also, that there fell on the same night more snow aloft vpon the other snow that was fallen before, by reason whereof it could not easilie be iudged in the morning which way he was gone, though king Edward vpon knowledge had that he was fled, sent out a great manie of horsmen after, to haue brought him againe, if they might anie where haue found him. But Bruse hasted forth with such spéed in his iournie, that the seuenth day of his departure from London, he came to Louchmaben in Annandale, and there found Dauid, or (as some bookes haue) Edward his brother, with Robert Fleming, a worthie yong gentleman, vnto whome (they musing what he meant by his sudden comming) he declared into what perill of life he had fallen by means of Cumin, and how narowlie he had escaped out of king Edwards hands. His brother hearing the matter, consented to go with him, and to be partaker of all haps that might fortune to fall out in his flight; and by the way they chanced to light vpon one of Cumins seruants, that was going with letters vnto king Edward from his maister the said Cumin, signifieng by the same, that if Bruse were not the sooner put to death, there would insue shortlie such trouble and ruffling in Scotland against K. Edward, that it would be much adoo to appease it.

A seruant of Cumins taken with letters on him.

These letters beeng found about Cumins seruant, through means of yong Fleming, the Bruse after he had apposed the bearer throughlie in each behalfe, and learned of him that his maister the said Cumin was in the friers at Dunfrise, he first slue this fellow that was thus sent with the letters, & after in all hast possible came to Dunfrise, by the guiding of the same Fleming, where in the quier of the friers church there he found Cumin. And reasoning the matter there with him, for that he had vsed him so euill, and withall shewing him the indenture which king Edward had deliuered to him, as before is mentioned, in the end (after some multiplieng of words togither) Robert Bruse plucked forth his sword, and stroke the foresaid Cumin a sore blow in the bellie, and thereupon fleeing out of the church, met with two of his dearest friends, James Lindseie, and Roger Kirkpatrike, who beholding his countenance altered, and comming forth of the church in such hast, demanded of him what was the matter: I trow (said he) that Cumin is slaine. Why (said they againe) hast thou attempted so high an an enterpriſe, and left it doubtfull: And immediatlie herewith they went to the place where Cumin lay wounded (as before is mentioned) and asked of him whether he thought he had anie deaths wound, or hoped to recouer if he might haue a good ſurgian. And for that he answered how he truſted to do well inough if he might haue a good ſurgian in time; they gaue him three or foure other wounds ſo grieuous and deadlie, that forthwith vpon the ſame he yéelded vp the ghoſt. This chanced in the yeare of our Lord 1305, the fourth Ides of Februarie. About the ſame time was William Wallaſe taken at Glaſkow by the means of ſir John Menteth and others, in whome he had euer put a moſt ſpeciall truſt; but they being corrupted with the offers of large rewards promiſed by king Edward to ſuch as could helpe to take him, wrought ſuch fetches that he was apprehended at length by Odomare de Valence earle of Penbroke, who with a great power of men brought him to London, where he was put to death, and his quarters ſent into Scotland, and ſet vp in ſundrie great townes there for a ſpectacle, as it were to giue example to other. This was the end of that puiſſant champion William Wallaſe, praiſed amongſt the Scotiſhmen aboue all other in that age, for ſo much as he would neuer yéeld or conſent to acknowledge anie ſuperioritie in the Engliſhmen ouer his countrie, no not when all other had ſubmitted themſelues to king Edward as his liege ſubiects and moſt obedient vaſſals. It is ſaid, that when he was yong and went to ſchole, he learned by heart two verſes of his ſchoolemaiſter, which euer after he bare in mind, and vſuallie would rehearſe them, (when a toy toke him in the head) as followeth.

Of this William Wallaſe one Henrie, who was blind from his birth, in the time of my nativitie (ſaith Iohn Maior) compoſed a whole booke in vulgar verſe, in which he writed all thoſe things vulgarlie ſpoken of this Wallaſe. BVt now touching Bruſe; after he had ſlaine Cumin (as before is mentioned) he purchaſed an abſolution from Rome for that act: and to the end he might then through authoritie obteine ſome aid to reſiſt the puiſſance of his aduerſarie king Edward, he went by ſupport of friends vnto Scone, & there cauſed himſelfe to be crowned king, on the 27 day of March, though he had no great number that toke his part in the beginning, as ſhortlie after well appeared. For when he ſhould aſſemble an armie againſt a power of Engliſhmen that were ſent againſt him by king Edward, immediatlie vpon knowledge had of his attempts, he was not able to get togither anie ſufficient number to reſiſt his aduerſaries, though with thoſe few which came vnto him, he thought to trie the chance of battell, and ſo incountring with Odomare de Valence lieutenant of the Engliſh armie at Meffen the 19 day of June 1306, he was there put to flight; and though the ſlaughter was not great, yet for that it was iudged to be an euill ſigne to haue ſuch infortunat lucke vpon his entering into the eſtate, the peoples fauor ſhranke greatlie from him.

Odomare de Valence after he had obteined this victorie againſt king Robert, baniſhed the wiues of all thoſe that ſupported the ſame Robert, by means whereof, manie ladies and gentlewomen were conſtreined to flée into woods, and other deſert places, to eſchew the crueltie of their aduerſaries. King Robert alſo after this ouerthrow, fled into Atholl, and from thence to Streill, where the third Ides of Auguſt at a place called Dalreie, he fought againe with the Cumins and other ſuch Scots & Engliſhmen as were aſſembled in thoſe parties readie to purſue him, and had the like lucke here that had chanced to him before at Meffen; for he was put to flight after the ſame maner, though he loſt here but few of his men, neither in the fight nor chaſe. This place Dalreie is as much to ſay, as the kings field: Buchan lib. 8, which is alſo called Dalwkie by I. Wherevpon finding fortune thus contrarie vnto him in theſe two ſeuerall battels, he was left ſo deſolat and vnprouided of all friendſhip, that he was conſtreined for his refuge to withdraw into the woods and mounteins, with a few other in his companie, and there liued on herbs and rots oftentimes for want of other food.

WHileſt he remained in this eſtate of aduerſe fortune, there were two that ſhewed themſelues right truſtie and faithfull ſeruants vnto him aboue all the reſt, the earle of Leuenor, and Gilbert Hate: for though either inforced by perſecution of enimies, or conſtreined through ſome other neceſſitie, they departed ſometimes from his preſence; yet did they euer acknowledge him for their ſouereigne lord and onelie king, readie at all ſeaſons to ſerue and obey him in each behalfe. The moſt part of all other his friends yea and ſeruants, in that preſent miſerie, did clearelie forſake him; ſo that ſometimes he was left with onelie one or two in his companie, & glad to kéepe himſelfe ſecret in deſert places, where no perſon lightlie vſed to reſort. His wife & quéene fled to ſaint Duthо, and chanced to be taken by William Cumin earle of Roſſe, who deliuered hir to king Edward, by whoſe commandement ſhe was committed to ſafe kéeping at London, where ſhe remained till after the battell of Bannockſborne. His brother Nigell was alſo taken, and ſo afterwards were his two other brethren, Thomas and Alexander, with manie other nobles and gentlemen of Scotland, of whome ſome were executed at Carleill, and ſome at Berwike. Nigell was taken at the caſtell of Kildrome whither he fled, and came to Berwike. Thomas and Alexander were taken at Locreis, and carried to Carleill, and ſo beheaded. Io. Maior. lib. 4. cap. 19. Finallie the moſt part of all ſuch as had aided him before, and were now ſhronke from him, were within one yeare after, either ſlaine or kept as priſoners in England.

The earle of Leucnor and Gilbert Hate faithfull ſeruitors to king Robert.

King Roberts wife taken.

Nigell Thomas and Alexander brethren to king Robert are taken and put to death.

Yet though he was thus left deſolat of all aid and ſuccor, hauing his brethren and other of his friends murthered and ſlaine to his vtter diſcomfort and ruine (as was to be ſuppoſed) he neuertheleſſe liued euer in hope of ſome better fortune, whereby in time to come he might recouer the realme out of the enimies hands, and reſtore the ancient libertie thereof to the former eſtate. As for the paines which he toke in liuing barelie for the moſt part by water & rots, & lodging oftimes on the bare earth, without houſe or other harborough, he was ſo accuſtomed thereto by haunting the warres in his youth, that the ſame gréeued him little or nothing at all. But to conclude, ſuch was his valiancie and moſt excellent fortitude of mind and courage, that no iniurious miſchance of froward aduerſitie could abaſh his inuincible heart and manlike ſtomach. At length, after he had wandered from place to place in ſundrie parts of Scotland,

His inuincible hart and vndaunted ſtomach.

Scotland, the better to auoid the sleights of them that laie in wait to apprehend him, he got ouer into one of the Iles, where comming vnto one of his speciall friends, a man of high nobilitie and welbeloued of the people in those parts, he was most hartilie welcome, and gladlie of him receiued, to his great ease and comfort.

King Robert getteth ouer into the Iles.

Here when he had remained a certeine space, hee got support of men, armor and weapons, by meanes whereof taking new courage, he passed ouer vnto Carrike, & winning the castell there that belonged to his fathers inheritance, he slue all the Englishmen, which he found within it, and bestowed all the spoile of monie and goods gotten there amongst his souldiers and men of warre. His friends that laie hid in couert and secret corners, hearing of these his doings, began from each side to resort vnto him, by whose assistance shortlie after he wan the castell of Innernesse, and slue all them that were within it in garrison. With the like felicitie he got the most part of all the castels in the north, racing & burning vp the same till he came to Glennesse, where being aduertised that Iohn Cumin with sundrie Englishmen and Scots were gathered against him, because he was vpon a strong ground, he determined there to abide them: but they being thereof informed, and wondering at his manlie courage, durst not approch to giue him battell, but sent ambassadors vnto him to haue truce for a time, vnder colour of some communication for a peace, till they might increase their power more strongly against him: which being done, they pursued him more fiercelie than before. Neuertheless K. Robert receiued them at all times in such warlike order, that they might neuer take him at anie aduantage, but were still driuen backe with slaughter and losse, though the same was of no great importance to make account of, but such like as happeneth oftentimes in skirmishes & light incounters, where the battels come not to ioine puissance against puissance. The fame whereof yet procured him the fauour of sundrie great barons in Scotland.

Fr. Thin. Simon Fraser and Walter Logan executed.

✻ About this time, Simon Fraser, and Walter Logan (most valiant knights, and greatlie fauouring their countrie) were taken (by such as followed the faction of Cumin) deliuered to the English, sent to London, and there executed. Almost about which time, Iames Dowglasse ioined himselfe to the part of king Robert. This Iames being the sonne of William Dowglasse, was a yong gentleman very actiue and forward in all chiefe exercises and arts. Who when he gaue himselfe to studie at Paris (hearing that his father was by the king of England cast in prison, in which he shortlie after died, as is before noted) returned home to dispose the rest of his life after the aduise of his friends. But being without liuing, & all his other friends by misfortune dispersed: he committed himselfe to the seruice of W. Lambert bishop of saint Andrews, of whome hee was gentlie receiued into his familie, and well interteined: vntill king Edward comming to Sterling (after that he had almost pacified all the rest of Scotland) to besiege Striueling: at what time Lambert going to Sterling to salute the king, caried Dowglasse to attend vpon him, to the end to prefer him to his liuing and inheritance. Wherevpon the bishop finding the king at conuenient leisure, besought him to be fauourable to this Dowglasse; to restore him vnto his fathers patrimonie: and that (receiuing the yong man into his fealtie and defense) it would please him to imploie him in his faithfull and warlike seruice: adding further such commendations in the behalfe of Iames, as for that time he thought most conuenient. But the king vnderstanding his name and kinred, spake bitterlie of the disobedience and stubbernesse of his father William Dowglasse; further answering, that he would neither vse the same Iames, nor his trauell in anie thing, neither that he could (if so he would) restore him to his patrimonie, because he had with the same gratified other that well deserued it. For which cause being by the king so repelled, he remained still in the bishops seruice, vntill Bruse came into Merne, at what time (least he might lose the opportunitie to offend king Edward, whome he secretlie in heart disdeined) this Dowglasse departed from Lambert his maister, taking with him all the bishops gold, and certeine of his best horsses, with the which, hauing in his companie diuerse other hardie yong gentlemen, priuie to his doings, he fled with all spéed vnto king Robert, offering him his seruice, and to spend his life in his quarell and defense.) The bishop was priuie to his cousins going awaie, yea and counselled him therevnto, though he would by no means it should outwardlie so appeare, for doubt least if things had not come to passe as he wished, he might haue run in danger for his cloked dissimulation. The Dowglasse was ioifullie receiued of king Robert, in whose seruice he faithfullie continued both in peace and warre to his liues end.

A craftie dissembling prelate.

Though the surname and familie of the Dowglasses was in some estimation of nobilitie before those daies, yet the rising thereof to honor chanced through this Iames Dowglasse: for by meanes of his aduancement, other of the same linage toke occasion by their singular manhod and noble prowes shewed at sundrie times in defense of the realme, to grow to such height in authoritie & estimation, that their mightie puissance in mainrent, lands, & great possessions, at length was (through suspicion conceiued by the kings that succeeded) the cause in part of their ruinous decay. Edward king of England hearing of the doings of his aduersarie king Robert, doubted (if some redresse were not found in time) lest the Scots reioising in the prosperous successe of his said aduersarie, would reuolt wholie from the English obeisance: and herevpon purposing with all spéed to subdue the whole realme of Scotland from end to end, he came (with a far greater armie than euer he had raised before) to the borders; but before his entring into Scotland, he fell sicke of a right sore and grieuous maladie, whereof he died shortlie after at Burgh vpon sands, as in the English historie more plainlie doth appeare, though Buchanan say he died at Lancaster.

The rising of the Dowglasses to honor.

The death of king Edward Longshanks.

The English writers make mention, that a litle before he departed out of this world, there were brought vnto him 55 yong striplings, which were taken in the castell of Kildrummie, after it was wone by the Englishmen, and being asked what should be done with them, he commanded they should be hanged incontinentlie, without respect to their yong yéeres, or consideration of their innocencies that might haue moued him to pitie. After his decease, his sonne Edward of Carnaruan succéeded in the gouernement of England, who following his fathers enterprise, called a councell at Dunfreis, summoning the lords of Scotland to appeare at the same, and caused a great number of them at their comming thither to do their homage vnto him, as to their superior lord and gouernor: but yet diuers disobeied his commandements, and would not come at his summoning, vpon trust of some change of fortune by the death of his father, for that the son was much giuen (as was reported) to incline his eare to lewd counsell, not without the great griefe of his people, and namelie of the lords and chiefe nobles of his realme.

The cruelties of king Edward as is noted by the Scotish writers.

Edward of Carnaruan, sonne to Edward Longshanks.

Homage to king Edward of Carnaruan

Shortlie

Shortlie after this, the said Edward of Carnaruan returned into England, and in the meane time John Cumin erle of Buchquhane gathered a mightie armie, both of Scots and Englishmen to resist against king Robert, that he might thereby declare his faithfull affection toward the new English king. He trusted onelie with multitude of people to cause his enimies to giue place: but king Robert though he was holden with a sore sickenesse at that time, yet he assembled a power, and caused himselfe in a horselitter to be caried forth with the same against his enimies, who abiding him at a streight, supposed it had bin an easie matter for them to be put to slight: but it chanced quite contrarie to their expectation, for in the end the Cumin with his whole armie was discomfited, and a great number of king Roberts aduersaries slaine or taken. This victorie was gotten at a village called Enuerrour, ten miles distant from Aberden, on the Ascension daie, wherewith king Robert was so much refreshed in contentation of mind, that he was suddenlie therupon restored to his former health, hauing at that time also taken the castell of Aberden, which he vtterlie destroied, and caused to be leuelled with the ground, to the end his enimies might haue no more refuge thereby.

John Cumin discomfited by king Robert at Enuerrour 1308. Fr. Thin.

Donald of the Iles discomfited by Edward Bruse.

In the same yere Donald of the Iles came with a great armie of Englishmen and Scots against K. Robert, and was on the feast day of the apostles Peter and Paule discomfited by Edward Bruse the kings brother, at the water of Deir. At this battell was a right valiant knight named Rowland, slaine of the English part, with a great number of other about him, and Donald himselfe was taken prisoner.

Argile subdued by king Robert. This was in 1309, as Iohn Ma. saith.

Thus king Robert through fauour of prosperous fortune, obteining the victorie in sundrie conflicts, came with an armie into Argile, and not onelie subdued the countrie to his obeisance, but also tooke Alexander lord of Argile out of a strong castell in that countrie, and banished him with all his friends into England, where shortlie after he deceassed. In the yere next following, king Edward came with an armie into Scotland, where ioining with an other armie of Scots that were assembled readie to aid him, he passed through the countrie vnto Ranfrew, and at length without atchiuing anie notable enterprise worthie the mentioning, he returned againe into England.

K. Edward commeth into Scotland. Anno 1310 as should seeme by Io. Maior.

In the same yeere, through continuall warres, there rose such dearth & scarsitie of things in Scotland, that neither corne nor other vittels could be had for monie: for the ground in manner generallie through the countrie laie vntilled, and beasts with all kind of cattell were driuen awaie, as booties taken by the enimies. By reason wherof the famine so increased on each side, that the people were constreined to eat horsses, and other lothsome flesh & meats, thereby to susteine their liues. In the yere following which was after the incarnation 1311, king Robert chased the Englishmen out of all parts of Scotland, winning manie castels out of their hands, diuerse of the which he raced and consumed with fire. After this entring at sundrie times into England with his fierce armie, he brought from thence innumerable booties of cattell and other riches, afflicting the Englishmen with like slaughter and calamities, as the Scots had suffered in the yeres before, by the outragious force and puissance of king Edward. On the eight day of Januarie next insuing, King Robert wan by fine force the strong towne of Perth, fleaing and hanging all the people both English and Scotish, which were found in the same. He threw also the walles of that towne to the ground, and filled the ditch with the rampire. The same yere the castels of Dunfreis, Aire, Lanarke, with manie other strengths and castels were rendered vnto him, and cast to the ground.

Castels won.

The castell of Rokesburgh was taken by sir James Dowglasse on Feastings euen, in the yeere 1313, when they of the garison were ouercome with immoderate surfetting by meats and drinks excessiuelie taken, according as on that day the accustomed vse is. In that yeere also Thomas Randall, afterwards created earle of Murrey, wan the castell of Edenburgh. In which yeere also, Bruse wan the Ile of Man; Iohn Maior lib. 5. cap. 1. And the same yeere Edward Bruse besieged the castell of Striueling: but the strength of the house was such, what by nature of the high crag whereon it stood, and what by fortification of mans hand beside, all his trauell and inforcement diligentlie imploied to win it, proued vaine for the time. Within this castell as capteine thereof, was a right valiant knight named sir Philip Mowbray, a Scotish man borne, but taking part with the English men, who feared nothing the siege, for he had sufficient store of men, vittels, munition, and all maner of puruiance sufficient to defend the hold for a long season: so that finallie Edward Bruse, perceiuing no meanes whereby to atchiue the enterprise, which he had rashlie taken in hand, was abashed thereof: for by force he saw well inough it could not be brought to passe, and by large offers made to the capteine, if he would render the place, and become seruant to the king his brother, he could not once moue him to giue anie care thereto, insomuch as at length he sought to trie him another way forth, which in the end toke better effect than was likelie it would haue done, considering the lacke of circumspection vsed in the bargaine making: as thus.

Sir Philip Mowbray.

After long siege, and (as before is said) no good done, there was a motion made betwixt him and the capteine within for a truce, which was accorded on this wise: that if the fortresse were not succoured within twelue moneths next insuing, it should then be rendered vnto king Robert, and in the meane time no force should be vsed against it. This composition was vnwiselie made, as most men iudged: for euerie man of anie wisedome might easilie coniecture, that king Edward hauing so long day to make his prouision, would come in support of them within the castell, and that so stronglie, as would be hard for the Scots to resist him. King Robert himselfe also was sore offended with his brother for his follie shewed in this behalfe: but yet hee would not go about to breake the couenant accorded, for doubt to lose his brother, whose aid hee might not well want.

In the meane time king Edward sent forth messengers with letters, not onelie vnto all his subiects, but also vnto all his confederats and alies, to haue men of warre taken vp and retained to serue him in his warres against the Scots, which he intended to follow to the vtter destruction of the whole nation. There came therefore in hope of spoile, not onlie such as were appointed by commissioners of the musters, but also a great number of other that offered themselues of their owne accord to go in that iournie, namelie such as had little to liue vpon at home, and trusted to amend the matter by some good fortune in the warres abroad. The countries out of the which it is reported by the Scotish writers, that such aid came to the English, were these; Holand, Zeland, Brabant, Flanders, Picardie, Bolognois, Gascoigne, Normandie, Guian, and Burdelois. For all these at that time were either subiect to the king of England, or else in confederate league with him. There were also manie Scots that were English by deuotion, and aided king Edward at this time.

K. Edward taketh vp souldiers.

Out of what countries K. Edward had aid of men.

But

But the number of naturall Englishmen exceeded anie one nation beside, insomuch that the whole armie what of one and other, conteined (as the fame went) one hundred and fiftie thousand footmen, and almost as manie horsemen, beside cariage-men, coistrels, women, and lackies, but the fame herein belike (as often happeneth) did farre exceed the truth. Fame oftentimes exceedeth the truth. For it is not to be thought (as Iohn Maior himselfe writeth) that he should get such a number togither, not for that England it selfe is not able to set forth such a power: for as the same Maior saith, as manie men as are to be found in England of lawfull age, so manie able personages may be found there to passe for able souldiers. But either kings are not of abilitie to find so great a multitude with vittels and sufficient prouision, or else they will not streine themselues thereto. Nevertheless, the whole number by all likelihood was great, for many as well strangers as Englishmen, brought their wiues, their children, and whole household-meinie with them, in hope after the countrie were once subdued, to haue dwelling places appointed them in the same, there to inhabit: for so had king Edward promised them. K. Edwards promise. By reason whereof the disorder was such, that no warlike discipline might be obserued amongst them; for men, women, and children, were all mixt togither, with such clamor and noise, through the huge number of people, and diuersitie of languages, that it was a thing right strange to behold a campe so confusedlie ordered.

King Edward himselfe most proud and insolent of such incredible number, toke no heed at all to the gouerning of them, supposing victorie to be alreadie in his hands; insomuch that at his comming to the borders, he toke aduise with his councell to what kind of torment and death he might put king Robert, for he had no doubt of catching him at all. He also brought with him a religious man somewhat learned belike, of the order of the Carmelites, to describe the whole maner of his conquest and victorie ouer the Scots: so sure he thought himselfe that all things would come to passe as he could wish or deuise. K. Edward thinketh himselfe sure of victorie. This Carmelite, as may appeare in Iohn Bales booke, intituled A summarie of the writers of great Britaine, was named Robert Baston, and had the gouernance of an house in Scarburgh, of the Carmelites order, he being (as before is said) of that cote himselfe. Robert Baston a Carmelite.

On the contrarie part, king Robert ordered all his doings by good & prudent aduise, and with 30000 men, right hardie and throughlie exercised in wars, came forth against his enimies, shewing no token of feare in the world, but boldlie pitched downe his tents in good order and warlike arate, vpon a plaine a little aboue Bannockshorne. Iohn Ma. hath in his booke 35 thousand. Whether he did this for the great confidence he had in the hardinesse of his people, or for that he would shew how little he doubted the puissance of his enimies, least they should haue him in contempt, it is vncerteine. King Robert his comming toward the battell. Indeed there were diuerse expert warriours amongest the Englishmen, that said (when they heard how the Scots were thus assembled to fight) that the victorie would not be had, except it were dearelie bought: the wisedome and manhood of king Robert was knowne so well amongst them, that they were assured he would not ieopard himselfe in such a case, but that he knew he had such fellowes about him, as would sticke to their tackle. The opinion of expert warriors of king Edwards.

Moreouer the Scots by appointment of their king, to the furtherance of his hardie enterprise, had cast deepe pits and ditches in the place where it was iudged the battels should ioine, and pitched sharpe stakes within the same, and after couered them ouer slightlie with greene turfes or sods, in such wise that a few footmen might passe ouer well inough; but if anie great number should come prealling togither, or that anie horsemen came there vpon, the sods would shrinke and fall to the bottome of the trenches, with extreme perill of the men and horses, that were sure to fall vpon the stakes set there for that purpose; or else to be so inclosed, that they should not be able to get out of those pitfals. Trenches made by Scots to ouerthrow the Englishmen. By the place where king Robert was thus incamped, there runneth a great broke or water called Bannockshorne, so named of oten-cakes called bannocks, which were vsed to bee made commonlie at the mils standing on the banks of the said water. Bannockshorne. It falleth into the Forth right famous afterwards by reason of this battell fought neere to the same.

When both the armies were approched within a mile togither, king Edward sent eight hundred horsmen by a secret waie, vnto the castell of Striueling, to giue notice to sir Philip Mowbrate the capteine, that he was come with his armie to succour him. K. Robert being aduertised of their gate, & beholding them which way they toke, he sent Thomas Randall with fiue hundred Scotish horsmen to saue the countrie from spoile, who with singular manhood incountering with those Englishmen in sight of both the armies, there insued a cruell fight betwixt them for so small a number, continuing a long space with vncerteine victorie. The fight of Th. Randall with 500 Scotishmen in his companie against 800 Englishmen. In the meane time sir Iames Dowglasse, dreading that his speciall friend the said Thomas Randall should be ouerset with multitude of the Englishmen, came to K. Robert, and falling on his knees before him, required licence to go forth to the support of them that were thus fighting with their enimies: which bicause the king would not grant at the first, he rushed forth of the campe without licence, hauing in his companie a small band of men, but yet chosen out for the purpose, that if it were but by shewing himselfe, hee might put the enimies in some feare.

Notwithstanding, when he was come neere to the place where they fought, and saw how the Scots had got the victorie with great murther of the Englishmen, he staied and went no further; least he should by his comming seeme to bereeue them the glorie of the victorie, which had wone it with so great prowesse & singular valiancie. All those in the Scotish campe were relieued, in good hope of greater successe to follow in the whole enterprise by so happie a beginning. The Englishmen passed litle thereof, but yet for that the Scots should not ware proud, and take ouermuch courage thereby, The Englishmen determine to giue battell. they determined to giue them battell the next morow. King Robert prepareth to receiue the enimies by battell. King Robert with great diligence caused his people to prepare themselues readie to receiue the enimies, though he was nothing able to match them in number, deuising which waie he might traine them into the ditches before prepared. He commanded through the armie that euerie man should on the next morow receiue the sacrament of the Lords bodie, through the which they might haue the better hope of victorie against the vniust inuaders of their realme and countrie.

On the other side, the Englishmen trusted that all things would prosper with them, euen as they could best deuise: for by one small daies labour they hoped to be lords of all Scotland, and to dispose of the lands and goods of their enimies, as should seeme to them good, and most for their owne auaile. But king Robert all the night before the battell toke litle rest, hauing great care in his mind for the suertie of his armie, one while reuoluing in his consideration this chance, and an other while that; yea and sometimes he fell to deuout contemplation, making his praier to God and saint Phillane, whose arme as it was set and inclosed in a siluer case, he supposed had Saint Phillane.

beene the same time within his tent, trusting the better fortune to follow by presence thereof. In the meane time, as he was thus making his praiers, the case suddenlie opened, and clapped to againe. The kings chapleine being present, astonied therewith, went to the altar where the case stood, and finding the armie within it, he cried to the king & other that were present, how there was a great miracle wrought, confessing that he brought the emptie case to the field, and left the armie at home, least that relike should haue beene lost in the field, if anie thing chanced to the armie otherwise than well.

A subtill chapleine.

A matter deuised betwixt the king and his chapleine, as is to be thought.

The king verie toifull of this miracle, passed the remnant of the night in praier and thankesgiuing. On the morow he caused all his folks to heare diuine seruice, and to receiue the sacrament, as ouer night he had appointed. The abbat of Inchchaffraie did celebrate before the king that day, and ministred vnto him and other of the nobles, the communion, other priests being appointed to minister the same vnto the residue of the armie. After this, when seruice was ended, the king called the people to his standard, and first declared vnto them from point to point, how necessarie it was for them to shew their wonted manhood, considering that such an huge multitude of people was brought thither against them by king Edward, not of one nation or dominion, but of sundrie languages and parties, as well subiects as alies to the Englishmen, with full purpose vtterlie to extinguish the Scotish name and memorie, and to plant themselues in their seates and romes, as in possessions vtterlie voided of all the ancient and former inhabitants. To increase the fierce stomachs of the Scotishmen against the enimies, he recounted vnto them what he heard by credible report touching the menacing words and insolent brags of the same enimies, able to moue verie quiet minds vnto full indignation. Againe, to auoid feare out of their harts, which they might conceiue by reason of the multitude of their aduersaries, he rehearsed what a number of rascals were amongest them, without anie skill of warrelike affaires, not taken vp by choise and election in appointed musters, but resorting without difference togither, in hope of spoile and booties, hauing not else whereupon to liue at home in their countries.

The exhortation of king Robert to his people.

Moreouer, if nothing else might raise their harts in hope of victorie, their iust cause sith they came in defense of their countrie against iniurious inuaders, was matter sufficient to aduance their manlie stomachs, in trust of Gods aid in that quarell, hauing partlie assured them thereof, by notable miracles shewed in the night last passed. Hereto he added, that the greater multitude there was of the enimies, the more spoile and riches was to be got, if they atteined the victorie. Finallie, the more to stirre their harts to doo valiantlie, he required them of one thing, which he trusted (their manhood being such) they would not thinke hard for them to atchiue, and this was, that euerie of them would but dispatch one of the enimies, which if they performed, he promised them assured victorie. As for ten thousand, he knew to be amongst them of such approued souldiers, and old men of war, as he durst safelie vndertake for them that they would slea two of the enimies a peece, at the least. Such manner of persuasions king Robert vsed to incourage his people.

Fr. Thin. ✻ But Iohannes Maior, lib. 5. cap. 2. putteth speech much different from this, in the mouth of Bruse, further saieng, that when this oration was ended, that the king came downe the hill, on which he stood, when he vttered these words, and bareheaded imbraced all the nobilitie in his armes, and after turning himselfe to the whole armie, he reached to euerie man his hand, in signe of amitie: but I suppose he was ouerwearied before he had shaken 35000 men by the hands.) On the other part, king Edward caused the colonels of ech nation within his campe, to exhort their retinues to remember, that if they fought valiantlie for one houre or two, they should purchase infinit riches with the whole realme of Scotland, in reward of their labour: for he desired nothing for himselfe, but the superioritie. Againe, he willed they should haue in remembrance what irrecourable shame would follow (sith they had departed out of their countries in hope of gaine) to returne home with emptie hands, and void of victorie, not without some reproch and note of cowardise.

The exhortation of king Edward.

✻ Besides which (as seemeth by Iohannes Maior) king Edward clothed in his kinglie robes, is said to haue vsed these speeches to the armie. If I did not behold the open victorie, I would this day (most valiant men) make an other beginning of speech vnto you. We are in preparation & number of souldiors farre beyond these miserable Scots. Besides which, we haue abundance of brasse peeces, catapultes, bowes, and other such engins of warre, which on the contrarie part the Scots do want. They are onelie couered with leather pilches made of bucks skins, and with clokes like vnto the wild mounteine people, for which cause our archers, before the strength of the maine battell shall ioine, will soone subdue them. Maruell not that they haue before time subdued some of my subiects, because they did it by their accustomed deceits, and not by strength of battell. And though by chance they haue ouercome (in fight) some weake companie of equall number vnto them, yet are they not able to resist vs; being farre more excellent in number, preparation, and order of battell. The Scot hath a weake nation fighting on his owne charge, not hauing anie chosen souldier. God hath in this field inclosed that for Bruse (nourished by my good father) to the end that he might receiue worthie punishment for his wickednesse. His three brethren were consumed by my father: wherefore it now remaineth that we apprehend (aliue) these other two wicked and wauering men, to lead them to London, there to receiue their due punishment. You had great reuenues (noble princes) giuen to you by my father, in that kingdome. Wherefore now shew your selues valiant persons, that you may againe recouer the same, at this day possessed by the vniust and vnrightfull owners. Besides which, I will further by line geometricallie measure forth all the land of Scotland, to be diuided vnto those that deserue the same, according to the merits of the men. Thus much Maior.)

Fr. Thn. Iohannes Maior maketh K. Edward to speake (by his pen) what he list himself.

Io. Maior forgot that guns were not yet inuented.

But yet when they should march forward in arraie of battell towards the Scots, they might scarse be seuered from their wiues and children, which they had there in campe with them: neuertheless, at length by the sharpe calling vpon of their capteins, they were brought into order of battell, not without much adoo, by reason of the vnrulie multitude. The archers were placed in wings, mingled amongest the horsemen on the sides of the wards and battels, which stood inclosed in the middest of the same wings. King Robert appointing all his battels on foot, diuided the same into three parts: the fore ward he committed to Thomas Randulfe, & James Dowglasse, capteins of verie approued valiancie, vnder whome went seuen thousand of the borderers, and three thousand of the Irish Scots, other wise called Baterans or Redshanks. These no lesse fierce and forward, than the other practised and skilfull. The second ward was gouerned by Edward the kings brother, wherein were ten thousand men: but for that he was suspected of too much rashnesse, there was ioined with him

The third battell, in the which were (as Iohn Maior recordeth) fiftéene thouſand fighting men, the king himſelfe led, ſhewing a verie chérefull countenance amongeſt them, ſo farre forth, that euerie one that beheld him, conceiued in his mind an aſſured hope of victorie to ſucceed.

The third.

The abbat of Inchchaffraie aforeſaid (who as before is mentioned, did celebrate that morning afore the king) came forth before the battels, with the crucifix in his hands, bearing it aloft like a ſtandard [admoniſhing them valiantlie to take in hand the defenſe of their countrie, and the libertie of their poſteritie: for (ſaith he) you muſt not euerie man fight as it were for his owne priuat defenſe, his owne houſe and children, but euerie man for all men, and all men for euerie man muſt fight for the libertie, life, patrimonie, children, and wiues of all the realme: for ſuch and ſo great is the dignitie of our countrie, as they which deface or ſpoile it, are to be puniſhed with perpetuall fier, and they which do preſerue it, are to be recompenſed with an eternall crowne of glorie. And herewithall this abbat inſtructed them of manie things touching the loue of their countrie, which nature hath ſo planted in all men, that for the preſeruation and libertie therof, none ſhould refuſe ante danger, no not the loſſe of life, yea though (if it were poſſible) that it might be manie times loſt therefore. Which done, he feared not to admoniſh them to worſhip the image of Chriſt, which he ſhewed them on the croſſe.] Incontinentlie wherupon, the Scotiſh armie fell on knées before it, deuoutlie commending themſelues to almightie God.

Leſleus epiſc. Roſſ. li. 7. pag. 244. ſaith, it was Mauricius the abbat a man of ſingular pietie and puritie of life, ſuch vertue they can find in their clergie.

The Engliſh armie beholding the Scots fall on knées, thought verelie they had yéelded without ſtroke ſtriken. But when they ſaw them riſe againe, and to come forward, they began to be ſomewhat doubtfull. And herevpon ruſhing togither, at the firſt ioining a great number of people on either ſide were beaten downe & ſlaine. The archers which were arraied on the vtter ſkirts of the Engliſh wings, ſore annoied the Scots, till finallie Edward Bruſe came on their backs with a thouſand ſpeares, and brake them aſſunder, in ſuch wiſe that they did but little more hurt that day. Albeit incontinentlie herewith a battell of horſſemen to the number of thirtie thouſand, came ruſhing togither all at once in ſhocke, to haue borne downe and ouerridden the Scots; but being ſo in their full race galloping with moſt violence towards them, they tumbled into the foſſes and pits before mentioned, in ſuch wiſe one vpon another, that the moſt part of them was ſlaine, without all recouerie. Neuertheleſſe the Scots in maner oppreſſed through the huge multitude of the enimies, were néere at the point to haue béene vanquiſhed. [During which conflict ſaith Buch. this happened (which though it be a ſmall thing to put in writing, yet was ſuch as oftentimes it chanceth in battell, and as brought no ſmall benefit to the perfection of their buſineſſe) that king Robert (who continuallie rode before the battell appointed to his gouernement) holding a mace of warre in his hand (and keeping the firſt order in the arraie) was eſpied of an Engliſhman that knew him verie well: and forthwith rode full againſt Bruſe with his ſpeare. But the king beating the ſtroke aſide, came to his Engliſh aduerſarie, ouerthrew him by the force of his horſſe, in the end killed him with his mace & ſo left him dead. Wherevpon, the common people beholding the valure of their king and capteine, did with great force by the inſtigation of their fierce and fierie minds (and not by the kings perſuaſion) fall vpon their enimies in ſuch ſort, that they ſéemed to haue had the victorie of the aduerſe battell of their enimies: had it not béene for the Engliſh archers, which were placed in the wings of the battell; whom Bruſe (ſending out certeine light horſſemen) did ſone repreſſe: whereby the Scots incouraged, made their partie good, rather by hidden policie, than prepared force. For a ſtratagem by the Scots deuiſed, and an error by the Engliſh therof conceiued, did far more hurt to the enimie, than the power aſſembled in the field. For that deuiſe in the end was the cauſe that the Engliſh loſt the victorie, being in this ſort.]

The firſt ioining.

Thirtie thouſand Engliſh horſſemen ouerthrowen in trenches.

The Scots which were appointed to attend the carriage, as carters, wainemen, lackies, and the women, beholding in what danger their maiſters, friends, & countriemen ſtood, put on ſhirts, ſmocks, and other white linnen aloft vpon their vſuall garments, and herewith binding towels and napkins to their ſpeares, and to other ſuch ſtaues as they got in their hands, placed themſelues as well as they could in arraie of battell, and ſo making a great muſter and ſhew anew, came downe the hill ſide in the face of their enimies, with ſuch a terrible noiſe and hideous clamor, that the Engliſhmen fighting as then with moſt furie againſt the Scots with vncerteine victorie, and beholding this new reenforce comming downe the hill vpon their faces, ſuppoſing verelie it had béene ſome new armie, their hearts began to faint, the more in deed, for that they ſaw themſelues vneth able to ſuſteine the violent incounter of the Scots then preſent. And herevpon they began to turne their backs, and fell to running away as people clearelie vanquiſhed: on whome the Scots followed with inſatiable ire, and ſlue them down on all ſides where they might ouertake them. Sir James Dowglas with foure hundred choſen horſſemen, was commanded by king Robert to purſue the king of England with all ſpéed, to trie if he might ouertake him.

The Engliſh mens hearts begin to faint.

Dowglas (according to his charge) followed him in chaſe to Dunbar, & caſting betwixt that and the borders, laie in wait to haue taken him, if he had returned by land; but he being receiued into the caſtell of Dunbar by Patriſke Dunbar erle of March, with fiftéene earles in his companie, was by the ſame earle of March conueied into certeine veſſels, lieng there at anchor, with the which he paſſed alongſt by the ſhore into England, to ſhew an example of the vnſtable ſtate of princes: for though this Edward was that day in the morning right proud of the great puiſſance and number of people which he had about him, not vnlike ſometime to the great armie of king Xerres, yet he was conſtreined before the euening of the ſame day, to ſaue his life in a poore fiſhers boat. In this battell were ſlaine fiftie thouſand Engliſhmen (as the Scotiſh writers affirme) amongſt whome was the earle of Glocester, with two hundred knights. On the Scotiſh part were ſlaine about foure thouſand, and amongſt other two valiant knights, ſir William Mepount, and ſir Walter Roſſe. The ſpoile was ſo great of gold, ſiluer, and other iewels gotten in the field, that the whole number of the Scotiſh armie was made rich thereby: and beſides this, they got little leſſe monie and riches by ranſoming of priſoners taken at this battell, than of ſpoile gotten in the fight, campe, and field. But the death of ſir Giles Argentine, that died amongſt other in this mortall battell, was ſo diſpleaſant to king Robert, for the familiaritie which he had ſometimes with him in England, that he reioiſed little of all the gaine got by ſo famous a victorie. He cauſed his bodie to be buried right honorablie in ſaint Patriks church, beſide Edenburgh. The quéene king Roberts wife, who had béene kept in captiuitie the ſpace of 8 yeares, was in England now deliuered by exchange for one of the nobles of England, which was taken at this battell. The rich clothes of ſilke, veluet, and gold, which were found in the Engliſh campe, were diſtributed to the abbeies and monaſteries of the realme, to make thereof veſtments, copes, and frontals for altars. The Carmelite frier, of whome ye heard before, brought thither by king Edward to deſcribe the victorie of the Engliſhmen, was taken priſoner amongſt other, and commanded by king Robert to write contrarilie the victorie of the Scots, according as he had ſéene: who thereupon gathered his ruſtie wits togither, & made certeine rude verſes beginning thus.

Verſes made by Robert Waſton the Carmelite.

De planctu cudo metrum cum carmine nudo,
Riſum retrudo cùm tali themate ludo.
With barren verſe this rime I make,
Bewailing whileſt ſuch theame I take.

There be ſome that haue iudged, how this victorie was atteined by the ſingular fauor of almightie God, by reaſon of miracles which they rehearſe to happen at the ſame time. The night before the day of the battell, there came to the abbeie of Glaſtenburie two men in complet armour, deſiring to lodge there all night: the abbat kéeping an houſe of great hoſpitalitie, receiued them right gladlie, and making them good cheare, demanded what they were, and whither they were going: who anſwered that they were the ſeruants of God, and going to helpe the Scots at Bannorſborne. On the morrow the chamberlaine found them departed before anie of the gates were opened, & the beds faire made, and not ſtirred otherwiſe than as they left them ouer night. The ſame day that the battell was foughten, a knight clad in faire bright armour, declared to the people at Aberden, how the Scots had gotten a famous victorie againſt the Engliſhmen, and was ſéene ſhortlie after to paſſe ouer Pictland Firth on horſſebacke. It was ſuppoſed by the people that this was ſaint Magnus, ſometime prince of Orkenie, and for that cauſe king Robert endowed the church of Orkenie with fiue poundes ſterling of the cuſtomes of Aberden, to furniſh the ſame church, with bread, wine, and wax.

Miracles if ye liſt to beléeue them.

Manie noble men for their approued manhood ſhewed in this conflict, were highlie rewarded at the hands of king Robert. One Robert Fleming, by whoſe means he reuenged the treaſon wrought againſt him by John Cumin, with ſlaughter of the ſame John, had the lands of Cumnernald giuen him, which were of the inheritance belonging to the ſaid Cumin. It is reported by writers, that two knights of Brabant that ſerued amongeſt the Engliſhmen, chanced to heare manie reprochfull words ſpoken in the Engliſh campe againſt king Robert, who being ſomewhat moued therewith, and miſliking ſuch diſmeaſured talke, wiſhed in words that the victorie might chance vnto him. For the which with K. Edward informed thereof, cauſed them by a trumpet to be conueied vnto the Scotiſh campe, with commandement to aid king Robert to the vttermoſt of their powers, purpoſing to puniſh them according to his mind, if he atteined the victorie, as he had no doubt but he ſhould. Herevpon, before the ioining of the battels, he cauſed proclamation to be made, that whoſoeuer brought their heads vnto him, ſhould haue an hundred marks in reward.

A proclamation.

King Robert hearing in what danger they had run for his ſake, rewarded them with great riches of the ſpoile got in the field, with the which they returning into Brabant, built a goodlie houſe in Antuerpe, naming the ſame Scotland, and cauſing the Scotiſh armes, and the picture of Bruſe to be ſet vp in the ſame, appointed it for a lodging to receiue them of the Scotiſh nation that ſhould reſort vnto that towne, as may appeare euen vnto this day. And this was done for a memoriall, to ſhew what loue and hartie benevolence theſe two knights bare towards king Robert and his people, for the great liberalitie receiued at his hands. This glorious victorie chanced to the Scots on the day of the natiuitie of ſaint John Baptiſt, in the yeare 1314.

* About this time for the varietie of fortune (in ſo ſmall a courſe of yeares) happened a thing not vnworthie the reporting. For John Wentith, which before betraied his déere friend Wallaſe to the Engliſh, being therefore (as of right he ought) extremelie hated of the Scots, was (in recompenſe thereof beſide manie other rewards) benefited with the gardianſhip of the caſtle of Dunbriton: which fort (after all the other caſtles before ſaid were recouered to the Scots) was almoſt the onlie thing (except ſome few others) that remained in the hands of the Engliſh: and becauſe this fort was by nature inexpugnable, king Robert dealt with the captéine (by ſuch as were friends and of kinred vnto him) to betraie the caſtle into his hands, promiſing great recompenſe therefore. Wherevnto this Wentith by no means would agrée, vnles K. Robert would giue to him the earledome of Lennox for his reward. Wherevpon the king being greatlie in doubt what to ſay therein, (though in déed he vehementlie longed for the ſaid caſtle) becauſe he did not thinke the obteining thereof to be of ſuch good vnto him, as that he would therefore offend or loſe the earle of Lennox; who had in all his calamities béene the moſt certeine, and almoſt the onelie friend of the king: which doubt, when the earle vnderſtood; he forthwith came vnto him, willing him in no wiſe to refuſe the condition; wherevpon the bargaine was concluded betwéene John Wentith and the king, and that in ſuch ſort, as it was moſt ſolemnelie confirmed.

John Wentith made captéine of Dunbriton caſtle.

Now, when the king ſhould come to receiue this caſtle (according to compoſitions) as he was in the wood Colchon, a mile diſtant from the ſame, a certeine carpentar called Rowland came thither ſecretlie vnto him, & deſired licence that he might ſpeake to the king, for he would diſcouer a great matter touching a treaſon that was deuiſed and prepared againſt him, by the captéine of Dunbriton. Which pardon obteined, he opened vnto Bruſe, that below in the wine-cellar of the caſtle, were a number of Engliſh incloſed, which at dinner ſhould either take or kill the king (being then ſafe) after that he had obteined the caſtle. Wherevpon the king nothing abaſhed, but kéeping on his former determination, & being (according to appointment) receiued by the ſaid John Wentith in the caſtle of Dunbriton: after that he had ſearched all other places, and was courteouſlie inuited to ſit downe to dinner; anſwered that he would not eate, vntill he had looked into the cellar below. Wherevnto for excuſe, and to defer the time, the captéine anſwered that the ſmith was abſent and caried the key away with him. But the king not waiting for the comming of the ſmith, did incontinentlie breake open the cellar doore, whereby all the deceit appeared. After which, the armed men were brought forth before the king, who being ſeuerallie examined, confeſſed the whole matter; and further, that there was a ſhip readie in the hauen to haue caried the K. priſoner into England, if they had taken him aliue. Wherevpon the reſt being puniſhed, John Wentith was onelie caſt into priſon, & reſerued from further paine: becauſe the king would not offend his friends & kinred in ſo dangerous a time as that was. For this Wentith had manie beautifull daughters maried to men of great power & riches. After which impriſonment of this 1314. The crowne of Scotland intailed. Margerie the daughter of king Robert by his first wife.

Immediatlie after, king Robert called a parlement at Aire, where, by consent of the three states he was confirmed king, and the crowne intailed to the heires male of his bodie lawfullie begotten, and for want of such heires, to remaine vnto his brother Edward Bruse, and to the heires male of his bodie; and if he chanced to die without such heires, then should the crowne descend to Margerie the daughter of king Robert, and to the heires generall of hir bodie by lawfull succession. In which parlement it was further decreed, that if the king were in his minoritie, he should then be gouerned by Thomas Randolph, and if anie misfortune chanced vnto the said Randolph, that then the gouernement of the kings person and kingdome should be committed to James Dowglasse.

This Margerie was gotten by king Robert on the earle of Mar his sister, his first wife, and was maried by the aduise of his nobles vnto Walter great Steward of Scotland. Also king Robert, for that his first wife aforesaid was deceassed, maried shortlie after Elizabeth the daughter of the earle of Ulster, on whome he got a sonne named Dauid, and two daughters, the one named Margaret, and the other Mauld. The first was maried to the earle of Sutherland, and bare him a sonne named John: the second departed this world in hir infancie. After the mariage solemnized betwixt his daughter Margerie, and the foresaid Walter Steward, king Robert went through all the bounds of his realme, and did not onelie confirme the ancient liberties and priuileges of the burrowes and townes in all places where he came, but also augmented the same, and granted vnto diuerse, aswell townes as baronies, sundrie new prerogatiues and franchises, as may appeare by his charters made vnto them of the same, speciallie to the townes of Perth, Dundee, and Aberden.

Liberties by king Robert.

In the yeare following, which was in the yeare 1315, the princes of Ireland oppressed (as they tooke it) with long and insufferable tyrannie of the Englishmen, and trusting by support of Scots to recouer their libertie, now after so notable an ouerthrow of the whole English puissance, sent ambassadors vnto king Robert, requiring that it might please him to send his brother Edward Bruse, to receiue the crowne and gouernement of their countrie of Ireland. This request being granted, Edward prepared to take that iournie in hand, and so with a small power of Scotishmen transporting ouer into Ireland, and ioining with an armie of such as were readie to assist him there, he tooke the towne of Vlster, and slue a great number of Englishmen which were found in the same. Then afterwards, by the generall consent of all the estates of Ireland, Edward Bruse was proclamed king of that realme, and certeine of the Irish nobilitie sent ambassadors vnto the pope, to sue for a ratification of their act and procéedings, for the suertie and weale of their countrie, sith they were not able longer to sustéine the grieuous yoke of the English thraldome. These ambassadors, through their earnest diligence, got such fauor in their sute, that the pope sundrie times charged the Englishmen to auoid out of Ireland: howbeit, they séemed to passe little of his commandements in that behalfe, for they dailie sought how to make themselues strong in that part, least they should lose the possession of that countrie, which their enimies were about to get forth of their hands.

1315. The lords of Ireland require aid of king Robert. Vlster. Edward Bruse proclamed king of Ireland. The Englishmen passe little on the popes commandements.

King Robert being informed how through the reenforcement of the English armie, being dailie refreshed with new succors, his brother was like to run in danger to be cast away, he left sir James Dowglasse gouernor in Scotland, with a competent number of men to defend the borders, and he himselfe with a great power of other souldiers and men of war went ouer into Ireland, to support his brother: but suffering great distresse at his first comming thither, for want of victels & other prouisions, he lost almost the one halfe of his folks through verie famine & hunger, & the residue were constreined to eate horsses and other such lothsome meats, therewith to sustéine their languishing liues. At length being approched within a daies iournie of his brother, in purpose to haue supported him with those people which he had left, his brother not abiding his comming, fought vnwiselie with the Englishmen at a place called Dundach, and receiuing the ouerthrow, was slaine himselfe with a great number of other. It is vncerteine whether he had anie knowledge of the comming of his brother king Robert, or that through desire of fame he feared least if he staied till his brother came, a great part of the praise (if they got the victorie) should remaine to him: and therefore he made such hast to fight. But howsoeuer it was, thus he was slaine on the fourtéenth of October, in the yeare 1317.

Sée more hereof in Ireland. King Robert passeth ouer into Ireland. Edward Bruse is slaine in Ireland. Sée more of this matter in Ireland.

Edward king of England, hearing that king Robert was passed ouer into Ireland, thought the time to serue well for his purpose, eftsoones to inuade Scotland: and herevpon comming with a great power to the borders, he purposed to haue done some great feat. But sir James Dowglas the gouernor, hauing likewise gathered an armie, gaue him battell, and put both him & his people to flight. In this battell were slaine three notable capteins on the English side: as sir Edmund Lilaw a Gascoigne capteine of Berwike, with sir James Neuill, and the third sir James Dowglasse slue with his owne hands. King Edward perceiuing it was not like that he should do anie good at that time against the Scots by land, thought it best to assaile them by sea, which way forth the Englishmen commonlie were euer too good for the Scots. He rigged therefore a fléet of ships, and sent the same into the Forth, which burned the countrie on each side, and tooke manie rich booties from the inhabitants néere to the shore.

K. Edward sendeth a nauie into Scotland.

Duncane earle of Fife, hearing of these cruelties done by the Englishmen, came forth with fiue hundred hardie souldiers, to defend the countrie from such inuasions: but when he perceiued that the enimies were of greater number than he was able well to incounter, hauing but an handfull of men in comparison to them, he gaue somewhat backe, and in the meane time met with William Sinclare bishop of Dunkeld, hauing about three score armed men in his companie, who blaming the earle for his faintnesse of courage, caused him to set forward againe towards the enimies, & finding them busie in spoiling & harrieng the countrie, they gaue an onset vpon them so fiercelie, that there was slaine at the first incounter to the number of fiue hundred of the Englishmen, and the residue chased to their botes lieng at Dunbritsell, which they entred in such haste, that one of the botes being pestered with ouer great number, sanke with them before they could get to their ships. K. Robert euer after customablie called this Wil. Sinclare his owne bishop, for the noble prowes which he shewed in this enterprise.

It was taken now by practise, through meanes of one Spaldein an Englishman, who for his labour had certeine lands giuen him in Angus, which his posteritie inioieth to these daies.

*Trulie it were a wonderfull processe to declare what mischiefes came through hunger and other misfortunes, by the space of 11 yeeres in Northumberland; for the Scots became so proud after they had gotten Berwike, that they nothing esteemed the English nation. But (amongst other things by the Scots attempted) much about this time, Adam de Gardonne came with 160 men, to driue awaie the cattell pasturing by Norham, which the people of the towne perceiuing, ran forth and incountered with the Scots, who had gotten the victorie of them, had not Thomas Grey capteine of the castell, seeing them in some ieopardie, issued forth with 60 of his souldiers, & slaine most part of the Scots, and their horsses. The which Grey had beene twise before besieged in the castell of Norham, once almost by the space of a whole yéere, and another time by the terme of seuen moneths, in which he behaued himselfe like a worthie gentleman, in that his enimies got none aduantage of him, although that during the siege, they had erected manie fortresses before the castell, to annoie such as were within: of which forts they made one at Uplitlington, and one in the church of Norham, the castell whereof had beene twise teinted and in danger of losse, had not the lord Persie and Neuill (being great succourers of the marches) rescued the same. For at one time the vtter ward of Norham castell was taken in the time of this Grey on saint Katharins eeuen, which the Scots kept not but three daies, and their purpose in winning the same did vtterlie faile them.)

After that the earle of Murrey had recouered Berwike, he and the lord James Dowglasse in the moneth of Maie inuaded England with a puissant armie, passing further into the countrie than the Scots had béene accustomed to do before time, burning as they went forward the townes of Northallerton and Burrowbridge; and comming to Ripon, they spoiled the towne of all the goods found therein; but compounding with them that kept the church against them for a thousand marks, they forbare to burne anie of the buildings. After they had taried here three daies, they departed thence, and went to Knaresburgh, which towne they burnt, and beating the woods (into the which the people were withdrawne with their goods and cattell) they got a great bootie, and returning homewards by Scipton in Crauen, they first spoiled the towne, and after burnt it, and so marching thorough the countrie, came backe into Scotland with their spoiles and prisoners without anie resistance. [This castell of Knaresburgh was taken by John Lilleborne, which after rendered himselfe to the king vpon certeine conditions.]

In the yeere following, king Edward came and laid siege vnto Berwike, but the towne was so well defended, that he was constreined with small honor to returne home, and leaue it as he found it. For in the meane time, while king Edward lay at the siege before Berwike, Thomas Randall earle of Murrey, and the lord James Dowglasse assembled their forces together; but perceiuing themselues too weake to remoue the siege by force, they passed by, and entring into England, wasted and spoiled all before them, keeping on their way vnto Burrowbridge: whereof when the citizens of Yorke were aduertised, with their capteins William Melton their archbishop, and the bishop of Elie, not making them of the countrie once priuie to their purpose, but hauing in their companie a great number of priests and men of religion, they gaue battell to the Scots one day in the after none, not farre from the towne of Mitton vpon Swale, twelue miles distant from Yorke northwards.

But forsomuch as the most part of the Englishmen were not expert in the feates of warre, and came not in anie orderlie arraie of battell, they were easilie vanquished & put to flight by the Scots, who were readie to receiue them in good order, close togither in one entier squadrone, and after their accustomed maner, at their first ioining they gaue a great showt, wherewith the Englishmen out of hand began to giue backe: which when the Scots perceiued, they got them to their horses, and followed the chase most egerlie, beating downe and sleaing the Englishmen, neither sparing religious person nor other, so that their died to the number of foure thousand Englishmen that day, and amongst the rest was the maior of Yorke one. In the water of Swale (as was said) there were drowned to the number of a thousand. When king Edward lieng as yet at the siege of Berwike, vnderstood what mischiefe the Scots did within his realme, he raised his siege, in purpose to haue incountered with his enimies: but the Scots aduertised of his purpose, returned with all their prisoners and spoile by Stanemore, and so through Gilland, and the west marches, withdrew home into their countrie. About the feast of All saints, when the inhabitants of the north parts had got in their haruest, so that their barnes were now stuffed with corne, of the which prouision they were to liue all the yéere after, the Scots vnder the conduct of the said two capteins, the earle of Murrey, and the lord Dowglasse, entered into England, and burnt the countrie of Gilland, taking away both such people as they tooke prisoners, and also all the cattell which they might meet with, and so kept vpon their iournie till they came to Burgh vnder Stanemore, destroieng all afore them, & then returning through Westmerland, practised the like mischiefe there, in burning vp houses and corne in all places where they came, as they had done before in Gilland. And finallie passing through Cumberland with the like hauocke, at length they drew home into their owne countrie, with no small number of prisoners, and plentie of great riches which they had got in that iournie. [And the souldiers going backe againe toward Scotland, fought with the commons of Newcastell at the bridge end, for certeine displeasures done vnto them, in which conflict sir John Perith knight was slaine, and manie other squires belonging to the constable and marshall. About the same time died Margerie Bruse king Roberts daughter. Shortlie after also was a truce taken betwixt the two realmes of England & Scotland for a certeine time. Then king Robert hauing no trouble, neither within his realme nor without, caused a parlement to be holden at Perth, where hée required the lords to shew their deeds and charters whereby they held their lands. The lords after long aduisement taken herein, at length pulled out their swords all at once, declaring that they had none other euidence nor charter to shew for the tenure of their lands. but yet he diſſembled for the time, and commended them for their noble hearts and valiant ſtomachs: neuertheleſſe, he purpoſed to be reuenged of their proud preſumptions, when more opportunitie of time ſerued thereto. Sundrie of the nobles perceiuing that the king bare an inward grudge towards them for this matter, deuiſed amongſt themſelues how to deliuer him into king Edwards hands, ſo to auoid all danger that might follow of his diſpleaſure conceiued thus againſt them. For the accompliſhment of this their treaſonable practiſe, they made a bond in writing, confirmed with their hands and ſeales betwixt them, & minded to ſend the ſame into England vnto king Edward. But king Robert hauing ſome inkeling of this their purpoſe, cauſed diligent watch to be laid by the way for ſuch as ſhould paſſe into England from them with the ſaid bond, inſomuch that in the end a palmer or pilgrime was apprehended which had the bond, and other writings incloſed within his pilgrims ſtaffe.

A palmer taken with writings on him.

King Robert vnderſtanding by theſe writings all the manner of the treaſon, and what they were that had conſented to the ſame, haſtilie ſent for the whole number of them, as though there had beene ſome matter in hand wherein he wiſhed to haue their aduiſe. They were no ſooner come, but ſtreightwaies calling them before him, he queſtioned with them whether they knew their owne hands and ſeales, and immediatlie therewith ſhewed the writings, which were found in the palmers ſtaffe: and becauſe they could not denie their owne act, they were committed to ward within ſundrie caſtels, till he had taken further aduiſe in the matter. Incontinentlie after, he went to Berwike, and there arreſted the capteine of the towne, named ſir William Soulis, and cauſed him to be conueied to Perth (committing the ſaid William Soulis (as ſaith Io. Maior) with the counteſſe of Straherne, to perpetuall priſon) where ſhortlie after he called an aſſemblie of all the eſtates of the realme. This was called the blacke parlement, kept in the yeere after the incarnation of our Sauiour 1320. In this parlement, at the beginning thereof, was Dauid Abernethie, the ſiſters ſonne of king Robert, accuſed as partie to the treaſon aforeſaid, though being laboured vnto by the reſt of the conſpirators to ſoine with them therein, he refuſed ſo to doo, but yet for that he did not vtter the thing, but concealed it with them, he was condemned & loſt his head, the people ſore lamenting his miſhap, for the great valiancie which was knowne to be in him, hauing ſerued honorablie manie yeeres before againſt the Saracens, and other miſcreants in the parties of beyond the ſeas, where he was called the flower of chiualrie.

The lords that had conſpired, are committed to ward.

Dauid Abernethie loſeth his head.

In deed the king himſelfe would gladlie haue ſaued his life, but for that he minded to doo iuſtice on the reſidue, and finding no man to make ſute for him, he permitted the execution to proceed againſt him. On the morrow after, he cauſed all the reſidue of the traitors to be brought forth to iudgement, and ſentence being giuen againſt them, he commanded without delaie that they ſhould be executed. Then came diuerſe and ſundrie perſons in moſt humble wiſe to make ſute for pardon to the king for their friends and kinſmen: but he made them plaine anſwer, that there was none to be found that would make interceſſion for the ſauing of his kinſmans life the day before, when he was led to execution, that had offended nothing ſo grieuouſlie, in compariſon of them for whome they now made ſute; and therfore he bad them be contented, for they ſhould aſſuredlie haue according to that which they had deſerued. And therewith were the officers commanded to make haſt with the execution, which was done incontinentlie without anie further reſpit.

Execution without reſpit

There were ſome that were accuſed to be partakers in this treaſon, but yet for that no euident proofes could be produced againſt them, they were diſmiſſed, as Walter Warwell, with Walter Berclaie ſhiriffe of Aberdene, Patrike Graim, Hameline Keldrinton, and Euſtace Rathe, knights; beſides eight others. But yet the counteſſe of Straherne & William de Soulis were condemned to perpetuall priſon. The earle of Buchquhanes lands, who ſuffered at that preſent, were diuided into two parts, the one being giuen to William Haie that was made conſtable of the realme in place of Iohn Quincie, who likewiſe ſuffered at the ſame time; and the other part was giuen vnto William Reth, togither with the office of the ſtewardſhip of the realme. About the ſame time the king of England by complaint made to the pope, purchaſed that a legat was ſent from the ſée apoſtolike into Scotland, to admoniſh king Robert to ceaſſe from further diſquieting the realme of England, by ſuch cruell inuaſions, as were ſurmiſed that he wrongfullie exerciſed againſt the ſame realme. But anſwer was made hereunto by the king, and other the nobles of the realme of Scotland, that all the world might well vnderſtand that the whole occaſion of all the trouble which had chanced betwixt the two realmes of England and Scotland, did onelie proceed of the couetous deſire in the Engliſhmen, ſeeking to conquer that realme without anie iuſt claime or title: and therefore they thought it reaſon firſt to ſuppreſſe the loftie ſtomachs of the Engliſhmen; and then if there were ante thing worthie to be reformed on their behalfes, they would be contented to ſtand vnto the order of the popes authoritie therein. Thus was the legat diſpatched home, without other effect of his errand [ſauing (as ſaith Buchanan) he curſſed and interdicted the Scots and Scotland.]

Shortlie after, king Robert entered with an armie into England, and waſted the countrie before him, till he came to the recroſſe, which ſtandeth vpon Stanemore. Howbeit it ſhould ſeeme by that which Richard Southwell writeth hereof, that king Robert was not preſent himſelfe in perſon in this iournie, but that he appointed the earle of Murrey to be his lieutenant, who with an armie, after the feaſt of the Epiphanie entered into England, and comming to Darington, ſtaied there for a ſeaſon, whileſt the lord Iames Dowglaſſe, and the lord Steward of Scotland went abroad to harrie and ſpoile the countrie on ech ſide, the one of them paſſing forth towards Hartilpole and Cliueland, and the other towards Richmond. The inhabitants of Richmondſhire, hauing no capteine amongeſt them to defend their countrie from that grieuous inuaſion of the enimie, gaue a great ſumme of monie in like manner, as at other times they had done, to haue their countrie ſpared from fier and ſpoile.

The Scots taried at this time about 15 daies within England, and in the end returned without battell. For when the knights of the north countries repared vnto the duke of Lancaſter then lieng at Pomfret, and offered to go into the field with him againſt the Scots, he would not once ſtirre his foot, by reaſon of the diſcord that was depending betwixt him and king Edward: but howſoeuer the matter went, king Edward ſore grieued in his mind with ſuch inuaſion made by his enimies the Scots, he gaue order to leauie an armie of an hundred thouſand men, what on horſſebacke and on foot (as the report went) appointing them to be readie to enter into Scotland at Lammas next: whereof king Robert being aduertiſed, ment to preuent him, and therupon in the octaues of the Natiuitie of ſaint Iohn Baptiſt,

The abbeie of Holme burnt.

From thence he marched forward, destroieng and spoiling the countrie of Copland, and so keeping vpon his iournie, passed Oden sands, towards the abbeie of Fourneis: but the abbat méeting him on the waie, redéemed his lands from spoile, and brought king Robert to his house, and made to him great chéere: but yet the Scots could not hold their hands from burning and spoiling diuerse places; and marching forward vnto Cartmele beyond Leuin sands, burnt and spoiled all the countrie about, except a priorie of blacke canons which stood there. Passing from thence they came to Lancaster, which towne they also burnt, saue onelie the priorie of blacke monks, and a house of preaching friers. Héere came to them the earle of Murrey, and the lord James Dowglasse with an other armie, whereupon marching further southwards, they came to Preston in Anderneis, and burnt that towne also, the house of friers minors onelie excepted.

And thus being foure score miles within England from their owne borders, they returned homewards with all their prisoners, cattell, and other bооties which they had got in that iournie, comming to Carleill on the éeue of saint Margaret, and lodging about that towne the space of fiue daies, they wasted and destroied the corne, & all other things that came within their reach. Which done, on saint James euen they entred into Scotland againe, hauing béene within England at this time thrée wéekes and thrée daies. Immediatlie hereupon, to wit, about the feast of Lammas, king Edward with his armie came to Newcastell, and desirous to be reuenged of such iniuries done to his subiects, entered into Scotland, and passing forth till he came to Edenburgh, through want of vittels and other necessarie prouision, he was constreined to returne home within the space of 15 daies. For king Robert aduertised of his comming, had caused all the corne and cattell in the countrie to be conueied out of the waie into certeine forts, whereunto the Englishmen might not come to get it into their hands, & so to relieue themselues therewith. But in their returning homeward, somewhat to reuenge their displeasures, they spoiled and burnt the abbeies of Melrose, and Driburgh, with diuerse other religious houses and places, not sparing anie kind of crueltie against all those of the inhabitants that fell into their hands.

In reuenge hereof, king Robert shortlie after entred with a puissant armie into England, spoiling & wasting the countrie, till he came almost to Yorke. At length, hearing that king Edward was comming towards him with an armie, he chose a plot of ground betwixt the abbeie of Biland and saint Sauiour, there to abide battell; which king Edward refused not to giue, though in the end he was put to flight with his whole power, and chased with great slaughter both of Englishmen and Normans, which were there in his aid. Diuerse also of the nobilitie were taken prisoners, as John de Britaine earle of Richmond, and Henrie Sowlie, with others. This battell was fought in the yéere of our Sauiour 1323, 15 daies after the feast of saint Michaell the archangell. King Edward lieng the same time at the abbeie of Riuale, aduertised of this ouerthrow, fled and got him into Yorke, leauing his plate and much other stuffe behind him for want of cariage in that his sudden departure, which the Scots comming thither found, and tooke awaie with them. And from thence they passed forth into Yorkeswold, spoiling and wasting the countriemen vnto Beuerleie, which towne for a summe of monie they were contented to spare, and so then they returned homewards, entering againe into Scotland on All soules day, which is the second of November, after they had remained within England at that time the space of a moneth and foure daies.

Shortlie after, king Robert sent an ambassador to the French king [to pacifie him offended with them for the English] and to renew the ancient bond of amitie betwixt the two realmes of Scotland and France, which was accomplished with this new condition added to the former articles, that if it chanced that succession failed touching the inheritance of the crowne of either realme, so that a doubt should rise, who ought by right to inioy the same, the claime and title thereof should be tried and decided by the nobles of both the realmes; and further, that they should not onelie remoue and exclude all such as went about wrongfullie to vsurpe the crowne, but also to defend and mainteine the true inheritor to the vttermost of their powers. In confirmation of this couenant, both the kings receiued the sacrament. And for further ratifieng of it, they made a prouiso, that whereas (then) they had the popes consent hereto, neither he, nor ante of his successors hereafter should dispense with them for the breaking of that bond; and if they did, euerie such dispensation should be reputed void and of none effect.

A prouiso.

In this yéere 1323 (as Richard Southwell reporteth) about the Ascension day, came commissioners from the two kings of England and Scotland, vnto Newcastell, there to treate of some agréement of peace. For the king of England came Amerie de Valence earle of Penbroke, the lord Hugh Spenser the yonger, and foure other persons sufficientlie authorised. And for the king of Scots came the bishop of saint Andrewes, Thomas Randall earle of Murrey, and foure other persons likewise of good calling. After much talke, in the end they agréed vpon a truce to indure for 13 yéeres, which was proclamed in both realmes about the feast of saint Barnabie next insuing. About this time also, or not long before, an Englishman descended of noble linage, called Hamton, chanced for speaking certeine words in commendation of king Robert, to fall at variance with one of king Edwards priuie chamber, named John Spenser; insomuch that fighting togither about the same words, Hamtons hap was to slea this Spenser, & thereupon knowing there was no waie but death, if he should hap to be caught, he fled with all speed into Scotland, where he was receiued of the king in most friendlie wise, and had giuen to him for the maintenance of his estate like a gentleman, the lands of Cadzow [which (as saith Buchanan) he called by the name of Hamilton.]

The posteritie of this Hamton remaineth in Scotland vnto this day, increased so in kinred and honor, by reason it was in processe of time mingled with the kings bloud, that few linages in that realme are of like estimation. They are now called Hamiltons, somewhat changed from the name of their first beginner. [Donald earle of Marre, was made by king Edward the second gardian or capteine of the castell of Bristow in England, the which he kept vntill the comming of quéene Isabell against hir husband Edward the second, at what time he deliuered the same into the hands of the said quéene, and returned into Scotland.]

His ſonne Edward the third was placed in his rome, and crowned the 26 day of Januarie, in the yéere 1326. In the night of the ſame day in which he receiued the crowne, the Scots ment to haue ſteine the caſtell of Norham by ſcaling, and they went ſo cunninglie about their purpoſe, that they were to the number of 16 of them got aloft on the wals: but the capteine of this caſtle Robert Maners being warned afore hand of their comming by one of his ſouldiers that was a Scotiſhman borne, ſuddenlie aſſailed them, ſlue nine or ten of them, and toke fiue priſoners aliue, but ſore wounded, ſo as this miſfortune falling to them in the beginning of king Edward the third his reigne, might haue bene a forwarning of their loſſes to follow in the daies of his gouernement.

Whileſt theſe things were a doing in England, king Robert though he might ſéeme to haue title iuſt inough to the crowne of Scotland, which he had poſſeſſed now not onlie by rightfull conqueſt, but alſo by lawfull intereſt of inheritance for a certeine number of yéeres, by conſent of all the eſtates of the realme; yet to the end to put awaie all doubts, and to conclude the ſucceſſion of the Balioll from all claime, which hereafter they might pretend to the crowne of Scotland, he ſent ſir James Dowglaſſe into France vnto the lord John Balioll, to require him to tranſpoſe and reſigne all the challenge of right and intereſt which he might ſéeme to haue to the crowne of Scotland, as well for himſelfe as his heires & ſucceſſors for euer, to king Robert le Bruſe, and his heires. In conſideration of which reſignation, he offered faire lands and rents to him to be appointed forth in Scotland.

James Dowglaſſe ſent into France to the Balioll.

The Balioll being now ſore worne with age, and thereto blind of bodilie ſight, lightlie conſented vnto this motion, conſidering (as he ſaid) he toke it to be the ordinance of almightie God, that king Robert ſhould inioy the gouernement of the Scotiſh kingdome, as moſt worthie and able thereto, hauing deliuered the ſame, and defended it moſt valiantlie from the hands of moſt cruell enimies. He called therefore his friends and kinſmen togither, in the preſence of whome he wholie reſigned vnto king Robert and his heires, all the right and title which he or anie other for him either had, or hereafter might haue to the crowne of Scotland, concerning anie intereſt or claime which might be auouched for anie cauſe or conſideration, from the beginning of the world vnto that preſent day. After the returne of ſir James Dowglaſſe forth of France, with ſo good expedition and diſpatch of that buſineſſe wherabout he was ſent, king Robert verie ioifull thereof, aſſembled a parlement of the nobles and other eſtates of the realme at Cambuſkenneth, where he procured a new act to be eſtabliſhed touching the ſucceſſion of the crowne, which was, that if his ſonne Dauid deceaſſed without heires of his bodie lawfullie begotten, that then Robert Steward begotten on Margerie Bruſe his daughter, ſhould ſucceed in poſſeſſion of the crowne. In the meane while, king Edward the third ſent vnto king Robert for peace, but forſomuch as it was perceiued to be but a coloured pretenſe, no concluſion thereof inſued, but preparation made on either part for wars. King Robert ſhortlie after fell ſicke, by reaſon whereof, being not able to ride abroad, nor to trauell himſelfe, he committed the adminiſtration of all things touching the common-wealth, and other the affaires of the realme vnto Thomas Randall, earle of Murrey, and to the lord James Dowglaſſe, two capteins, for their high prowelle and noble valiancie in thoſe daies greatlie renowned. Theſe two hardie chieftains aſſembling an armie of twentie thouſand men, or (as ſome writers haue) 25 thouſand, entered with the ſame into Northumberland, waſting & ſpoiling the countrie on ech ſide. [And incountring with an aſſemblie of the Engliſh at Darlington, there ſlue manie of them, and put the reſt to flight.] Againſt whome came king Edward with an armie of an hundred thouſand men: of the which number there were (as Froiſſard ſaith) eight thouſand horſſemen, and 24 thouſand archers. At their comming into Northumberland, they might well perceiue by the ſmoke of the fiers, which the Scots made in burning of villages, houſes, and townes, where the enimies were: but yet becauſe they taried not long in a place, but paſſed on without ſoiorning here or there, the Engliſhmen might not come néere to fight with them.

King Edward the third commeth with an armie againſt them.

King Edward therefore was counſelled to draw towards Scotland, that lieng betwixt them and home, he might haue them at ſome aduantage as they ſhould returne, which was thought ſhould be ſhortlie, as well for lacke of vittels, as alſo to defend their owne borders, when they heard once that the Engliſh armie drew that waies forth. But comming to the riuer of Tine, through abundance of raine (latelie fallen) the ſtreame was ſo riſen, that neither horſſe nor man might paſſe, ſo that the armie was conſtreined to incampe there for the ſpace of three daies, in great ſcarſitie of vittels, till they were faine to ſend vnto Newcaſtell (which was diſtant from thence 26 miles) and to Carleill (which was about 22. miles thence) for prouiſion, which was ſent them from thoſe places in great plentie. In the meane time were thus certeine light horſſemen ſent abroad into the countrie, to vnderſtand where the Scots were, and to view their doings. [Upon proclamation before made by the king (that who ſo could bring him word where the Scots were harbored, ſhould haue a hundred pounds of yéerelie reuenues in recompenſe for the ſame; Thomas Rokeſbeie after diligent ſearch, brought word to the king thereof:] for thoſe which were ſent, finding where the Scots were incamped, vpon the top of a mounteine, not paſt fiue miles from the Engliſh campe, returned backe to king Edward, and declared what they had ſéene and learned of the enimies doings.

Fr. Thin.

The Scots are incamped on a hill.

King Edward right ioifull of the news, cauſeth his armie to be diuided into three battels, and forthwith marcheth on towards the place where his enimies laie. And comming about none daies within ſight of the Scots, he perceiued at length that the place which they kept was ſo ſtrong, what with the heigth of the ground, & thereto defended on the one ſide with the courſe of a riuer, that by no means they might be aſſailed without great and manifeſt danger. The Engliſhmen in the end thought it beſt to chooſe forth a place to incampe in for that night, and ſo doing, ſent an herald at armes vnto the Scots, requiring them to come downe vnto ſome euen ground where battell might be giuen; but the Scots refuſed ſo to do, alledging that ſith the Engliſhmen were three to one in number, it was no reaſon to will them to forſake their ground of aduantage which they had taken and choſen forth for their owne defenſe.

Thus were they incamped néere togither either in ſight of other for the ſpace of three nights, euerie day ſhewing themſelues in order of battell, without breaking their arraie, except certeine of the horſſemen, which on either part now and then came forth and fell in skirmish, so that sometimes a man might haue seene good emptieng of saddles betwixt them. On the fourth day in the morning, when the Englishmen beheld the hill where the Scots had lien the night before, they perceiued how they were gone, and thereupon sending forth light horsemen to trie out which way they had taken, word was brought how they were but remoued to an other hill a little off, lieng fast by the same riuer, and there lay incamped more stronglie than before. Incontinentlie herevpon, king Edward raiseth his campe, and remoueth to an other hill lieng ouer against that hill where the Scots with their power were now lodged. At length, after that both the armies had lien thus a good space the one ouer against the other, James Dowglasse tooke aduise with himselfe to exploit a right hardie enterprise.

The Scots dislodge.

The English armie raised.

He chose forth two hundred of perfect good horsemen, mounted vpon verie swift and readie geldings, with the which in the night season he passed stilie by the English watch, that he was not once descried by anie of them, till he was entered into their campe, where, by the noise of the mouing of the horsse feet, some chanced to awake that lay asleepe. But yet per the alarme were raised to anie purpose, the Scots thus led by Dowglas had persed through, euen vnto the kings tent, and cut two cords of the same in sunder, so that the king was in no small danger to haue beene slaine, had not the Scots withdrawen the sooner for doubt of being inclosed with their enimies as now raised on each side to come to his succors, but Dowglasse yet returned in safetie with his number backe againe to the Scotish campe, hauing slaine (as some books report) three hundred Englishmen at this brunt. The Englishmen warned hereby, tooke better heed after to their watch.

An enterprise exploited by sir James Dowglasse.

These armies lay thus one against an other for the space of eightéene daies, till at length the Scots priuilie in the night conueied themselues away, and returned home in most speedie wise, supposing they had done sufficientlie inough for that time. It chanced that in the euening, before the Scots went thus their waies, there was a Scot taken by the English watch, who being brought before the king, confessed that there was commandement giuen through the Scotish campe, that euerie man should be readie with his armor and weapon to follow the standard of Dowglasse at a certeine houre the same night, but whither they intended to go, it was vnknowne, saue onelie amongest the capteins. Herevpon the English doubting least the Scots minded to giue them a camisado that night, placed themselues in order of battell, and so stood till the next morning readie to haue receiued them, if they had come. The Scots also made great fires within their campe, that they might see about them. In the breake of the day, there were two Scotish trumpeters taken by the English scouts, the which being brought before the king, declared that the Scotish armie was broken vp and returned, and further shewed how they were appointed thus to declare vnto him, hauing suffered themselues to be taken for the same intent. As soone as the Englishmen were aduertised that the Scots were thus departed, they hasted to the place where they had lien incamped, in hope to haue found some riches, which for hast they had left behind them: but at their comming thither, they found nothing, but 20000 paires of hieland shoes, which are made of the greene hides of beasts vntanned. Also they found three hundred hides of sauage beasts set vpon stakes in stead of caldrons, therein to seeth their meat. Moreouer, they had left behind them fiue hundred dead carcasses of beasts & sheepe, which for that they could not driue them away, they killed, to the end the Englishmen should haue no gaine by them. There were likewise found fiue Englishmen with their legs broken, & bound naked vnto trees, which were quicklie losed and committed to the cure of surgians. The enimies being thus departed, king Edward by aduise of his councell brake vp his campe, and returned to London, supposing it but lost labour to trauell his people anie further at that time.

King Edward breaketh vp his campe.

In this yeare died Walter Steward, father to Robert Steward, that was after king of Scotland. And in this yeare following, or rather the same yeare, Q. Elizabeth mother to Dauid Bruse the prince deceassed, and was buried in Dunfirmling in the yeare after the birth of our Sauiour 1328. In the same yeare, king Robert wan the castell of Norham, and shortlie after besieged the castell of Alnwike, where were slaine William de Mountalte knight, John Clapanen, and Malisius de Dunbar, with diuerse other of the Scotish nobilitie. In the end of the same yeare, there were ambassadors sent from king Edward into Scotland for the conclusion of a peace, which was accorded in this wise: that K. Edward should renounce all his right & claime which he had or might haue to the crowne of Scotland, in declaring it free as it was in time of king Alexander the third, vnder these conditions, that Northumberland should be admitted for the marches of Scotland on the east part, and Cumberland on the west. For the which renuntiation thus to be made, and for the damages done to England by the Scots, it was couenanted that king Robert should pay to king Edward thirtie thousand marks sterling. And for the more suertie and ratification of this finall agréement and peace betwixt the two nations, it was concluded that Jane the sister of king Edward should be coupled in mariage with Dauid Bruse the prince of Scotland.

All which articles were put in writing, wherevnto all the seals of the great lords within both the realms were set in most substantiall wise. The solemnization of the mariage before remembred was kept at Berwike within a while after, on the eighteenth day of Julie, in the presence of a great number of the nobilitie, both of England and Scotland. King Robert liued not past twelue moneths after this mariage, departing out of this life at Cardros the seuenth day of Julie, in the yeare of our Lord 1329. In the latter end of his daies, he was grieuouslie vexed with a leprosie, which thus finallie made an end of him, in the twentie fourth yeare of his reigne, being one of the most valiant princes knowen in anie part of the whole world in those his daies, hauing felt in his time the force of either fortune: for in the beginning of his reigne, such storms of aduersitie surrounded him on each side, that if his constant manhood had not béene the greater, it might haue brought him in despaire of all recouerie: for beside sundrie discomfitures, which he receiued at the hands of the enimies, with losse of all his brethren (his brother Edward onlie excepted) the most part of all the lords of Scotland were against him, and aided his aduersaries to the vttermost of his power: yet he nothing discouraged herewith, ceassed not to imploy all industrious means to deliuer his countrie from the yoke of seruile bondage (which he beléeued would succéed by the gouernment of the English kings) till at length (as it were in despite of all former chances) he attained the effect of his whole indeuors, so much the more to his praise, as he had found the hinderance and difficultie great in bringing the same fullie to passe.

The fame of king Robert.

amongſt his owne people, but alſo amongſt ſtrangers, inſomuch that his due praiſe was not wanting, no not euen amongſt and in the midſt of his verie enimies. For (as it is ſaid) on a time it chanced that king Edward the third, ſitting at a banket amongſt his nobles, fell in talke with them of warlike enterprizes, and of ſuch notable capteins as had excelled in knowledge in that behalfe. At length, after much reaſoning to and fro, he proponed this queſtion to the king of heralds, that as then ſtood by, commanding him to declare which were the three moſt worthie & valiant capteins that he had knowne in all his daies. The herald adviſing with himſelfe of this matter, ſtaied a ſpace, in which meane while all the companie were quiet, longing to heare his anſwere therein, both for that they knew his ſkill was ſuch as was able beſt to giue ſentence in ſuch a matter; and againe, for that manie of them thought hee would haue numbred ſome of thoſe that were there preſent amongſt thoſe three. But the herald did not onelie know all the noble men within the realme of England, but alſo all ſuch ſtrangers as had in anie wiſe excelled in Martiall proweſſe, hauing all their acts and valiant dooings in freſh memorie, and thereupon boldlie vttered his mind as followeth.

His praiſe amongſt the enimies.

A queſtion proponed to an Engliſh herald by king Edward the third.

The heralds anſwer to the queſtion.

"The firſt, moſt worthie and valiant chiefteine (ſaid he) that hath liued in theſe our daies, was Henrie the emperour: for he ſubdued three kings and three realmes, and mainteined his imperiall eſtate and proſperous felicitie to his liues end. The ſecond, was ſir Giles of Argentine, who in three ſundrie battels againſt the Saracens got the victorie, & ſlue two of their principall capteins with his owne hands. The third (if vnder your graces correction I may praiſe the enimie) I muſt iudge to be Robert Bruſe king of Scotland: whom the herald had no ſooner named, but all thoſe that were preſent, with ſcornfull laughter began to ieaſt at the heralds preſumption, for that he durſt ſo malapertlie in the kings preſence honor the enimie with ſo high praiſe. At length, at the heralds requeſt, the king commanded them to be ſtill. The herald then began againe thus: I beſeech your highneſſe (ſaid he) if I haue ought offended, to take my words in good part: for I haue beene euer of this opinion, that the truth ſhould in euerie caſe be vttered, receiued, and allowed in your preſence; namelie, where your highneſſe commandeth anie man to declare the ſame. This one thing therefore I ſhall deſire you to conſider, that if a man muſt needs be vanquiſhed, it is leſſe diſhonor to be vanquiſhed of him that is knowne for a right valiant perſonage, than of him that is but a coward. Moreouer, to ſhew plainelie vnto your grace, how much I eſteeme the valiancie of king Robert (whome I perceiue ſome here may not abide to haue numbred with the two former moſt valiant capteins) if truth might appeare, I durſt be bold to preferre him with good cauſe before them both: for the valiant acts atchiued by Henrie the emperour may be aſcribed rather to the wiſedome of his councellors, than to his owne valiantneſſe and prudence: but contrarilie, king Robert being confined out of his countrie, and deſtitute of friends and all conuenient aid, recouered the realme of Scotland, by his ſingular manhood, out of the hands of your noble father, and eſtabliſhed it with ſuch tranquillitie, that he appeared more terrible to his enimies of England, than euer they had beene afore to his ſubiects of Scotland. ¶ Theſe or the like words vttered by the herald, were well allowed of the king, and ſtopped the mouths of them that toke the matter ſo ſtrangelie at the firſt."

The herald is ſcorned.

The heralds excuſe.

The heralds opinion.

The opinion of the herald concerning king Roberts valiancie.

But now to returne to the purpoſe. King Robert a little before the time of his death, called togither into the chamber where he laie, the chiefeſt peeres of his realme, and there in preſence of them all, committed vnto them the gouernment of his ſonne Dauid, a child as then not paſt ſeuen yeeres of age. He alſo aduiſed them of ſundrie things touching the rule of the realme after his deceaſe, which he perceiued was at hand. And firſt he counſelled them, that in no wiſe they ſhould at anie time make an abſolute lord ouer the Iles, becauſe the people of the ſame are of nature vnſtedfaſt, and ſone ſeduced and brought to moue rebellion againſt the king, into the which being once fallen, they are not eaſilie reduced to their due obedience againe, by reaſon their countries are of ſuch ſtrength, that they cannot be approched but by ſea, as inuironed with the ſame. Secondarilie, he aduiſed them neuer to appoint anie ſet battell with the Engliſhmen, nor to ieopard the realme vpon the chance of one field: but rather to reſiſt and keepe them off from indamaging their countrie, by often ſkirmiſhing, & cutting them off at ſtreicts & places of aduantage, to the intent that if the Scots be diſcomfited, they may haue ſome power yet reſerued to make new reſiſtance. Thirdlie, he forbad them in anie wiſe to make any long peace with England; for naturallie men war dull and ſlouthfull by long reſt and quietnes, ſo that after long peace, through lacke of vſe and exerciſe of armes, men are not able to ſuſteine anie great paines or trauell.

The admiſe giuen by king Robert vnto his nobles before his deceaſſe.

Moreouer, he alledged, how the Engliſhmen would continue in peace no longer than there wanted opportunitie and conuenient occaſion for them to attempt the warres: and therefore he iudged it beſt, that the Scots ſhould neuer conclude anie perpetuall peace with them, nor take anie truce longer than for three or foure yeeres at the moſt. He willed them further, to conſider one thing, that when their appeared leaſt occaſion of warres with England, then they ought to be moſt circumſpect, leaſt peraduenture their enimies ſhould come at vnwares, and find them vnprouided for timelie reſiſtance. Hereunto he deſired them, that after his deceaſſe, they would chooſe ſome one of the moſt worthie capteins within the whole realme, to beare his heart vnto Jeruſalem, and there to ſee it buried within the temple, before the holie ſepulchre of our Lord. For if he had not beene for a long ſpace hindered by vrgent buſineſſe of warres at home, and laſtlie preuented by death, he had vowed to haue paſſed with an armie into the holie land, in defenſe of the chriſtian faith, againſt the Turkes and Saracens.

His deſire to haue his heart borne to the holy ſepulchre.

Hereupon when he was dead, the lords by one aſſent, appointed ſir James Dowglaſſe to take this enterprize in hand, who willinglie obeied their order, as he that had euer during the life of king Robert, ſerued moſt faithfullie the bodie wherein the ſame heart was incloſed, & for this cauſe the Dowglaſſes beare the bloudie heart in their armes. * The commendations of which king Robert, Buchanan ſetteth forth (to comprehend manie things in few words) to be: that he was euerie way a moſt worthie perſon, and that there were few to be found (from the former heroicall daies) equall vnto him in all kinds of vertue. For as he was in battell moſt valiant, ſo was he in peace moſt temperate & iuſt. And though his vndiuided good ſucceſſe and perpetuall courſe of victories (after that fortune was once ſatisfied or rather wearied with his misfortunes) were verie great, yet he ſeemeth to Buchanan to be farre more wonderfull in his aduerſe fortune: whoſe valure of mind was ſuch, that it could not be broken (no not ſo much as weakened) by ſo manie euils as happened vnto him at one time: whoſe ſingular conſtancie appeared by the captiuitie of his wife, and the death of his valiant brethren. And beſides that, his friends were at one time vered with all kind of calamities, and they which escaped death, were banished with the losse of their substance: he himselfe was not onelie spoiled of all his patrimonie, but of the kingdome also, by the mightiest king of that age Edward the first, king of England, a man most readie in counsell, and of dispatch of his affaires as well in warre as peace. Yea, so farre was this Bruse oppressed at one time with all these kinds of euils, that he was driuen into extreame pouertie. In all which misfortunes he neuer doubted of the recouerie of the kingdome, neither did or said anie thing vnbeseeming the noble mind of a king, for he offered no violent hands to himselfe, as did the late Cato and Marcus Brutus, neither with Marius did he pursue his enimies with continuall hatred. For when he had recouered his former estate, he so liued with them that most occasioned his labour and trouble, that he rather remembred himselfe to be a king ouer them, and not an enimie vnto them. To conclude, he did not so forsake himselfe towards his end (when a grieuous disease added troubles to age) but that he confirmed and established the present estate of the kingdome, and prouided for the quiet of posteritie, whereby his subiects did not so much lament his death, as that they were depriued of so iust a king and godlie father.)

Hyperbolicall commendations.

Sir James Dowglasse then chosen as most worthie to passe with king Roberts heart vnto the holie land, closed the same in a case of gold, imbalmed with sweet spices, & right pretious ointments. And herewith hauing in his companie a number of nobles, and gentlemen, amongst whom sir William Sinclare and sir Robert Logan were chiefe, he passed forth till he came to the citie of Jerusalem, where he buried the heart aforesaid, with all reuerence and solemnitie that he might deuise. This done, he resorted with such number as he had brought thither with him, vnto such other christian princes as at the same time were gathered with great puissance, from sundrie parts of christendome to war with the Turks, and there in companie with them, he did so noble seruice against the common enimies of our religion, that by his often victories he wan great honor to the christian name. At length, hauing accomplished his charge in those parties, with no lesse fame and glorie than princelie magnificence, he tooke the seas to haue returned home into Scotland: but by force of contrarie winds he was driuen on the coast of Spaine, landing there vpon the borders of Granado, where at the same time he found the king of Aragon, readie to make warres against the Saracens that inhabited in those parties.

The Dowglasse, to make his manhood and prowesse the more knowne in all parts where he came, offered the king of Aragon to serue vnder him in those warres against the infidels, and so fought at sundrie times in his support against the enimies, with prosperous successe, till at length hauing too much confidence in fortunes fauour (which hath brought so manie noble men to their deaths) hee waxed negligent, and tooke small regard of dangers that might insue, so that in the end he was inclosed by an ambush laid for him by the enimies, and there slaine amongst them, with all such as he had about him. This was the end of that noble Dowglasse, one of the most valiant knights that liued in his daies. He had gotten the victorie 57 sundrie times in fight against the Englishmen, and 13 times against the Turkes, at it is written at length (saith Bellenden) in Scotichronicon. He might haue beene right necessarie for the defense of Scotland, if his chance had beene to haue returned home in safetie. He ended his life in maner (as is before mentioned) on the 26 day of August, in the yere of Grace 1330.

But now to proceed in order with the historie, yee shall note, that after the decease of king Robert, his sonne Dauid, a child scarse seuen yeeres of age, was proclamed king, and afterwards crowned at Scone, the 23 day of November, in the yeere of our Lord 1331. During the time of his minoritie, earle Thomas Randall was ordeined gouernor of the realme, who for the space of foure yeeres in the latter end of K. Roberts reigne, had the whole administration of things committed to his charge by the same king, for that by reason of sickenesse he was not able to attend the same himselfe. This earle Thomas then being elected gouernor by the generall consent of all the nobles of the realme, considered with himselfe, how necessarie it was for the people to continue in peace, till they had somewhat recouered their hinderance & losses chanced to them by the former wars. He addressed therefore certeine ambassadors immediatlie after the death of king Robert, vnto the king of England, to require a new confirmation of the peace betwixt both the realmes for a season. These ambassadours found the king of England easie inough to be intreated for the grant of their suit, so that a generall truce was taken for the space of three yeeres.

A truce for three yeres.

In that meane time, earle Thomas applied his whole studie for the maintenance of iustice and equitie through the whole realme, not omitting yet to appoint order, that men should be prouided of armor and weapon for defense of the countrie, if necessitie so required. [Wherefore when he was going to Wictone (a towne in Galloway) word was brought to him, that there was a strong assemblie of theeues in that countrie, besetting the high waies, and spoiling the passengers: whervpon sending forth a companie of his followers, he apprehended and hanged them all, not fauouring anie vnder pretext of deuotion or religion. For one of them latelie come from Rome (and safe as he supposed by the charter of the popes pardon) was also apprehended and executed by appointment of this Randall, saieng, that the pardon of the fault belonged to the pope, but the punishment thereof belonged to the king.]

Moreouer, for the better prose of exercising iustice amongst them that coueted to liue by truth, and to haue more readie occasion to punish others that ment the contrarie, he commanded the saddles and bridles, with all other such instruments and stuffe as perteined to husbandrie, should be left abroad both day and night without the doores: and if it chanced that anie of them were stollen or taken awaie, the shiriffe of the shire should either cause the same to be restored againe, or else to paie for it on his owne purse. Finallie, such punishment was exercised against theeues in all places, that both theft and pilfering were quite suppressed, and the realme brought to more tranquillitie than euer it was in anie kings daies before. Manie insolent and misruled persons were tamed by his seuere chastisement and iustice. Also that vertue might bee cherished within the realme, he commanded that no vagabund nor idle person should be receiued into anie towne or place, except they had some craft or science wherewith to get their liuings. By this meanes he purged the realme of Scotland of manie idle & slouthfull roges and vagabunds.

A meane to haue iustice executed.

Punishment of theeues.

A laudable ordinance against vagarant persons.

It is said, that during the time whilest such strict punishment was exercised against offendors, by the ministers of the lawes thereto by him authorised and assigned: it fortuned that a carle of the countrie, because he durst not steale other mens goods, stole his owne plow irons, that he might haue the value of them recompensed to him by the shiriffe: neuertheless, such earnest diligence was vsed in the search and and triall, who had the plow irons, that finallie the truth came to light, whereupon for his craftie falſehood the partie giltie was hanged, as he had well deſerued. The gouernor himſelfe, for that he ſaw how hard it was to reduce them that had beene brought vp in ſlouthfull loitering, vnto honeſt exerciſe, held euer about him a gard of warlike perſons, that hee might the more eaſilie oppreſſe all ſtubborne offendors, which would not ſubmit themſelues to his commandements. Thoſe that appeared before him, vpon ſummons giuen, had fauourable iuſtice, tempered with much mercie miniſtred vnto them.

Iuſtice tempered with mercie.

Others that refuſed to obeie, were purſued with his gard, and hanged euer as they were taken: as it happened on a time at Haddington, where threeſcore euill and naughtie diſpoſed perſons being gathered togither, robbed and ſpoiled the people on each ſide: and for that they regarded not, but rather miſuſed a purſeuant, whom he ſent vnto them, they were all taken incontinentlie by his foreſaid gard, which followed the ſaid purſeuant at the heeles, and without reſpit hanged them vp on gibbets to giue example to others. Thorough ſuch rigorous iuſtice, no rebellion was heard of within the realme of Scotland manie yeres after, ſo that ſuch tranquillitie folowed, that not onelie theeues and loitering lubbers were daunted, but the realme alſo aduanced in wealth and riches, to the great terror of all the foes and enimies thereof. King Edward aduertiſed of this great felicitie chanced to the Scots by this meanes, began to enuie the ſame, and imagined with himſelfe, that if earle Thomas, the author of the ſame felicitie were diſpatched out of the way, it ſhould not onelie impeach the proceeding of ſo great wealth to the Scots, but alſo make for the ſuertie of the realme of England: for the ſingular manhood and high proweſſe of this earle was by him and other his nobles ſore ſuſpected.

Stubborne rebels sharpelie punished.

K. Edward enuieth the felicitie of the Scots.

He thought good therefore to attempt the thing by ſleight, which might not be done by force, that afterwards the realme of Scotland might be the more infeebled, and as it were made open to receiue diſpleaſure at his hands. For king Dauid was yong, and manie of his nobles bare ſmall good will either towards him, or his houſe, for the ſlaughter of their fathers and friends in the blacke parlement. Hereupon he deuiſed, which way he might beſt deſtroie earle Thomas, the onlie confounder of all his imagined hope, as to atchiue anie luckie enterpriſe againſt the Scots. At length he deuiſed to diſpatch him by poiſon: and after he had long debated by whome he might worke that feat: finallie he found none ſo fit for his purpoſe, as a monke of the order and facultie of thoſe, that wandering from place to place, can with diſſembling viſage ſay that thing with mouth, which they neuer thought in heart: for oftentimes men of that order, put no difference betwixt ſhame and honeſtie, cloking their erecrable wickednelle vnder the feined ſhadow of their hypocriticall cowles.

K. Edwards purpoſe to deſtroie earle Thomas (as the Scots do write.) But this is a kind of practiſe amongſt men to forge ſlanderous reports to bring princes in contempt.

This monke, fullie inſtructed in that wherabout he was ſent, came into Scotland, and feining himſelfe to be a phyſician, got credit within a while amongſt the people, to be a man of moſt excellent knowledge, for he had a companion with him, that being made priuie to the matter, ſet forth his cunning and practiſe to the vttermoſt, declaring what notable and moſt deſperat cures he had taken in hand, and made the patients perfectlie whole of the ſame, where all other had quite giuen them ouer: namelie he brated it abroad, that for healing of the ſtone and grauell, his like was not to be found in all chriſtendome, as euidentlie had appeared by cures which he had ſhewed vpon ſundrie noble men, both in England and France. This he ſpake, for that it was knowne, how the lord gouernor was ſore vexed with that diſeaſe, hoping by this meanes to haue him in cure, that he might thereby the more eaſilie worke his diueliſh enterpriſe.

A monke ſent into Scotlād to poiſon the gouernor. The fittеſt inſtrument to bring ſuch a thing to paſſe.

And euen according to his deſire it came to paſſe: for being taken for ſuch a man as he was named to be, he was ſent for to the gouernour, and comming before him, he handeled the matter ſo with words, that the gouernour was contented he ſhould take him in hand, which he did with ſuch wicked intention, that perſuading him to keepe ſuch diet as he preſcribed, and herewith to take ſuch ſirrups & other things as he would giue him, at length he moſt traitorouſlie poiſoned him in deed. The venem was of ſuch mixture, as would not ſlea him out of hand, but by little and little waſte his entrails, that the monke might haue leaſure to eſcape home into England, ere it were perceiued what he had done. He therefore after he had miniſtred his wicked poiſon, found meanes to conueie himſelfe out of the waie, and returned moſt ſpeedilie into England, informing king Edward how he had delt. The gouernor feeling himſelfe tormented dailie worſe and worſe in his ſtomach and wombe, and hearing that the monke was gone, and minded not to returne to him againe, he began to doubt the matter, and ſhortlie after learned by phyſicians that he was poiſoned, and that the venem had taken ſuch hold within his bowels, that it was not poſſible to remoue it.

The gouernor is poiſoned.

The monke fleeth.

In the meane time was king Edward come with an armie to the borders, purpoſing to inuade Scotland, for that he thought how the gouernour was either dead, or at the verie point of death, and therefore he was in hope, that comming in time of the trouble vpon his death into Scotland, he ſhould find occaſion to atchiue ſome enterpriſe, highlie to his aduantage. But the gouernour aduertiſed hereof, raiſed a power, and though he were not able either to ride or go, yet he cauſed himſelfe to be caried forth in an horſelitter. King Edward hearing that the gouernour was comming towards him with an armie, & that himſelfe in perſon quite contrarie to his expectation, he ſent an herald vnto him for meane of communication of ſome peace, as was outwardlie pretended, though nothing elſe was ment but that he ſhould eſpie how all things in the Scotiſh campe ſtood. The gouernour hearing of this heralds comming, arraied himſelfe in his beſt apparell, that it might appeere he was rather recouered of his infirmitie, than otherwiſe weake and feeble thorough his diſeaſe, and then cauſing the herald to be brought before him, where he was ſet in a chaire, to heare what his meſſage was, which conſiſting in certeine demands not greatlie agreeable to reaſon, the gouernour with bold countenance anſwered, that he truſted within ſhort time to make it knowne, what right the Engliſhmen had to moue ſuch vnreaſonable requeſts, and thus diſpatching the herald, he gaue him all ſuch gorgeous and rich apparell as he ware at the ſame time when he thus talked with him.

King Edward at the returne of the herald, not perceiuing otherwiſe by his report, but that the gouernor was in health, he returned immediatlie with his armie into England, and licencing euerie man to depart to his home, laid hands on the monke, and as one that had diſſembled with his prince (for ſo he tooke it) cauſed him to be burnt for his vntruth. Thus was the wretch righteouſlie recompenſed, as he had moſt iuſtlie deſerued. In the meane time, the gouernour returning homewards, through force of the venem ſtill increaſing, deceaſſed at Muſcleburgh, and was buried at Dunfirmling, in the yeere of our redemption 1331. Thomas and John, worthie ſuch a father, they being perſons of great valure, and friends to their natiue countrie.]

Two gouernours choſen to rule Scotland.

After his deceaſſe, by common conſent of the three eſtates of the realme in councell aſſembled, Patrike earle of March, and Dauid earle of Mar were choſen gouernors, the firſt (that is to ſay, the earle of March) had the charge of that part of the realme which lieth on the ſouth ſide of the Forth, and the other (that is to ſay, the earle of Mar) was appointed to gouerne all that on the north ſide. Shortlie after roſe great trouble in Scotland by meanes of Edward Baliol, the ſon of John Baliol before remembred, as thus:

Twinam Lorison.

It chanced there was one Twinam Lorison, a gentleman borne, but ſpotted with vile conditions, as adulterie, and diuerſe other, for the which being put vnder cenſures of the church by the officiall of Glaſcow: he tooke at length the ſame officiall as he was going towards the towne of Aire, and held him in captiuitie, till he had paied two hundred pounds for his deliuerance. But this iniurie remained not long vnpuniſhed: for ſir James Dowglaſſe, before his paſſage to the holie land, would not ſuffer him to reſt, till he had conſtreined him to flee into England for his more ſafegard.

Scotiſh lords baniſhed into England.

At his comming into England, he met with Dauid Cumin earle of Atholl, and manie other Scotiſhmen, which were baniſhed in times paſt by king Robert, for that they aſſiſted the king of England againſt him. Theſe perſons being driuen out of the realme, and confederat altogither in one band, remained in England long time after, euer truſting to ſee ſome occaſion offered, whereby they might one day returne againe into their owne natiue countrie. And now, hearing that earle Thomas Randall the gouernour was deceaſſed, this Twinam Lorison in name of them all was ſent ouer into France to perſuade Edward Baliol to attempt the recouerie of the crowne and realme of Scotland, as the rightfull heritage of his father, and deſcended vnto him as lawfull and rightfull heire. Though the Baliol had no regard to make anie claime at all to the crowne of Scotland before this time, yet through the pithie perſuaſions of the earneſt meſſenger, declaring how eaſie a matter it were for him to atchiue, conſidering the aid which he ſhould haue in England, both at the kings hands, and alſo by the Scotiſhmen which remained there in exile, by whoſe meanes he might aſſure himſelfe of ſupport inough within Scotland it ſelfe, after he was once entered: finallie he concluded to paſſe ouer into England, to proue what purchaſe he might make there.

Twinam Lorison ſent vnto Edward Baliol.

Edward Baliol commeth into England

At his comming thither, he made ſute to the king, to aid him in his righteous quarell towards the atteining of the crowne of Scotland, which if he might bring to paſſe with proſperous ſucceſſe, he promiſed to hold the ſame of him and his ſucceſſors as ſuperior lords thereof. King Edward gladlie vpon that condition, condeſcended to his requeſt, notwithſtanding the aliance contracted with king Dauid, by the mariage of him with his ſiſter. Herewith he appointed forth ſir thouſand men well apparelled and araied for the warre, to paſſe by ſea with the Baliol, and other the confederats into Scotland, truſting that vpon their arriuall there, they ſhould find no ſmall number of friends to aſſiſt them. For beſide the Baliol, there was the lord Henrie Beaumount a Frenchman, who had maried the earle of Buchquhanes daughter and heire: alſo the earles of Atholl & Angus [the lords Perſie and Wake, Richard Talbot, Henrie Ferres, John Mowbrate] & other Scotiſh lords ſuch as were baniſhed Scotland, when K. Robert le Bruſe recouered it out of the Engliſhmens hands. Theſe were appointed to go with the Baliol to aſſiſt him in that enterprize: and likewiſe the lord Stafford, and diuerſe other Engliſh capteins, wherevpon when all their prouiſion was once readie, with the number appointed them by king Edward, and a few others, they got them a ſhipbord, and ſailing forth by the coaſt till they entered into the Forth, at length they came on land neere the towne of Kingorne, and ſhortlie after, incountring with Alexander Seiton, they ſlue him, and put his ſolkes to flight.

Edward Baliol landeth in Scotland.

Alexander Seiton is ſlaine.

Baliol verie ioifull of this happie ſucceſſe, came with his people to Perth, otherwiſe called S. Johns towne, whereof the earles of Mar and March being aduertiſed, they raiſed two mightie armies, and haſted toward the enimies, not as though they ſhould haue to doo with men of warre, but to chaſtiſe a number of theeues and robbers that were come out of England. Yet at length they concluded to ioine both togither in Stratherne, that they might iointlie ſet vpon their enimies both at once. The Baliol ſeeing the matter brought ſo farforth, that no feare of death nor ſtarting-hole by flight might auaile him, boldlie came forward, and pitched downe his tents at Duplin neere to the water of Erne, truſting that if his armie would ſtand to it, and fight with manlike conſtancie, he ſhould weild his enimies well inough, notwithſtanding their huge number. The ſame night came the earle of Mar with his power, and incamped with the ſame within ſight of the Engliſh armie, but the earle of March lodged about fiue miles from thence, at Dthirardour.

Edward Baliol at Duplin.

The earles of Mar and March gather their people.

The Scots that were with the earle of Mar, hauing knowledge of the ſmall number of their enimies, made no accounts of them, ſo that they neither tooke heed to their watch, nor to anie other order for defenſe of themſelues, but fell to ſinging, danſing, reuelling, and drinking, in moſt diſſolute manner. The Baliol taking occaſion hereof, determined to aſſaile them the ſame night in their campe; and thereupon cauſing his people to make them readie to accompliſh that enterprize, in the dead of the night he iſſued forth of his campe, and comming vnto the water of Erne, paſſeth the ſame by the ford, where one Andrew Murrey of Tullibard had pight a ſtake of ſet purpoſe, in midſt of the ſtreame, to ſhew them the waie. Thus hauing got all his armie ouer the water, without anie noiſe or din, ſo ſecretlie as might be deuiſed, he entered the campe of his enimies, and brake through till he came to the tent of the earle of Mar, the Scots generall, before he was once deſcried. Heere at the firſt was the earle himſelfe ſlaine, lieng faſt aſleepe in his bed, after with huge noiſe they ſet vpon the whole campe, murdering the Scots as then buried in ſleepe without all defenſe. And thereupon followed ſo cruell ſlaughter, that nothing was heard but grunting and groning of people, as they lay on heapes readie to die, welteriug togither in their owne bloud. And if it had not beene that Edward Baliol had cauſed ech of his men to wrap a white cloth about his arme, no man might haue knowne (by reaſon of the darkneſſe of the night) his friend from his foe.

The Engliſhmen were ſo earneſtlie bent to the ſlaughter of Scots, that they might not be filled with the bloud and murder of them, ſo that they ſaued none whome they might ouertake. There were ſlaine of nobles and gentlemen, to the number of three thouſand, beſide innumerable of the commons. A certeine number of the Scots that eſcaped out of the place, cloſed themſelues togither, and in purpoſe to be reuenged on the Engliſhmen for the death of their fellowes, returned vpon them againe, and were ſlaine themſelues euerie mothers ſonne. The chiefeſt nobles that were ſlaine at this battell, were theſe,

This battell was fought on the thirteenth day of Auguſt, in the yeare 1332. After that Edward Balioll had atchiued this victorie thus at Duplin, he went ſtraightwaies vnto Perth (otherwiſe called ſaint Johns towne) and giuing aſſalt thereto, quickelie entered it by force, without anie great reſiſtance. The earle of March that lodged (as is ſaid) the ſame night that the battell was fought, not paſt fiue miles off, hearing what had chanced both in the battell and towne, came with his people arraied in good and perfect order vnto Perth aforeſaid, to beſiege the Engliſhmen with Edward Balioll and other as then within it. But hauing lien there a certeine ſpace, and filled the ditches in the meane time to ſuch aduantage, that it was thought if he had giuen the aſſalt, he muſt néeds haue entered, he ſuddenlie raiſed from thence, and departed, to the vnſpeakeable damage (as was thought) of the whole Scotiſh nation. The ſiege being thus raiſed, there came dailie great numbers of nobles and commons to the Balioll, offering him their aid and ſeruice as his loiall ſubiects, towards the atteining of his right to the crowne.

He raiſeth his ſiege.

HEreupon, perceiuing his power ſufficientlie increaſed, and receiuing the othes of the earle of Fife, and William de Seintclere biſhop of Dunkeld, he went accompanied with them and a great number of other, vnto Scone, where he was crowned the 24 day of September, in the yeare laſt before remembred, and receiued there the ſame time the homages and fealties of a great companie of nobles & gentlemen, at that ſolemne feaſt there aſſembled. King Dauid being not paſt nine yeares of age, to auoid all dangers in that troubleſome time, as deſtitute of ſuccors, by aduiſe of his councell, was conueied ouer into France with quéene Jane his wife, ſiſter to Edward king of England, and was moſt friendlie receiued by Philip king of France the ſirt of that name, ſo that they remained there with him for the ſpace of nine yeares. And in the meane time diuers noble men that yet remained at the deuotion of king Dauid, vnderſtanding that K. Edward le Balioll ſoiourned within the towne of Perth, otherwiſe called ſaint Johns towne, which ſtandeth almoſt in the middle part of the realme, and was at that preſent not cloſed with anie wall, or rampire, they raiſed their powers, and beſieged him within the ſame towne, he hauing as then no great companie about him.

Edward Balioll crowned king of Scotland, not the 24 of September, but the fourth of October, as Ri. Southwell ſaith.

Saint Johns towne beſieged.

Whereof when they of Galloway had aduertiſement, becauſe the king was their ſpeciall lord and chiefe gouernor, they aſſembled togither vnder the conduct of the lord Euſtace de Pakeſwell, and inuaded the lands of thoſe Scotiſhmen that had thus beſieged their lord king Edward Balioll, and by that means conſtreined the aduerſaries to leuie their ſiege. Whereupon earle Patrike and the new earle of Murrey, with the lord Andrew de Murrey, and the lord Archembald Dowglaſſe, with an armie aſſembled in all ſpéd, entered into Galloway, doing all the miſchiefe they could deuiſe, with fire & ſword, taking & bringing away from thence a great number of cattell and other goods; but they ſlue no great number of people, for they found them not at home, being withdrawen out of the way for feare of this terrible inuaſion. Thus did the Scots in that part of the realme ſpoile & harrie each others countries.

Galloway inuaded.

In the meane time, king Edward le Balioll fortified the towne of Perth, appointing the earle of Fife to the kéeping thereof, whileſt he with an armie paſſed into the countrie; but before he returned, his aduerſaries (that is to ſay) the ſonnes of them that had béene ſlaine at the battell of Duplin, Robert Keith, Alexander Lindſeie, James and Simon Fraſeir wan S. Johns towne in the third moneth, after they had laid ſiege thereto, as Hector Boetius ſaith. But whither that is to be intended after the firſt beſieging thereof, or now after their laſt comming thither, I can not affirme; but as the ſame Boetius writeth, now when the towne was woone, the earle of Fife, and Andrew Murrey of Tullibard, were taken, with other of their complices. The earle with his wife and children were ſent to the caſtell of Kildrummie, there to remaine vnder ſafe kéeping; but Andrew Murrey for his treaſon afore committed, was beheadded. The towne being thus woone, was deliuered to the kéeping of John Lindſeie. But Buchan. out of an other author ſuppoſeth that it was not committed to the cuſtodie of anie; but that the walls were pulled downe to the ground. The gaining of this towne put the Scots in hope of more proſperitie to ſuccéed.

And thereupon John Randoll the earle of Murrey, ſonne to earle Thomas late of famous memorie, and Archembald Dowglaſſe lord of Galloway, the brother of James Dowglaſſe latelie ſlaine (as before is mentioned) in Spaine with Simon Fraſeir and others, gathered a great armie, and came with the ſame [and William Dowglaſſe lord of Liddeſdale to Mauket] againſt the Balioll, who being aduertiſed thereof, met them in Annandale, where incountring togither, after cruell fight & great ſlaughter on both parts, at length Baliols part was put to the worſt, ſo that he himſelfe was glad to flée, hauing got an horſſe without a bridle, and reſted not till he came to Roxburgh, or rather to Carleill, as Richard Southwell ſaith. In this battell were ſlaine ſir Henrie Balioll, a man of great valiancie, ſir John Mowbraie, Walter Cumin, and Richard Kirkbie; but Alexander Bruſe earle of Carrike, and the lord of Galloway were taken priſoners, and ſaued by the helpe of the earle of Murrey, for that they had ſubmitted themſelues to the Balioll but latelie before. Shortlie after the atchiuing of this victorie, Andrew Murrey a man of great puiſſance and poſſeſſions was choſen to be gouernor, as colleage and aſſociat with the earle of March. Theſe two gouernors, hearing that the king of England was minded to inuade Scotland with a maine armie, ſent ſir Alexander Seiton with manie other gentlemen vnto Berwike for defenſe of that towne and caſtell; [Alexander (as ſaith Buchan.) being capteine of the towne, and Patrike Dunbar capteine of the caſtle and borders aioining.] Shortlie after, the new gouernor Andrew Murrey was taken priſoner at Roxburgh, by reaſon that hauing put his enimies to flight in a ſkirmiſh which he made with them at the bridge without the caſtell, he purſued ouer raſhlie in the chaſe, and was incloſed amongſt them, and ſo taken yet he might be reſcued. [At which time alſo William Dowglaſſe lord of Liddeſdale was ſent to Annandale, to defend the weſt marches.] There was also taken beside the gouernor, a notable pirat named Crab, who before that time had done manie displeasures to the Englishmen both by sea and land: and now because his countriemen would not ransome him, but to his further griefe had slaine his sonne within Berwike, he became the king of Englands man, and did the Scots more damage afterwards, than euer he had done to the Englishmen before. The gouernor at length was ransomed for a great summe of gold.

About the same time William Dowglasse of Liddesdale named for his singular manhood, The flower of chiualrie, fought with the Englishmen in Annandale, where himselfe was taken, and his people discomfited. Both these noble men thus taken prisoners, were deteined in captiuitie more than a twelue moneths space, & then ransomed for a great summe of gold. This William Dowglasse was sonne to sir James Dowglasse, of whom so often mention is made heretofore. The realme of Scotland being thus diuided in two parts, the one assisting the Balioll, and the other continuing in their allegiance sworne and promised to king Dauid:

Edward king of England purposeth to subdue the Scots.

Edward king of England iudged the time to serue well for his purpose to make conquest on the Scots, and herevpon gathering a mightie armie both of Englishmen and strangers, as well such as were subiects to him as other, whome he reteined out of Normandie, Aniou, and Flanders, he came with the same to subdue (as he outwardlie pretended) onelie such Scots as would not yéeld themselues to the Balioll. The Scots perceiuing themselues thus ouerset with enimies on each side, sent John Randoll earle of Murrey into France vnto king Dauid, that by his means they might purchase some aid of the French king to defend the realme from the force of the enimies. In the meane time the king of England besieged Berwike both by sea and land, notwithstanding such as were within it defended the towne so manfullie that he got but small gaines by assaults; by reason whereof the siege continued for the space of foure moneths: during which time manie issues and skirmishes were made betwixt the Scots and Englishmen, whereat manie proper feats of armes were atchiued with variable fortune.

William Seiton bastard sonne to the capteine of the towne was taken prisoner, and his bastard brother, as he assailed the English ships one night ouerfiercelie, was drowned by mischance in the sea. At length, when they within the towne began to want vittels, the capteine sir Alexander Seiton sent vnto king Edward, promising that if he would grant a truce for the space of 6 daies, if no succour came in the meane time to resist his siege, the towne should be deliuered into his hands at the end of that terme; and for the assurance thereof, he was contented that his eldest sonne and heire Thomas Seiton should remaine with the said king in hostage. Whilest things passed thus at Berwike, the nobles of Scotland by common consent chose Archembald Dowglasse to be gouernor in place of Andrew Murrey. This Archembald Dowglasse raising a mightie armie of Scotishmen entered with the same into the borders of England, so to withdraw king Edward from the siege of Berwike to defend his owne lands from burning and spoiling. But king Edward aduertised hereof, deuised an other shift; for immediatlie sending a messenger to sir Alexander Seiton capteine of the towne, he certified him plainelie, that vnlesse he rendered the towne forthwith into his hands, both his sonnes which he had with him, the one as hostage, and the other as prisoner, should be without further delay hanged on a gibbet there in sight afore his owne face.

Sir Alexander Seiton capteine of Berwike.

Archembald Dowglasse chosen gouernor in place of Andrew Murrey.

Sir Alexander Seiton hereto answered, that as yet the terme of the truce was not expired, & therefore desired the king either to obserue the couenants, or else to deliuer the pledges, that he might be at his aduantage: but king Edward (as saith the Scotish chronicle) immediatlie caused a paire of gallows to be raised before the towne, and both the sonnes of sir Alexander to be led thither, to suffer on the same without further respit. Sir Alexander Seiton beholding that pitifull sight, and weieng with himselfe, that he might saue the liues of those innocent creatures, if he would, was brought into great perplexitie of mind: the naturall affection and compassion which he bare towards his sonnes moued him to haue rendered the towne on the one side, and the dutie with faith promised to his king and countrie restraining him from all such resolution on the other. But in the end, the tender regard he had to saue the liues of his sonnes, had ouercome him, and caused him to haue rendered the towne into his enimies hand, had not his wife and mother to his said sonnes, exhorted him most earnestlie to the contrarie, alleging that such reproch and dishonor should redound vnto them, and their posteritie, if through their fault the towne were traitorouslie deliuered into the enimies hand, that from thenceforth they should be infamed for euer: and as for the death of their sonnes, it was not to be counted a losse, for by this kind of death, they should win immortall name, & leaue to their parents the high honor and renowme of faithfull & lotall subiects. Againe they were yong inough to beget and bring forth new children, where they should be neuer able to recouer honor once lost; if by deliuering the towne into the enimies hands, they should séeme to betraie their countrie, & falsifie their faith to their naturall prince and souereigne.

Sir Alexan. Seiton in doubt what to do.

The manlie stomach of Alexander Seitons wife.

With such & manie other the like words, this noble & worthie ladie persuaded hir husband to refraine his inward griefe, and brought him with right sorrowfull and heauie chéere vnto his chamber, that through commiseration had of his sonnes, he should commit nothing either against his honor or weale of the towne. In the meane time, his two sonnes were put to death, ending their liues (saith Hector Boetius) with most honor, for the righteous quarell of their countrie: [at what time K. Edward remoued his campe to Halidon hill.] Archembald Dowglasse the gouernor, being at that present entered into Northumberland with his armie, hearing that king Edward had thus cruellie put to death those two yong gentlemen, came the third day after with all his power, and pitched downe his tents not far from K. Edwards armie, fullie resolued to giue him battell, as well to reuenge the displeasure for the death of the said gentlemen, as to deliuer the towne of Berwike from further danger of the enimies force.

Archembald Dowglas purposeth to giue battell.

Yet were there sundrie prudent councellors in the Scotish armie, that for diuers respects aduised him in no wise to fight with the enimies at that present, considering the huge number of practised souldiers which they had amongest them, and the want of skilfull warriours on his side, hauing few with him saue yongmen, and such as lacked experience in the wars, for that they had beene but little trained therein. Notwithstanding, he himselfe was of contrarie opinion, iudging that the good willes and desire which his people had to fight with the Englishmen, should supplie their lacke of skill: and thereupon determining to trie the chance of battell with them, commanded his armie to refresh themselues with meat, drinke, and sléepe for that night, and to prouide themselues readie for battell on the next morning. In the breake of the day he arraied his people in order of battell. The vauntgard was gi-

On the other part, the Engliſhmen were nothing ſlow to come forward to incounter the Scots, but at the firſt to take the vantage of the ground, they gaue ſomewhat backe, withdrawing to the ſide of an hill, which they hauing once got, boldlie turned themſelues to the Scots that purſued them ouer raſhlie, in hope that the victorie had béene alreadie theirs: but being here fiercelie receiued by the Engliſhmen, and beaten downe in heaps on each ſide, though they inforced themſelues with all their might to be reuenged both for old and new iniuries which they had receiued, and ſo ſlue no ſmall number of the enimies; yet in the end was the Scotiſh armie put to flight, and more ſlaughter made in the chaſe, than was afore in the battell: for one wing of the Engliſhmen making forwards to get before the Scots, ſo ſtopped their paſſage, that they were ſlaine miſerablie on each ſide, as they had bene incloſed within a toile or deere-ſtall. There were but few in number that were taken priſoners, thoſe on the next day were beheaded by commandement of king Edward, except a ſmall number which were kept ſecret by ſome of the Engliſhmen for profit of their ranſome. There were ſlaine on that day of the battell, to the number of fourtéene thouſand men, amongeſt whome were theſe as principall: Archembald Dowglas the gouernour, John Steward, James Steward, and Alane Steward, the ſonnes of Walter Steward; the earle of Roſſe, the earle of Southerland, Alexander Bruſe earle of Carrike, Andrew, James, and Simon Fraſeir. ¶ That this number and therewith manie mo do abound by one yeare, Wil. Hariſon doth gather togither by the *feries, becauſe Adam Meremouth ſaith, that Magdalen day fell on the monday this yeare, and that the morrow after being tueſday, Berwike was ſurrendered. But for ſo much as the ſame Meremouth maie be perhaps deceiued, or miſtaken herein: I haue here thought good (as in other places) to note in the margent the yeare, according to the account of Hector Boetius, ſpeciallie in this place, the rather becauſe he agréeth with Richard Southwell, Robert Auesburie, and other of our Engliſh writers, concerning this yeare in which this battell was fought: but where the ſame Boetius ſaith, that it was fought on Magdalen day, R. Southwell, Robert Auesburie, Thomas Walſ. and diuers other affirme, that it was fought the nintéenth of Julie being ſaint Margarets euen. But now to proceed. The place where this battell was ſtriken, is called Hallidon hill.

Immediatlie vpon this ouerthrow of the Scotiſh power, Alexander Seiton and Patrike Dunbar capteins of Berwike, deſpairing of all ſupport, yéelded the towne to king Edward, with condition to haue their liues and goods ſaued, and to become ſubiects to king Edward. Herevpon, when they had receiued their oths, Patrike Dunbar was commanded by king Edward, to build vp againe the caſtell of Dunbar vpon his owne coſts and charges, for that he had throwen it downe, when he ſaw he was not able to defend it againſt the Engliſh power comming toward him. K. Edward accompliſhing his deſire, returned backe into England, leauing behind him with the Balioll, manie great lords of England (amongſt whome for chiefe was Richard Talbot) that vſing the aduiſe and counſell of them he might rule the realme of Scotland as ſhould be thought expedient. Edward Balioll herevpon went thorough all the bounds of Scotland, placing garriſons of Engliſhmen in moſt part of all the ſtrengths and caſtels of the realme, for he had them all at his commandement, fiue of them onelie excepted, which were kept by ſuch Scotiſhmen, as would not renounce their allegiance promiſed to king Dauid. For Dunbreton was kept by Malcolme Fleming of Cumirnald, Lochleuin by Alane of Lepont, the caſtell of Kildrummie by Chriſtine Bruſe, and Urquhart by Robert Lauder, the pile of Loudopin, a ſtrong thing of ſo ſmall a compaſſe, was in the keeping of one John Thomſon [who were ſupported with monie by Philip the French king] Theſe capteins would by no means neither yéeld themſelues nor their fortreſſes to Edward Balioll, but defend them to the vttermoſt for the behoſe of their ſouereigne lord and maiſter king Dauid.

In the meane time, Philip king of France laboured to the pope, that he might by his authoritie cauſe the Engliſhmen to ſurceaſſe from further vexing the Scots, by their cruell inuaſions made into their countrie: but when the popes ambaſſadors came about this matter into England, they were ſo little regarded, that they could not get licence to declare that meſſage, and ſo were they glad to returne without doing anie thing in the matter whereabout they were ſent. Shortlie after was a parlement called at Perth, where Edward Balioll was confirmed king of Scotland, a great number of the nobles promiſing there by ſolemne oths, neuer to remoue anie rebellion againſt him in times to come. In the meane time roſe great altercation betwixt Henrie Beaumont, and Alexander Mowbray for certeine lands in Buchquhane [which Edward the firſt had giuen John Mowbray, brother of this Alexander.] Henrie Beaumont claimed thoſe lands by the right of his wife, that was daughter to the ſaid Alexander, but the Mowbray claimed them as heire to his brother.

Strife betwixt Mowbray & Beaumont. Fr. Thin.

After long contention, Mowbray had the lands adiudged to him by ſentence of the Balioll, by reaſon whereof, Dauid Cumin earle of Atholl, and Richard Talbot, fauouring the cauſe of Henrie Beaumont, began to practiſe ſuch conſpiracies againſt the Balioll, that to auoid further danger, he was glad to repeale the former ſentence by him giuen on the behalfe of Alexander Mowbray, and by new ſentence adiudged the lands vnto Henrie Beaumont, for that (as was alledged) he had maried the inheritor thereof, which ſentence he was conſtreined to change (ſaith Buchanan) by this means. *Balioll (fauouring Alexander) and hauing adiudged the matter on his ſide, ſo offended the minds of the aduerſaries, that they feared not openlie to complaine of the iniurie. But when they perceiued that they nothing profited therein by their ſpeeches, they all departed from the court to their owne poſſeſſions, of which faction Talbot, whileſt he goeth into England, was taken and carried to Dunbreton: Beaumont doth ſtrengthen Dungard a ſtrong caſtell of Buchquhan, and not onelie maketh the land whereof the contention was, but alſo the whole countrie adioining, to be ſubiect to his gouernement. Cumin (returning to the part of Dauid Bruſe) goeth into Atholl (whereof he was earle) and fenſing the places of ſtrength thereabouts, armeth himſelfe to withſtand all force, ſtrante be prepared againſt him. Balioll fearing the conſpiracie of theſe great men, changeth his iudgement, and awardeth the lands (wherof the contention grew) to Beaumont, and reconciled Cumin vnto him, by the gift of many rich poſſeſſions, that then belonged to Robert Steward, which ſhortlie after was king of Scotland.

Thus through puiſſance of the parties, the truth in deciding the controuerſie, might not onlie not haue place, but Balioll was alſo driuen to that extremitie, that he muſt haue one of them (with his faction) to be his enimies. For now Alexander, ſtroken with this iniurie (to haue the iudgement giuen before for him thus to be reuoked) forſaking the Balioll, ioined him ſelfe with Andrew Murrey gouernor of Scotland (for Dauid Bruſe) hauing a little before ranſomed himſelfe, with a great maſſe of monie out of the Engliſhmens hands. Theſe things (although done at ſeuerall times) we haue ioined togither, leaſt by often repeating of them in other places, the courſe of the hiſtorie might be broken: for (vpon this) Andrew Murrey beſieged Beaumont in the caſtell of Dongard, the inheritance of his wife, where he ſurrendered the ſame, vpon condition that he might freelie repaire into England: at what time alſo Richard Talbot (being beyond the mounteins, in the inheritance of his wife the daughter of Iohn Cumin of Scotland (for now manie Engliſh nobles poſſeſſed great reuenues in Scotland by mariages) hearing of theſe newes, that Balioll was forſaken by the earle of Atholl and Beaumont, would haue gone into England, but was taken in Lownes.

Not long after this, Edward Balioll came to Rainfrew, and there receiuing the people into his obeiſance, had the keies of the caſtell of Rothſaie and Dunnone, brought vnto him by ſir Alane Lile ſhiriffe of Bute [at what time the king gaue to him the keeping of the caſtell of Rothſaie, hauing before made him ſhiriffe.] Thus did the Balioll increaſe in puiſſance, by ſuch confluence of people as dailie ſubmitted themſelues vnto him, & he inriched them liberallie with lands and goods ſtill as they came to him, thereby to win there good wils. He ſought by all meanes poſſible to haue gotten Robert Steward into his hands, as the perſon whome he knew to haue moſt right, next vnto king Dauid to the crowne of Scotland: but through the diligent foreſight of his friends, this Robert Steward being about the age of fifteene yeeres, was conueied [with bote and horſſe, by the helpe of William Hariot and Iohn Gilbert] to the caſtell of Dunbreton, where he was ioifullie receiued by Malcolme Fleming the capteine.

The Balioll being ſore offended, that ſuch caſtels as were kept by his enimies, were ſo great an impediment to his interprizes, by ſuccouring and relieuing his aduerſaries to make warres againſt him, he got togither an armie, and the next yeere laid ſiege to the caſtell of Lochleuin: but perceiuing that this caſtell might not be woone without long ſiege, he appointed ſir Iohn Striueling to continue the ſiege with a great power of men, vntill the caſtell were yeelded. There were left alſo with him, Michaell Hariot, Dauid Wemis, and Richard Paleuill, with diuerſe other. Theſe capteins adviſing the place and ſite of the caſtell, lodged themſelues within the churchyard of ſaint Serfe, beſide Kinroſſe, making baſtiles and other defenſes within the ſame, for their more ſafegard. Within the caſtell were two valiant capteins to defend it, the one named Alane Uepont and Iames Lambie, citizens of ſaint Andrews.

Alane Uepõt and Iames Lambie capteins of Lochleuin.

The enimies aſſaied all the meanes that might be deuiſed to haue woone this caſtell, but all was in vaine. At length, they deuiſed a ſubtill ſleight, whereby to compaſſe their intent, on this wiſe. They went about to dam vp the mouth of the riuer where it iſſueth out of the Loch, with earth, trees, & ſtones, that the water being ſo kept in, might riſe to ſuch an height, that it ſhould ouerflow the caſtell, and ſo drowne all the people within it. And to cauſe the Loch to ſwell more ſpeedilie, they turned the courſe of diuerſe riuers and brookes in the countrie thereabouts, and brought them into the ſame Loch. It chanced at the ſame time, that ſir Iohn Striueling capteine of the ſiege, with a great part of the armie, went vnto Dunfirmling for deuotion ſake, to viſit the ſhrine of ſaint Margaret, ſometime quéene of Scotland. Whereof Alane Uepont then capteine of the caſtell, hauing vnderſtanding, about midnight prepared three botes, and taking certeine ſouldiers with him, rowed forth to the head of the dam or water, and there, with ſuch engins as he had deuiſed for the purpoſe, aſſaied to boare through and make a hole in the banke or rampire that kept vp the water, which when they had brought to paſſe, they returned quickelie againe to the caſtell.

A deuiſe to drowne the caſtell.

The water hauing once gotten an iſſue, within a while ware the hole ſo large, that entering with more violence, it finallie brake downe the banke, and ruſhed forth with ſuch an huge ſtreame, that it bare downe all afore it, drowning vp the baſtils and tents of them that lay at ſiege there, and caried the ſame with men and all downe into the deepe ſea, they were ſo ſuddenlie taken, yer they could make anie ſhift to eſcape. Alane Uepont, when the water was fallen to the old marke, iſſued forth of the caſtell, & ſetting vpon thoſe that had eſcaped the danger of the water, ſlue part of them, and put the remnant to flight. Iohn Striueling hearing the miſchiefe that had happened to his folks, returned to the ſiege, and made a vow neuer to depart from thence, till he had taken the caſtell, and ſlaine all them within it. But yet, after he had laine there a long time, and ſaw it was not poſſible to win that fortreſſe, he was conſtreined to raiſe his ſiege, and to go his waies, after he had loſt thereat no ſmall number of his people. This ſiege of Lochleuin chanced in the Lent ſeaſon, in the yeere 1335.

In the yeere following, king Edward prepared an armie both by ſea and land, to enter into Scotland. He ſent by ſea 70 ſhips well and ſufficientlie decked for the warres, to enter by the Forth: but by a ſore tempeſt manie of thoſe veſſels periſhed betwixt Inchketh and the North land. He himſelfe hauing the Balioll in his companie, with fiftie thouſand men, came by land vnto Glaſcow, and perceiuing there was little for him to do, for that no rebellion greatlie anie where appeared, he returned backe againe into England with the Balioll, and left Dauid Cumin earle of Atholl gouernor in his rome, to ſubdue the reſidue of the rebels, and to win thoſe ſtrengths, which as yet were defended againſt him. Dauid Cumin left thus to be gouernor in Scotland, toke vpon him the rule in name both of the king of England, and alſo of the Balioll, and ſeized into his hands all thoſe lands in Murrey and Buchquhane, which perteined to Robert Steward, confiſcating all the goods of ſuch the inhabitants, as would not be ſworne vnto him. [Who notwithſtanding that hee was of ſuch great authoritie in Scotland, of credit with both kings, Edward of England, & Edward of Scotland, and of exceeding great poſſeſſions of his

At what time none would publikelie profeſſe him a ſubiect to Dauid Bruſe, but botes, who in their plaies & games would alwaies call their king, Dauid Bruſe.]

Incontinentlie heerevpon, Robert Steward aſſembled his friends by the helpe of Dungall Campbell of Lochquhow, and ſuddenlie tooke the caſtell of Dunnone, ſleaing all the Engliſhmen and other, which were found therein. [Which Campbell (as ſaith Iohn Maior) came with 400 men, and by the teſtimonie of Buch. was a man of great power in Argile.] The commons of Bute and Arrane, glad of this proſperous beginning, aſſembled togither to the number of foure hundred perſons, and ſet forward, that they might come to ſupport Robert Steward in ſuch his late begun enterpriſes: and being incountered by the waie by Alane Lile ſhiriffe of Bute, they laid ſo luſtilie about them, that they ſlue the ſhiriffe, [with Iohn Gilbert capteine of the caſtle of Bute] there in the field, & diſcomfited all his people [which they did after this manner. Theſe people of Bute, (called the ſeruants of Bawdanus) ſeeing ſuch ſtirs to be made by Alane Lile, ran to a heape of ſtones not farre from them, and with great force pelting the ſhiriffe, they in the end killed him with ſtones, and put the reſt to flight.] Diuerſe of them taken priſoners, were brought awaie, and preſented vnto Robert Steward, who in recompenſe of this ſeruice, granted ſundrie priuileges vnto the inhabitants of Bute and Arrane: as among other things, to be free from paieng tribute for their corne and graine. Such felicities ſucceeding one another, cauſed manie of the Scots to ſoine themſelues with Robert Steward, in hope to recouer the realme out of the Engliſh mens hands. Amongſt other, Thomas Bruſe earle of Carrike, and William Canther [whome Iohn Maior calleth Carucher, & Buchanan Carruder of Annandale] with a number of the commons came vnto him.

About the ſame time, the earle of Murrey returned forth of France, and landed at Donbriton, where he was moſt ioifullie receiued by the ſaid Robert Steward. Shortlie after the ſaid Steward, and the ſaid earle, hauing with them a great power of their friends and alies [as Godfrie Roſſe, and others] came into Clidesdale, Kanfrew, Kile, Cunningham and Aire, which togither with Ros and Murrey, they reduced to the obeiſance of king Dauid. [At which time (as ſaith Buchanan) did Kanfraie come to his old lords the Stewards.] The earle of Murrey alſo, to reuenge the iniuries done by the earle of Atholl, went vnto Aberden, and there learning where he ſoiorned, made thither with all ſpeed: but the earle of Atholl vnderſtanding how all the countrie tooke part with his aduerſaries, fled into the mounteins, where he ſuſteined his life with hearbs and roots for a time, and durſt not come forth to ſhew his head. At length, when he ſaw no waie to eſcape, he came forth and in moſt humble wiſe ſubmitted himſelfe to the lords that defended the part of king Dauid. They receiuing him vpon his ſubmiſſion, ſware him to be true vnto king Dauid, and exhorting him to be as diligent in reconciling the people vnto king Dauid, as he had beene afore to ſubdue them to the obedience of the Baliol, they ſuffered him to depart.

About the ſame time, ſir William Dowglaſſe of Liddeſdale, and Andrew Murrey, were ranſomed home out of England, for a great ſumme of monie, after they had beene kept there by the ſpace of three yeeres in captiuitie. At their comming to Edenburgh, they found the lords aſſembled in councell, at the which Iohn Randolph earle of Murrey, and Robert Steward, with generall voices were elected gouernours. Manie Scotiſhmen at this time reuolted from the king of England, ſubmitting themſelues to king Dauid, as Alexander Ramſay, a verie ſkilfull warrior, Laurence Preſton, Iohn Herring, and Iohn Haliburton knights, with diuerſe other.

The earle of Murrey and Robert Steward elected gouernours.

* After this, Iohn Randolph, and Robert Steward, were ſent into the north parts with a ſtrong armie, gathered of ſuch as were wearied by the Engliſh gouernement, whereat Dauid Cumin (being feared with the ſudden aſſemblie) fled for his ſafetie, whome they egerlie purſued, and taking him (being then beſet in a narrow ſtreict, and oppreſſed with penurie of all things) they compelled him to yeeld (without anie more circumſtances) to their faction, who then ſwearing fealtie to Dauid Bruſe, was permitted to depart vpon his promiſe: wherevnto they gaue ſuch faith, that they left him deputie for them. At what time he did not faintlie diſſemble the fauouring & defending of the part of Bruſe. In the meane time, Randolph returned into Louthian, and ioined himſelfe with his old friend William Dowglaſſe latelie returned out of England, & now with great ſlaughters of his enimies egerlie reuenged the long lothſomneſſe of his impriſonment: to whome alſo to make their partie the ſtronger, came Andrew Murrey, which was taken at Bokesborowe. Wherefore theſe gouernours ſufficientlie garded with the nobilitie, appointed a parlement at Perth, in the kalends of Aprill. Whither when the nobles came, there could not be anie thing performed, by reaſon of the ſecret hartburning harbored in the boſoms of William Dowglaſſe, and Dauid Cumin earle of Atholl: the cauſe whereof was pretended to be, in that Dowglaſſe did obiect vnto Cumin, that it was by his meanes, that he was no ſooner deliuered out of priſon from the Engliſh: amongſt which nobilitie, Steward fauored Cumin, and almoſt all the other tooke part with Dowglaſſe. Which diſſention amongſt the nobilitie, was occaſioned for ſuſpect which they had of the Cumins comming to that place with ſo great a traine: for he brought thither ſuch number of his friends and followers, that he was a terror to all the reſt of the aſſemblie, to the increaſe of which ſuſpicion, they further ioined a conceit they had of Cumins great and changeable wit, his aſpiring mind, and certeine rumors ſpred abroad of the comming of the Engliſh, with whome no man did doubt, but that the earle of Atholl would ioine for his defenſe.)

Edward king of England vnderſtanding the rebellion of the Scots, determined to aſſaile them both by ſea and land: and ſo prouiding a nauie of an hundred and foure ſcore ſhips, ſent the ſame well vittelled and manned to ſaile into the Forth, the which being there arriued, burnt and ſpoiled the townes on both ſides that riuer, but returning backe into England, they loſt manie of their veſſels by a tempeſt. King Edward himſelfe, togither with Edward the Baliol entered by land, with an armie of fiftie thouſand men, leading the ſame to the towne of Perth, otherwiſe called ſaint Johns towne, and there lodged in campe, abiding for the comming of the earle of Atholl, who as then being ſolicited thereto by the king of Englands agents, was readie to turne againe incontinentlie to his ſide [who after accordinglie, with Godfrie of Roſſe, & Alexander Mowbraie, with other, came to the king of England.]

K. Edward inuadeth the Scots by land.

Fr. Thin. Scala chron.

The ſame time, whileſt the king of England lay thus at Perth, the earle of Namure (whom the Scotiſh writers wrongfie name the duke of Gelderland) came into England with an armie, and purpoſing to paſſe thorough Scotland vnto the place where king Edward lay in campe, to come to his aid, was diſcomfited comfited on the Burrowe moꝛe, beſide Edenburgh, by the power of the gouernours, and others, which were there aſſembled againſt him. There died manie on both parts in the fight (as Iohn Fourdon writeth) foꝛ the ſtrangers fought verie valiantlie: inſomuch that if William Dowglaſſe, with diuerſe other, had not come downe from Pictland hils to the aid of the Scots, whileſt they were thus fighting, the ſtrangers that day had woone the victoꝛie. But now diſcouraged with the ſudden comming of this freſh aid to their aduerſaries, they began to giue place, and drew towards Edenburgh: neuertheleſſe keeping themſelues in oꝛder of battell, they fought ſtill: and at length comming to Edenburgh, they were dꝛiuen by thoꝛough the friers ſtreet, and ſo by an other ſtreet, called ſaint Marie Wind, where one ſir Dauid de Anand, a verie valiant knight chanced to be wounded by one of the enimies, by reaſon whereof he was ſo kindled in wꝛathfull deſire to be reuenged, that with an axe which he had in his hand, he gaue his aduerſarie (that had hurt him) ſuch a blow on the ſhoulder, that he claue him downe togither with his hoꝛſſe, that the axe ſtaied not till it light vpon the verie hard pauement, ſo as the pꝛint of that violent ſtroke remained to be ſéene a long time after in one of the ſtones of the ſame pauement.

The ſtrangers ſtill retiring, and manfullie defending themſelues, at length got to the hill where Edenburgh caſtle ſtandeth, and there ſlue their hoꝛſſes, making as it were a rampier of their carcaſſes, ſo to defend themſelues from the foꝛce of their enimies: but being inuironed by the Scots on ech ſide all that night, and hauing neither meate noꝛ dꝛinke wherewith to ſuſteine their languiſhing bodies, the which beſide hunger and thirſt, were ſoꝛe tormented with cold alſo, and want of conuenient lodging, they yéelded themſelues the next day, with condition to haue their liues ſaued. When the ſpoile of the field (where they firſt ioined) was gathered, amongſt the dead bodies there was found a woman of an huge ſtature, who in the beginning of the battell ſtept foꝛth befoꝛe hir companie, and incountering in ſingular fight with an eſquire of Scotland, named Richard Shaw, ſhe ouerthꝛew him, and afterwards beating downe hir enimies on ech ſide, long it was yer ſhe might be ouerthꝛowne, which chanced not befoꝛe ſhe was inuironed about on ech ſide with hir enimies.

A woman of manlike foꝛce and ſtature.

The earle of Namure hauing yéelded himſelfe into the hands of the gouernours, was verie courteouſlie vſed, the earle of Murrey not onelie rendering vnto him all his goods, but alſo granting him licence to depart: and foꝛ his moꝛe ſuertie, he went himſelfe in perſon with him to the boꝛders, to ſée him ſafe deliuered out of all dangers. But by an ambuſh that lay in wait foꝛ the earle of Murrey, he was taken pꝛiſoner, and bꝛought to king Edward. Dauid Cumin earle of Atholl, hearing that the earle of Murrey one of the gouernours was thus taken, ſuppoſing king Edwards part to be much aduanced thereby, came ſtreightwaies vnto Perth, and gaue his faith eſtſones vnto Edward Baliol, and was againe eſtabliſhed by him gouernour of the realme of Scotland, as he was befoꝛe. The king of England, hauing in the meane time gotten the towne of Perth, returned into England, and toke the Baliol with him, foꝛ doubt leaſt when he had recouered the whole gouernement of the realme, he ſhould ſhꝛinke awaie from him. The earle of Atholl hauing now regained his foꝛmer authoꝛitie, began to exerciſe great crueltie againſt all thoſe that were enimies to the Baliol.

Sir Thomas Cumin was taken pꝛiſoner, & beheaded the next day, being Newyéres day. Foꝛ the battell befoꝛe mentioned was fought the laſt day of December (as Fourdon noteth.) * This Dauid earle of Atholl was verie inconſtant & gréedie of gouernment, who if he had bꝛought all the Scots to haue taken king Edwards part, would out of doubt, haue afterward contended with king Edward, and inuaded the kingdome of Scotland by violence; he did moſt grieuouſlie oppꝛeſſe the giltleſſe and poꝛe people, and wickedlie oꝛdered all things after his own fanſie, without reaſon.) Cumin earle of Atholl was ſlaine on this wiſe: Andꝛew Murrey was choſen gouernour in place of the earle of Murrey, taken (as befoꝛe is ſaid) by the Engliſhmen. This Andꝛew Murrey in the beginning of his new office, laid ſiege to the caſtle of Couper, with a mightie power of men, but hearing that the Cumins made foule woꝛke in the noꝛth parts of the realme, againſt ſuch as fauoured not the Engliſh part, he left that ſiege, and went againſt them, with whome incountering in battell, he ouerthꝛew their armie, and put them all to flight.

At this bickering were ſlaine two of the Cumins, Robert and William, Thomas Caldar, and diuerſe other valiant men, though enimies foꝛ the time vnto the gouernour. This victoꝛie reduced all the noꝛth parts of Scotland vnto the obeiſance of king Dauid. Few Engliſhmen after the ſame abode within the noꝛth bounds of Scotland, except thoſe that were within the caſtle of Dungard in Buchquhane. At length this caſtle was woone, & all that kept it ſlaine, except Henrie Beaumont the capteine, who being ſwoꝛne neuer to returne againe into Scotland, was licenced by the gouernour to depart into England without anie interruption. After this, the gouernour came to the caſtle of Lochindoꝛis, and laid ſiege to it, where within was the countelle of Atholl, the wife of the late ſlaine earle Dauid. This woman hauing knowledge afoꝛehand, that hir houſe ſhould be beſieged, had ſent vnto the king of England and to Edward Baliol foꝛ ſuccours.

The king of England hauing now doubting leaſt all the ſtrengths in Scotland, kept by ſuch as were his friends, would be loſt without recouerie, if the ſame were not the ſoner reſcued, he raiſed an armie of foꝛtie thouſand men, and entering therewith into Scotland, came to the caſtle of Lochindoꝛis afoꝛeſaid. The Scots that lay there at ſiege, vpon knowledge had of his comming towards them, bꝛake vp, and departed from thence. Héerevpon, when he had refreſhed the hold with new men, munition, and vittels, he toke the countelle foꝛth with him, and paſſed with bloudie ſwoꝛd thoꝛough Murrey, euen to Elghine, and returning by Mar, burnt the towne of Aberden. [Then he went to Striueling, where he ſtronglie repared the caſtle: from whence he toke his iournie to Botheuill, and there alſo in winter he made the caſtle

The towne of Perth newlie fortified.

The king of England at his comming to Perth, forth of the north parts of Scotland, and finding the towne vnfortified, cauſed the ſame to be newlie fenſed with wals and bulworks, at the charges and onelie expenſes of theſe ſir abbeies, Aberbrothoke, Couper, Lundoris, Balmerinoch, Dunfirmling, & ſaint Andrewes. Henrie Beaumont alſo, who contrarie to his oth before taken, was now returned with king Edward into Scotland, was made capteine of ſaint Andrewes. Alſo Henrie Ferrar was made capteine of the caſtle of Lucres, William Montacute of Striueling, William Felton of Rockeſburgh, and the keeping of the towne of Perth was committed vnto one Thomas Vthred. Whileſt king Edward ordered things in Scotland after this maner, his brother (ſurnamed by the Scotiſh writers Eltham) came vnto him at Perth, who in the weſt parts of Scotland had exerciſed much crueltie, as well againſt the enimies of the Engliſhmen, as againſt thoſe that were fauourers and friends vnto them, inſomuch that paſſing through Galloway, Carike, Kile, and Cunningham, he put all to the fier and ſword that came in his waies. He burned the church of ſaint Bute, and a thouſand perſons within it, which were fled thither for ſafegard of their liues. At his comming to Perth, he found the king his brother within the church there, who being ſore offended with him for his miſordered doings, verie ſharpelie reproued him for the ſame: and forſomuch as he anſwered him ſomewhat frowardlie, he plucked forth his ſword, and there thruſt him through the bodie, euen before the altar of ſaint John, wiſhing that all ſuch might periſh on the ſame wiſe, as put no difference betwixt friend and foe, place hallowed and vnhallowed; as being no reaſon, that the church ſhould be anie more refuge for him, than he had made it for other.

His crueltie.

K. Edward ſleeth his brother Eltham.

It may be, that king Edward ſlue ſome other man in this ſort, as the Scots heere do write: but for the earle of Cornewall that was brother to king Edward, and ſurnamed John of Eltham, becauſe he was borne at Eltham, it is nothing true that he was ſo made awaie, for he died of a naturall infirmitie, as by our Engliſh writers it manifeſtlie appeereth. But now to proceed with the hiſtorie, as we find it written. Such things accompliſhed in Scotland (as before ye haue heard) king Edward returned into England, & left the Baliol behind him with a great power of men at Perth. About the ſame time, Henrie Beaumont ſlue all ſuch Scots as he might lay hands on, that had beene at the battell of Kilbleine, where his coſine Dauid Cumin was ſlaine. Moreouer now, after that king Edward was returned into England, Andrew Murrey came forth of the mounteins, into the which he was before withdrawen to eſchue the furie of the Engliſhmen, and by the aſſiſtance of ſundrie of the nobles of Scotland, he wan the caſtle of Kincleuin, and raſed it to the earth. Shortlie after he came into Mernes, and there tooke the caſtle of Kilneſſe, and likewiſe raſed the ſame.

On the other part, the Engliſhmen made no leſſe ſpoile and deſtruction on ech ſide where they came, ſo that the Mernes, Angus, Stermond, and Gowrie through ſpoile, murther, & other diſgraces, chancing by continuall warre, were left in manner waſte and deſolat. At length, this Andrew Murrey aſſembling a great power, with ſupport of them of Murrey, Mar, and Buchquhan, fought with his enimies at Panmore in Angus, where he obteined the victorie with huge ſlaughter of Engliſhmen, and other his aduerſaries. In this battell was ſlaine Henrie Mountfort, who latelie before had beene ſent by king Edward into Scotland to ſupport the Baliol, beſide foure thouſand others, the moſt part gentlemen: ſo that this ouerthrow was verie diſpleaſant to the king of England, hauing his ſide ſore weakened thereby. After the gaine of this victorie, Andrew Murrey paſſed through Fife & Angus, ouerthrowing the caſtle of Lucres, with all the other ſtrengths of Fife, the caſtle of Couper onelie excepted.

By meanes whereof, the Scots remoued and came to Clerkington, and the Engliſh came to Krethtowne not farre diſtant; betweene whome there was a great fight, and manie ſlaine on both ſides. But the victorie inclining (without anie great conqueſt) to neither partie, both armies parted: for the Engliſh went ouer Tweed, and the Scots feining that they would go into England, lodged themſelues at Galuſchell. So that king Edward hearing of ſuch proſperous ſucceſſe chancing to his aduerſaries, ſent incontinentlie two capteins with two armies into Scotland, to the ſupport of the Baliol.

The other was led by Richard Mountfort with whome Laurence Preſton and Robert Gordon met, and giuing him battell, ſlue the ſame Richard with the moſt part of all his companie. About the ſame time ſir William Montacute earle of Saliſburie, togither with the earle of Arundell came into Scotland with a great power of men, and beſieged the caſtell of Dunbar, lieng at the ſame for the ſpace of 22 weeks. Amongeſt whome there was a Scot of a right ſtout ſtomach named Robert Pendergeſt; he, for that it was perceiued he loued but little the Engliſh nation, was euill intreated and vſed amongſt them, in ſo much that on a day, hauing his head broken by the marſhall named Thomas Knatoun, he ceaſſed not to ſeeke ſome meane to be reuenged, till he brought his purpoſe to paſſe, ſo that ſhortlie after he ſlue the ſaid marſhall, and afterward to auoid the danger of death due for that fact, he got away, and came to William Dowglas, whome he perſuaded with all diligence to paſſe vnto Edenburgh, where he might find his enimies at ſome great aduantage, by reaſon of the ſlothfull negligence as then growne amongeſt them. The death of Andrew Murrey the gouernor. 1338.

Not long after, Andrew Murrey the gouernor of Scotland deceaſſed, to the great damage of the common-wealth, and was buried in Roſmarkie, in the yeare after the birth of our Sauiour 1338. It came well to paſſe for Scotland, that about the ſame time the king of England entering into wars againſt France, was conſtreined to ceaſſe his purſute of the conqueſt which he minded to make in Scotland, the which muſt néeds haue come to full effect, if he had followed his former purpoſe and intent. But to proceed, after the deceaſſe of Andrew Murrey the gouernor, Robert Steward toke all the charge on him for the gouernment of the realme, till king Dauid returned home out of France, and began to rule all things himſelfe. Tiuidall alſo was recouered out of the Engliſhmens hands, with diuers other places, about this time, by the high prowes and manlie valiancie of William Dowglas and other Scotiſh capteins; and therefore in the reward of the good ſeruice ſhewed by the ſame William in conqueſt of that countrie, he intoied the ſame afterward as his right full inheritance. [Henrie earle of Lancaſter and Derbie, hearing of the valure of theſe two worthie capteins, William Dowglas, and Alexander Ramſeie, earneſtlie deſired to ſée them, and to trie their ſtrengths in iuſting. Whereupon, there was a day appointed therefore at Berwike by all the ſaid parties, where they met with their complices prouided accordinglie. At what time a certeine Engliſhman aſked Peter Grame, if he would not refuſe to iuſt with him, to whome he anſwered, that he accepted the chalenge, but willed him firſt to dine well, becauſe he ſhould that night ſup in paradiſe. Which fell out accordinglie, for in running together the Engliſhman was ſlain.] The king of England moued with high diſpleaſure at theſe doings, ſent a right valiant knight named ſir Thomas Berkleie with a great power of men into Scotland. Againſt whome came William Dowglas, and Robert Steward the gouernor, and gaue him battell at Blackeborne, where the Scots were diſcomfited and ſo beaten downe, that few of them eſcaped, which were not either ſlaine or taken. Not long after, William Dowlas fought with his enimies at the Cragings, where hauing not paſt fortie men in his companie, he diſcomfited ſir John Striueling, who had with him neere hand fiue hundred Engliſhmen and Scots, that toke his part in the king of Englands quarell. In the yeare following, the ſame William Dowglas wan the caſtell of Hermitage, & ſlue all them that were found within it. In the yeare next after, he fought fiue times in one day with ſir Laurence Abernethie, principall capteine vnder the Balioll, and being put to the worſe at foure of thoſe times, at the fift he vanquiſhed his enimies, and toke priſoner their capteine the ſaid ſir Laurence, who was ſent to the caſtell of Dunbreton, there to remaine in ſafe kéeping for a time. For theſe and ſuch worthie enterpriſes hardlie atchiued, this Will. Dowglas was much commended, and within a few daies after the taking of the ſaid ſir Laurence Abernethie, he was ſent by the gouernor the ſaid Robert Steward into France, as ambaſſador to king Dauid, for the diſpatch of certeine weightie matters touching the ſtate of the realme.

1339. In the meane time, Robert Steward the gouernor raiſed a mightie armie, and came with the ſame vnto the towne of Perth, planting a ſtrong ſiege round about it; for diuiding his hoſt into foure parts, he lodged them with their capteins in foure ſeuerall places. The firſt conſiſting for the moſt part of weſterne Scots, he gouerned himſelfe; the ſecond he committed to Patrike Dunbar earle of March, the third to William earle of Roſſe, and the fourth, to Maurice of Mowbray lord of Clideſdale. Theſe lay thus at ſiege of this towne for the ſpace of ten weékes. And though ſundrie times they gaue alarmes and aſſaults to it, yet was it ſo ſtoutlie defended by Engliſhmen and other within, that the Scots for a long time loſt more than they wan. At length when they were in maner paſt all hope to get the towne, & readie to haue departed from it, William Dowglas arriued in the Taie, bringing with him out of France in fiue ſhips, both men of war, and alſo munition of armour, artillerie, and weapons, which ſerued the Scotiſhmen in that ſeaſon greatlie to purpoſe.

Thoſe Scots that had ſerued vnder him likewiſe, were content to forſake the king of Englands wages, and to ſerue William Dowglas, who led them forthwith to the ſiege of Perth, the which towne ſhortlie after his comming was rendered into the gouernors hands, by Thomas Vthred the capteine, in the third moneth after it was firſt beſieged, & in the yeare after our redemption 1341.

Among other exploits attempted at this ſiege after the comming of the lord William Dowglas, the Frenchman Hugh Handpile, taking vpon him on a day to approch the towne with his ſhips, and to giue an aſſault thereto, he loſt the chiefeſt veſſell he had, although afterwards when the towne was now rendered, the lord William Dowglas cauſed the ſame ſhip to be to him againe reſtored, and with great thanks and liberall rewards giuen as well to him as to the other of the Frenchmen, he ſent them backe into France, greatlie to their pleaſure and contentation; although in their returne, as they paſſed out of Drumlie Firth, they eſcaped verie hardlie from the ſhore. [The winter after the ſiege of Turneie, king Edward went to Melroſſe, but from thence riding through part of the forreſt of Etrike, in a tempeſtuous time, he came backe againe to Melroſſe, where Henrie earle of Lancaſter iuſted with William Dowglaſſe (by couenant) in the kings ſight. In the ſame yeere (as ſome do write) or (according vnto other) in the yeere following, there was ſuch a miſerable dearth, both through England and Scotland, that the people were driuen to eat the fleſh of horſſes, dogs, cats, and ſuch like vnuſed kinds of meats, to ſuſteine their languiſhing liues withall, yea, inſomuch that (as is ſaid) there was a Scotiſhman, an vplandiſh felow named Triſtricloke, ſpared not to ſteale children, and to kill women, on whoſe fleſh he fed, as if he had béene a woolfe. Perth being once deliuered (as before is ſaid) to the gouernor, he went with his armie to Striueling, and beſieging the caſtell, had it rendered vnto him the eight day after his comming thither, on theſe conditions, that Thomas Foulkie the capteine, with his wife and children might ſafelie paſſe into England, without fraud or guile of anie impeachment [of which caſtell (as ſaith Buchanan) Maurice the ſonne of Andrew Murrey was made capteine.] Edward Baliol, by ſuch good and proſperous ſucceſſe, as did thus dailie fall vnto his enimies, to auoid further danger, after oft remouing from place to place, at length he was conſtreined to flie into England, leſt he ſhould haue fallen into his aduerſaries hands.

Not long after, the caſtell of Edenburgh was woone by policie on this wiſe. William Dowglas hauing acquaintance with one Walter Towers, [whom Buchanan called William Cur a merchant] cauſed him to prouide a ſhip, and to arriue therewith in the Forth, feining as though he were a merchant, and to offer wines to ſell vnto the garriſon that kept Edenburgh caſtell. This Towers according to inſtructions thus giuen him, prouided him of all things neceſſarie for the purpoſe, & ſo comming into the Forth with his ſhip, came on land himſelfe, and brought with him into Edenburgh two punchions of wine, which he offered to ſell vnto the ſeeward of houſhold to the capteine of the caſtell, who falling at a price with him, appointed that he ſhould bring them earlie in the morning vp to the caſtell, that they might be receiued in. Towers hiring a cart ouer night, came with the punchions vp to the caſtell gate, earlie vpon the breake of the day in the next morning, and hauing the gates opened, entred with his cart, and being come within the gates with it, he plucked forth a wedge or pin deuiſed of purpoſe, and immediatlie therewith the cart with the punchions fell downe, ſo ſtopping the entrie of the gates, that in no wiſe they might be ſhut or cloſed againe.

The Dowglaſſe hauing in his companie William Bullocke, Walter Fraſeir, and John Sandlands, right valiant knights, with diuerſe other hardie and bold perſonages, laie in couert not far from the caſtell, & hauing knowledge giuen him by ſound of horne, or otherwiſe, when to come forth, he haſted thereupon with all diligence vnto the gates, and finding them thus open, firſt ſlue the porters, and after into the caſtell, within a while had diſpatched all them within, and ſo became maiſters of that fortres, within the which for capteine they left one William Dowglas, the baſtard brother of the other William Dowglas, by whoſe conduct chiefflie, both this enterpriſe and diuers other were luckilie atchiued. Thus was the realme of Scotland clearelie recouered out of the enimies hands, the Engliſhmen, and all other that toke part with the Baliol, conſtreined to auoid out of all the parts and bounds thereof. The caſtell of Edenburgh was thus recouered by the Scots in the yeere laſt before remembred, to wit, 1341.

The ſame yéere, or in the next inſuing, the ſecond of June, king Dauid with his wife quéene Jane, and ſundrie nobles both French and Scotiſh, came ſafelie through the ſeas, and arriued in Innerberuie, from whence with no ſmall triumph they were conueied vnto Perth. About the ſame time, Alexander Ramſey of Dalehouſe, one of the moſt valiant capteins knowne in thoſe daies, gathering a great power of men, entered into England, and hauing knowledge that the Engliſhmen were aſſembled, in purpoſe to giue him battell, laid an ambuſh for them, and training them within danger thereof, by ſuch a fierce and new onſet as he gaue vpon them, he put them out of order, and chaſed them moſt egerlie, killing and ſlaieng a great number of them at his pleaſure. Wherefore king Dauid in recompenſe of his valiancie thus declared in his ſeruice, gaue vnto him the keeping of this caſtell, together with the ſhiriffwike of Tiuidale. Whereat William Dowglaſſe toke ſuch diſpleaſure, that ſeeking to be reuenged, he found meanes to apprehend this Alexander Ramſey within the church of Halwike, and put him in priſon within the caſtell of Hermitage, where he remained in great miſerie and lacke of food till he died. King Dauid was ſore moued herewith, purpoſing to ſee ſuch puniſhment done vpon William Dowglaſſe for that rebellious attempt, as might ſerue for an example to all other how they went about anie the like offenſe. Neuertheleſſe, the Dowglaſſe kept him out of the way amongſt the mountains teins and other deſert places, till finallie Robert Steward and other nobles purchaſed his pardon, ſo that at length he came into fauor againe, and had all his lands and liuings reſtored vnto him, as well in Tiuidale as elſewhere.

The earle of Saliſburie exchanged for the earle of Murrey.

Froiſard.

Some after the earle of Saliſburie was taken by ſir Alexander Ramſey (as is ſaid) he was exchanged for the earle of Murrey, that had beene holden manie yéeres before as priſoner in England. But it ſhould appeare by other writers, that the earle of Saliſburie was not taken at that time in the borders of Scotland (as before is ſuppoſed) but in the borders of France, where he was in the wars which king Edward the ſame time made againſt the Frenchmen, & now was exchanged for the earle of Murrey. But howſoeuer it was, king Dauid after the realme of Scotland was once brought into a quiet eſtate from the former trouble of war, he called a parlement at the towne of Perth, where he rewarded verie liberallie all ſuch as had either done any notable ſeruice themſelus, or had loſt any of their friends or parents in defenſe & recouerie of the relme out of his aduerſaries hands. Among other, Hugh Boece had in recompenſe of his fathers ſlaughter at Duplin, the inheritor & ladie of the baronie of Balzid giuen him in mariage, which baronie is yet poſſeſſed by the heires of the ſaid Hugh.

Shortlie after vpon the breaking vp of this parlement, king Dauid raiſed a mightie armie, and entered with the ſame into Northumberland; but committing the whole charge to Iohn Randolph erle of Murrey as lieutenant generall, he wold not that anie of his owne banners ſhould be ſpred and borne in all that voiage [although himſelfe were there in perſon, ſeruing ſecretlie, and would not be knowne in this iournie.] The moſt part of all Northumberland was burnt and ſpoiled, for they remained there a moneth before they returned, conueieng awaie with them great riches, which they got abroad in all places where they came. Shortlie after, he came with a new armie into England, cauſing his own ſtandard to be caried afore him at that time, as he that toke vpon him the whole gouernance of that enterpriſe himſelfe. The Engliſhmen withdrawing all their goods into ſtrengths, minded not to giue the Scots any ſet batell, but to take them euer at ſome aduantage, if they ſtraied abroad any where vnwarilie to fetch in booties. Neither were they altogither diſappointed of their hoped prey, for 5 Scotiſh knights, whoſe names were Steward, Eglinton, Craggie, Boid, and Fullarton, purſuing their enimies on a time ouer fiercelie, were taken priſoners, and after redéemed for great ſummes of monie. At length, king Dauid perceiuing that he waſted but time, returned into Scotland. But not long after he went againe into England, in which iournie his people were ſo beaten with vehement ſtormes of raine and haile, that they had much adw to ſaue themſelues from periſhing through the vnmeaſurable force of that ſo rigorous weather.

On the other ſide, the Engliſhmen that were gathered to reſiſt againſt him, were in ſemblable maner neere hand deſtroied with the like rage of tempeſt. Herevpon king Dauid, to the end that his enterpriſe ſhould not ſéeme altogither to want effect, ouerthrew ſundrie ſtrong houſes on the Engliſh borders, and ſo returned home without other damage either done or receiued. About the ſame time did Edward king of England beſiege the towne of Calis. The French king therfore deuiſing all waies poſſible whereby to ſaue that towne, and to cauſe his aduerſarie to raiſe his ſiege, ſent ambaſſadors into Scotland, to require king Dauid, that with an armie he would enter into England, and do what damage he might vnto the Engliſhmen, to trie if by that meanes king Edward could be conſtreined to leaue his ſiege, and to returne home for defenſe of his owne countrie and ſubiects. In the meane time alſo (as I find in the Scotiſh chronicles) king Edward addreſſed his orators into Scotland, offering vnto king Dauid, vpon condition that peace might be had, to deliuer into his hands not onelie the towne of Berwike, but alſo Edward Balioll his old aduerſarie, for whoſe cauſe the warre had ſo long continued betwixt them.

The king of Englands offers.

These offers being proponed in councell, though ſome of the wiſer ſort gaue aduiſe that in no condition they ought to be refuſed; yet the king himſelfe (for loue that he had to the French king with whome he had béene brought vp) and other of the nobles hauing yong heads, vpon deſire to be reuenged of the Engliſhmen by practiſe of warres (wherevnto they were inclined) wold néeds condeſcend to the French kings chargeable requeſt, & refuſe the king of Englands beneficiall offers. Whereupon an armie was leuied, and ſolemne proclamation made, that all ſuch as were able and fit to beare armour, ſhould méet the king at a certeine day and place, which was to them in the ſame proclamation aſſigned. The earle of Roſſe therefore came with his people vnto Perth, and there made his muſters before the king: but in the night following he ſlue the lord of the Iles, with ſeuen of his kinſmen as they were in their beds, and therevpon fled, and got him with all ſpeed againe into Roſſe [whereby the armie was greatlie diminiſhed, when the friends of both parts fearing ciuill warres amongſt the families departed home.]

The Scots readie to helpe the French, & hinder their neighbors the Engliſh.

The lord of the Iles ſlain by the earle of Roſſe.

Fr. Thin.

King Dauid, though he was ſore diſpleaſed herewith, and deſired moſt earneſtlie to haue puniſhed that heinous act; yet bicauſe he would not hinder his iournie, he let paſſe the puniſhment therof, till more conuenient opportunitie might ſerue thereto. [Notwithſtanding that William Dowglaſſe of Liddeſdale did earneſtlie perſuade him, at that time to leaue the iournie, and firſt to puniſh theſe turmoils at home, whereby all things might be quieted in his abſence.] At his comming to the borders, and before he entered into England, he made manie knights, to ſtirre them the rather to do valiantlie; but firſt he created William Dowglaſſe an earle, which William was ſonne to Archembald Dowglaſſe, ſlaine before at Halidon hill. There was vndoubtedlie a mightie power of the Scots aſſembled at that preſent; inſomuch as there was of earles, lords, knights, and gentlemen, to the number of two thouſand men of armes; and of ſuch armed men as they called hoblers, ſet forth by the burrowes and good townes twentie thouſand; beſide the archers and other footmen; ſo that they were at the leaſt fortie thouſand men in all, or (as ſome writers affirme) three ſcore thouſand.

William Dowglaſſe created earle of Dowglaſſe.

King Dauid inuadeth England.

King Dauid with that his puiſſant armie, the firſt of October entered Northumberland, and coming to a fortreſſe not farre off from the borders called Lidell, they laie round about that place for the ſpace of three daies, without giuing thereto anie aſſault: but the fourth day they aſſailed it right fiercelie, and in the end entered by fine force, ſleaing the more part of all thoſe which they found within the houſe. The capteine ſir Walter Selbie was taken aliue, but immediatlie by king Dauid his commandement, had his head ſtriken off, and was not permitted to haue ſo much time as to make his confeſſion, which he inſtantlie deſired to haue done, but it would not be granted. From thence the armie remoued, and went vnto the abbie of Lauercoſt, which they ſpoiled; and that done they departed, and paſſing by Naward caſtell, and the towne of Redpeth, kept on on till they came vnto the priorie of Herham, which they sacked; but the towne was saued from fire by commandement of king Dauid, who in this iournie appointed to preserue foure townes onelie from burning; to wit, Herham aforesaid, Corbridge, Darington, and Durham, to the end he might in them lay vp such store of vittels, as he should prouide abroad in the countrie, wherewith to sustaine his armie during the time of his abiding in those parties.

From Herham, where he laie three daies, he marched to Chechester, wasting and spoiling the countrie on each hand, and after turned towards the wood of Beaurepaire; and comming thither, lodged himselfe in the manour, and set his people abroad into the countrie to fetch in booties, & to burne vp the townes and houses in all places where they came. The spoile, waste, destruction, and slaughter which the Scots practised with fire and sword, was wonderfull to heare, and incredible almost to be told, they spared neither yoong nor old, church nor chappell: religious houses as well as other were consumed to ashes. The abbeie of Durham, and all places thereabout (as the Scotish writers affirme) were spoiled and miserablie sacked, although it was said king Dauid was admonished in a dreame, that he should in anie wise abstaine from violating the goods and lands perteining to saint Cuthbert.

The earle of Northumberland lieutenant of the North vnder king Edward, to resist these iniuries, raised a great power of men, and ioining the same with such bands of old souldiers as king Edward had latelie sent ouer out of France for that purpose, first dispatched an herald at armes vnto king Dauid, requiring him to staie from further inuading the countrie, and to returne into Scotland, till some reasonable order for a finall peace might be agreed vpon betwixt him and the king his maister: otherwise he should be sure to haue battell to the vtterance within three daies after. King Dauid contemning this message, required his folks to make them readie to receiue their enimies if they came to assaile them, and on the nert morrow, he diuided his armie into three battels. In the first was Robert Steward prince of Scotland, and Patrike Dunbar earle of March: in the second were appointed John earle of Murrey, and William earle of Dowglasse: in the third was the king himselfe, with all the residue of the nobles. [Contrarie to the which Buchanan placeth Dowglasse in the first, the king in the middle, and Steward in the third.]

In the morning earlie before the battell, the earle of Dowglasse departed from the armie to descrie the English host, and to vnderstand their force and order (if it were possible:) but entring somwhat vnwarilie within danger of his enimies, he was chased, and that to such disaduantage, that he lost fiftie, or rather fiue hundred (as some bookes haue) of yoong gentlemen, and such other light horssemen as he tooke forth with him, escaping verie narrowlie himselfe also from being taken at the chase. In the meane season, the English host diuided likewise into three battels, approched forward, and came within sight of the Scotish armie. Wherevpon Dauid Graham with a wing of fiue hundred horssemen, well appointed gaue a full charge on the skirts of the English archers, thinking to haue distressed them: but he was so sharpelie receiued and beaten with arrowes, that losing a great number of his men, he was constreined to flee backe to the maine battell, and that not without great danger of being taken in his flight by such as followed him.

These two discomfitures notwithstanding, the Scots rushed fiercelie vpon their enimies, & fought with great manhood a long season; but in the end, Robert Steward, and the earle of March, perceiuing their people partlie to shrinke backe, caused the retreat to be sounded, in hope to saue their men by withdrawing into some safer place: but this fleeing backe of the earle of March and Robert Steward, brought the discomfiture vpon all the residue of the Scots. For that battell of Englishmen that was first matched with them, came now with such violence vpon the maine battell where king Dauid fought, that within a short while after, the same was vtterlie discomfited and put to flight. In this businesse king Dauid himselfe did in euerie point plaie the part of a most valiant chiefteine, incouraging his people as well with words as notable examples to doo their indeuours. Neither would he flie after hee saw himselfe destitute of all conuenient aid, but still continued in earnest fight, desiring nothing so much (as should appeare) as death, for that he thought nothing more displeasant than life, after the slaughter of so manie of his nobles and liege people.

At length hauing his weapons striken out of his hands, one John Copland came vnto him, and willed him to yéeld; but he with one of his fists gaue this Copland such a blow on the mouth, that by force of the gantlet he strake out two of his teeth before he did yéeld vnto him. Which Copland is misnamed by Iohn Maior, and not onelie called Couptaunt, but also reported by him to be a Gascoigne, whereas it is euident by our histories, that he was named Copland, and a meere Englishman. But to our purpose. The Scots that fought in the rereward had no better successe than the other: for that battell was also broken & put to flight, with great slaughter as well of the nobles, as other commons, besides those that were taken. There were slaine in this dolorous conflict, the earle of Murrey, the earle of Stratherne, the constable, the marshall, the chamberleine and chancellor of Scotland, with a great number of other nobles and commons [with Maurice Murrife.] There were taken with the king fiue earles, that is to say, Dowglasse, Fife, Sutherland, Wigtoun, and Menteith [the earle of March & the Senescall fled, but after the earle of Mench being taken, was with the earle of Menteith (as saith Scala chron.) drawne and hanged at London.] And besides other great riches lost in this field, the holie crosse (as they call it) of holie rood house, was found vpon king Dauid, who bare it about him, in trust that by vertue thereof he should be inuincible: but he was spoiled both of that and all other his iewels which were found vpon him at the same time. This battell was striken neere vnto Durham, the 17 day of October, in the yéere 1346. What countries and places the Englishmen got after this victorie, ye may read in the English historie.

In the yéere following, the Balioll, with the earle of Northumberland made a road into Louthian, and Cliddesdale, bringing a great botie of goods and cattell out of those countries into Galloway, in which countrie the Balioll abode a long time after. At length, the Scots recouering themselues with much paine, after the slaughter of so manie of their nobles and commons, beside the discomfort for the taking of their king, chose and appointed Robert Steward as gouernour to haue the rule of the realme. About the same time, William Dowglasse the sonne of Archembald Dowglasse, that was brother vnto good sir James Dowglasse, who (as before is said) was slaine in Spaine, returned forth of France, and by support of his friends chased the Englishmen out of Dowglasdale, Tiuidale, Twidale, Etrike forrest, & Twedale. John Copland capteine of Rokesburgh, to resist such enterprises, gathered a number of men,

In the yéere following, was the ſame ſir William Dowglaſſe, being latelie before ranſomed out of England, ſlaine, as he was hunting in Etrike foreſt, by his cоſine and godſonne William earle of Dowglaſſe, in reuenge of the ſlaughter of Alexander Ramſey, and other old grudges. Thus was the houſe of the Dowglaſſes diuided amongeſt themſelues, purſuing ech other manie yéeres togither with great vnkindneſſe, vnnaturall enimitie and ſlaughter. In the yéere next following, which was 1355, ſhortlie after Eaſter, there arriued in Scotland a noble knight named ſir Eugenie de Garenteris, with a companie of Frenchmen, though few in number, yet valiant and verie ſkilfull warriors, which were ſent thither by John king of France, that ſucceéded his father king Philip of Valois, latelie before deceaſſed, and deliuered vnto the gouernor and other nobles of the realme of Scotland, fortie thouſand crownes of the ſunne, to be imploied about the leuieng of an armie againſt the Engliſhmen, that they might be conſtreined the ſoner to withdraw their powers out of France.

This monie was receiued, though a ſmall part thereof came to the hands of the ſouldiers or men of warre of Scotland, for the lords and nobles kept it ſafe inough to their owne vſe. Yet neuertheleſſe, the earle of March, and William Dowglaſſe, gather their people, and paſſe forth with the ſame to the borders, and entering into England, appoint William Ramſey of the Dalehouſe, to ride before with a number of light horſſemen, to the end, that if the Engliſhmen did aſſemble and come forth too ſtrong againſt him, he might retire backe to the maine battell, where they lay in couert, at a place called Nilbet more. This Ramſey doing as he was commanded, made a great forraie thorough the countrie, and hauing got togither a great bootie of cattell, withdrew with the ſame homewards: but being ſharpelie purſued by the Engliſhmen, in hope to recouer their goods, he fled amaine, and they following egerlie in the chaſe, were vpon the Scotiſh armie before they were aware. The Scotiſhmen, and thoſe few Frenchmen that were there, ſet vpon the Engliſhmen fiercelie, and finallie put them to flight, though not without ſome ſlaughter on their part: for there were ſlaine of Scots ſir John Holieburton, and ſir James Turnebull knights. Theſe were taken priſoners of Engliſhmen, ſir Thomas Greie, and his ſonne, with John Darcas, and manie other Engliſhmen.

✻ The taking of which Greie is reported by others to haue béene after this manner. The lords Perſie and Neuill, gardians of the Engliſh marches, tooke truce with the lord William Dowglaſſe, at the time that he conquered the lands which the Engliſhmen had woone of the Scots. But Patrike earle of March (being in confederacie with Garanteris) would not by anie perſuaſion conſent to that leage: wherevpon (with a number of others) he made a road to the caſtle of Norham, ambuſhing themſelues vpon the Scotiſh ſide of the riuer of Tweed, ſending ouer a banneret with his enſigne, and 400 men to forage & ſpoile the countrie, who gathering the preies, draue them in deſpite alongſt the caſtle: wherevpon Thomas Greie, capteine of Norham (ſonne to Thomas Greie, that had béene three times by the Scots beſieged in the ſaid caſtle of Norham, in the reigne of king Edward the ſecond) ſéeing the commons of England thus robbed (and déeming it his part to defend his countrie, friends, and their ſubſtance) iſſued forth of Norham with few men more than fiftie of the garriſon of the caſtle, and a few of the common people vnexpert in matters of war; who (not knowing of the ſecret ambuſh of the band which Patrike had laied in wait behind Tweed) iſſued forth to follow and recouer the preie: but being ſo farre gone in chaſe of the enimie, as that he could not returne in ſafetie (becauſe he was beſet before and behind with the 400 on the one ſide, & the ambuſh laied by Tweed on the other ſide) the ſaid Greie and his companie (finding none other remedie but to hazard the ſucceſſe) forſoke their horſſes, and on foot (ſtanding to the extremitie) with a wonderfull courage ſet vpon the Scots, whereof more were killed than of the Engliſh, but the Scots comming ſo ſore on the Engliſh (not able to reſiſt) they began to flie, at what time Thomas Greie (as before is declared) was taken priſoner.)

The earles of March, and Dowglaſſe, after the obteining of this victorie, came ſudenlie in the night ſeaſon vnto the towne of Berwike, and raiſing vp ladders to the wals, wan the towne, but not without loſſe of diuerſe Scotiſh gentlemen, as Thomas Haus, Andrew Scot of Balwerie, John Gordon, William Sinclare, Thomas Preſton, and Alexander Powbraie knights. Of Engliſh were ſlaine Alexander Ogill capteine of the towne, Thomas Perſie brother to the earle of Northumberland, and Edward Greie, with others. Eugenie de Garenteris with his Frenchmen did verie valiantlie beare himſelfe in this enterpriſe, whome Robert Steward the gouernour rewarding with great gifts, ſent backe into France, commending him by letters vnto the French king, as he that had done his dutie in euerie behalfe verie thoroughlie. The caſtle of Berwike, notwithſtanding that the towne was thus woone, held forth the Scots and Frenchmen, by reaſon whereof when an armie of Engliſhmen came to the ſuccours thereof, they raced the wals, and burnt the houſes of the towne, and ſo departed.

✻ The tidings whereof were brought to king Edward at the verie inſtant of his landing from Calis into England, for which cauſe he taried at his parlement appointed at London but three daies, and with all ſpeed came to Berwike, where he entered the caſtle; wherat the burgeſſes amazed, treated with him, and therevpon the towne of Berwike was redeliuered (againſt the minds of the Scots) to king Edward.) K. Edward himſelfe being come to the reſcue and recouerie of Berwike, and hauing receiued the towne, and finding it ſo defaced, tooke order for the reparing thereof againe, went to Roxburgh, and there receiued of the Baliol a full reſignation of all his pretended right to the crowne of Scotland. [For there the 26 of Januarie, the ſaid Baliol hauing reſigned (as before) all his title to king Edward, alledged theſe cauſes: firſt, in conſideration that the Scots were full of rebellion; alſo, becauſe he had no heire, nor anie verie néere of his linage: and for that he

he was of K. Edwards blood of England, he knew not where to beſtow it better than vpon him. This Baliol is by no author (as Leſleus ſaith) placed in the catalog of the kings, as well for that he bound himſelfe (by homage) to the gouernement of England with an oth, againſt the gouernement & maieſtie of Scotland: as for that being a tyrant, & by force inuading the crowne, he continued not long in the ſame. In truth, I ſuppoſe he held it not verie long, and that in continuall warre. But yet for that which I can ſee, he was crowned king at Scone, 1332, as Leſleus himſelfe, Buchanan, and all other authors do agrée. Beſide, he gouerned by him & his agents vntill the yéere of 1342, at what time he yéelded his crowne to king Edward of England; which was the full part of ten yeares, after which againe he recouered a good part of Endgland. Wherefore it ſéemeth ſtrange to me, that Roſſe will not allow him a place in the catalog of kings, ſince Buchan. maketh him the nintie fourth king, and ſo placeth him vnder that title, and maketh Dauid Bruſe (who was crowned before Baliol, and gouerned after Baliols departing Scotland) the 98 king, naming alſo Robert (who ſucceéded after Bruſe) the hundred king in order of gouernement; in ſuch ſort, that both theſe writing at one time (but with diuers affections) cannot agrée on the number of their kings: one receiuing, & the other reiecting him to be placed in the catalog of their kings.] After this, king Edward paſſing forth to Hadington, ſpoiled and waſted the countrie by the way on each hand as he marched forward; and for diſpleaſure that his naule on the ſea (after the ſouldiers and mariners had béene on land, and burned the church of our ladie in thoſe parts called Whitekirke) had with force of a rigorous tempeſt béene ſore ſhaken, and manie of the ſhips loſt and drowned togither with men and all, he fell into ſuch a rage, that he cauſed all the buildings in thoſe parts to be burnt and ſpoiled, as well abbeis as all other churches and religious houſes, as though he minded (ſay the Scotiſh writers) to make warre both againſt God and all his ſaints. Theſe things chanced in the yeare 1355, after our common account, about the feaſt of the Purification of our ladie, & by reaſon the Engliſhmen did ſo much hurt at that time in thoſe parts by fire, they called it euer after; The burnt Candlemas.

Shortlie after that king Edward was returned into England, William Dowglas of Niddeſdale recouered out of the Engliſhmens poſſeſſion the lands of Galloway, & the lands of Dritſdale were in like maner recouered by one Kirpatrike. In the ſame yéere on the 20 day of October, was the battell of Poitiers fought, where Edward prince of Wales, otherwiſe named the Blacke prince, ouerthrew the armie of France, and toke king John priſoner, with his yongeſt ſonne Philip, and a great number of other of the French nobilitie beſides. There was at this battell with king John, the earle William Dowglas, & to the number of thrée thouſand Scots, hauing diuers knights and gentlemen to their capteins, of whome there died in the ſame battell Andrew Steward, Robert Gordon, Andrew Holiburton, and Andrew Haus, knights. The earle of Dowglas eſcaped with life and vntaken, but Archembald Dowglas, ſon to ſir James Dowglas ſlaine in Spaine, was taken priſoner; albeit his taker ſuffered him to depart for a ſmall ranſome, by reaſon that William Ramſey of Colluthie, who was alſo taken with him, made ſemblance as though the ſame Archembald Dowglas had béen ſome poore ſlaue, cauſing him to pull off his boots, and to do other ſuch drudging ſeruice, as fell not for the eſtate of a man of any eſtimation or honeſtie, to the end it ſhould not be knowne what he was.

Thus the king of England at one time hauing two kings vnder his captiuitie, ſat crowned betwixt them at meate in the feaſt of Chriſtmaſſe, making (as the vſe is) amongſt the Engliſhmen in that ſeaſon) a great banket. And this he did (as is reported) to the intent that the maner thereof might be bruted abroad to his high praiſe & glorious fame. King Dauid within certeine yeares after was conueied by the earle of Northampton vnto Berwike, where the moſt part of all the nobles of Scotland aſſembled togither to conſult with him touching ſome agréement to be had for his ranſome: but becauſe they could grow to no certeine point therein, he was brought backe againe to London, and there remained in priſon as before. In the meane time, Roger Kirpatrike was ſlaine by James Lindſeie, in a caſtell where the ſaid James dwelled, and receiued the ſaid Roger as his gheſt. This Lindſeie fled vpon the fact committed; but yet being apprehended and brought to the gouernor Robert Steward, he ſuffered death for that offenſe.

Shortlie after, that is to wit at Michaelmaſſe next inſuing, after king Dauid had béene at Berwike, there was an agréement made for his ranſome, whereupon being deliuered, he returned into Scotland, in the eleuenth yeare after his taking at Durham field. Dauid was alſo bound by couenant of agréement to race certeine caſtels within Scotland, which ſéemed moſt noiſome to the Engliſh borders: which couenant he performed. For vpon his returne into Scotland, he caſt downe the caſtels of Dalſwinton, Dunfreis, Morton, and Duriſdere. He alſo called a parlement, wherein he enacted ſundrie things for the puniſhment of them that fled from him at Durham field: and firſt for that his coſſine Robert Steward was one of them, being through means thereof a great cauſe of the ouerthrow, he procured that the act (by which the crowne was appointed for want of iſſue of his bodie lawfullie begotten, to deſcend vnto the ſaid Robert Steward) was vtterlie reuoked and diſanulled, and John Southerland the ſonne of Jane his yongeſt ſiſter, appointed heire apparant in place of the ſaid Robert. Not long after, king Dauid called an other councell, wherein (according to his promiſe made to the king of England before his deliuerance) he moued the lords and barons of Scotland in a matter whereof he wiſhed not to haue of them anie towardlie anſwer, and that was this: Whether they could be contented, that after his deceaſſe, the crowne of Scotland ſhould be tranſferred vnto the king of Englands ſonne, and to his lawfull heires? [Which thing Iohn Maior aſſigneth to the yeare 1363, who alſo ſaith, that it was this parlement (as he hath red) and done by the perſuaſion of Jane the queene, forgetting that he ſaid before, that ſhe died in the yeare 1357.]

The lords hearing what was proponed vnto them, anſwered without anie long ſtudie, that ſo long as anie of them were able to beare armour or weapon, they would neuer conſent thereto. King Dauid right toſull to heare them at this point, thought himſelfe diſcharged, for that he was not bound to labor further in this ſute, becauſe his promiſe made to the king of England touching this point, onelie was, that if the Scotiſh lords would agree, then he ſhould intaile the crowne to his ſonne. K. Dauid, after hir deceaſſe, maried a yong luſtie gentlewoman named Margaret Logie, daughter to ſir John Logie knight, but within three moneths after he repented him, for that he had matched himſelfe with one of ſo meane parentage, to the diſparagement of his bloud. Herevpon he baniſhed both hir, and all other that had counſelled him to marie hir, confining them for euer out of all the parts of his dominions. She hir ſelfe went vnto Auignon, where as then the pope with all his conſiſtorie remained, and entering hir plaint there in the court, followed the ſame with ſuch diligence, that in the end ſentence was giuen on hir ſide (that is to ſay) that king Dauid ſhould receiue hir againe into his companie, and to accept and vſe hir as his iuſt and lawfull wife. Thus ſhould the realme of Scotland haue run in trouble and danger of interdiction, had ſhe not departed out of this life by the way in returning homewards. ✻ Charles the fift ſurnamed the wiſe, being king of France (ſupported by the aids of Scots) prepared an expedition into the holie land, in which iornie, when a greeuous contention fell among the French and Engliſh, the laſt were ouercome by the firſt through the ſingular manhood of the Scots. Which benefit Charles not forgetting, erected an order of an hundred archers to be about his perſon, and by office to keepe watch and ward for him (in the night) within his court gates: which (vpon this originall) is obſerued with great ſolemnitie, euen in this our age.] K. Dauid in the meane time repared ſundrie places and ſtrengths of his realme, & built a tower in Edenburgh caſtell, bearing the name after him euen vnto this day, called Dauids tower. ✻ About this time (or rather more truelie as others haue before this written in the yeare of Chriſt 1356, or ſhortlie after the deliuerie of Dauid Bruſe from captiuitie as the third ſort do ſay) William Dowglaſſe being about to go on pilgrimage beyond the ſeas (at ſuch time as king John was preparing his hoſt againſt the Blacke prince) went with K. John vnto the foreſaid battell, being honored by his hands with the title of knighthood: but after, hauing manie of his men ſlaine, and being inforced to forſake the field, he returned home into Scotland. William Dowglaſſe ſhortlie after, vpon the deliuerie of Dauid Bruſe from the captiuitie of England, was created earle of Dowglaſſe. Much about which or at the ſelfe ſame time, the ſaid king of Scots aduanced William Ramſeie to the earldome of Fife, by the means of the wife of the ſaid Ramſeie, whom the king intirelie loued (as the report went.) The right of which countie king Dauid affirmed to be iuſtlie in him (ſo that he might liberallie giue it) as truelie veſted in his poſſeſſion by the forfeiture which Duncan ſometime countie of Fife had done in K. Robert Bruſes daies; in murthering of an eſquier called Michaell Beton, whome he miſerablie ſlue in a riuer for extreame diſpleaſure. Wherefore this William Ramſeie ſurmized that Duncan (to obteine pardon for his offenſe) did by indenture make Robert Bruſe K. of Scots his heire in reuerſion, if he died without iſſue maie. Yet had this Duncan a daughter (by his wife the counteſſe of Gloceſter, and daughter to the king of England) which was enterteined in England, and ſhould haue beene ſold to Robert the ſeneſchall of Scotland. But ſhe (rather reſpecting the ſatiſfieng of hir loue, than the honor of hir eſtate, rather chooſing to be a kings wife, than an earles ladie) toke to huſband one William Felton, a knight in Northumberland, which (at the ſaid time when William Ramſeie was made earle of Fife) challenged that earldome in the right of his wife, daughter and heire to the ſaid Duncan earle of Fife. But for anie thing that I can yet ſee, the ſaid Ramſeie went away with the honor thereof.]

Then was Robert Steward conueid to Scone, and there crowned with great ſolemnitie, and was called Robert the ſecond. This came to paſſe in the 47 yéere of his age, on our ladie day in Lent, called the Annuntiation, being the yéere of Chriſt 1370. Moreouer, that the firmer amitie & friendſhip might continue and be nouriſhed betwixt this king Robert and his ſubiect the earle of Dowglaſſe aforeſaid, it was accorded that Eufemie eldeſt daughter to king Robert, ſhould be giuen in mariage to James ſonne to the earle of Dowglaſſe aforeſaid. ¶ Thus ye may perceiue how the Stewards came to the crowne, whoſe ſucceſſion haue inioied the ſame to our time: queene Marie mother to Charles James that now that now reigneth, being the eight perſon from this Robert, that thus firſt atteined vnto it [of whoſe firſt originall and deſcent you ſhall ſée before in the life of Duncan.

He had to wife at the time of his atteining to the crowne, Eufemie daughter to Hugh earle of Roſſe, by whome he had two ſonnes, Walter and Dauid. But before he was maried to hir, he kept one Elizabeth Mure in place of his wife, and had by hir three ſonnes, Iohn, Robert, and Alexander, with diuerſe daughters, of the which one was maried to John Dunbar erle of Murrey, and another to John Leon lord of Glames. The earledome of Murrey continued in poſſeſſion of the Dunbars onelie during the life of this earle John & his ſonne, in whom the ſucceſſion failed touching the name of the Dunbars, in the inioieng of that earledome: for leauing a daughter behind him that was married to the Dowglas, the ſame Dowglas came by that meanes to the ſaid earledome of Murrey. King Robert after his coronation made ſundrie earles, lords, barons, and knights. Amongſt other, James Lindſey of Glenneſke was made earle of Crawford. His wife queene Eufemie deceaſſed the third yeare after hir husband atteined the crowne, and then incontinentlie he maried Elizabeth Mure [or Moore, daughter to ſir Adam Mure knight] his old lemman, to the end the children which he had by hir might be made legitimate by vertue of the matrimonie ſubſequent. Shortlie after, he called an other parlement at Perth, where it was ordeined, that after the death of king Robert, the crowne ſhould deſcend vnto John his eldeſt ſonne, and to his iſſue male; and for default thereof, vnto Robert his ſecond ſonne, and to his heires male; and for default of ſuch heires, to Alexander his third ſonne, and to his heires male, and in default of them, to remaine to his ſonne Walter, begotten on Eufemie his wife, & to the heires male of his bodie begotten: and if ſuch ſucceſſion failed, then it ſhould deſcend vnto his yongeſt ſonne Dauid the earle of Stratherne, and to his heires generall either male or female. And all the nobles of the realme were ſworne to performe this new ordinance touching the ſucceſſion of the crowne, and that in moſt ſolemne maner.

In the yére following, against the nert faire to be holden at Rorburgh aforesaid, the said earle of March, with his brother the earle of Murrey gathered a power of men secretlie togither, and comming to the said towne, toke it, slue all the Englishmen found within it, put their goods to the sacke, and after set the towne on fire, and so departed.

Herevpon the Englishmen shortlie after enter with an armie into Scotland, burning and doing much hurt vpon the lands of sir John Gordon, for that they ioined to the earle of Marches lands. Sir John Gordon verie desirous to reuenge this iniurie, came into England with an armie, and getting togither a great bootie of cattell, returned therewith homewards, but being incountered by the way at a place called Carran or Carram, by John Lilborne and other Englishmen, there was a sore fight betwirt them, the victorie for a time shewing it selfe so variable and vncerteine, that sir John Gordon was sore wounded, and the Scots were fiue times that day had in chase, and as oft got the like aduantage of their enimies. In the end the Englishmen were clearelie discomfited, and their capteine sir John Lilborne, with his brother and diuerse other brought prisoners into Scotland [the maner whereof Iohn Maior condemneth and laieth the fault of breach in earle Dowglasse.]

To reuenge these displeasures, Henrie Persie earle of Northumberland entered into Scotland with seuen thousand men, & comming vnto Duns, there pitched downe his tents; but the night following came the herds and other people of the countrie, hauing prepared certeine bagges made and sowed togither, of drie leather like to bladders, into the which they had put small peble stones, & running vp & downe about the place where the Englishmen were incamped, made such a noise with those bags full of stones, that the Englishmens horsses breaking their halters and bridles wherewith they were tied, ran from their maisters and keepers, and were scattered so abroad in the countrie, that the Scotishmen got hold of them, and so in the morning the Englishmen that had watched all night (for doubt to haue béene assailed by their enimies) perceiuing themselues set on foot, returned home without anie further attempt.

In the meane time, Thomas Musgraue capteine of Berwike, comming to the succours of the earle of Northumberland, chanced to méet with sir John Gordon vpon the way, by whom he was taken, and lead into Scotland as his prisoner. Neither had the Scots the better thus onelie on the east marches, but also on the west, where sir Io. Johnston had sundrie skirmishes with the Englishmen, and went euer awaie with the vpper hand. [All which before (vntill the death of Eufemie the quéene) Buchanan appointeth to the first two yéeres of the king, before the death of the quéene.] About this time, pope Gregorie the 11 sent a legat from Auignion to king Robert, forbidding him in any wise to meddle with the goods perteining to the church, after the decease of anie bishop, person, or vicar. [About this time happened the death of Edward the third, king of England. And Charles the fift king of France sent ambassadors into Scotland, to renew the old leage betweene the two nations, and to persuade him to warre vpon England, to the end the warres might thereby be withdrawne out of France: which was performed accordinglie.

On the 22 day of October, in the yére 1378, Dauid Steward was borne, which afterwards was made duke of Rothsaie, and on saint Andrews day nert following, towne of Berwike was taken by sir John Gordon, and sir or seuen other knights, but it was not long kept: for a number of English men entring by a posterne of the castell, recouered the towne easilie againe out of the Scotishmens hands. After this, William earle of Dowglas came with twentie thousand men to the faire of Pennire within England, and spoiled all the goods found as then in the same faire, and so returned with great riches into Scotland: but the Scotishmen smallie reioised at this gains, for with such cloth & other wares as they brought awaie with them from the foresaid faire, they drew into the countrie such a violent and sore pestilence, that the third part of all the people (where it came) died thereof. This was the third time that the pestilence was knowne to haue done anie great hurt in Scotland, being in the yére after the incarnation 1380.

The Englishmen [with the number of 1500, vnder the conduct (as saith Buchanan) of Talbot] to reuenge the displeasure done by the erle of Dowglas at Pennire, raised a great armie, and came with the same ouer Sulway, and inuading the Scotish borders on that side most cruellie, spared neither fire nor sword. In the meane time, the Scots gathered to the number of fiue hundred men, & stood in a streict till the Englishmen should come and passe by them, and then with such huge noise and clamor they set on the Englishmen, that in giuing backe there was foure hundred of them slaine, and a great number of the residue for hast drowned in the water of Sulway, and hereby was all the bootie of cattell & goods recouered againe by the Scots, and the most part of it restored to the owners. Charles the first as then French king, hearing of such prosperous aduenturs dailie chancing to the Scots, sent ouer his ambassadors vnto king Robert, exhorting him to follow his good fortune, and occasion thus offered to reuenge old iniuries against the Englishmen, now that their hearts séemed to faile them through losses susteined diuerse waies of late at the Scotish mens hands. An other cause of their message was also (as the Scots do write) to renew the old league & band betwirt Scotland and France, which being done in solemne wise according to the maner, they returned into France, & with them went ambassadors from king Robert vnto their master the said K. Charles, Walter Wardlaw, cardinall & bishop of Glascow, with manie other noble men, who in like maner there renewed the same leage & bond of friendship, to the high contentation of both the princes. In which yéere John Lion chancellor of Scotland was slaine by James Lindesay, earle of Crawford. This John Lion grew into so high fauour with king Robert, that he gaue to him his daughter the ladie Elizabeth in mariage, with diuerse possessions and lands, called Glammis. Of him the surname of the Lions is descended: and in memorie thereof, they beare in their armes the lion & lillies, with the tresse in forme and fashion as the king of Scotland beareth his, saue that their lions are placed in a blacke field. The cause why the earle of Crawford thus slue the chancellor, was onelie vpon enuie and spite, for that after he had maried the kings daughter, he atteined to such estimation and authoritie, that he might do all things with the king, according to his owne will and pleasure. For this offense the earle of Crawford remained in exile certeine yeeres after, and durst not returne home, till finallie through earnest sute made to

In the meane time, Edward king of England, the third of that name, departed this life, and Richard of Burdeaux, ſonne to the blacke prince Edward, that was ſonne to the ſaid king Edward, ſucceeded, in the fourth yeere of whoſe reigne, being after the birth of our Sauiour 1381, Iohn of Gaunt, duke of Lancaſter, with other Engliſh lords, came into Scotland in ambaſſage [to whome were appointed Iames earle of Dowglaſſe, and Iohn Dunbar earle of Murrey] to treat for the appeaſing of the diſcord as then continuing betwixt the two realmes: and in the end the matter was ſo handeled, that a truce was concluded to indure for three yeeres. As the ſaid duke was returning homewards, he was informed of the rebellion and inſurrection made by the commons of England againſt the nobles, hauing one Iacke Straw and others to their capteins, whereupon doubting to paſſe thorough his owne countrie till things were better appeaſed, he returned into Scotland, and was conueied by William earle of Dowglaſſe, and Archembald Dowglas lord of Galloway, to holie rod houſe beſide Edenburgh, where he remained till he heard that the rebels were ſuppreſſed, and their capteins ſlaine or taken, and put to execution.

As ſoone as the truce was expired, Archembald Dowglaſſe lord of Galloway, diſpleaſed in his mind that the Engliſhmen lieng in gariſon within the caſtell of Lochmaben, did dailie harrie and rob the villages and countrie townes of Galloway and Annandale, raiſed a great power by ſupport of the earls Iames of Dowglaſſe, and George of March, and therewith laid a ſtrong ſiege vnto the ſaid caſtell of Lochmaben, & hauing lien thereat the ſpace of nine daies, they fought with a number of Engliſhmen that came out of Carleill to reſcue this caſtell, whom hauing put to flight, they gaue therwith alſo a sharpe aſſalt to the caſtell, and put them within in ſuch feare, that ſir William Fetherſton then capteine thereof, and the reſidue conſented to yeeld the houſe vnto the Scots euen the ſame day without more adoo, vpon condition they might depart with their goods in ſafetie into England.

But Fourdon writing of the winning of this caſtell, ſpeaketh not of anie ouerthrow giuen to thoſe that ſhould come from Carleill, in maner as other write. For thus he ſaith. When Archembald Dowglaſſe had got knowledge that the ſame caſtell was vtterlie vnprouided both of men and vittels neceſſarie for the defenſe thereof, he aſſembled an armie togither, with the helpe of the earles of Dowglaſſe and Dunbar, who ioining with him, inuironed the caſtell about with a ſtrong ſiege, ſo that no ſuccour could enter to the reliefe of them within at anie hand. Hereupon the capteine ſir William Fetherſton knight, ſent letters vnto the lord wardens of the Engliſh marches, requiring aid, and letting them to vnderſtand in what danger he ſtood for lacke of men and vittels. The wardens wrote to him againe, that he ſhould do his beſt for eight daies to hold out; and if no ſuccour came within that terme, then to do as he ſhould ſee cauſe. Hereupon ſir William Fetherſton requiring a truce of the Scotiſh lords for the ſpace of thoſe eight daies, within which terme if no ſuccour came to remoue their ſiege, he would yeeld the caſtell vnto them, the liues and goods of them within ſaued. This was granted, and the Scots ceaſſed further to annoy them within by aſſalts: and when the ninth day was come, and no aid from England appeered, they receiued the caſtell into their poſſeſſion, according to the couenant. And ſo the Scots hauing thus woone the caſtell of Lochmaben, raced it quite downe to the earth.

King Richard hearing that the Scots had atchiued this enterpriſe, appointed the baron of Graiſtocke with a certeine number of men to go with vittels and munition vnto Rorburgh, for doubt leaſt if the Scots came to lay ſiege to that fortreſſe, and finding it vnprouided, they might peraduenture bring it into further danger than would lightlie be remedied. As this baron was come within a mile of Rorburgh, he was taken by the earle of March, and brought to Dunbar with all his prouiſion. The king of England being informed alſo of this miſhap, appointed two armies, one by ſea, and another by land, to inuade the Scots; the duke of Lancaſter hauing the generall charge and conduct of them both, who giuing order to them that ſhould paſſe by ſea what they ſhould do, entered himſelfe by land, and waſting the countries of March and Louthian, came to Edenburgh, and toke the towne. But whereas his ſouldiors would haue ſpoiled and burned it, he compounded with the inhabitants for a ſumme of monie, and ſo returned without doing anie more damage.

This earle of Dowglaſſe, one of the moſt valiant perſonages in thoſe his daies, within the whole realme of Scotland, died within his caſtell of Dowglaſſe, ſhortlie after he had atchiued this enterpriſe, and was buried in the abbeie of Melroſſe.

After his deceaſſe, his ſonne Iames, or (as ſaith Buchanan) William ſucceeded in the earledome of Dowglaſſe, a verie fierce and hardie knight, the which ſhortlie after appointed by the king to haue the guiding of an armie, he paſſed with the ſame into England, and burnt the countrie ſo farre as Newcaſtell. But being countermanded home, he returned and came vnto Perth, where he found the lord Iohn de Vian, admerall of France, and earle of Valentinois, who about the ſame time was arriued in Scotland with two hundred and fortie ſhips well and perfectlie furniſhed for the warres, and in them two thouſand and fiue hundred armed men, diuerſe of them being lords and barons, beſides gentlemen and others. Alſo there was amongeſt them 400 hagbutters (as Bellenden ſaith) and two hundred with croſbowes: the reſidue bare pikes, halberts, and ſuch like weapons. They were paied their wages for one whole yeere aforehand, and had brought vittels with them to ſerue them as long. They had brought alſo with them foure hundred paire of white curets, foure hundred halfe long ſwords, & fiftie thouſand franks, to be giuen among the nobles of Scotland, accordinglie as king Robert ſhould appoint and thinke expedient.

The admerall and other the nobles of France, being thus come into Scotland to make warres on the Engliſhmen, were highlie feaſted by the king and lords of the realme, as then preſent with him; and when the earle of Dowglaſſe was once come, by common conſent of them all there aſſembled togither in councell, it was ordeined that an armie ſhould be raiſed with all ſpeed, that ioining with theſe

Frenchmen they might passe immediatlie into England. The earle of Fife sonne to king Robert was appointed to be generall of this armie, hauing with him the earles of Dowglasse, and March, Archembald Dowglasse lord of Galloway, and diuerse other of the Scotish nobilitie. This armie when they were all togither, amounted to the number of fiftie thousand men, the which entring into England, tooke the castels of Warke, Fourd, and Cornewall. After this, by robbing and spoiling the countrie betwixt Berwike and Newcastell, they did much hurt in all parts where they came; but through continuall raine which fell as then in great abundance, they were constreined to returne into Scotland, where they pitched downe their field neere to the castell of Rockelburgh, purposing to haue assaied the winning thereof: but forsomuch as they could not agree in whose name it should be kept if it were woone, they left that enterprise. For the Frenchmen required that if they wan it, that then it might be kept by them, in the name and to the behoofe of the French king, whereunto the Scots would not agree.

Yet after this, the Frenchmen wishing to accomplish some other enterprise, went to the west borders, where ioining with Archembald Dowglas lord of Galloway, they passed ouer Sulway sands; and so entering into Cumberland, did wonderfull much hurt in that countrie. At length they determined to lay siege vnto Carleill, but being called from thence they returned into Scotland, and then (as some authors write) and not before, they laid siege to Rockelburgh, and raised from thence within eight daies after, by reason of the variance before alledged. At Allhallowentide next insuing, the Frenchmen returned into France, hauing indured no small trauell and paines, since their first comming forth of their countrie. After they were gotten a shipbord to returne homewards, the Scots againe enter into England with an armie, remaining there for the space of two moneths (as the Scotish writers say.) And in the meane time king Richard assembled a mightie power, and inuading Scotland, passed through the Mers and Louthian, putting all the townes, countries, and houses vnto vtter ruine, as in the English historie more plainlie may appeere.

They inuade Cumberland. The Frenchmen returne into France. King Richard inuadeth Scotland.

1387. In the yeere next insuing, Walter Wardlaw bishop of Glascow and cardinall, departed this life. Also within a while after that king Richard was returned backe into England, Robert Steward earle of Fife, with James earle of Dowglas, Archembald Dowglas lord of Galloway, entred into England with an armie of thirtie thousand men, comming so secretlie thorough the water of Sulway, that they came to Cokermouth in such speedie wise vpon the sudden, that the people had not leasure to conueie away their goods: so that the Scots remaining there for the space of three daies, got a rich botie togither, and returned with the same thorough the countries of Westmerland and Northumberland safe, and without incounter againe into Scotland. Amongest certeine other things, found in rifeling and ransacking of houses in this iournie, there was a charter found of certeine lands giuen by king Athelstane, in this forme: I king Athelstane giues to Paullane, Odhiam and Rodhiam, als guid and als faire, als euer yay mine waire, and yarto witnesse Mauld my wife. ¶ By tenure of which deed it may appeere, that our ancestors gaue more credit to the true meaning of a few words barelie expressed in their writings, than that there needed so long processe and circumstance as is now vsed with long studie of penning, nothing being thought sufficient to assure the parties of their couenanted bargaines, and concluded agreements.

1387. An armie of thirtie thousand Scots inuaded England by the west marches. Cokermouth taken vpon the sudden. The forme of an old deed of gift. The true meaning of men in old time.

In this last iournie against the Englishmen, William Dowglas bastard sonne to Archembald Dowglas lord of Galloway, wan great fame and honor for his high prowes and noble valiancie, shewed as well in certeine approches made vnto Carleill, as in diuerse other skirmishes elsewhere. The king also herevpon began to fauour him in such wise, that he thought him worthie of some high aduancement; and therevpon gaue him his daughter in mariage, named Giles, a ladie of such excellent beautie, as hir match in those daies was not to be found: [with whome for hir dowrie, he gaue the lands of Niddesdale.] He begat on hir a daughter, which was after maried to the earle of Orkenie. This William Dowglas (as Iohn Fourdon noteth) was of a blackish or swart colour, not ouercharged with flesh; but big of bone, a mightie personage, vpright and tall, valiant, courteous, amiable, full of liberalitie, merrie, faithfull, and pleasant in companie, but herewith he was of such strength, that whome soeuer he stroke either with mace, sword, or speare, downe he went were he neuer so well armed. At one time (as the same Fourdon saith) he hauing with him but eight hundred, fought against three thousand Englishmen, of whome two hundred he slue in the field, & brought fiue hundred prisoners with him into Scotland.

1388. In the yeere 1388, Robert earle of Fife, and Archembald Dowglas lord of Galloway, entered with a proud armie into England, and in the meane time came sundrie Irishmen by sea to the coasts of Galloway, and landing in diuerse places, fetched awaie great booties of cattell, and other goods of the inhabitants: whereof William Dowglas, sonne of the said Archembald being informed, got a conuenient power of men togither, by support of his brother in law, Robert earle of Fife, and by licence of the king passed ouer with the same, shipped in certeine vessels into Ireland, where being got on land, he laid siege to the towne of Carlingford. The townesmen doubting to be taken by assault, purchased a truce for certeine daies, promising to giue a great summe of monie to haue their towne saued: but in the meane time, they assembled the number of eight hundred men, through helpe of an other towne not farre off, called Doundalke, and ioining with them, they diuided themselues into two parts. One part set vpon Robert Steward of Durisdeir, who hauing the conduct of the earle of Fifes men, was gone abroad into the countrie to fetch in some preie: and the other part assailed William Dowglas, that lay still afore the towne.

Neuertheless, the said Robert and William receiued the enimies with such manhood, that they put them in both places to flight, and immediatlie after gaue assault to the towne, and entring the same perforce, put all the goods found therein to the sacke, and then set it on fier, and burned it to ashes. This done, they tooke three score ships which they found in diuerse hauens and creeks there on that coast, and fraughting fifteene of them with such spoile as they had got, they burned the residue, and then returning homewards, spoiled the Ile of Man by the way as they passed. Shortlie after their returne home, the king of England sent an armie into Scotland, which did much hurt in the Mers, in burning and ouerthrowing diuerse towers and houses. King Robert being certified hereof, as then remaining in the north parts of Scotland, assembled the nobles of his realme at Aberden: and there by all their aduises it was concluded, that the whole puissance of the realme should be raised with all speed, to reuenge those iniuries don by the Englishmen. Herevpon were two armies assembled, the one, wherein were fifteene thousand men, was committed to the gouernance of the earle of These two armies parting in ſunder at Jedworth, the earle of Fife with his people entered into Cumberland by the weſt marches, and the earles of Dowglas and March with theirs, entered on the other ſide into Northumberland, paſſing thorough the countrie, ſpoiling and waſting the ſame, till as farre as Durham: and on the other part, the earle of Fife ſpared neither fier nor ſword, all the way as he paſſed. At length both theſe armies met togither about a ten miles from Newcaſtell. Here the earle of Dowglaſſe choſe forth ten thouſand of the moſt able men that could be found amongeſt all the numbers, with the which he went to Newcaſtell, to trie if by anie meanes he might take the towne. There was gathered into Newcaſtell before his comming thither, the moſt part of all the choſen men from Yorke to the borders, with the earle of Northumberland, who by reaſon of extreme age was not able to ſturre abroad (anie thing to purpoſe) himſelfe, but he had with him two of his owne ſonnes, the one named Henrie, and the other Rafe, verie forward and luſtie gentlemen. Henrie Perſie deſirous to ſhew ſome proofe of his ſingular manhood, wherein he greatlie truſted, required to fight with the earle of Dowglaſſe man to man; which requeſt the earle granting, togither they ran, mounted on two great courſers with ſharpe grond ſpeares at the vtterance. The Engliſhmen that ſtood without the gates, made to the reſcue, recouered him on foot, and brought him forthwith backe into the towne. Incontinentlie hervpon, the earle of Dowglaſſe cauſed the aſſault to be giuen, and filling the ditches with haie and fagots, came with ladders to the wals: but the Engliſhmen ſo well defended themſelues, that the Scots were beaten backe, not without great loſſe and ſlaughter of their people.

¶ Froiſſard making mention of this enterpriſe thus made by the Scots, varieth ſomewhat from the Scotiſh writers in this place: for he ſpeaketh nothing that the Dowglaſſe and the Perſie ſhould thus run togither on horſſebacke (as before is ſpecified) but that in giuing aſſault to the towne, it chanced, that as the Engliſhmen defended their barriers without the gate, the Dowglas fortuned to be matched hand to hand with Henrie Perſie, and there by force plucked the Perſies ſtaffe from him, and in returning hoiſted it vp on heigth, ſaieng, he would carrie the ſame for his ſake into Scotland: and the next day after, he raiſed his campe and departed homewards towards the borders, & comming to a place called Otterborne, about twelue or foureteene miles from Newcaſtell, pitched downe his tents there, that his ſouldiors might take ſome reſt, & refreſh themſelues after their great trauell, for they had not reſted of all the day nor night before, nor to anie purpoſe, ſince their firſt entering into England.

In the meane time the Engliſh power was highlie increaſed at Newcaſtell, for a great number of the countrie came, and entered into the towne the ſame night that followed the day of the aſſault. Henrie Perſie then perceiuing his number ſufficient to fight with Dowglaſſe, ſet them in order of battell, & determined to iſſue forth vpon the Scots, and to giue them an incounter: but when he vnderſtood that they were gone homewards, he followed them with all ſpeed, for he would by no means that they ſhould paſſe into Scotland without battell, truſting to recouer the diſhonor which he had ſuſteined by loſing his ſtaffe at the barriers before the gate of Newcaſtell. Earle Dowglaſſe aduertiſed that the enimies were comming to giue him battell, exhorted his people with few words to remember their wonted manhood, that by gaining the victorie, they might win euerlaſting fame and honor, with ſafegard to themſelues and their countrie. The Perſie likewiſe for his part, incouraged his men, willing them to fight manfullie in reuenge of their iniuries done to them and their friends by the Scots, and herewith commanding the trumpets to ſound, he gaue the onſet fiercelie.

As ſone therefore as the moone began to appeare, they ioined againe with more malice than before. The Engliſhmen fought ſo egerlie, that putting the Scots backe, and cauſing them to giue ground, they had woone the Scotiſh ſtandards, and ſo by all likelihood got the vpper hand, had not Patrike Hepborne with his ſonne, & ſuch other of his companie as attended him, come to the reſcue, by whome the fight was begun afreſh. Herewith alſo came the earle of Dowglaſſe, and with a great mace in his hand laid ſuch ſore ſtrokes round about him, that none came within his reach, but downe he went.

The valiantie of the earle of Dowglaſſe.

* The ſaid Dowglaſſe the yonger, hauing with him Robert & Simon Glendoure, was (all which notwithſtanding) moſt grieuouſlie wounded, whom his friends (comming about to ſuccor) found then caſt vpon the ground, next vnto whome lay one named Hart moſt miſerablie wounded alſo. At what time a prieſt (which had faithfullie aſſiſted this Dowglaſſe in all diſtreſſe) did (now the bodie being faint and decaied) defend the ſame from other hurt of the aduerſarie. Dowglaſſe lieng in this eſtate, his neere friends (John Lindſeie, John and Walter Seintclere) came vnto him, demanding how he did. To whome he ſtoutlie anſwered (as one whome the preſence of death nothing diſmaied) that he was verie well; for ſaid he, I do not now die in my bed (by ſluggiſh deſtinie) but in the field, as almoſt all my anceſtors haue done. Wherefore, this ſhall be the laſt thing that I will require of you; firſt to keepe my death moſt ſecret, ſecondlie that you ſuffer not my ſtandard to be throwne downe, and laſtlie that you reuenge my death; the which if I may before hand by your promiſe hope to be performed, I ſhall with more patience indure all other things. Wherevpon they firſt ſeuered his bodie that it ſhould not be knowen; then they erected his ſtandard, crieng (as the maner is) A Dowglaſſe a Dowglaſſe. At which voice, there was ſo great a concurſſe of people, & ſuch a toſſull aſſault vpon the enimie; that forthwith they draue them from the place of the battell. For at the verie name

The Engliſh men put to flight.

Finallie, the whole number of the Scotiſhmen bare themſelues ſo manfullie, that the Engliſhmen being broken and put to flight, were ſlaine & borne downe. The chaſe continued till the breake of the day with killing and taking, as in ſuch caſes is euer ſéene, though the more part in déed were taken with their liues ſaued after they once fell in the chaſe.

There were taken in all of Engliſhmen, to the number of a thouſand and fortie, and ſlaine what in the field and chaſe (as Froiſſard recounteth) aboue an eightéene hundred. [But Buchan. ſaith, there were 1840 ſlaine, 1000 wounded, and 1004 taken.)

Fr. Thin. There were ſlaine but fiue hundred Engliſhmen as Hector Boetius ſaith.

But yet the Scotiſh writers themſelues report a leſſe number. Neither did this victorie chance to the Scots without great loſſe and ſlaughter. For amongſt other, the earle of Dowglaſſe himſelfe was thriſe ſtricken through the bodie, and alſo wounded ſo mortallie on the head, that being borne to his tent a little before the end of the battell, he died of thoſe hurts immediatlie after, to the great diſcomfort of all his armie, conceiuing more dolorous griefe for the loſſe of ſo worthie a chiefeteine, than ioy for the gaine of a great victorie.

The firſt aduancement of the Hepborns.

The houſe of the Hepborns (of the which this Patrike Hepborne that fought ſo valiantlie in this battell at Otterborne did deſcend) aroſe in Scotland after this wiſe.

It chanced in the daies of king Dauid the third, there was an Engliſhman of that name taken priſoner in Scotland, who by chance being in place where the earle of March was got vpon a yong gelding vnbroken, the which plaieng the vnrulie iade, in fetching and flinging aloft, put the earle in great danger of his life; and when all other that were preſent there gaue backe, and durſt not ſtep in to make anie ſhift to helpe the earle: this Engliſhman lept to him, and boldlie catching hold on the bridle reine, held the horſſe faſt, till the earle was ſafelie got beſide him. In reward of which benefit, the ſaid earle gaue vnto this Hepborne certeine lands in Lowthian, whoſe poſteritie increaſed afterwards in ſuch power of lands and ſurname, that the ſame inioied not onelie the earldome of Bothwell, but was alſo diuided into ſundrie branches, and manie knights thereof haue riſen of right worthie fame and eſtimation.

*Amongſt thoſe that fled to the battell, was Mathew Redman gouernor of Berwike, whom Iames Lindſeie (ſuppoſing by the beautie of his armor to be of the nobler ſort) did vehementlie follow by the ſpace of thrée miles. At the laſt, Redman perceiuing that he was not by flight able to eſcape (and déeming it better to hazzard his life, than otherwiſe to be ſlaine without aduenture) allighted from his horſſe to fight with his enimie on foot, which Lindſeie did accordinglie; in the end after a long conflict betweéne them, the Engliſhman (being as ſaith Buchanan inferior to the Scot in armor & weapon) did yéeld himſelfe to his aduerſarie. By whome (after that he had giuen an oth to returne at a certeine day) he was permitted to go at libertie. Such in thoſe daies was the humanitie amongeſt the borderers, and both nations towards their priſoners, which to this day doth continue betweene the inhabitants of thoſe places. But if anie do not returne at the day appointed, this puniſhment is ſet vpon him for a perpetuall diſgrace. That in the aſſemblies of true daies (to demand reſtitutions of things and iniuries done by the one nation vnto the other) they vſe that he which complaineth himſelfe to be deceiued by his priſoner (on his promiſe) doth carrie about a hand or gloue painted in a cloth vpon a long ſtaffe or ſpeare to be ſéene of all men; the which is accounted a ſingular infamie to the deſeruers thereof. For they which haue ſo broken their faith, be euer after hated of their friends and acquaintance; for which diſhoneſtie, they will not afford them good report or interteinment. Lindſeie hauing with this condition diſmiſſed his priſoner (and perceiuing a great number of armed men) made directlie towards them, not knowing that they were his enimies, vntill he had ridden ſo néere vnto them, that he could not withdraw himſelfe out of their danger. Theſe men were the bands of the biſhop of Durham, who when he came too late to Newcaſtell (to ioine with Perſie at the battell of Otterborne, becauſe he ſuppoſed that the enimies would not ioine vntill the nert day) commanded his armie to reſt there, and to fall to their ſupper. Shortlie after which, he tooke his iournie towards the Scots.

Lindſeie had a halberd, and Redman a ſword with a buckler which he caried at his backe. Io. Maior. lib. 6. cap 14.

Io. Ma. ſaith if they breake promiſe, the picture of him is tied to a horſſe taile and drawen about the borders of the countrie.

The biſhop of Durham goeth towards the Scots, accompanied with Thomas Lindſeie and Thomas Clifford.

But (before he was anie great way marched out of the towne) vnderſtanding (by thoſe that fled from Otterborne battell towards Newcaſtell) that Perſie was ouerthrowne, and had loſt the field, he returned with his friends to Newcaſtell, to conſult what he ſhould do againſt the enimie. At which time it was declared, that the nert day at the ſunne riſing, they ſhould all be redie in armor to ſéeke the Scots. According whereunto in the morning of the nert day, the inhabitants bordering thereabouts were aſſembled, who (with theſe that the biſhop had brought thither) were of all ſorts gathered togither, to the number of 10000 horſſemen and footmen. Theſe ſtirred the biſhops mind, that (with all ſpéed) hée ſhould lead them toward the Scots, and trie the ſucceſſe of battell, for the Scots (ſaid they) wearied with the former daies fight, and moſt of them wounded, will not be able to abide the ſecond batell. With which ſpéeches they perſuaded themſelues of an eaſie conqueſt. Whereupon the biſhop ſet forward with his armie, whoſe comming being vnderſtood by the ſcouts of the Scots, the erle of Murrey (whom now all men did follow after the death of Dowglas) called the preſent nobilitie togither to conſult what ſhould be done with the priſoners, whom they could not in iuſtice now kill (hauing receiued them vpon ranſome) but it would ſeeme a moſt cruell part: and to reſcue them (being their enimies, and almoſt an equall number to themſelues) it was a thing moſt dangerous. Wherefore it was concluded, that the priſoners ſhould ſweare, that they would not ſtirre whileſt the Scots and Engliſh were in fight; and further, that if the Scots were ouercome, and they (being now their priſoners) recouered from them, that yet they ſhould ſtill remaine priſoners vnto them as before, and ſo returne to them at a certeine day. Theſe things thus done, they left the priſoners in the campe, with a ſmall gard which ſhould execute a preſent reuenge vpon them, if they did at anie time ſeeme to attempt anie thing.

After this the Scots (full of the victories latelie obteined) afreſh deſcended into the battell, defended behind with the marches, and on the left and right ſide with the dead bodies of the former conflict: at what time it was alſo commanded that euerie one (as he did approch the enimie) ſhould blow the horne he caried about his necke (hanging at his backe) as lowd as he could, which ſound being of it ſelfe terrible, was in the echo (by reflexion of the hilles) ſo multiplied, that it forced the enimie to ſuppoſe the Scots to be of greater number than in truth they were. But before they entred into the battell (as ſaith Iohn Maior) George of Dunbar earle of March incouraged his ſoldiers with theſe words. We haue this night (moſt noble Scots) ſuſteined the chiefe heat and force of the battell, we haue ouerthrowne the youth and ſtrength of Northumberland with their two princes: for which there is no cauſe why we (after ſuch honor obteined againſt thoſe valiant princes) ſhould now feare this filthie prieſt. Trulie there remaineth nothing now for vs, but that euerie one of vs giue but two ſtrokes, becauſe the leader will flie at the third, and all the flocke will follow, ſince the ſhéepeheard ſtroken, the ſhéepe will be diſperſed. But if they ſhall ſo long contend with vs, that (as God moſt rightlie forbid) we chance to be ouercome, then ſhall we moſt ſhamefullie loſe the glorie which we before haue honorablie gained by this nights trauell. But contrarie, if we be men, and put on vs ſuch valiant hearts (as the preſeruation of honor requireth) we ſhall eaſilie teach this mitred prieſt, that it had béene farre more honor to him, ſafetie to his, and moſt commoditie to them all, that he had remained at home, with rods to correct vnbrideled and negligent ſcholers, than with ſword to enter battell againſt growne and bearded ſouldiers.

The maner of the Scots was, that going to battell they carie a horne about their necks like hunters, and in the battell incourage themſelues to fight with that, Io. Ma. li. 6. ca. 4. which I ſuppoſe was alſo the maner of the Engliſh (as may be by manie ſubſtantiall reaſons approued.)

This being ſpoken, and the Engliſh now come to the point to ioine with the aduerſarie, the Scots began the alarms with their hornes, whereupon the Engliſh hearing that terrible noiſe (vnaccuſtomed to them in ſuch multitude) remembring that they muſt fight in the middle of dead carcaſſes of their friends and kinred latelie ſlaine (a ſpectacle to diſcourage moſt valiant hearts) and ſomewhat abaſhed at the chéerefulneſſe of the Scots ſtanding againſt them (which they looked not for after the laſt battell) the Engliſh (I ſay) conſidering theſe things, retired towards the place from whence they came, and ſuffered the Scots to returne without anie other purſute againſt them. In the meane time, when Alexander Lindſeie (taken as before, and as yet priſoner in Newcaſtell) chanced to be ſéene and knowne by Redman (his yéelded priſoner) he was moſt courteouſlie (after congratulation of amitie betwéene them) ſuffred to depart frō Newcaſtell to Scotland.)

A parlement at Perth.

In the yéere following, a parlement was holden at Perth, in the which demonſtration was made by king Robert, that forſomuch as he was broken by great age, and might not through féebleneſſe occaſioned thereof attend to his office in gouernement of the realme, it was neceſſarie that ſome gouernor ſhuld be choſen; wherfore he required that his ſecond ſonne Robert earle of Fife might inioy that office, conſidering his eldeſt ſonne Iohn earle of Carrike (by reaſon of a ſtripe which he had receiued on the leg by an horſſe of ſir James Dowglaſſe of Dalketh) was not able to trauell, but kept his bed, and might ſturre no way forth abroad. The lords conſented to the kings requeſt, and ſo the earle of Fife was conſtituted gouernour of Scotland, by common conſent of all the lords of the realme [before which time (as ſaith Buchanan) they were called wardens and not gouernors.] Alſo the earle marſhall of England was ſent by king Richard to the borders, to remaine there as warden in the place of Henrie Perſie priſoner in Scotland. It is reported by the Scotiſh writers, that this earle ſhould make ſtout brags, that he would fight with the Scots the next time he met with anie power of them, whether he were like in number to them or not. But when it came to paſſe that Robert Steward the Scotiſh gouernor was entered into Northumberland with an armie, hée withdrew into places of ſafegard, and ſuffered the moſt part of the countrie to be harried and burned. In deed our Engliſh writers affirme, that the ſaid earle, hauing with him but fiue hundred men of armes, was not able to accompliſh anie notable exploit auailable againſt the great multitude of his enimies.

In the ſame yéere was a truce taken betwixt England and France, the Scots (if they would ſo agrée) being compriſed therein. Herevpon there came ambaſſadors forth of England, to vnderſtand what the king of Scots would determine in that behalfe. By whom it was anſwered, that he would with good will ſtand to the ſame truce according as it was concluded. Whileſt things paſſed thus in Scotland, Alexander Steward earle of Buchquhane burnt the cathedrall church of Murrey, the lanterne and ornament of all the north part of Scotland, vpon diſpleaſure conceiued againſt the biſhop of the ſame place. Whereat his father the king toke ſuch indignation, that when his ſonne the ſaid Alexander was brought to his preſence, he commanded him to be committed vnto ſtreict priſon, wherein he remained till after his fathers deceaſſe. The realme being in this maner brought to good tranquillitie, king Robert falling into great infirmitie and féebleneſſe, by reaſon of extreame age, without any maner of other accidentall ſickneſs, deceaſſed at his caſtell of Dundonald, the 19 day of Aprill, in the yéere after our redemption 1390, being as then aboue 75 yéeres of age, and haning reigned the ſpace of 19 yéeres, his bodie was buried at Scone before the high altar.

John Steward earle of Carrike admitted to the crowne.

Fr. Thin. Buchanan.

After the deceaſſe of king Robert the ſecond, his ſon Iohn Steward earle of Carrike was admitted to the crowne, which he receiued at Scone on the Aſſumption of our ladie. And forſomuch as Iohn was thought to be an vnfortunate name for kings, they changed the ſame, and called him Robert after his father, being now the third of that name. *But whether the ſame was ſo altered, either for the calamities which happened to the two Johns, the king of England and the king of France, or for the good ſucceſſe of the two former Roberts (Bruſe and Steward) had in the victories and gouernement of the realme: for their vertue in peace and warres: for their vniuerſall happineſſe in what they attempted:

Robert earle of Fife is choſen gouernor of the realme.

I will leaue vncerteine, hauing no certeintie deliuered thersof vnto me. This Robert the third rather lacked vices, than was beautified with anie extraordinarie vertues, for which cause he being king in name, his brother Robert was king in deed, as one vpon whome the whole gouernement did depend.

Iohn Ma. lib. 6. cap. 6. The king Robert did marrie Annabell (the daughter of Iohn Drummond) whome he receiued into his bed, rather for hir singular beautie, than the honor of hir parents, or for anie benefit that might grow to the common wealth by hir or hir aliance. In the begining of his reigne, a truce was taken betweene England and Scotland, for the space of three yéeres, which shortlie after was prorogued to the terme of foure yéeres.)

William Dowglas of Niddesdale chosen admerall by the lords of Prutzen.

About the same time William Dowglasse of Niddisdale was chosen by the lords of Prutzen, to be admerall of a nauie, conteining two hundred and fortie ships, which they had rigged, and purposed to set forth against the miscreant people of the northeast parts. But being appealed by the lord Clifford an Englishman (who was there likewise to serue with the foresaid lords in that iournie) to fight with him in a singular combat: before the day came appointed for them to make triall of the battell, the lord Clifford lay in wait for the Dowglasse, and vpon the bridge of Danzke met with him, and there slue him, to the great disturbance and stay of the whole iournie. Moreouer, shortlie after the coronation of king Robert the third, tidings came that Duncane [whom some call Daiech Steward] sonne to Alexander Steward the kings brother afore rehearsed, was entred into Angus with a great number of men, and slue Walter Ogiluie shiriffe of the countrie, that came forth with a power to resist him from spoiling the people, whom he miserablie afflicted; howbeit these his insolent doings were not long vnpunished. For the earle of Crawford being sent against him with an armie, caused him to disperse his companie, and to flée his waies; but being apprehended with the most part of his said companie, they were punished according to their demerits.

The north parts of Scotland sore disquieted by two clans.

At this time also the most part of the north countrie of Scotland, was sore disquieted by two clans of those Irish Scots, called Katerans, which inhabit the hie-land countries, the one named Clankaies and the other Clanquhattans. These two being at deadlie fude, robbed and wasted the countrie with continuall slaughter and reife. At length it was accorded betwirt the parties, by the aduise of the earls of Murrey and Crawford, that thirtie persons of the one clan, should fight before the king at Perth, against thirtie of the other clans men, with sharpe swords to the vtterance, without anie kind of armor or harnesse, in triall and decision of the quarell, for the which the variance betwirt them first arose. Both these clans right ioifull of this appointment, came to Perth with their number, where, in a place called the North inch, a litle beside the towne, in presence of the king and other iudges assigned thereto, they fought according as it was agréed, and that with such rage and desperate furie, that all those of Clankaies part were slaine (one onelie excepted) who to saue his life, after he saw all his fellowes slaine, lept into the water of Taie, and swam ouer, and so escaped. There were 11 of Clanquhattans side that escaped with life, but not one of them vnwounded and that verie sore. At their entring into the field or lists where they should fight the battell, one of the clans wanted one of his number, by reason that he which should haue supplied it, was priuilie stolen awaie, not willing to be partaker of so deare a bargaine. But there was a countrie-felow among the beholders, who being sore displeased with the matter, and loth that so notable a fight should be passed ouer, offered himselfe for a small summe of monie to fill vp the number, though the matter apperteined nothing to him, nor to anie of his friends. [This man (as saith Buchanan) séemed to be a saddle-maker, who for halfe a Frenchcrowne, and his diet during his life (if he were victor) toke the matter in hand, in which none behaued himselfe more valiantlie than he, on whose part the said eleuen did suruiue, himselfe making vp the number.] This battell was fought thus betwéene the two clans, in maner as is before remembred, in the yeere 1396.

In the third, or (as saith Buchanan) the second yéere after, a parlement was holden at Perth, wherin, besides diuerse constitutions and ordinances enacted for the aduancement of the common-wealth, the king made his eldest sonne named Dauid (that was then about eightéene yéeres of age) duke of Rothsaie, and his brother Robert (that was earle of Fife and gouernor of the realme, as before ye haue heard) he created duke of Albanie. These were the first dukes that had béene heard of in Scotland, for till those daies there was neuer anie within the realme that bare that title of honor. [Which virgin title (saith Buchanan of that honor) gaue neuer good successe to the maisters]. During the time that the peace continued betwirt the two realmes of England and Scotland, there were sundrie iustes and combats put in vre, and exercised betwirt Scots and Englishmen, for proofe of their valiant actiuitie in feats of armes, to win thereby fame and honor. But amongst the residue, that was most notable, which chanced betwirt Dauid earle of Crawford Scotish, and the lord Welles English.

Iustes and combats betwixt Scots and Englishmen.

It was agréed betwirt these two noble men, to run certeine courses on horsebacke, with speares sharpe grownd for life and death. The place appointed for these iusts was London bridge, and the day the thrée and twentith of Aprill, being the feast of saint George. At the place & day thus prefixed, they came redie to furnish their enterprise, and being mounted on their mightie coursers, they ran togither right egerlie. At the first course, though they atteinted, yet kept they their saddles without anie perill of falling. The people beholding how stiffelie earle Dauid sat without mouing, cried that the Scotishman was locked in his saddle. He hearing this, leapt beside his horsse, and verie nimblie mounted vp againe into the saddle, armed as he was, to the great wonder of the beholders. This done, he toke another staffe, & so togither they ran againe right fiercelie the second time, and yet without anie great hurt on either part: but the third time, the lord Welles was borne out of the saddle, and sore hurt with the grieuous fall.

And for bicause the earle of Crawford thus vanquished his aduersarie on saint Georges day, hée founded a chanterie of seuen priests to sing in our ladies church of Dundée, in memorie of S. George, which they did vnto our time, not without singular commendation of the said earle. After this, he remained thrée moneths in England, in sporting and feasting amongst the nobles, before he returned into Scotland, highlie praised of all estates for his noble port and great liberalitie there shewed amongst them. Not long after, one sir Robert Morlaie an Englishman, came into Scotland to trie his manhood in singular battell, with whome soeuer would come against him: he vanquished one Archembald Edmounston, and Hugh Wallase: but at length he was ouercome by one Hugh Traill at Berwike, and died shortlie after vpon displeasure thereof conceiued.

But at the laſt, being bewraied and knowen what he was, and therevpon brought to king Robert, he was right honorablie by him interteined: neuertheleſſe, knowing himſelfe depoſed from his roiall eſtate, he gaue himſelfe wholie to contemplation, till finallie he departed this world at Sterling, and was buried in the blacke friers there within the ſame towne, as the ſame Scotiſh chronicles vntrulie do report. In the yeere next inſuing, that is to ſay, 1400, king Robert, in conſideration of a ſumme of monie to him aforehand paid, contracted couenants of mariage to be had and made betwixt his ſonne the duke of Rothſaie, and the earle of Marches daughter. But Archembald earle of Dowglas, hauing indignation that the earle of March ſhould be preferred before him, by ſupport of the duke of Albanie, procured a councell to be called, in the which he found meanes to aſſure his daughter the ladie Margerie, or Marie (as ſaith Buchanan) vnto the ſaid duke of Rothſaie, & with all ſpeed went about to conſummate the mariage betwixt them, to put the matter out of all doubt. The earle of March perceiuing this dealing, came to the king, and required to know his pleaſure, if he minded to performe the couenants concluded, concerning the mariage betwixt the prince and his daughter, or not; making as it were a great complaint of that which was alreadie done to the breach thereof; and receiuing anſwer nothing agreeable to his mind, he departed in a great fume, not ſticking to ſay, he would be reuenged on ſuch vntruth yer it were long. Shortlie after he fled into England, leauing his caſtell of Dunbar well ſtuffed of all things neceſſarie for defenſe, in the keeping of his ſiſters ſonne named Robert Maitland. But when Archembald Dowglaſſe came thither in the kings name, and required to haue the caſtell rendered into his hands, this Robert Maitland obeied the kings commandement, and deliuered the houſe to the ſaid Dowglaſſe.

The occaſion of the falling out betwixt king Robert and the earle of March

The earle of March flieth into England.

The caſtell of Dunbar ſeized to the kings vſe.

George earle of March informed hereof, procured all his friends to conueie themſelues into England, and determined with himſelfe to do all the diſpleaſure and miſchiefe he might inuent againſt his owne natiue countrie. King Robert ſore dreading, leaſt by this earles procurement ſome trouble might hap to follow amongeſt his ſubiects [did (firſt confiſcating his goods) ſend] an herald at armes into England with letters vnto him, promiſing by the tenure of the ſame, not onelie to pardon him of all offenſes committed, but alſo to redreſſe all wrongs or iniuries which he had anie waies forth receiued, if he would returne into Scotland. And forſomuch as the earle of March refuſed this offer, the ſame herald according to inſtructions giuen him at his departure from king Robert, went immediatlie to Henrie king of England with other letters, earneſtlie deſiring him to cauſe the earle of March to depart out of his realme, & not to receiue anie rebels out of Scotland into his bounds, whereby the peace might be violated, which as yet remained betwixt the two kingdomes.

Sent letters alſo vnto the king of England.

King Henrie vpon reaſonable allegations (as he pretended) refuſed to ſatiſfie king Roberts petitions in this behalfe, by reaſon whereof the peace brake betwixt them and their ſubiects, without anie further tracting of time. For ſhortlie after, Henrie Perſie, ſurnamed (as is ſaid) Henrie Hotſpur, and the earle of March entered into Scotland, and got togither a great bootie of goods and cattell [in Louthian about Hadington, at what time they did in vaine beſiege the caſtell of Hais or Halis, who being at Lintone were come vpon by the Scots, for (to haue returne of the booties taken) Archembald earle of Dowglaſſe] hauing aſſembled a power of men, came with the ſame towards the enimies, immediatlie whereupon they fled to Berwike, and left all their bootie behind them, which being recouered by the ſaid earle of Dowglaſſe and his companie, he returned backe vnto Edenburgh, where he ſhortlie after being taken with an hot feuer, departed out of this life, leauing behind him an honorable memorie of his name, for his high proweſſe and noble valiancie ſhewed in manie and ſundrie enterpriſes, by him luckilie atchiued for the wealth of his countrie. He was named of his terrible countenance and dreadfull looke, The grim Dowglaſſe.

The deceaſſe of Archembald earle of Dowglaſſe.

After his deceaſſe, his ſecond ſonne that was called likewiſe Archembald, was made earle of Dowglaſſe; for his eldeſt ſonne William Dowglaſſe died in the yeere before his father. Shortlie after, Henrie king of England came into Scotland with an armie, without doing anie great damage to the people; for he required no more of them that kept anie caſtels or ſtrengths, but onelie to put forth a banner of his armes as he paſſed by. At his comming to Hadington, he was lodged in the nunrie there, & ſhewed much bounteous humanitie toward the nuns, and all other of that houſe, not ſuffering anie manner of thing to be done preiudiciall to the ſame. The like gentleneſſe he vſed towards them of the Holie rood houſe, at his comming to Edenburgh, wherein he likewiſe lodged. It is thought, that in memorie of the friendlie interteinement, which his father the duke of Lancaſter found in theſe abbeies, at the time of his being in Scotland, when the rebellion chanced in England, through Jacke Straw and his complices, he ſhewed ſuch fauour towards them at this preſent. To be briefe, it ſhould appeare, that king Henrie came into Scotland, as it were inforced, more thorough counſell of his nobles, than for anie hatred he bare towards the Scots, as he well ſhewed in returning backe againe, without doing them anie further iniurie.

Henrie king of England inuadeth Scotland.

[In the yeere after, or thereabout, died Walter Trailie biſhop of ſaint Andrewes, and the] Scotiſh queene Annabell Drommond, after whoſe deceaſſe hir ſonne Dauid the duke of Rothſaie, that vnder hir gouernment had beene well and vertuouſlie brought vp, hauing now got once the reine at libertie, fell to all kind of inſolent outrage, ſeeking to defile wiues, virgins, nuns, and all other kind of women, in all places where he came. At length, his father perceiuing his ſonnes youthfull nature to rage after that manner in vnbrideled luſt, beyond the bounds of all meaſure, to the great reproch of them both, wrote to his brother the duke of Albanie, requiring him to take his ſonne, the ſaid duke of Rothſaie into his cuſtodie, and to ſee him ſo chaſtiſed for his wanton behauiour, as he might learne to amend the ſame. ¶ Here is to be noted, that the duke of Albanie had of long time before, desired to see the duke of Rothsaie dispatched out of the way, as the person whome he most doubted; & therefore hauing commission thus from the king to take him, he reioised not a little, trusting thereby to compasse his purpose without danger. And hereupon taking the duke of Rothsaie betwixt Dundee & saint Andrewes, he brought him to Falkeland, where he shut him vp in streict prison, and kept him without all manner of meat or drinke, so to famish him to death.

The duke of Rothsaie committed to prison.

It is said, that a woman vnderstanding the duke of Albanies intention, and taking ruth of the others pitifull case, found meanes to let meale fall downe thorough a rift of the loft of that tower wherein he was inclosed, by meanes whereof his life was certeine daies susteined; but after this was once knowen, incontinentlie was the woman made awaie. On the same manner, an other woman through a long reed fed him with milke of hir owne breists, and was likewise dispatched as soone as hir doings were perceiued. Then after this, the duke destitute of all worldlie sustenance, thorough verie famine was constreined to eat not onelie all such filth as he could find within the tower, but also in the end he gnawed off his owne fingers, and so finallie in this miserable state of martyrdome (as I may call it) ended his wretched life, and was buried in Lundonis, where (as the fame went) manie faire miracles were done neere to his graue, till time that Iames the first began to punish the murtherers, for since that time such miracles ceassed.

The duke of Rothsaie famished to death.

About the same time, George earle of March did manie displeasures to the Scots, making sundrie rodes into their countrie, greatlie to his profit. The earle of Dowglasse that had the gouernement of Louthian in those daies, toke order, that certeine capteins of that countrie should euerie one of them for his turne, with a competent number for the time, make a rode into England, to reuenge such displeasures. The first that went, was Thomas Haliburton of Dirlington, who returned in safetie with a great preie taken of Englishmens goods. Next vnto him was Patrike Hepborne of the Halis the yonger, appointed to go forth as capteine generall with a certeine number, who entering into England, got a great bootie togither; but the Englishmen following therevpon to recour it, incountered with him at Nesbet in the Mers, and there not onelie slue him, but also distressed his people. Besides them that were slaine with their capteine, there were also manie that were taken, as John and William Cockborne, Robert Lawder of the Bas, John and Thomas Haliburton, with manie other. Almost all the floure of Louthian (as Iohn Maior writeth) perished in this battell, which was fought the 22 of June, in the yeere 1402.

Archembald Dowglas inuadeth England.

Archembald earle of Dowglasse sore displeased, and wonderfullie wroth in his mind for this ouerthrow, got commission to inuade England with an armie of ten thousand men, and hauing the same once readie with all things necessarie for his voiage, he set forward, and entering into England, burnt and harried the countrie, not staieng till he came as farre as Newcastell. In this armie there was with the Dowglasse, Murdocke eldest sonne to duke Robert earle of Fife, Thomas erle of Murrey, George earle of Angus, with manie other lords and nobles of Scotland. At the last, when they were returning homewards with a preie of infinit goods and riches, Henrie Hotspur, and George earle of March, with a great power of men met them, and assailed them so with such incessant shot of arrowes, that where the earle of Dowglas with his armie had the aduantage of an hill, called Homildon, he was constreined to forsake the same; and comming downe vpon the Englishmen, was neuertheless put to the worsse, the most part of his people being either taken or slaine. It is said, that after the Scots were once put to flight, they gathered againe, and renewed the battell by the exhortation of Adham Gordon, & sir John Swinton, but that did little auaile them, for they were still beaten downe and slaine. Among other of those that were slaine, were the same sir John Swinton, and Adham Gordon: also John Leuinston of Kalender, Alexander Ramsaie of Dalhousie, with sundrie other gentlemen & nobles of Scotland.

Archembald earle of Dowglas, Murdocke Steward eldest sonne to duke Robert the gouernour, George erle of Angus, Robert Erskin of Galloway, the lord Saulton, James Dowglas maister of Dalkeith, and his two brethren John and William, with the most part of all the barons of Fife and Louthian, were taken prisoners. This battell was fought on the Rood day in haruest, in the yeere 1403, vpon a Tuesday. Henrie Persie verie proud of this victorie, came with the earle of March vnto the castell of Cockclauis in Teuidale, and laied siege to the same, but John Greinelow capteine thereof defended it so manfullie, that they got no great aduantage; yet at length he fell to this composition with them, that if he had no rescue within the space of three moneths [or (as Buchanan saith) fiftie daies] the castell should be then rendered into their hands. When the gouernour of Scotland was informed what agreement the capteine of Cockclauis had made, he assembled the lords in counsell to haue their aduise for the leauieng of an armie against the time appointed. There were manie of this opinion, that it was better to lose the castell, than to ieopard the liues of so manie men as were necessarie to furnish that enterprise for the sauing of it. But the gouernour shewed, that he weied the losse of it so much, that if none of the nobles would passe with him to the rescue thereof, yet he would go himselfe to do what in him might lie to saue it. But in the meane time, such trouble rose in England, that there needed no power to be leauied for the defense of Cockclauis. For by a conspiracie practised against king Henrie, certeine of the English nobilitie were alied togither to haue destroied him, but amongest the residue, the Persies were as chiefe.

They fought togither at Shrewesburie a verie bloudie battell, where the king got the victorie, and slue the lord Persie, surnamed (as before ye haue heard) Henrie Hotspur. At this battell was also the earle of Dowglas, with a great companie of Scotishmen on the Persies side, for being taken prisoner at the battell of Homildon (as before is said) it was accorded betwixt him and the said Henrie Hotspur, that aiding him & other his complices against king Henrie, if it chanced the said king Henrie to be vanquished and put from the crowne, according to their intent and purpose, then should the said earle Dowglas be released of his ransome, and haue the towne of Berwike rendered vnto him in reward of his aid and assistance. He fought (as is reported) with singular manhood, and had the fore ward on the Persies side. He slue that day with his owne hands, three gentlemen arraied in the kings cote armour; and finallie when the battell was lost, he was taken in the chase, and saued aliue, where not one more of all his retinue of Scots escaped with life, but were all slaine out of hand. Neither was this victorie gotten by king Henrie, without great slaughter of those that were on his part, for he lost foure verie valiant knights, as Staluart, Blunt, Wallie, and Pottoke, with seuen hundred other souldiers and men of war (as King Henrie (as the ſame Scotiſh writers do record) vſed the counſell & aduiſe of the earle of March, in the obteining of this victorie, being fled latelie before from the rebels ſide to him. The earle of Dowglas, in reſpect of his noble parentage and high valiancie, was verie tenderlie cheriſhed by king Henrie, who for that he had ſeene him do ſo valiantlie in the day of that battell, reputed him worthie of all honor. The earle of Dowglas yet was verie infortunat in moſt of his enterprizes, ſo farre forth, that he neuer wan battell wherein he chanced to be, and was therefore named Archembald Tinneman; though there were no default to be found at anie time in his owne perſon, for he euer fought with great manhood. At the battell of Hommildon he loſt one of his eies, and at this battell of Shrewesburie he loſt one of his ſtones. The old earle of Northumberland, hearing what euill ſucceſſe his ſonne and other his kinſmen had found in their rebellious enterprize at Shrewesburie, with one of his nephues (that was his ſonnes ſonne) and other of his friends and kinſmen, withdrew into Scotland, where he was receiued by Henrie Wardlow biſhop of ſaint Andrewes, and lodged with him at his eaſe and in good ſuertie within his caſtell of ſaint Andrews aforeſaid.

About the ſame time, king Robert was aduertiſed, that his ſonne the duke of Rothſaie was pined to death in Falkland (in manner as before is expreſſed) which newes were ſo greeuous vnto him, that he grew each day more and more in ſorow and melancholie. The duke of Albanie kept it ſo long as was poſſible from the kings knowledge, and being now ſent for by the king to anſwer him for ſuch treaſonable ſlaughter of his ſonne, he came, and ſo excuſed the matter with a faire painted tale, as though he had beene nothing guiltie in the cauſe, and for further declaration of his innocencie, he promiſed (if it might pleaſe the king to come vnto Edenburgh) he would bring in the offendors which were culpable of the murther. The king as then remaining in Bute (where for the moſt part he euer ſoiourned) though he were not well able to trauell by reaſon of long ſickneſſe, yet in a chariot he came vnto Edenburgh, vpon the earneſt deſire he had to ſee his ſons death puniſhed. And at his comming thither, the duke of Albanie deliuered vnto him certeine naughtie perſons, & ſuch in deed, as for their heinous acts and vngratious conditions deſerued well to die (though not for this matter) which neuertheleſſe by vntrue ſuggeſtions and forged accuſements, being brought before corrupt iudges (and ſuch as the duke of Albanie had prouided for his purpoſe) were condemned as giltie of his death, whome in all their life time they neuer ſaw.

Though this matter was handled as finelie as was poſſible, and made ſo ſound and cleare as could be deuiſed; yet was not the king ſo ſatiſfied in his mind, but that he had a great ſuſpicion in the duke of Albanie as author of his ſonnes death: but for ſo much as the duke had all the realme vnder his obeiſance, partlie by policie, and partlie by authoritie of his office, being gouernor thereof, the king durſt not attempt anie thing againſt him, but rather doubted, leaſt he hauing an ambitious deſire to the crowne, would compaſſe alſo to haue the life of his ſecond ſonne (named James) as then prince of Scotland; and therefore by the faithfull helpe & good aduiſe of Walter Wardlaw the biſhop of ſaint Andrews, he prouided a ſhip, and ſent the ſaid prince forth in the ſame to paſſe into France to K. Charls the firſt, deliuering him alſo a letter written and directed vnto the king of England in his fauour, if he chanced at vnwares by anie fortune to fall into the Engliſhmens hands.

The king ſendeth away his ſonne the prince.

Henrie lord Sinclare, the ſecond earle of Orkeneie, was appointed to haue the conueie of him, who hauing all his purueiance readie, tooke the ſhip that was appointed for them at the Baſſe, where it late at anchor, and loſing from thence, they ſailed forward till they came to Flamburgh head, where (as ſome ſay) they were taken on the ſea by Engliſhmen, the which hearing how the prince of Scotland ſhould paſſe that waies, laie in wait for him. Others write, that his deſire was to be ſet on land there, becauſe he might not awaie with the aire of the ſea, being brought far out of quiet in his head & ſtomach therewith. But how ſoeuer it was, the truth is, taken he was in the ninth yeare of his age, the 33 day of March, in the yeare of our incarnation 1406, and was kept in captiuitie of the Engliſhmen by the ſpace of eightéene yeares. At his comming to the preſence of king Henrie, he deliuered to him the letter directed from his father king Robert, the tenor whereof here inſueth, as in the Scotiſh toong they be written.

James prince of Scotland taken by the Engliſhmen. H.B. 1404.

The tenor of the ſaid letter as it is written in the Scotiſh toong.

RObert king of Scots to Henrie king of England greeting. Thy great magnificence, humilitee, and iuſtice, are right patent to vs, by gouernance of thy laſt armie in Scotland; howbeit ſike things had beene vncerteine to vs afore. For though thou ſeemed as enemie with moſt awfull incurſions in our realme: zit we found mair humanities and plaiſures than damage (by thy cumming) to our ſubdittes. Specialie to yame that receiuit thy noble fader the duke of Longcaſtell the time of his exill in Scotland. Wie may not ceis yairfore, wuhile wee are on life, but aye luyf and loif thee as maiſt noble and worthie prince, to ioys thy realme. For yocht realmes and nations contend amang themſelfe for conqueſts of glorie & launds, zit na occaſioun is amang vs to inuade athir realmes or lieges with iniuries, bot erar to contend amang our ſelfe, quhay ſall perſew othir with maiſt humanitee and kindneſſe. As to vs we will meis all occaſion of battell, quare any occurres at thy pleaſure. Forther, bycauſe we haue na leſſe ſollicitude in preſeruing our childzen fra certaine deidlie enimies, than had ſometime thy noble fader, we are conſtreined to ſeeke ſupport at vncowth princes hands. Howbeit, the inuaſioun of enimies is ſa great, that ſmall defenſe occurres againſt yame without they by preſerued by amitie of nobill men. For the warld is ſa full of peruerſit malice, that na crueltie nor offenſe may be deuiſit in erd, bot the ſamine may be wrought be motion of gold or ſiluer. Heirfore, becauſe we knaw thy hyneſſe full of monie, noble vertues, with ſike puiſſance and riches, that na prince in our daies may be compared thairto: we deſire thy humanitee and ſupport at this time.

We traiſt it is not vnknowen to thy maieſtie, how our eldeſt ſonne Dauid is ſlaine miſerablie in priſoun be our brothir the duke of Albanie, quhome wee cheſit to be gouernour (quan we were fallen in decrepit age) to our ſubdittes and realme, beſeekand thy hienes thairfore to be ſa fauorable, that this bearer James our ſecond and allanerlie ſonne may haue targe to liefe vnder thy faith, and iuſtice, to be ſome memorie of our poſteritie, knawand the vnſtable conditioun of mans life ſa ſodanlie altered: now fluriſaund, and ſudenlie falling to vtter conſumptioun. Forthir beliefe well, quhan kings and princes hes na other beild bot in thair awin folks, thair empire is caduke and fragill. For the minds of common people ar euir flowand and mair inconſtant than wind. Zit quen princes ar roborat be amitee of othir vncowth kings thair brethir and nighbouris, na aduerſitie may occurre to eiect thaim fra thair dignitie riall. Forthir gif thy hienes thinke nocht expedient (as God forbeid) to obtemper to thir owr deſires; zit we requeſt ane thing quhilk was ratifiſt in our laſt trewes & conditioun of peace, that the ſupplicatioun made be ony of the two kings of Ingland and Scotland ſall ſtaund in manner of ſaufeconduct to the bearer. And thus we deſire to be obſeruat to this our allanerlie ſonne, and the gratious God conſerue thee maiſt noble prince.

After that king Henrie had cauſed theſe letters to be opened and read, he aduiſed himſelfe thereon with great deliberation; but in the end, he determined to ſtaie this James prince of Scotland as his lawfull priſoner, for that he was thus taken in time of warres, and that moreouer, there were diuers rebels of England ſuccored within the bounds of his fathers dominion, to the high diſpleaſure of the ſaid king Henrie. But ſuch was the fauour ſhewed in his bringing vp, that his captiuitie turned more to his honor, profit, and commoditie, than anie other worldlie hap that might by anie means haue otherwiſe chanced vnto him. He had ſuch perfect inſtructors to teach him, aſwell the vnderſtanding of tongs as the ſciences, that he became right expert and cunning in euerie of them. He was taught alſo to ride, to run at the tilt, and handle all kind of weapons conuenientlie to be vſed of ſuch a perſonage, whereunto he was ſo apt and readie, that few in anie point of actiuitie might ouermatch him. He had good knowledge in muſike, and could plaie on ſundrie inſtruments right perfectlie. To be briefe, it appeered in all his behauiour and maners, in what companie ſo euer he came, that his bringing vp had beene according to his nature, neither of them differing from his birth, and the qualitie of a noble and moſt vertuous prince.

After it was ſignified vnto his father king Robert, as he ſat at ſuper, that his ſonne was thus arreſted in England, he made full great and dolorous mone, ſore lamenting that euer he matched himſelfe in mariage with a woman of ſo meane degree (to the diſparagement of his blood) as was queene Annabell, on whome he begat his ſonnes, which (as he tooke it) was the onelie cauſe why aſwell forraine princes as his owne ſubiects had him thus in contempt. He tooke this matter ſo ſore to hart, that within three daies after the newes came vnto him, he departed this world through force of ſickneſſe, now increaſed by melancholie, which had vered him a long time before. He died at Rothſaie in the ſirteenth yeere of his reigne complet, and from the incarnation 1408. His bodie was buried at Paſleie, with his wife queene Annabell before rehearſed. He was a man of a mightie ſtature, verie liberall and gentle, ſo that if he had not beene maimed with a horſſe, and thereby grew lame, that he might trauell about the affaires of the realme himſelfe, it was thought the common-wealth ſhould haue proſpered vnder his gouernement, as much as euer it did vnder anie of his predeceſſors.

The gouernor Robert duke of Albanie, after the deceaſſe of his brother king Robert, was by new election choſen, or rather confirmed in his office of gouernor, which he exerciſed more vprightlie, & with better iuſtice now after his brothers death, than before. [For (as ſaith Buchanan) take away from him, that he was ouermuch blinded with deſire to gouerne (whereunto he cared not by anie means to aſpire) there were in him manie other good parts worthie to haue ſuch gouernement: for he was valiant in battell, wiſe in counſell, he did decide matters of controuerſie with great equitie, he wan the nobilitie with his liberalitie, and did not ſucke the commons drie by exactions.] In the meane time, the caſtell of Jedworth (which the Engliſhmen had held euer ſince the battell of Durham) was taken by Tiuidalemen, and raced downe to the earth. Archembald earle of Dowglaſſe, as yet remaining captiue in England, after he had knowledge of king Roberts death, made ſhift to agree for his ranſome, and ſo being ſet at libertie, returned with all ſpeed now at length into Scotland.

The earle of Dowglaſſe is releaſed and returneth into Scotland.

Shortlie after, there was a councell called, wherein was a motion made for the reſtoring of George earle of March to his countrie, lands, and bloud. After long debating of the matter, and hard hold to and fro both with him and againſt him, it was in the end concluded, that he ſhould returne into Scotland, and be receiued as a true Scotiſhman; but vnder this condition, that he ſhould forgo his lands of Annerdale, and Lochmaben, which ſhould for euer remaine to the Dowglaſſe, and to his heires. All his other lands and poſſeſſions, it was accorded, that he ſhould inioy as in his former right & eſtate. And thus was the earle of March pardoned of all paſſed offenſes committed againſt the crowne of Scotland, and returned home, to the great comfort of his friends.

* Perſie that before was fled into Scotland to the erle of March his old friend, was courteouſlie receiued, interteined, & nouriſhed according to his eſtate, by the ſaid earle of March: during which time, he ſollicited his friends in England to find means for returne into his countrie. And amongſt other of his friends, with whom he dealt by ſecret meſſengers; he directed letters concerning the ſame, to an old (and as he deemed a moſt faithfull) friend of his, called Rafe Rokſbie, declaring vnto him that he ſhould not want friends, both Scotiſh & Engliſh (through whoſe helpe he did not deſpaire to recouer his patrimonie) if he might haue his aid alſo therein, for this Rafe was ſhiriffe of Yorkſhire. This man, after he had intiſed Perſie (vnder the aſſurance of falſe hope and truſt in him) to come into England, he opened the conſpiracie to the king, and ſecretlie laid wait to intercept the ſaid earle, by which meanes, (getting him into his poſſeſſion) he cut off his head, and ſent it to the king to London. This counterfeit king yet boaſting him to be of the princelie bloud, was honored accordinglie; after certeine yeares, and at length (feining himſelfe to be far from all deſire of gouernement, to the end he might worke his effect the more ſafelie) he died and was buried in the church of the frier Dominicks in Sterling, with a title of the king of England grauen vpon him.)

Rebellion moued by Donald of the Iles.

About the ſame time, there roſe great trouble in Scotland, by the rebellion of Donald of the Iles, who claming by right of his wife, a title to the earldome of Roſſe, was defeated of the ſame, by the practiſe of the gouernor, hauing by ſubtill conueiance, aſſured the ſaid earldome vnto his ſecond ſon the earle of Buchquhane named John. The foreſaid Donald, by way of ſupplication, beſought the gouernor to doo him reaſon; but he receiued nought, except it were froward ſpéech, wherewith he toke ſuch diſpleaſure, that raiſing all the power of the Iles he came into Roſſe, and ſubdued the ſame at his pleaſure. ✻ The which to make the matter more plaine, and to deduce his title out of Leſleus (which he forgetteth not to report for the honor of his owne houſe) I will ſet the ſame downe in this maner.

Donald ſubdued Roſſe. Fr. Thin. Leſleus lib. 7. cap. 268.

Walter Leſle a noble man, after ſingular proweſſe ſhewed by him (in externall battell) vnder the Romans, returned with honor into Scotland, where he maried the daughter of William earle of Roſſe, (ſlaine at the battell of Halidon) and with hir obteined the earldome of that prouince, of which wife he raiſed one ſonne called Alexander, after earle of Roſſe; and one daughter giuen in mariage to Donald of the Iles. This Alexander ioined himſelfe in mariage with Eufemie the daughter of Robert the gouernor, and had by hir one onelie daughter and heire chriſtened after the name of hir mother, who (after the death of hir father, being yet a tender maid and vnpractiſed in the courſe of things) was partlie by the flatteries, and partlie by the threats of the gouernor, induced to giue the earldome of Roſſe vnto him, by whoſe helpe, as it was reported, ſhe ſhortlie after died. Whereupon, Donald that had to wife the ſiſter of Alexander Leſle (aunt to this Eufemie which ſold hir inheritance) demanding the erldome of Roſſe by right of inheritance (as is ſaid) by his wife, entered Roſſe, and brought it to his ſubiection.) But not being ſatiſfied with this, he paſſed through Murrey, Boghtuall, and other bounds thereabouts, till he came vnto Garioch, purpoſing to burne Aberden.

The earldome of Roſſe tranſferred from the line of Walter Roſſe to the Stewards.

The earle of Mar.

But Alexander Steward earle of Mar, hauing gathered a power with all diligence to reſiſt this Donald, met with him at a village called Harlow, & incontinentlie not ſtaieng for more aid that was comming towards him, ſet on the enimies more raſhlie than orderlie, and more fiercelie than diſcreetlie, not paſſing for keeping anie accuſtomed arraie of battell, as had béene requiſit. By reaſon whereof, great ſlaughter was made on either part, the victorie in the end being ſo doubtfull, that both parts were faine to withdraw out of the field, and flée to the next mounteins, as glad to be ſeuered the one from the other. There was ſlaine on Donalds part nine hundred men, with Makclane, and Makinthos. On the earle of Marres ſide, there died Alexander Ogiluie ſhiriffe of Angus, with ſeuen knights of name, and diuers other gentlemen, with commons, to the number of ſix hundred. This battell was ſtriken on ſaint James euen, in the yeare 1411. Donald of the Iles, after this bickering wholie granted the victorie to his enimies, in fleeing all the night long after the battell towards Roſſe, and from thence with like ſpéed he paſſed ouer into the Iles.

In the yéere next following, the gouernor prepared to make a iournie into the Iles, to chaſtiſe the foreſaid Donald; but he through feare of further damage, ſubmitted himſelfe, and was ſworne neuer to procure anie trouble to the realme in time to come. Not long after the battell of Harlow, Patrike Dunbar, ſecond ſonne to the earle of March, with one hundred of hardie perſons, came earlie one morning somewhat before the breake of the day to Faſt caſtell, and wan the ſame, taking the captaine priſoner, whoſe name was Thomas Holdon. At the ſame time was the bridge of Rorburgh broken downe, and the towne burnt by William Dowglaſſe of Drumlanerik, Gawan Dunbar another of the erle of Marches ſonnes, and diuerſe others. In the ſame yéere (or rather in the yéere before) the vniuerſitie of ſaint Andrews was firſt founded, which afterwards was furniſhed with diuerſe notable learned men brought in and placed there by James the firſt, to the end that by their inſtructions his people might increaſe in learning, to the further aduancement of vertue, laudable maners, and all ſorts of ciuill cuſtomes. Amongeſt ſundrie other expert men in all ſciences which he brought into Scotland, there were 18 doctors of diuinitie, & 8 doctors of the canon law.

✻ From this time by the ſpace of ten yeares (ſaith Buchanan) there was almoſt nothing done worthie of memorie, betweene the Scots and the Engliſh, either bicauſe the truce occaſioned it (which yet I find not mentioned of anie man) either for that Henrie the fourth, king of England, being dead, and his ſonne Henrie the fift reigning in his place, and being all the time of his gouernement buſied in the warres of France, the Engliſh ceaſſed to offer iniuries to the Scots: or for that the gouernor of the Scots durſt not moue anie thing againſt the Engliſh, fearing leaſt the K. of England would then returne home the right and true heire of Scotland, who (he was moſt aſſured ſhould find fauour againſt him) in the hearts of his owne people, that would tenderlie pitie the miſfortune of his impriſonment, and ſeeke to eſtabliſh him in the kingdome. Wherefore if there were anie thing done in that meane time, they were but ſome few and ſmall excurſions within the realme, which more aptlie might be called robberies & ſpoiles, than anie right wars. For as Pennure in England was burned by Archembald Dowglas, ſo (to anſwer the ſame) Dunfreis in Scotland was in the like order deſtroied by the Engliſh. Beſides which there was a certeine exchange of priſoners of the one nation with the other: for Murdac the ſonne of the gouernor (taken at Halidon) was returned into Scotland, and Perſie (who was brought out of England by his grandfather into Scotland, and left vnder the protection of the gouernor) was deliuered to the Engliſh, and after by the new king of England was reſtored to the title & lands of his anceſtors earles of Northumberland.

This man (though by the lawes of armes he was no captiue) yet the vniuſt deteining of James the ſonne of the king of Scots ſtopped the mouths of the Engliſh, that they could not complaine of anie iniurie done in deteining him. The doing whereof ſo little offended this Perſie, that while he liued, he did (with all kind of courteſie) giue witnes of the humanitie ſhewed vnto him by the Scots. Not much different from this time, came two ambaſſadors into Scotland, the one from the councell of Conſtance (whereof the chiefe was the abbat of Pontineac) and the other was from Peter de Luna, who did ſtiflie reteine and defend the papaſie, whereof he had once gotten poſſeſſion, which Peter by the trauell and perſuaſion of Henrie Hardine (an Engliſh man, and a Franciſcane frier) had drawne the gouernor of Scotland to follow his faction, which yet ſucceeded to none effect: bicauſe the vniuerſall companie of the cleargie ſtiffelie labored againſt it, and did ſubſcribe to the depoſition of Peter, and to the councell of Conſtance for the election of Martine the fift to the papaſie.

The earle of Stratherne ſlaine.

Much what about the ſame time, John Drummond ſlue Patrike Graham earle of Stratherne, by traitorous meanes, and thereupon fled into Ireland: but as he was about to haue paſſed from thence ouer into England, the veſſell wherein he ſailed, was driuen on the coaſt of Scotland, where hee was taken, and afterwards loſt his head for the ſaid offenſe. Shortlie after alſo, there roſe great warres betwixt England and France, as in the hiſtories of thoſe realmes may more plainlie appeare. There was alſo a great rebellion raiſed in Wales, againſt Henrie the fift king of England, which was the ſon of Henrie the fourth latelie deceaſſed. ¶ We find in the Scotiſh chronicles, that this Henrie the fift, at his returning forth of France, after his firſt iournie thither (hauing in the ſame wone the towne of Harflet, & diſcomfited the whole power of France at Agincourt) was conſtreined to go againſt the Welſhmen, and incountering with the prince of Wales, was diſcomfited, and loſt ten thouſand of his men: but after this, he reinforced his power, and came againe into Wales, not ceaſſing till he had brought the Welſhmen ſubiect at his pleaſure: but the Engliſh writers make no mention of anie ſuch matter.

Whileſt things paſſed thus in England, William Haliburton wan the caſtell of Warke, and ſlue all ſuch as he found within it, howbeit ſmall while indured the ioy of this fortunate ſucceſſe to the Scots: for ſundrie Engliſhmen that knew all the ſecrets of the houſe, found meanes to enter through a gutter, that ſerued in maner of a ſinke, to auoid all the filth of the kitchen into the riuer of Tweed, breaking downe a pane of an old wall, and ſo made entrie for the reſidue of their fellowes; by reaſon whereof they eaſilie recouered the caſtell, and in reuenge of them that were ſlaine there when the Scots wan it, they likewiſe ſlue all thoſe which were then within it, without anie reſpect of one or other. After this, in the yeere 1419, the third day of September, Robert duke of Albanie, that had beene gouernor of Scotland for the ſpace of fifteene yeeres, after the death of king Robert the third, departed out of this life, hauing borne himſelfe in all his time as a right valiant and noble prince. [This doth Buchanan attribute to the yeere 1420, being the fifteenth yeere after the death of Robert the third.]

The deceaſſe of Robert duke of Albanie. Fr. Thin.

A little before his deceaſſe, there came from Charles the French king, the earle of Vandoſme, and chancellor of France, both to renew the ancient league betwixt the two realmes of Scotland and France, & alſo to get ſome power of Scots to paſſe into France, to ſupport the ſaid Charles againſt the Engliſhmen, which as then ſore inuaded his realme. Whereupon ſhortlie after by decree of councell, it was ordeined, that John Steward earle of Buchquhane, ſecond ſonne to duke Robert, and Archembald Dowglas earle of Wigton, ſhould paſſe into France with ſeuen thouſand armed men. The king of England informed hereof, to cauſe the Scots to keepe their men at home, menaced to inuade Scotland with a puiſſant armie, & that in all haſt. Which rumor being ſpred ouer all the bounds of his realme, cauſed the Scots for doubt thereof to lie all the next ſummer on the borders: but in the meane time, king Henrie paſſed into Normandie, to purſue his wars againſt France with all diligence.

At length, through the procurement of the duke of Burgognie, vnder certeine conditions and couenants of agreement, king Henrie toke to wife the ladie Katharine daughter to the French king. And among other articles of the ſame agreement, it was concluded, that after the deceaſſe of Charles the French king, the crowne of France ſhould immediatlie deſcend vnto king Henrie, as lawfull inheritor vnto that realme, without all contradiction; by reaſon whereof, Charles the Dolphin, and ſonne to the ſaid king Charles, was clearelie excluded from all claime to the ſame: but this notwithſtanding, the Dolphin did not onelie refuſe to ſurrender his title, but alſo ſought to mainteine the war againſt king Henrie as his aduerſarie, and open enimie to the realme. In the meane while alſo, the earles of Buchquhane and Wigton, with Alexander Lindſeie brother to the earle of Crawford, and Thomas Swinton knights, accompanied with ſeuen thouſand well armed men, arriued in France, to the great reioiſing of the Dolphin, as he well declared in the thankfull receiuing, and moſt heartie welcomming of them. Finallie, the towne and caſtell of Chatelon in Touraine was deliuered to them, that they might haue a place at all times to reſort vnto, at their owne will and pleaſure.

* Shortlie after they were imploied in the battell of Bauge. For the duke of Clarence brother to the king of England (in whoſe place he was deputie and generall of the armies in France) after that he had ſpoiled and ouerrun the countrie of Anion (which hitherto had remained moſt ſtedfaſt in the obedience of the French) was comming (as it was ſuppoſed) to the towne of Bauge, about two daies before Eaſter: for which cauſe the Scots (thinking that the duke in that holie feaſt would, as the maner was, ceaſe from all violence of warre, and attend the church ceremonies appointed for thoſe times; or elſe as ſome write, by reaſon of the truce which was taken for eight daies) did more negligentlie looke vnto their eſtate than wiſdome would they ſhuld haue done. The which when Clarence vnderſtood (either by Andrew Fregoſe an Italian, or by the Scotiſh forragers intercepted by his horſſemen) he reioiſed that he had ſo good occaſion offered worthilie to performe ſomething. Wherefore riſing forthwith from dinner, he commanded his horſſemen to arme themſelues, with whome he went directlie towards his enimies, at what time he was (beſides the beautie of his other furniture) richlie adorned with goodlie diadems of gold (ſet with manie pretious ſtones) and placed vpon a chaplet of iron. At whoſe ſudden approch, thoſe few French which were neere vnto them in a village called little Bauge (amongſt whom was John de la Troir) being feared, made their defenſe in flight; and for ſafegard entered the ſteeple of the next church adioining, in the which they were hardlie after beſieged.

Whileſt theſe were thus inuironed, the clamor and cries which was now come to the next armie (wherein the Scots were aſſembled) ſuddenlie cauſed them with great feare to flee to their weapons. At that time the erle of Buchquhane (whileſt the others prepared themſelues) ſent thirtie archers to poſſeſſe the bridge, vnder which the next riuer had his courſe, and through which they might paſſe ouer, where (incountering with the Engliſh enimie) Hugh Kennedie came vnto them out of the next church (in which he ſojorned) with a hundred of his companie halfe armed, as it often falleth out in ſuch ſudden exploits. Theſe with their arrowes ſo ſtreictlie kept this ſtreict, that the horſſemen could not haue anie paſſage there, for which cauſe the duke of Clarence did firſt forſake horſſe (as the reſt of the companie did after him) began the battell on foot, and with a ſtrong aſſault made way for his men, beating from them the Scots, who were for the moſt part vnarmed, and the others not verie well armed.

After this, in the meane time whileſt Clarence taketh his horſſe againe, and ſome of the reſt ſcatteringlie do paſſe the bridge, the earle of Buchquhane commeth vpon them, & forthwith (deſirous to make triall of his people egerlie ſéeking after it) there was a bitter battell committed, with like minds of hatred the one againſt the other: for the Scots did reioiſe, that they had now obteined cauſe, time, and place, where they might (after their firſt arriuall in France) ſhew ſome token of their valure, and refute thoſe tawnts which the Frenchmen laid vpon them, obiecting that the grédineſſe of wine & vittels had brought them ouer into that countrie. With which reproch the Frenchmen are woont to vpbraid the Engliſh, the Spaniard the French, and the Affrican the Spaniard. But as the Scots were eger in a ſtrange countrie to win honor, ſo was the Engliſh no leſſe deſirous of conqueſt, greatlie diſdeining both at home and abroad, to be ſo infeſted with that implacable nature of the Scots. In which battell none did fight more valiantlie or egerlie than did the duke of Clarence himſelfe. Againſt whome (ſo noted for the richneſſe of his armor) came John Swinton, which grœuouſlie wounded him in the face, and whome the earle of Buchquhane (ſtriking on the head with his mace) quite ouerthrew to the ground. Which doone, the Engliſh fled, and were grœuouſlie ſlaine, becauſe the ſame continued till the night ended the quarrell; which battell was fought on Eaſter eue, a little after the equinoctiall ſpring. In this battell were ſlaine of the Engliſh about 20000, amongſt whome were 26 of noble calling, whereof were the duke before ſaid, the earle of Kiddeſdale, otherwiſe called the earle of Angus, & the lord Greie were part: but of the Scots and Frenchmen, there were few miſſing, and they of the meaner ſort. All which, as we haue héere ſet it downe, is the common report of the death of the duke of Clarence. But the booke of Pluſcart reporteth, that the duke was ſlaine by Alexander Macelſell, a knight of Lenox, which tooke from him the coronet (whereof we ſpake before) and ſold the ſame to John Steward of Dernill, for a thouſand angels, which he after laied to pawne to Robert Huſtone, to whom he ought fiue thouſand angels; & this ſaith that booke was the moſt common report at thoſe daies. The chiefe praiſe of which victorie remained with the Scots, euen by the teſtimonie of the enuious aduerſaries, as the writer of this ſtorie ſaith vpon his credit.) At this battell alſo were a great companie of priſoners taken, amongeſt whome (as principall) were theſe, the earle of Huntington, & the earle of Sommerſet, with his brother, both of them being brethren to the ladie Jane, that was after maried to king James the firſt, king of Scotland. For the high valiancie of the Scotiſhmen ſhewed in this battell, the Dolphin created the earle of Buchquhane high conſtable of France, and gaue him ſundrie townes, caſtels, and lands, therewith the better to mainteine his eſtate.

* King Henrie hearing of the death of his brother the duke of Clarence, did ſubſtitute for his deputie his other brother the duke of Bedford, promiſing that he would ſhortlie after come thither himſelfe with an armie of foure thouſand horſſe, and a thouſand footmen (which he performed accordinglie.) For with all ſpéed he after came into France with a mightie hoſt, and had with him James the Scotiſh king, or rather prince of Scotland, for all this while the Scots reputed him not as king, for that he was not as yet crowned: nor ſet at libertie out of the Engliſhmens hands, into the which (as before ye haue heard) he chanced to fall by his fathers life time.

The king of England taketh the prince of Scotland ouer with him into France.

The cauſe why king Henrie did take this James ouer with him at that preſent into France, was, for that he hoped by his meanes to procure all the Scotiſhmen that were in ſeruice with the Dolphin to forſake him, and to returne home into their owne countrie: but when he had broken this matter vnto the ſaid James, and promiſed, that if he could bring it to paſſe, he would not onelie remit his ranſome, but alſo ſend him into Scotland highlie rewarded with great riches: James anſwered hereunto, that he maruelled much, why he did not conſider how he had no authoritie ouer the Scots ſo long as he was holden in captiuitie, and as yet had not receiued the crowne, but (ſaith he) if it were ſo that I might be ſet at libertie, and had receiued the crowne according to the accuſtomed manner, togither with the othes and homages of my ſubiects, I could then in this matter do as ſhould be thought to ſtand with reaſon; but in the meane time I ſhall deſire your grace to hold me excuſed, and not to will me to do that which I may in no wiſe performe.

The anſwer of James the king, or rather prince of Scotland.

King Henrie maruelling at the high wiſedome which appeered to be planted in the head of that young prince, left off to trauell with him anie further in this matter. In the meane time, the warres continuing betwixt the king of England and the Dolphin of France, manie townes were beſéeged, woone, and ſacked, and ſundrie light bickerings and ſkirmiſhes chanced betwixt the parties, as occaſion ſerued. But the Engliſhmen ſhewed themſelues to beare ſuch hatred toward the Scots, that ſo manie as fell into their hands neuer néeded to ſtreine their friends for their ranſomes, which crueltie they put not in practiſe againſt their enimies, being of an other nation. [For king Henrie, when he had taken the towne of Meldens, hanged twentie Scots which he found therein, laieng to their charge that they had fought againſt their owne king.] At length, king Henrie fell into a grœuous diſeaſe, which in ſhort time made an end of his life, notwithſtanding all the helpe that either by phyſicke or other waies might be miniſtred vnto him. The ſame yeare, that is to ſay, 1422, the French king Charles, the firt of that name, deceaſſed; after whome ſucceeded his ſonne Charles the ſeuenth, before named the Dolphin, as the cuſtome there is. By the death of theſe kings, the wars were not altogither ſo earneſtlie followed as before, wherupon the earles of Buchquhane and Wigton returned into Scotland, and ſhortlie after was an armie leuied, and ſiege laied both to Rockſburgh, and to Berwike, but for that they lay long abroad and did no good, returning home without gaine, this iournie in deriſion was called The durtie rode, or (as the Scots terme it) The dirtin raid.

But now to ſpeake ſomewhat concerning the order of the common-wealth in Scotland, ye ſhall vnderſtand, that after the death of Robert duke of Albanie, his ſonne Murdo Steward earle of Fife and Menteith was made gouernour, continuing in that office for the ſpace of foure yéeres, though (to confeſſe the truth) he was farre vnmeet thereto, differing much from the wiſedome and manhood of his father, for in him remained ſundrie vices, greatlie variable and contrarie one to another. In time of anie aduerſitie, he ſhewed himſelfe as a man deſpairing of all comfort or helpe: in proſperitie ſo lift vp in careleſſe inſolencie, that he had no ſtaie of himſelfe, by reaſon whereof Murdo Steward earle of Fife elected gouernour of Scotland.

The repugnant vices reigning in Murdo Steward.

whereof sometimes he suffered heinous offenders, through dread of their puissant friends (a thing not to be suffered in Scotland) to escape unpunished; and at other times against, he shewed himselfe more severe & cruell in executing of iustice, than the matter required.

His negligence in the ruling his sonnes.

Thus was he still in extremities, keeping no temperance nor laudable measure in anie of his doings. Neverthelesse he so negligent in ruling his sons Walter, James, & Alexander (whether through tenderie & lacke of wit, or by reason he bare such a feard & terrour fatherlie love toward them) that they hanting him in small regard, played manie outrageous parts, to the sore offending of a number. At length, one of them taking displeasure with his father, for that he would not giue him a falcon, the which he had long before gentlie desired, fretted to him, and plucking him beside his till, wrong his necke from his bodie even presentlie before his face. Wherupon the father somewhat kindled with this presumptuous deed of the sonne: Walter (said he, for so was his name that had thus misused him) sith it is so that thou and thy brother will not be ruled by my soft and gentle government, I shall bring him home yet it be long, that shall chastise both you and me after an other manner. And after this, he rested not to travell till he had redeemed of Iames the first out of captivitie, till at length he brought him home in deed, to the great wealth, ioy, and good hap of all the Scottish nation. For calling together a parliament (of the nobilitie) at Perth, they consulted of recouering home their Iames imprisoned in England, and at length willinglie agreed (either for fauour they bare to the lawfull heire, or being wearied with the lothsomnes of the present gouernement) to send an ambassage to the king of England, to demand the restauration of king Iames. Whereupon they dispatched into England (to execute their deuise) Dennis Lychton bishop of Aberden, Archembald Douglasse (the third earle of that name, and 6 of that familie) the sonne of Archembald Douglasse duke of Tourraine, William Hepe constable of Scotland, Richard Cornell archdeacon of Landane, and Alexander Iuuraine a Dane, knight.

In the meane time, the French king, Charles the seuenth, being sore vexed with warres by the Englishmen, sent to the earle of Buchquhane his constable, requiring him to returne againe with all speed in to France, and to bring 6 manie Scottishmen with him, as he conuenientlie might. This earle therefore found meanes to perswade Archembald earle of Douglas, father to the forenamed earle of Wigton, to passe with him into France, which two earles with an armie of fiue thousand men, or (after some writers) ten thousand, tooke the seas, and arriued with prosperous wind and weather at Rochell, and comming to the French king, were receiued of him with all ioy and gladnes. With this companie also was sent ambassador Gilbert Greenlaw bishop of Aberden, a man of great authoritie amongest the nobilitie of Scotland, for his singular wisedome, and such a person as with great dexteritie executed the office of the chancellorship of the realme. The effect of whose message was, to comfort Charles the seuenth, then king of France, and to assure him, that not onelie they which were now arriued in France, but also all the inhabitants of Scotland would remaine in firme in his faith & friendship, that they would spend both liues and goods in the defense of the crowne of France, as the following experience should well trie. Wherupon the earle of Douglasse was by the king in his further aduancement honored with the title of the dukedome of Tourraine. But that glorie of the Scots was soone diminished (as both Lesleus)

by the infortunat successe which they had against the Englishmen at the battell of Vernoile. In which (besides all the horsemen or common souldiers which were also most slaine at that time) there perished of the nobilitie, the two brethren of the gouernour, the earle of Buchquhane constable of France, Archembald Douglas duke of Tourraine, with Iames his sonne and heire, Alexander Lindsaie, Thomas Stewart, Robert Scotland, and manie other, as in the French and English histories more largelie may appeare.

Lesleus lib. 7. pag. 372. 1424. N. C.

And here a little to step out of the way, because in this place Buchanan gnarreth at the Englishmen (as he doth in all the parts of his booke, with most bitter taunts) I will a little shew that he hath forgotten himselfe in the same: as well against us generallie (as appeareth in manie places) as against Gratian, Humfrie Lhoid, and Hall, especiallie in manie other places thereof. And therefore (readers) giue me leaue in maner first to speake of him (being dead) than he doth of others. For although (against all humanitie) he do most bitterlie with words of heat inflame his pen against Humfrie Lhoid, departed the world manie yeares (as it appeareth) before he tooke the later penne in hand (after the ouerlooking of his old fragments) as himselfe in his epistle confesseth, to write an historie: yet I will spare him in better sort. And therefore I much muse, that he a man so learned and graue, would take in his latter age, when reason should most rule him, so dip his pen in gall, as forgetting himselfe, he should be of these rough conditions (contrarie to all learning, which Emollit mores, nec sinit esse feros) he would call men impudent, immodest, unlearned, liers, vnbridled, malicious, backbiters, & still tongued; and that he can rather proue the Britains to be made of dogs and brute beasts, better than to be descended of Brutus. All which speeches are to be found in his booke: for (if there were a fault in Lhoid) as there was none, because it seemes he will not well conceiue his mind: could not he either misheard error, or misknowne men, but with such bitter inuectiues, when they but modestlie shew their opinion, dissenting in matter of fact from others, as it is lawfull for all learned men to do? Where learned he that rhetoricke, to reiect the opinion of men with dogs eloquence, and scorne to reduce that creature (framed in the image of God, and lord of all beasts) to be rather made of dogs than of men, and for one or two grosse persons to inuaie against a whole race?

3 inuection against Buchanan.

But Humfrie Lhoid imputeth a note of infamie to his nation (as he supposeth) in disproouing Hector Boetius, who arrogantlie (leaue all truth) hath transformed in his Scots both places, persons, and deeds, which neuer belonged to them. And is this so great a fault in Lhoid, when himselfe and Lesleus bishop of Rosse (secretlie millibing Boetius) haue in steede poised more a great manie imperfections in the historie of Boetius, and placed manie other things after an other sort, referring them to other times than Boetius doth? And why should he maligne Lhoid to reprehending him, whome himselfe condemneth, for whome he saith that In descriptione Scotiæ quadam parum vere prodidit, & alios in errorem induxit, and whome for manie faults (by Boetius escaped) he further saith in the later end of his second booke, that he will not defend him in such errors, as no reason there is why he should? But if from the abundance of the heart the tong and hand do speake and write, I can not lie but that by his vnkempt & rash speeches, I may condemne him of secret grudge, not so much to the person of Lhoid, as to the whole nation, against which the chiefest part of his booke seemeth to be a tomaching inuectiue. And yet such as it is, they must of necessitie follow that intreat of the histories of his nation, or else he will exclame against them (as he doth in this place of the battell of Vernoile) that they malicious-lie obſcure the glorie of the Scots, following the authoritie of the aduerſarie, and not the truth of the hiſtorie written by him, or the French nation.

And in this place of his booke, rather than he will want occaſion to tawnt and diſgrace vs by his cholerike pen, he will ſéeke a knot in a ruſh, and make a mounteine of a molehill, in ſo vehement inuaieng againſt the Engliſh, that ſay that the Scots were not able to mainteine ſuch titles of honor as were giuen them by the French: a ſimple matter to make ſuch diſcourſe vpon, and to ſtep ſo much awrie out of the courſe of the ſtorie. But thinke you Buchanan hath committed no ſuch (nay greater) faults againſt vs? Yes trulie, and that I ſuppoſe will be well prooued at an other time, in an other treatiſe vpon his booke now iuſtlie forbidden in England, and (as I heare) more iuſtlie in Scotland. And heere remember I praie thée gentle reader, that in one place of his booke he ſaith that he ment to haue obſerued this courſe from the beginning, that he would not ſeeke to digreſſe by bypaths out of the courſe of the hiſtorie. And hath he ſo ſone forgotten that in the firſt forehead of his booke, almoſt thrée leaues togither, & alſo in manie other parts of the ſame (as well as in this place of the battell of Vernoile) he hath lept manie miles out of the way, with bitter words to tawnt Humfrie Lhoid, Grafton, Hall, & all the Engliſh hiſtories, and by manie whole pages (in manie parts of his worke) with much ſpence of powder and ſhot, to batter the credit of the Engliſh writers. Theſe trulie were not parts of ſuch a perſon, as the place (which he had about the prince whileſt he liued) required. But inough of this by me (who am not Honorarius arbiter, and will be no ſeuere cenſurer of other mens writings at this time (whereunto I was occaſioned by Buchanans digreſſion in this place) ſince the ſame will be more ſubſtantiallie touched by others in other workes (whereunto I refer my ſelfe) and ſo returne to the order of the hiſtorie.)

Enuie and diſcord.

The Scotiſh chronicles declare, that the loſſe of this field chanced ſpeciallie through enuie and diſcord, which reigned amongeſt the chiefteins. For the duke of Alanſon enuieng that the Scots ſhould dailie riſe in honor within France, kept himſelfe backe, till time the Scots were ouerthrowen and brought to vtter deſtruction. Againe, euen vpon the ioining, there roſe great ſtrife and contention betwixt the conſtable & the duke of Touraine, who ſhould haue the ſupreme rule of the Scotiſh legher, the one diſdaining to giue place to the other. Thus ye may perceiue, how the Scots with loſſe of manie of their liues, and much bloudſhed, ſupported the ſide of Charles king of France, againſt the Engliſhmen. And though there came dailie newes of diuerſe great ouerthrowes giuen by the Engliſhmen to ſuch Scotiſhmen and other, as ſerued the ſaid king Charles, yet did not the Scots therefore ſtaie at home, but at ſundrie times, and vnder ſundrie capteins repaired into France: as amongeſt other, one Robert Patillocke of Dundée with a new power of Scots went ouer to king Charles the ſeuenth aforeſaid, ſhewing ſuch proofe of his ſingular manhood and valiancie in thoſe wars, as in recouerie of the realme of France out of the Engliſhmens hands, his ſeruice ſtood king Charles in notable ſtéed. Chiefflie his diligence and proweſſe well appéered, in reducing the parties of Gaſcoigne vnto the French ſubiection, which had remained a great number of péeres vnder the dominion of the Engliſh kings. And hereupon was he called by the inhabitants euer after, Le petit roy de Gaſcoigne.

✻But to returne to the buſineſſe of Scotland and of the Scots, as they paſſed in the meane time. We ſay, that the French reioiſing of this conqueſt of Gaſcoigne, would not ſéeme to be vnthankfull to the Scots therefore: for which cauſe they erected a ſtatue or image of this Patillocke, in the hall of the king of France, as a perpetuall memorie of this conqueſt, and as a ſingular teſtimonie of their good will towards the Scots, which they placed there to remaine a monument to all poſteritie. Beſide which, he confirmed and increaſed the number of the gard of Scotiſh archers (which they were wont to vſe in peace and warre) firſt inſtituted by Charles the king of France, ouer all which he made this Patillocke chiefe capteine, which office the Scots did then and ſince ſo well diſcharge, that the ſame continueth yet in our memorie. Beſides which (a little before this) Charles the firſt appointed an other companie of Scotiſh horſſemen to be in wages with him, being commonlie called the trope of the Scotiſhmen at armes. Of whome the chiefe gouernour was Robert Steward (borne of the familie of the earle of Lennor) who was honored by the king with the title of the lord de Aubignie, with other lands and great poſſeſſions beſtowed vpon him. All which (being of long time poſſeſſed of the Scots of the ſame ſurname, by continuall order of blond & deſcent, that is, by Bernard the famous capteine of warre, then by Robert, and to conclude, by John Steward, brother of the earle of Lennor) is at this day alſo in poſſeſſion of the worthie yong gentleman (the ſonne of the ſaid John) who giueth forth a rare hope that he will not degenerat from the nobilitie of his anceſtors. The ambaſſadors ſent (as * before is ſhewed) into England for K. James, behaued themſelues ſo ſagelie therein, that in the end, they brought it to good concluſion: as thus. Firſt it was agréed, that king James ſhould be ſet at libertie, and alſo pay for his ranſome the ſum of 100000 marks ſterling, the one halfe to be paid in hand, and for the other halfe to leaue ſufficient pledges behind him, till it were paied. Albeit ſome writers alledge, that leauing pledges for the paiment of the one halfe, he was diſcharged of the other, in conſideration that he tooke to wife the ladie Jane, daughter to the earle of Summerſet. The ſaid earle and the cardinall of England his brother, conueied him with his quéene their néece, vnto the borders of both the realmes. And at their taking leaue each of other, there was preſented vnto king James and to the quéene his wife, beſides a cupbord of maſſie plate, ſundrie faire cloths of rich and coſtlie arras by his wiues friends, with manie other iewels and things of great price & valure.

King James then departed on this wiſe from his wiues brethren, and other ſuch his déere friends, as his vertue and princelie behauiour had procured him during his abode here by the ſpace of ſixtéene or eightéene yeares in England, entered into Scotland, and came to Edenburgh on Care ſundaie, otherwiſe called Paſſion ſunday in Lent, where he was receiued with all honor, ioy, and triumph that might be deuiſed. ✻At what time as the nobles came to giue him their dutifull welcome into his natiue ſoile and inheritance, there began to be manie complaints by them, who ſince the death of their laſt king (partlie by negligence, and partlie by the default of the gouernors) had béene moleſted with diuers kinds of iniuries; whereupon, Walter the ſon of Mordac, Malcolme Fleming, and Thomas Boid being grieuouſlie accuſed, were (to pacifie the exclamation of the common people) committed to diuers priſons till the nert parlement, which was appointed the firſt kalends of June following, where is more intreated of this matter, as after ſhall appeare, Buchanan hauing thus placed it before the kings

AND after that, as soone as the solemnitie of the feast of Easter was finished, he came to Perth, and shortlie after to Scone, where he was crowned king, and his wife queene, by duke Murdo the gouernor, and Henrie bishop of saint Andrewes, the one and twentith day of Maie, after the incarnation 1424. There came forth of England with this James the first, diuerse English gentlemen, which remaining euer after in seruice with him, were aduanced to certeine lands, possessions, and liuings in Scotland. Amongest whome (as one of the chiefest) was Andrew Graie, who afterwards by the kings aid and good furtherance, got in mariage the daughter and heire of Henrie Mortimer of Foulis, named Helen, and by that means came the lordship of Foulis vnto the hands of the Graies, whose surname and posteritie continueth yet in Scotland, inuested with great lands and dignities, both in Gowrie and Angus.

King James after his coronation returned from Scone to Edenburgh, where he called before him all those that bare anie authoritie in the administration of the common-wealth, during the time of the gouernors duke Robert and duke Murdo, namelie the chancellor, the treasuror, the clearks of the register, the controller, the auditors, and receiuers, with all other that had borne offices, or had anie thing to do concerning the kings rents. At length, when he perceiued by their accounts made, that the most part of all the lands, rents, and reuenues perteining vnto the crowne, were wasted, bestowed, alienated, and transported by the two foresaid gouernors, vnto their friends and fautors, contrarie to all right or good consideration (the customs of burrowes and good townes onlie excepted) he was not well content herewith, though for the time he passed ouer his displeasure, in shewing outwardlie no semblance, but as if he had liked all things well.

King James keepeth an audit.

In the meane time, he aduisedlie perused all euidences, rols, and charters perteining to the crowne, and shortlie thereupon called a parlement at Edenburgh, in the which, by aduise of the three estates, a generall tax was ordeined and granted, to be raised through the whole realme; as twelue pence of the pound to be paied of all lands within Scotland, both spirituall and temporall; and foure pence for euerie cow, ore, and horsse, to be paied for the space of two yeares togither. This paiment was leuied the first yeare without anie trouble, but the second yeare there rose such murmur and grudging amongst the poore commons about the paiment thereof, that he remitted the residue that was behind, & tooke neuer anie tax after of his subiects, vntill he maried his daughter with the Dolphin of France. Amongst other bils put vp in this parlement, there was diuerse complaints exhibited by the people, for sundrie oppressions vsed and done by the sons of duke Murdo, and other great peares of the realme, before the kings returne into Scotland.

Whereupon Walter Steward, one of the sons of the said duke Murdo, was arrested, and sent to a castell situated vpon a rocke within the sea called the Walle, there to remaine in safe keeping. Also Malcolme Fleming of Cumernald, and Thomas Boid of Kilmarnoke, were committed to ward in Dalkeith, but these two at the intercession of diuerse noble men were pardoned and forgiuen of all offenses for an easie fine, with condition, that they should satisfie all such persons as they had in anie wise wronged. In the foresaid parlement also, K. James tooke a solemne oth, to defend as well the liberties of his realme, as of the church, during the course of his naturall life. The like oth by his example did all the residue of the barons take at the same present time. Not long after, an other parlement was called and holden at Perth, in the which duke Murdo, with his sonne Alexander, were arrested and committed to ward. So was also Archembald earle of Dowglasse, with his brother William earle of Angus, George earle of March, Adam Hepborne of Hales, and manie other great barons of Scotland, euerie of them being put in sundrie castels and strengths, to remaine there in safe keeping. Duke Murdo was sent to Carlaurocke, and his duchesse was put in Temptalloun.

In the yeare following, on the Holie rod daie, called the Inuention of the crosse, Iames Steward the third sonne of duke Murdo moued with great ire, for that his father and brethren were holden in prison, came with a great power to the towne of Dunbreton, and burnt it, after he had slaine John Steward of Dondonald, and two and thirtie other persons, which were found in the same towne: but the king kindled in great displeasure for this attempt, pursued this Iames so fiercelie, that he was faine to flee into Ireland, where he afterwards deceassed. [And Finelaw (which was sometime one of the order of the frier Dominicks) which fled with him into Ireland, & was author that the said Iames committed all these outrages, died there also. Besides which, there fled into Ireland the wife of Walter, hir two sonnes, Andrew and Alexander, with Arthure the bastard: who (in the end) returning home, was after by Iames the third aduanced to great honors.] In the next yeare insuing, K. Iames called a parlement at Sterling, in the which he sitting with scepter, sword, and crowne in place of iudgement, Walter Steward with his brother Alexander were condemned, and incontinentlie were lead forth to a place before the castell, and there beheaded.

Walter and Alexander the sonnes of duke Murdo beheaded.

On the morrow after, duke Murdo himselfe, and Duncan Steward earle of Lennor were conuicted of high treason, and beheaded before the castell in semblable manner. [It is a constant fame (saith Buchanan) though I find it not written in any place, that the king sent the heads of the father, husband, & children, to Isabell the wife of his cosine germane, to trie whether she being a fierce woman, would (as it iustlie happened) by distemperance of griefe discouer the secrets of hir mind. But she (notwithstanding all which grieuous and vnlooked for spectacles) did not inordinatlie burst out into anie bitter words, but onlie said; If the faults be true which are laid against them, the king hath done but right and iustice vnto them.) Thus by the attaindor of duke Murdo and his sonnes, the earldome of Fife, Menteith, and Lennor came into the kings hands. The residue of the lords and barons remaining as then in prison, and abiding the kings pleasure, were sore afraid, when they heard what rigorous iustice had beene executed on duke Murdo and his sonnes: notwithstanding, within 12 moneths after they were all set at libertie, and receiued into the kings fauor, on promise of their loiall demeanor & dutifull obedience euer after to be shewed, during their naturall liues.

* The parlement being ended, John Mountgomerie, & Humfreie Cunningham were sent by the king to the castell of Louchleuine, which was kept against him by the runagat James Steward, whom in short time they forced to surrender the said castell. Not long after, John Steward of Dernleie (who was maister of the Scotish garrison of horssemen in France, the rest of the former capteins being consumed) came into Scotland with the bishop of Reims, as ambassador in the name of Charls, to renew new the old league betweene the two nations, and to conclude matrimonie betweene Lewes the ſonne of the ſaid Charles the ſeuenth, and Margaret the daughter of K. James, both being yet verie yong. Which thing ſo diſpatched, in the nert yeare being the (1426) he determined (hauing pacified all Scotland betweene the mounteins of Granzeben) to ſubdue the further parts beyond it alſo. Wherefore to begin the ſame, he commanded the caſtell of Inuerneſſe (ſet in a conuenient place in the furtheſt borders of Murrey) to be repared. Whither when he came two yeares after, to ſit in iudgement vpon miſdemeanors of the inhabitants, and to ſuppreſſe their robberies, he called before him the chiefe of all the families of that countrie, eſpeciallie ſuch as being accompanied with great traines, were wont to fetch preies from their nert borders, did ſet tribute on the quieter ſort, and did compell the common people to miniſter ſuſtenance to thoſe idle loiterers; of which capteins, ſome had a thouſand, ſome two thouſand, & ſome far manie more redie at their call to obeie their commandement: with which they ceaſſed not to keepe the good in danger vnto them for feare of hurt, and made the euill (amongeſt whome they were aſſured of refuge & defenſe) the bolder to commit all kind of wickedneſſe. Which perſons when the king had gotten in, and drawen to come before him, partlie by flatteries, and partlie by threats: he committed about fortie of their leaders to ſeuerall priſons: whoſe euill being throughlie knowen, he hanged two notable fellows amongſt them, called Alexander Macror and John Macarcture; at what time alſo he beheded James Campbell (for the murther of John of the Iles) a man deerelie beloued of his people. The reſt which remained (being of the common ſort) they likewiſe diſperſed into diuers priſons, whereof ſome were after executed, and ſome were permitted freelie to depart to their owne. The capteins of the factions thus ſlaine (or for the moſt part reſtreined in priſon) the inferior ſort durſt not attempt anie thing, being deſtitute of leaders. Wherevpon the king calling them before him, did giue them a louing admonition to embrace iuſtice, becauſe there was no ſurer or certeine hope of ſafetie in anie thing, than in the innocencie of life, the which if they would determine to doo, they ſhould alwaies find him readie to honor and reward them; if not, they might learne by the examples of others what they ſhould hope to receiue themſelues.)

1427. In the yeere next following, which was after the incarnation 1427, Alexander lord of the Iles was arreſted by the king at Inuernes, for that he was accuſed to be a ſuccorer & mainteiner of theeues & robbers in the countrie: but forſomuch as he promiſed in time comming to reforme his former miſdemeanors, he was pardoned and ſet at libertie; wherof inſued great trouble immediatlie after. For ſhortlie vpō his deliuerance, he gathered a power of wicked ſcapethrifts, and with the ſame comming into Inuernes, burnt the towne, and beſieged the caſtell, inforcing with all diligence to win the ſame, till he was aduertiſed that the king was comming towards him with a great power, wherevpon he fled incontinentlie to the Iles. Finallie hauing knowledge that a great number of people lay dailie in wait to take him, that they might preſent him to the kings hands, he came diſguiſed in poore araie to the Holie rood houſe, and there finding the king on Eaſter daie deuoutlie in the church at his praiers, he fell downe on his knees before him, and beſought him of grace, for his ſake that roſe as that day from death vnto life.

His mother Eufemie daughter to Walter ſometime earle of Roſſe, was alſo committed to ward in ſaint Colmes inch; becauſe it was knowne that ſhe ſollicited hir ſonne to rebell (in maner as is afore ſaid) againſt the king.

Not long after, Donald Ballocht, brother to the ſaid lord Alexander of the Iles, came with a great power of men into Lochquhaber. The earles of Mar and Cathnes came with ſuch number of their people as they could raiſe, to defend the countrie againſt the inuaſion of thoſe Ilandmen, and fought with the ſaid Donald at Inuerlochtie, where the erle of Cathnes was ſlaine, and the earle of Mar diſcomfited. Herewith did Donald returne with victorie, and a great preie of goods and riches into the Iles. The king ſore moued with the newes hereof, came with a great armie vnto Dunſtafage, purpoſing with all ſpeed to paſſe into the Iles. The clans and other chiefe men of the ſaid Iles aduertiſed hereof, came to Dunſtafage, and ſubmitted themſelues vnto the king, excuſing their offenſe, for that (as they alledged) the ſaid Donald had conſtreined them againſt their willes, to paſſe with him in the laſt iournie. All thoſe clans vpon this their excuſe, were admitted to the kings fauour, and ſworne to purſue the ſaid Donald vnto death.

Shortlie herevpon, this Donald fled into Ireland, where he was ſlaine, and his head ſent by one Odo a great lord of Ireland (in whoſe countrie he lurked) as a preſent to the king that laie as then at Sterling. There were alſo three hundred of his adherents taken, and by the kings commandement hanged for their offenſes within three weekes ſpace, after his firſt flieng into Ireland. This trouble being thus quieted, king James paſſed through all the bounds of his realme, to puniſh all offendors and miſruled perſons, which in anie wiſe wronged and oppreſſed the poore people. He allowed no pardon granted afore by the gouernor, alledging the ſame to be expired by his death. For he thought indeed it ſtood neither with the pleaſure of God, nor wealth of the realme, that ſo manie ſlaughters, reiffes, and oppreſſions, as had beene done afore in the countrie, ſhould remaine vnpuniſhed through fault of iuſtice. It is ſaid that within the firſt two yeeres of his reigne, there were three thouſand perſons executed by death, for ſundrie old crimes and offenſes.

And though ſuch extreme iuſtice might haue beene thought ſufficient to giue example to other to reforme their naughtie vſages, yet one Angus Duffe of Stratherne nothing afraid thereof, came with a companie of theeues and robbers, and tooke a great preie of goods out of the countrie of Murrey and Cathnes: for recouerie wherof, one Angus Murrey followed with a great power, and ouertaking the ſaid Angus Duffe neere to Strachnauerne, fiercelie aſſailed him. Who with like manhood made ſtout reſiſtance, by reaſon whereof there inſued ſuch a cruell fight betwixt the parties, that there remained in the end but onelie twelue perſons aliue, & thoſe ſo wounded, that they were ſcarſe able to returne home to their houſes, and liued but a few daies after. About the ſame time, there was alſo another notable theefe named Makdonald Roſſe, which grew with ſpoiles and robberies to great riches. This wicked oppreſſor ſhod a woman with horſſe ſhoes, becauſe ſhe ſaid ſhe would go to the king, and reueale his wicked dowings. 1430. In the third yeere after, which was from the incarnation 1430, on the eleuenth daie of October, Jane the queene of Scots was deliuered of two sonnes at one birth, Alexander and James. The first deceassed in his infancie. The other succeeded after his fathers deceasse in the kingdome, & was named James the second. At the baptisme of these two infants, there were fiftie knights made. Amongst the which, and first of all other, was William the sonne of Archembald Dowglas, that succeeded his father in the earledome of Dowglas. His father the said Archembald Dowglas, somewhat before this time, or (as other authors say) in the yeere next insuing, was arrested by the kings commandement, and put in ward, remaining so a long time, till at length by supplication of the queene, and other peeres of the realme, the king pardoned him [with John Kennedie] of all offenses, and set both them And Alexander earle of Rosse at libertie. King James in this sort did what in him lay to bring the realme of Scotland in such quiet tranquillitie, that (in purging the same of all offendors, and such as liued by reiffe and robbing) passengers by the high waies might trauell without dread of anie euill disposed persons to molest them.

Moreouer, he repared and fortified the castels and fortresses of his realme, and stuffed them with such ordinance and munition as was thought expedient. He granted also sundrie priuileges and great liberties to the vniuersitie of saint Andrews, to the high aduancement thereof, and was oftentimes himselfe present at their disputations, taking great pleasure therein. Such as were knowne to be learned men, and were presented to him by the vniuersitie, he preferred to great benefices and other ecclesiasticall liuings, still as the same chanced to be vacant. Much what about the same time, there was a parlement holden at Perth, in the which Henrie Wardlaw bishop of S. Andrews, in name of all the three estates there assembled, made a long and right pithie oration to this effect; that Where by the high policie and prudent diligence of the kings maiestie there present, iustice, and all due administration of lawes and good ordinances were so reuiued, that nothing seemed to be ouerpassed, that might aduance to the profit and commoditie of the common-wealth; yet was there one wicked vsage crept in of late, increasing so fast, that if spedis remedie were not had in time, all those commodities brought into the realme by his comming, should be of small auaile, and that was, such superfluous riot in banketting chéere, and numbers of costlie dishes, as were then taken vp and vsed after the English fashion, both to the great hinderance of mans health, and also to the vnprofitable wasting of their goods and substance. If the laudable temperance vsed amongest the Scotishmen in old time were well considered, nothing might appeare more contrarie and repugnant thereto, than that new kind of gluttonie then vsed, by receiuing more excesse of meats and drinks than sufficeth to the nourishment of nature, through prouocation of such deintie and delicate dishes, confectioned sawces, and deuised potions, as were now brought in amongst them. As for such gentlemen as the king had brought with him forth of England, they were worthie in déed to be cherished and had in high fauour; neither was this abuse to be so greatlie imputed vnto them, considering it was appropriate to their nation. But the Scotishmen themselues were chiefflie to be blamed, that had so quicklie yéelded to so great an inconuenience, the enormitie whereof appeared by the sundrie vices that followed of the same, as excesse, sensuall lust, slouth, reiffe, and wasting of goods. For if temperance be the nourisher of all vertue, then must the contrarie, that is to say, intemperance, be the bringer forth and prouoker of all vice. If it might therefore please the kings highnesse, to shew his accustomed wisedome and prouidence in repressing this abuse of costlie fare, so much damagable to his people, he should do the thing that was meritorious before God, and no lesse profitable and necessarie for the publike weale of all his subiects.

Wices following delicate fare.

By these and manie other the like persuasions, bishop Wardlaw vsed to dissuade the king and his people from all superfluous courses of delicate dishes and surfetting bankets. Insomuch that euen then there was order taken, that fewer dishes and more spare diet should be vsed through the realme, licencing gentlemen onelie, and that on festiuall daies, to be serued with pies, the vse of them not being knowne in Scotland till that season. Neuerthelesse, such intemperance is risen in processe of time following,

A terrible eclipſe.

In the ſame yéere the ſeuentæenth day of June, was a terrible eclipſe of the ſunne, at three of the clocke at after noone, the day being darkened ouer head for the ſpace of one halfe houre togither, as though it had béene night, and therevpon it was called the blacke houre. At the next Lammas, the king raiſed an armie, & came with the ſame to Roxburgh, beſieging the caſtell for the ſpace of fiftæene daies togither. He had in this armie (as the report went) the number of two hundred thouſand men, accounting cariage men & all other ſuch as followed the campe: yet notwithſtanding all this huge multitude, hauing waſted his powder and other munition, before hée could dw anie great hurt to his enimies, he was conſtreined to raiſe his field, and leaue the caſtell in the Engliſhmens hands as he found it. After this king James perceiuing how the knowledge of handicrafts and manuall occupations was decaied in Scotland, through continuall exerciſe of wars, ſince the daies of Alexander the third, to the further aduancement of the common-wealth, and that his ſubiects might haue occaſion to auoid ſlouth and idleneſſe (the rot of all miſchiefe) he brought a great number of cunning craftſmen out of Germanie, France, and other parties, to inſtruct his people in their arts and faculties.

Not long after, one Paule Craw a Bohemian borne, was burnt at ſaint Andrews, for preaching and ſetting forth the doctrine of John Hus, & John Wikcliffe. John Fogo being one of them that helped chieflie to condemne him, was made (for his great and earneſt diligence therein ſhewed) abbat of Melroſſe. [After which, the ſaid king James began to take vpon him the perſon of a priuate man, ſundrie times aſſociating himſelfe to the companie of others (but eſpeciallie of the merchants) in changed apparell, according to the ſtate of ſuch perſons with whom he would companie, to the end he might thereby learne what men did ſay and iudge of him, and ſo vnderſtand what was to be corrected in the gouernement of the common-wealth.] About the ſame time was the abbeie of Charturar monks founded beſides Perth, by king James, with great coſt and magnificence.

Alſo the lord Scrope and other aſſociats with him, came in ambaſſage from Henrie the firſt, king of England. The effect of whoſe meſſage was, to haue the ancient league betwixt the Scots and Frenchmen diſſolued, promiſing that if the councell of Scotland would conſent thereto, and ioine in leage with the Engliſhmen; that both the towne and caſtell of Berwike, with all the lands lieng betwixt Twéed and the Recroſſe (as the Scots write) ſhould be deliuered into the Scotiſhmens hands. King James hauing ſmall credit in ſuch faire promiſes, perceiued the ſame to tend onlie to this end, that the league betwixt the Frenchmen and Scots might be once clearelie broken, and then to vſe the matter as occaſion ſhould ſerue their turne. This matter therefore being propoſed before the councell, it was concluded, that in no wiſe the ſaid league betwixt the Frenchmen and Scots ſhould be diſſolued, and ſo therevpon the Engliſh ambaſſadors were diſpatched without more talke concerning that matter.

1433. In the ſame yéere, that is to ſay, 1433, the king caused George Dunbar erle of March, ſonne to that earle which rebelled againſt his father king Robert the third, to be arreſted and put in ſafe kéeping within the caſtell of Edenburgh. He ſent alſo the earle of Angus with his chancellor William Creichton, and Adam Hepborne of Hales to the caſtell of Dunbar, deliuering them letters ſigned with his hand, and directed to the kéepers of the ſaid caſtell, that they ſhuld deliuer vp the houſe immediatlie vpon ſight of thoſe letters vnto the bringers of the ſame. The kéepers durſt not diſobeie his commandement, but ſuffered them to enter according to their commiſſion. Within twelue moneths after, a parlement was held at Perth, where the foreſaid George earle of March was diſherited of all his lands and liuings for his fathers offenſe committed againſt king Robert the third. Thus the houſe of the Dunbars loſt the earledome of March, wherein the ſame had flouriſhed ſo manie yéeres togither, to the great defenſe and ſafegard of the realme of Scotland on that ſide, againſt both ciuill and forreine enimies.

The king yet moued with ſome pitie toward ſo noble a linage, within ſhort time after gaue the earldome of Buchquhan to the ſaid George; and after the kings deceaſſe, the lords of the councell thinking the ſame too little, aſſigned forth to him and his ſon Patrike, the ſumme of foure hundred marks yéerelie, to be receiued out of a parcell of his owne ancient inheritance of the earledome of March, to inioy the ſame till James the ſecond came to full age. In the yéere 1435, Alexander Steward earle of Mar departed out of this life. This Alexander was a baſtard ſonne of the earle of Buchquhan, that was one of the ſonnes of king Robert the ſecond. He was a man of right ſingular proweſſe, and in his youth following the warres, was with Philip duke of Burgognie at the ſiege of Liege, or Luike, where he bare himſelfe ſo manfullie, that few wan the like honor at that iournie. Not long after, to his high aduancement, he got in mariage the ladie Jacoba counteſſe of Holland: notwithſtanding, he continued but a while with hir, being forced to forgo hir companie, either for that ſhe had another huſband, or elſe for that the inhabitants would not ſuffer a ſtranger to reigne ouer them.

After his returne into Scotland, he ſent meſſengers into Holland, requiring to haue the iſſues and profits of ſuch lands as were due vnto him in right of the ſaid counteſſe his wife; but receiuing nought ſaue a froward anſwer, hée prouided him of ſhips, and made ſore warres on the Hollanders by ſea: firſt being put to the worſe; but at length he tooke a number of their ſhips laden with merchandize, as they were returning homewards from Dantzicke. The mariners were drowned, and the ſhips burnt. Through which loſſe the Hollanders being ſore abaſhed, fell to a compoſition with him, and tooke truce with the Scots for an hundred yéeres. This earle of Mar ſo long as he liued had the gouernance of the north parts of Scotland vnder king James the firſt, for he was a right prudent perſon, as well in warlike enterprиſes, as in ciuill adminiſtration. Hée brought forth of Hungarie ſundrie great horſſes and mares for generation, that by ſuch meanes the countrie might be prouided of great horſſes of their owne race, where till that time there was none bred within Scotland, but ſmall nags, more meet to ſerue for iourneing hacknies, than for anie ſeruice in the warres.

The ambassadors that came with this message were honorablie receiued, and in like sort interteined by king James, who at their departure gaue to them sundrie rich gifts, and appointed sir William Creichton to go with them into Denmarke, ambassador frō him, to the king there, who vsed himselfe so sagelie in this businesse which he thus went about, that renewing the old league betwixt the two realmes of Denmarke and Scotland, stedfast peace and assured amitie without anie more adw therof insued. Much about the same time, there came ambassadors from the French king, Charles the seuenth, not onelie desiring to haue the old league betwixt France and Scotland to be ratified at that present by a new confirmation, but also to confirme the same with better assurance. Margaret eldest daughter to king James, at request of the said king Charles, was giuen in mariage vnto Lewes the Dolphin, and eldest sonne to the said king Charles.

Manie great lords of Scotland were appointed to haue the conueiance of hir into France, and great prouision of ships made for that voiage, because the king was aduertised that the Englishmen had a fleet abroad on the seas, to take hir if they might meet with hir by the waie. But as the hap fell, it chanced the same time, as the Scotish ships should passe, there appeered on the coast of England, a great fleet of Spaniards, which the Englishmen supposing to be the Scots, they came vpon them with foure score vessels of one and other, thinking verelie to haue had their wished preie, euen according to their expectation: but being receiued with as hot a storme as they brought, they quicklie vnderstood how they were in a wrong bor, and so shrewdlie amazed (as Hector Boetius saith) they sustained great losse both in men and ships, and in the meane time the Scotish nauie passed by quietlie without damage, incountering not one ship by the waie that sought to impeach their passage. There went 140 ladies and gentlewomen forth of Scotland, to attend this ladie Margaret into France, amongest which number there were fiue of hir owne sisters.

In the meane time, whilest such things were a doing, Henrie Persie of Northumberland inuaded Scotland with foure thousand men, not being known whether he had commission so to do from the king of England, or that he made that enterprise of himselfe. William Dowglasse earle of Angus, to resist this inuasion, gathered a power of chosen men, amongest whome were Adam Hepborne of Hales, Alexander Ramseie of Dalehouse, and Alexander Elphingston, with others. The earle of Angus being thus associat, met the Persie at Piperden, where a sore battell was foughten betwixt them, with great slaughter on both sides; but at length the victorie fell to the Scots, though there were slaine togither with Alexander Elphingston, two hundred gentlemen and commons of Scotland: and of the English part there died Henrie of Cliddesdale, John Ogill, and Richard Persie, with fifteene hundred other of gentlemen and commons, of the which gentlemen, fortie were knights. There were taken also and brought home by the Scots as prisoners, to the number of foure hundred.

Shortlie herevpon, king James raised a mightie armie, and besieged the castell of Rockesburgh, but when he had almost brought his purpose so neere to passe, that those within began to fall to communication, for the rendering of the place, the queene came to the campe in great haste vnto him, signifieng that there was a conspiracie begun against him, so that if he toke not the better heed, he was in great danger to fall into the hands of those that sought his life. The king doubting the matter, raised his siege and returned home to prouide the better for his owne suertie, but that preuailed little: for Walter Steward earle of Atholl, and head of the whole conspiracie, pretending euer a right to the crowne, by reason that he was procreat by king Robert the second on his first wife, procured his nephue Robert Steward, and his cosine Robert Graham, to slea the king by one meane or other, which finallie they accomplished in this wise. This Robert Graham, for diuerse wicked acts before committed, contrarie to the lawes and ordinances of the realme, was driuen to an outlawrie, so that if he were taken, he looked for nothing but present death, and therefore hated the king most deadlie. And though by the queenes diligence both his and other of the conspirators purposes were now disappointed, hauing contriued to dispatch the king at the siege of Rockesburgh; yet forsomuch as their names were not knowne, they hoped still to find occasion to atchiue their detestable intention, sith they were no more mistrusted than the others.

Herevpon the said Steward and Graham came one euening to the blacke friers of Perth, where the king as then was lodged, and by licence of the porters comming into the house, entered vp into the gallerie before the kings chamber dore, minding to haue staied there till one of the kings seruants that was priuie to their diuelish purpose should come, by whose helpe they were promised to haue entrie into the chamber. But before the comming of this Judaslike traitor, an other of the kings seruants named Walter Straiton came forth of the chamber dore to haue fetched wine for the king: but being aduised of these two traitors standing there at the dore, either of them hauing a long sword girded to him, he stept backe, and cried, Treason: but yer he could get within the dore to haue made it fast, they leapt vnto him, and slue him there outright.

Whilest this was a doing, not without great noise & rumbling, a yong virgin named Katharine Dowglasse (that was after maried to Alexander Louell of Bolunnie) got to the dore, and shut it: but because the barre was awaie that should haue made it fast, she thrust hir arme in the place where the bar should haue passed: she was but yong, and hir bones not strong, but rather tender as a gristle, and therefore hir arme was sone crasht in sunder, and the dore broken vp by force. Herewith entering the chamber, they slue such of the seruants as made defense, and then the king himselfe with manie cruell and deadlie wounds [at 28 seuerall blowes.] The queene was also hurt as she was about to saue hir husband. Patrike Dunbar, brother to George sometime earle of March, was left for dead on the flore, by reason of such wounds as he receiued in the kings defense, doing most manfullie his vttermost deuoire to haue preserued him from the murtherers hands. Thus was James the first murthered the 21 day of Februarie, the 44 yeere of his age, the 13 of his reigne, and from the incarnation of Christ 1436. His bodie was buried in the house of the Chartarars at Perth which he founded in his life time, but had not as yet throughlie finished.

* Of this James I find written in his singular commendation, that he was for proportion of bodie of the middle stature, with broad shoulders, hauing the other parts also answering thereunto, as they neither seemed monstruous big to be wondered at, nor extreme small to be scoffed at; but caried the maiestie of a person, whome Aeneas Syluius (expressing the most excellent conformitie of members in this our king) doth terme to be squared or of euen proportion tion, as the parts of a quadrangle or iuſt ſquare dw anſwer ech other, ſo that nature ſéemeth not to haue framed a creature more apt or excellent than he, either for ſhape of bodie, or for kinglie maieſtie. He did manie times imbrace iuſtice more ſtreictlie and ſeuerelie, than well became a king, which ought to be called (and ſo in truth to be) the father and nouriſher of the common wealth. For he ſéemed ſo exactlie to meaſure all things by the rule of iuſtice, that he is ſaid (within the ſpace of thrée yéeres) to haue executed thrée thouſand perſons for their committed offenſes. Although this may rather ſéeme to be a ſlander (than otherwiſe) grounded vpon no foundation, ſince all things ſéemed to haue béene performed by him in reſpect of ſincere zeale of iuſtice, whereof this may be a ſufficient argument, that he was of ſo mild and ſwéet nature, that we read not of anie of our princes that did more reuerentlie imbrace peace at home amongſt his ſubiects, or more willinglie conclude the ſame abroad with ſtrangers. What ſhall I ſay of his wiſedome, which in manie and the greateſt affaires did ſo manifeſtlie appéere, that the kings of other nations did ioine in league and friendſhip with him? Of which wiſedome, and of other his vertues (although he obteined part by the benefit of nature) he got the greateſt ſumme by the learning & inſtruction which he purchaſed in England, when he was priſoner: at what time he was by the commandement of Henrie the king moſt diligentlie inſtructed. For he was there by the kings beneuolence ſo well trained in all ſciences and gentlemanlie actiuitie, with the diligence of good ſchoolemaiſters, that it is not eaſie to iudge what ſcience he beſt vnderſtood: for beſide that he had ſkill in all kinds of muſike (but moſt excellent in plaieng on the harpe) he was ſo good an orator, that nothing might be more artificiall than that which he ſpake: againe, he was a rare poet, in which he ſéemed not ſo much cunning by art, as furthered by nature, which is ſufficientlie proued by verſes of diuerſe kinds (at this day remaining) compoſed by him (in Scotiſh méeter) with that ſingular art, as he is thought fullie to equall the ſharpeneſſe, grauitie, and wiſedome of the ancient poets.

Buchan. alſo ſaith he wrote Latine verſes with ſuch good grace, as the rudeneſſe of that age permitted.

It is ſtrange that I ſaie, and far beyond the diligence of the princes of our time, yea and almoſt beyond the opinion of men: but yet moſt true and confirmed by the teſtimonie of them which knew him well: and therefore to be written to his perpetuall praiſe. He did ſo exactlie in mind and memorie comprehend the depth of diuinitie and law, that therein he excelled manie, & in his time gaue not place to anie: to conclude, there was nothing wherein the commendation of wit conſiſted, or wherein anie ſhew of the liberall arts appeared, that he would not with great diligence aplie his indeuor for the knowledge thereof, yea and that ſometime to all mechanicall or handis-craft labors which were méet for a free man, which he is ſaid moſt ſtudiouſlie to haue followed. But in the end, iudging it ouer baſe for kinglie maieſtie to be exerciſed in theſe meane & inferior knowledges, he cauſed artificers of all ſorts to be brought out of England, Flanders, and other nations, which ſhould inſtruct our people therein; for by that means he perſuaded himſelfe he ſhould in the end calme the rough maners of his nation, and that with theſe mild arts they would alſo receiue a mild and ſwéete condition of life & maners. Wherefore I may well ſay; O moſt happie common-wealth which was gouerned by ſo worthie a prince: & may iuſtlie exclame; O you moſt fierce and wicked rebels, that would by murther take away ſuch an honor, beautie, and piller of the common-wealth. Now, beſides manie other things by him done, I will here (being better late than neuer) ſet downe this (not touched before) which is, that he was not onlie a beautie to his countrie, in prouiding for his people to liue at quiet within dores; but he alſo ſought for the defenſe of his realme againſt his enimies without dores: by artillerie, and other neceſſaries required for the warres. For the inuention of guns happing about his time, or not much before; he cauſed certeine péeces of artillerie to be made beyond the ſeas in Flanders, of which, there was one moſt eſpeciall and great peece called the Lion, on the circumference whereof were theſe verſes ingrauen, teſtifieng the antiquitie in like maner of the ſame: Iohn Maior lib. 6. cap. 13.

The nobles and péeres of the realme right ſorowfull for the death of this James, aſſembled togither, and made ſuch earneſt & diligent ſearch for the traitors before mentioned, that at the length they were apprehended and brought to Edenburgh, where they were executed on this maner. The earle of Atholl, which was not onelie principall in practiſe of this treaſon concerning the kings death, but alſo in times paſt was chiefe of counſell with Robert duke of Albanie, in making away of Dauid the kings eldeſt brother, and after the kings returne forth of England did moſt earneſtlie ſolicit him to put duke Murdo to death, with all other of his linage, truſting that when they were diſpatched, he ſhould find means to rid the king alſo, and his children out of the way, & ſo at length atteine to the crowne without anie obſtacle. This earle (I ſay) was firſt ſtripped of all his clothes, ſaue onelie his ſhirt; and then was an inſtrument of wood, made like to the drawer of a well, ſet faſt in a cart with a frame: at the end of which inſtrument, was the earle faſtened and bound, and ſo caried about the towne, ſometime hoiſed on high, that the people might ſée him aloft in the aire, and ſometime let fall againe with a ſwaie downe vpon the pauement.

After this, being brought to an open place, where moſt reſort of people was, they crowned him with an hot iron, for that (as was ſaid) a witch had told him, that before his death he ſhould be crowned openlie in ſight of the people. Through whoſe illuſion being deceiued, he liued vnder vaine hope to atteine the crowne, directing all his imaginations to compaſſe the means thereto. Thus was he ſerued on the firſt day. On the ſecond day, he was drawen with his complices laid on hurdels, round about the towne at an horſſe taile. The third day, his bellie was ript, and his bowels were taken forth, and throwne into the fire flickering before his eies, & then was his heart pulled forth of his bodie, and throwne likewiſe into the fire: and laſt of all, his head was cut off, and his bodie diuided into foure quarters.

His nephue Robert Steward was not altogither ſo cruellie executed. But Robert Graham, for that it was knowne that he ſlue the king with his owne hands, was put into a cart, the hand that did the déed being faſtened to a paire of gallows, which were raiſed vp in the ſaid cart; and then were thrée perſons appointed to thruſt him through in all parts of his bodie with hot irons, beginning firſt in thoſe places where it was thought no haſtie death would thereof inſue, as in the legs, armes, thighes, & ſhoulders. And thus was he caried through euerie ſtréet of the towne, and tormented in moſt miſerable wiſe, and at length had his bellie ript, and was bowelled and quartered as the other were before. Iames the ſecond.

IAmes the firſt made away through the traitorous practiſe of the earle of Atholl (as before is ſpecified) his eldeſt ſonne James the ſecond of that name being as then but ſix yeares of age ſucceeded to the crowne, as lawfull heire to the ſame, and by his mother and the nobilitie of the realme was brought to Scone, where, by the vniuerſall conſent of the three eſtates he was crowned king of Scotland, being the 102 king of that realme from Ferguſe the firſt. He was ſurnamed James with the fierie face, by reaſon of a broad red ſpot which he had in one of his cheekes. This James at his comming to mans ſtate proued a ſtout prince, and maried the daughter of the duke of Gelderland, as after ſhall appeare. In the beginning he had ſome trouble and buſineſſe, by reaſon of the great authoritie and rule which the high barons of the realme ſought to beare & maintaine, as the Dowglaſſe, and other, but in the end he ſubdued them all.

The daughter of the duke of Gelderland maried to Iames the ſecond.

Shortlie after his coronation, becauſe he was not of himſelfe able to gouerne, by reaſon of his tender age; the nobles and eſtates of the realme choſe ſir Alexander Leuingſton of Calender knight, gouernor of the king and realme, and ſir William Creichton knight was confirmed in his office to inioy the ſame as he before had done, the K. being committed to his keeping, togither with the caſtell of Edenburgh. Archembald earle of Dowglas remained in his countries of Dowglas & Annardale, and would neither obeie gouernor nor chancellor, wherby great trouble was raiſed within the realme. Within a ſhort time alſo, the gouernor and chancellor were diuided. The gouernor with the queene remained at Striueling, but the chancellor had the king ſtill with him in the caſtell of Edenburgh; and what the one commanded to be done, the other forbad: whereby neither of them was obeied, nor anie execution of iuſtice put in practiſe, ſo that through all the countrie, reiſſe, ſpoiles, and oppreſſion were exerciſed without feare of puniſhment. The queene perceiuing ſuch miſchiefe to reigne throughout all parts of the realme, deuiſed a meane to aduance the gouernors ſide, and hereupon with a ſmall companie repaired to Edenburgh, where ſhe to bring hir purpoſe to paſſe, did ſo much by great diſſimulation, that ſhe perſuaded the chancellor to ſuffer hir to enter the caſtell, and to remaine with the king; but within three daies after, ſhe feigned one morning to go on pilgrimage vnto the White kirke, and cauſed the king hir ſonne to be handſomlie couched in a trunke, as if he had beene ſome fardell of his apparell, and ſo packed vp, ſent him by one of hir truſtie ſeruants laid vpon a ſumpter horſſe vnto Lieth, from whence he was conueied by bote vnto Striueling, where, of the gouernor he was ioifullie receiued, commending the queene highlie for hir politike working, in deceiuing ſo wiſe a man as the chancellor was. Then raiſed he a great power of his friends and well-willers, and beſieged the chancellor in the caſtell of Edenburgh.

The king conueied vnto Striueling.

The biſhop perceiuing in what danger he ſtood through the womans deceipt, ſent to the earle of Dowglas, deſiring his aſſiſtance againſt the queene and gouernor. But the earle refuſing either to helpe the one or the other, alledging that they were both ouer ambitious in ſeeking to haue the whole gouernment of the realme in their hands. The chancellor then perceiuing himſelfe deſtitute of all helpe, made agreement with the gouernor, vnder certeine conditions, that he ſhould reteine ſtill the caſtell of Edenburgh vnder his poſſeſſion, and likewiſe continue ſtill in his office of chancellor. Shortlie after the earle of Dowglaſſe deceaſſed at Leſtelricke, in the yeare 1439, againſt whome aſwell the gouernor as chancellor had conceiued great hatred. He left behind him a ſonne (begot of the earle of Crawfords daughter) named William, a child of fourteene yeares of age, who ſucceeded his father in the earldome of Dowglaſſe, appearing at the firſt to be well inclined of nature, but afterwards by euill companie he waxed wild and inſolent.

About this ſeaſon, James Steward ſonne to the lord of Lorne, maried the queene Dowager, and fauored the earle Dowglaſſe in his vnrulie demeanor: whereupon, both the ſaid James and his brother William, with the queene, were committed to priſon in the caſtell of Striueling by the gouernors appointment; but ſhortlie after they were releaſed by the ſute of the lord chancellor, ſir William Creichton, and Alexander Seton of Gurdon, who became ſuerties for their good abearing, vnder great forfeiture of ſufficient band. About the ſame time, or rather somewhat before, Alane Steward lord of Dernlie was ſlaine at Palmais thorne, by ſir Thomas Boid. And in the yeare following, the ſame ſir Thomas was ſlaine by Alexander Steward of Bolmet and his ſonnes; where through there roſe great troubles in the weſt part of Scotland. William earle of Dowglaſſe ſent Malcolme Fleming of Cumernald, and Alane of Lowder, vnto Charles the ſeuenth, king of France, to obteine of him the duchie of Towraine, which was giuen to Archembald Dowglaſſe at the battell of Vernoill in Perth; and the laſt earle, father to this earle William, had inioied the ſame all his life time, whereupon that ſute was the ſoner obteined: which made the yoong earle more inſolent than before.

Alane Steward is ſlain.

He kept ſuch a port, and vſed to haue ſuch a traine attending vpon him, ſpeciallie when he came to the court, that it ſhould ſeeme he had the king in ſmall regard; for he thought himſelfe ſafe inough in mainteining the like ſtate and port, or rather greater than euer his father at anie time had mainteined before him: inſomuch as he would ride with two thouſand horſſe, of the which number there were diuerſe errant theeues and robbers, that were borne out in their vnlawfull and wicked practiſes by the ſame earls. Certeine captens of the Iles, as Lachlane, Makelaine, and Murdac Gipſon, with a wicked number of the inhabitants of the ſame Iles, harried, ſpoiled, and burnt the countrie of Lenor, and ſlue John Colquhouen lord of Lute vnder aſſurance. They alſo ſlue women and children, without reſpect to age or ſex. In this yeare chanced a great dearth in Scotland, the like was neuer heard of before, and ſuch a death by peſtilence, that few eſcaped that were taken therewith, and ſo the realme was plagued with reiſſe, reiſſe, oppreſſion, dearth, and death of people. This yeare alſo the gouernor toke the whole adminiſtration vpon him, wherewith the chancellor was diſpleaſed, and leauing the king and him in Striueling, repaired to Edenburgh, where he deuiſed the way how to recouer the king from the gouernor, and ſo on a morning toke foure and twentie men with him, and rode to the parke of Striueling where the king was then hunting, and the gouernor abſent at Perth.

Fr. Thin. Buchan. lib. 11.

*At what time the chancellor with great courteſie drawing towards the king, did ſalute him, being in ſome feare to ſée ſuch companie come vnto him, hauing ſo few in his traine. Which when the chancellor perceiued, he praied the king to be of good comfort, and in few words (fit for that time) exhorted him that he ſhould looke to himſelfe and the kingdome, and deliuer himſelfe from the impriſonment of Alexander the gouernor, liuing freélie from henceforth after a kinglie maner; that he ſhould not accuſtome himſelfe to obeie the pleaſure and couetouſnes of others, that he ſhould vſe to command his ſubiects in all iuſt and lawfull cauſes; and that he ſhould deliuer his people from theſe euils which increaſed vpon them, by the ambition and couetouſneſſe of the rulers, which he could not now well remedie or reſiſt, except the king would take on him the gouernement, the which to doo, he had without all danger or trouble prouided a meane. For he had in a readineſſe ſufficient number therefore, which ſhould attend vpon the king where ſo euer he would go, or to vſe anie other matter as néed ſhould require. Which the king taking with a pleaſant countenance (either becauſe the matter liked him well, or to diſſemble the feare he had of the chancellor) did fullie approue, and went with his ſmall vnarmed companie and the chancellor toward Edenburgh.)

The king went with the chancellor to Edenburgh.

The chancellor (as Hector Boetius ſaith) had cauſed the number of foure thouſand horſſemen of his ſeruants, tenants, and friends, ſecretlie to be readie that morning about the town of Striueling, to reſiſt his aduerſaries if they ſhould haue vſed anie force againſt him: and now vnderſtanding of the kings going thus with the chancellor, they came to him on the way, and attending him, brought him ſafelie and without further trouble vnto Edenburgh, where he was ioifullie receiued. The gouernor when he was aduertiſed hereof, was grieuouſlie diſpleaſed; but becauſe he knew not how to remedie the matter, he went to Edenburgh, and there got John Innes biſhop of Murrey, and Henrie Lichton biſhop of Aberdene, to labor ſome agreement betwixt him and the chancellor: which they did in this wiſe: the king to remaine in the kéeping of the chancellor, and the gouernor to continue his office. And ſo by this accord they were made friends.

The gouernor and chancellor are made friends.

Fr. Thin. Leſleus lib. 8. pag. 294. Buchan. lib. 11.

*During which turmoiles, William Dowglaſſe (that with a certeine pride of mind had highlie borne himſelfe, diſobeieng the rule of the gouernor, & diſdaining to ioine in ſocietie of the chancellor) did vew the dedlie hatred of them both againſt him; for which cauſe they ſéeke by all means vtterlie to take him awaie. For the doing whereof (to the end it might be performed without anie tumult) they appoint a parlement to be holden at Edenburgh; whither came not a few (as at other times in ſuch aſſemblies it alwaies happeneth) but almoſt the whole countries came flocking thither, to complaine of the iniuries which they had receiued: of which ſort, there was ſuch a miſerable ſhew, that men could not behold the ſame without great motion of a pitifull mind: when euerie one for himſelfe, the father for the children, the children for the fathers, and the widows for their husbands, did complaine that they were by the robbers ſpoiled of all their ſubſtance. Wherevpon (as it happeneth alwaies through pietie of gentle harts, to rue the afflicted) there aroſe great enuie againſt the capteins and leaders of the wicked doers of ſuch ſpoile, whoſe euils were now growne to ſuch exceſſe, as by no means they might be ſuffered; whoſe factions were ſo largelie ſpread ouer the realme, that none could defend their life or liuehod: but ſuch as did yéeld themſelues to their actions, and whoſe riches were ſo increaſed, as the weake could not well find anie helpe (in the authoritie of the magiſtrate) againſt their violence.

Wherevpon it liked the wiſer ſort (ſince their force ſéemed not almoſt able to be broken, or their parts to be ſeuered) to flie to policie and leaue ſtrength, not daring openlie to call the earle Dowglaſſe by that name of capteine of them, although they well knew him to be the chiefe author and fautor of thoſe people. Wherefore the gouernor and the chancellor (for a time diſſembling the hatred which they harboured againſt Dowglaſſe) perſuaded the whole parlement, that it were more conuenient with faire ſpéeches to pacifie Dowglaſſe, than with ſhew of ſuſpicious and euill words to ſtirre him to further heat: eſpeciallie conſidering that he was of that great wealth and power, that he alone, if he ſtood againſt them, might hinder all the decrees of the parlement: but if hée ioined with the nobilitie, there might be eaſie remedie found to ſalue all theſe preſent euils. Through which wiſe and ſubtill perſuaſion of Alexander the gouernour, it was decréed amongſt them, that there ſhould be honourable letters directed to him in the common & ſpeciall name of all the nobilitie, which ſhould admoniſh him, that being mindfull of the honorable place which he poſſeſſed (and of his worthie anceſtors, by whome the common-wealth of Scotland had receiued manie ſingular benefits) hée ſhould repaire to the parlement, which well could not, and willinglie would not, either kéepe or determine any thing in the ſame without his preſence. In which aſſemblie, if hée would complaine of anie wrongs or griefes offered vnto him, hée ſhould be ſatiſfied ſo fullie as they might lawfullie.

And if he or anie of his friends or familie had committed anie diſordered part, the nobilitie there met would fullie remit the ſame, as well for the nobilitie of his, and the worthie memorie of the déeds done by his anceſtors; as for that they rather attributed ſuch actions to the iniurie of the times, and the frailtie of his age, and the perſuaſion of others, than vnto him, of whome there was conceiued a ſingular hope of great towardneſſe, for the aduancement of his name and benefit of his countrie. Therfore if he would come and ioine with them, he ſhould receiue in gouernement what part, place, and office of the common-wealth pleaſeth him, to the end that as in times paſt, their countrie had béene manie waies deliuered out of moſt heauie dangers by the hand of the Dowglaſſes, ſo at this preſent, the ſame might alſo by his preſence and furtherance, be againe aduanced and ſtrengthened from and againſt thoſe inteſtine euils wherewithall it now fainted. The yong man (by nature and age gréedie of glorie) being moued with theſe flatteries, and the other perſuaſions of his friends (whereof euerie one was blinded with a certeine hope of good to happen to himſelfe) they now déemed it beſt (forgetting all former dangers) to thinke vpon their priuate commodities, and with that reſolution toke their iournie to come to the parlement.

The chancellor when he vnderſtood they were on there way, rode forth of Edenburgh manie miles to méet the Dowglaſſe, and courteouſlie inuited the earle to his caſtell of Creichton, which laie in his waie as he should ride, at which place he was most honourablie interteined by the chancellor. Where, when they had remained two daies, the chancellor (after hée had shewed manie tokens of a friendlie mind vnto him) bicause he would vtterlie banish from the earle all suspicion of him, that he had anie mislike in the said earle) began familiarlie to persuade him, that (remembring the kings dignitie, and the office of him whome the lot of inheritance, their countrie lawes, and the consent of the parlisment had aduanced to the gouernement and administration of all things) he should in all humilitie acknowledge him for his chiefe lord and king; that he would permit the large patrimonie obteined by the blood of his ancestors to descend to posteritie by lineall inheritance as he himselfe receiued it; that he would clearelie deliuer the name and familie of the Dowglasses (no lesse famous for their dutie, than their déeds) not onelie from the filthie spot of treason, but also from all note of suspicion thereof; that he would refraine himselfe and his from offering iniuries to the weake and common people; that he would remoue from him all such as were giuen to robberie and spoile; that he would from henceforth applie himselfe to the defense of iustice, to the end that his former offenses (if there were anie) might rather be attributed to euill counsell of the wicked, than to the naturall disposition of himselfe: for so the repentance of his yong yéeres might be taken for proofe of his innocencie in such euils. With these and such like spéeches, declaring the faith of a welwilling mind, he allured the earle to come to Edenburgh with Dauid his brother partaker of all his counsels and actions.

This faire tale of the chancellor, more than in times past or then beséemed the place which he possessed, with the manie messengers sent to him from Alexander the gouernor (to meet him on the way) almost euerie houre, draue a déepe suspicion in the heads of the earles companie riding with him to Edenburgh, of some trecherie to be ment towards him. Wherevpon the same began to be blundered from one to another of the traine, and came so fast to the friends of Dowglasse, that some of them did boldlie and liberallie admonish him, that he should remaine in that purpose (which once he did) to staie, to returne, and not to go forward with the chancellor: and at the least (if he would aduenture himselfe) to send home his brother Dauid, to the end that hée might not hazard the whole familie vnder the fortune of one stroke, as his father had before admonished him when he died. Whereat the vnaduised youth of this man, being moued to anger against his friends, did by the voices of some of his men (as it were by one that should make proclamation therfore) pacifie the secret murmurings that were amongest the companie; and answered such of his friends as found fault therewith, that he sufficientlie knew, that it was the common plague of all great families, alwaies to haue such men about them, as being impatient of quiet and ease, respect not the danger and miserie of their patrons, so it maie be commoditie vnto them: who bicause (they would not be restreined within the bounds of peacefull lawes) are authors of sedition, in which (when all things are in turmoile) they may the better wander abroad to satisfie their euill humor: whose speaches hée regarded not, since hæ rather respected and trusted the approued wisedome of the chancellor and the governor, than the slouthfull & rash minds of such seditious persons.

After which (to cut awaie occasion from the rest to answer) he set spurres to his horsse, and hastened his iourneie more than he did before, with his brother and a few of his other friends, taking his right course into the castell, and (as it were by a certeine destinie) casting himselfe hedlong into the snares of his enimies. At such time as he came to the castell, the gouernor (according to his promise) was readie there to méet him, to the end the matter might séeme to be wrought by common consent, and the weight of so great enuie might not light vpon the head of one man. Dowglasse being honorablie and friendlie by the gouernor receiued into the castell, was for dinner placed at the kings table. But in the middest of this sweet meat (sower sawce being prepared) there was a bulles head set before him, which in those daies was a signe of death. Wherewith the yong man amazed (and greatlie troubled in his mind, inwardlie repenting that he followed not the aduise of his followers) was about to rise from the table: but being apprehended by armed men (appointed to that function) he was caried into the court nert to the castell, and was there (in reuenge and punishment of his vnbrideled youth) beheaded, with his brother Dauid, and Malcolme Fleming, who (next vnto his brother) was in greatest credit with him. Whose death the king now entring into his adolescencie or yéers (as we tearme it) of discretion, is said heauilie with teares to lament, which the chancellor (grieuing to sée) did greatlie rebuke in the king such vntimelie and inordinate mourning, for the death of his and the common-wealths enimie, whose life (said hée) would haue taken awaie all peace and tranquillitie in the realme.)

After the death of the said earle, the state of the realme became more quiet: for his vncle James Dowglasse baron of Abircorne that succéeded him, being a man of great stature, and verie fat, gaue himselfe to quietnesse, and liued but three yeres after. The foresaid William had but one sister, that was called the faire maiden of Galloway, and was maried to one William Dowglasse, sonne to this earle James before his decease, that the heritage should not be diuided: bicause the earledome of Dowglasse was intailed vpon the heires male, and the lands of Wigton, Balwanie, Annardale; and Dzmont remained to hir as heire generall. This earle William, after the decease of his father earle James, began to war vnrulie, and to follow the vntoward maners of the other William Dowglasse latelie beheaded (as before ye haue heard) so that by support manie disobedient persons would not obeie the gouernor and chancellor, wher vpon sundrie great slaughters and oppressions were committed.

In the yéere 1443, not manie daies after, the castell of Dunbreton (which is not by strength to be subdued) was twise taken within a few daies: for Robert Semplier that was capteine of the inferior castell, 1443.

ſtell, and Patrike Galbꝛith capteine of the higher caſtell, did ſo diuide their gouernement of the ſaid caſtell (being a thing of great circuit) that euerie one had a peculiar and ſeuered entrance into his owne part without offenſe of the other. But yet theſe two (as moſt part of the realme of Scotland then was, and as it alwaies, oꝛ moſt commonlie happeneth in the minoꝛitie of the pꝛince, when euerie one will be a king) wanted not their factions, whome they did follow: foꝛ Patrike was ſecretlie thought to fauour Dowglaſſe, foꝛ which cauſe Semplier, oꝛ (as ſome haue Simplie) the other capteine perceiuing the part of the caſtell wherein Patrike ruled to be moꝛe negligentlie kept, than durſt oꝛ the ſtate of the time required, found oppoꝛtunitie to expell Patrike from thence, and to cauſe all his furniture to be caried out of the ſame, conuerting the ſaid caſtell to his owne vſe. In the end (the nexꝛt day after) Patrike vnderſtanding thereof, and comming with foure vnarmed perſons (to fetch awaie his furniture and houſhold-ſtuffe) entered into the caſtell; and firſt finding the poꝛter alone, turned him awaie, then taking armoꝛ, expelled the others out of the higher caſtell: after which, calling aid out of the towne nexꝛt adioining, he ſhut them alſo out of the inferioꝛ caſtell, and got poſſeſſion of the whole caſtell to himſelfe.)

1444. The king will rule himſelfe.

The king, after he came to the age of fouretéene yéeres, would not anie longer be vnder the gouernement of others, but toke the rule vpon himſelfe. The earle of Dowglaſſe informed thereof, came to him at Striueling, and put himſelfe and all he had to remaine at his pleaſure: wherevpon the king receiued him, pardoned all his paſſed miſdemeanoꝛs, and admitted him to be one of his ſpeciall friends and pꝛiuie councelloꝛs in all his affaires. By his perſuaſion ſhoꝛtlie after, ſir Alexander Leuingſton, & William Creichton being diſcharged of their offices, were alſo put off from the councell, and all their friends baniſhed the court, and they themſelues were ſummoned to appéere beforꝛe the king: which becauſe they refuſed to doo, they were pꝛoclamed rebels, and put to the hoꝛne. The earle Dowglaſſe then foꝛ the old grudge he bare them, raiſed an armie, and harried their lands. In reuenge wherof, ſir William Creichton ſpoiled the earle of Dowglaſſe his lands, ſo that great trouble was raiſed thꝛough the whole countrie, and the lands of Strabꝛoke, Abircoꝛne, & the towne of Blackneſh were burnt and deſtroied.

1445. Leſle.

The earle of Dowglaſſe ruled wholie about the king, & made Archembald his bꝛother earle of Murrey, by ioining him in mariage with a ladie of the houſe of Dunbar inheretrix therof. Moꝛouer, Hugh Dowglaſſe was made earle of Oꝛmont. Thus the earle of Dowglaſſe aduanced his name, and ioined in friendſhip with the earle of Crawfoꝛd, with Donald earle of the Iles, and with the earle of Roſſe, to the end that ech of them ſhould be aſſiſtant to others. In this meane time, the earle of Crawfoꝛd at the requeſt of the earle of Dowglas, toke a great pꝛeie of goods out of the biſhop of S. Andꝛews lands in Fife, which biſhop was called James Kenedie, ſiſters ſon to king James the firſt: where thꝛough the earle of Crawfoꝛd on the one part, and the earle of Huntleie with the Ogiluies on the other, met at Arbꝛoth in ſet battell, where the earle of Crawfoꝛd was ſlaine, and diuerſe barons on his ſide, although the victoꝛie and field remained with his ſonne, the maiſter of Crawfoꝛd, who ſuccœded his father, and was called earle Beirdie. On the earle of Huntleies ſide were ſlaine, John Foꝛbes of Petſlege, Alexander Berkleie of Gartulie, Robert Marwell of Teline, William Gurdun of Burrowfield, ſir John Oliphant of Aberdagie, and fiue hundꝛed moꝛe on their ſide, and one hundꝛed of the victoꝛers were alſo ſlaine, as Hector Boetius ſaith.

The ſame wꝛiter repoꝛteth that the occaſion of this battell did chance, thꝛough the variance that fell out betwixt the earle of Crawfoꝛds eldeſt ſonne Alexander Lindſeie, and Alexander Ogilbie oꝛ Ogiluie (as ſome wꝛite him) about the office of the bailiffewike of Arbꝛoth, the which the maiſter of Crawfoꝛd inioieng, was diſplaced and put out by the ſaid Ogiluie. Wherevpon the maiſter of Crawfoꝛd, to recouer his right (as he toke it) got a power togither with helpe of the Hamiltons, and with the ſame ſeized vpon the abbeie, and Ogiluie with helpe of the earle of Huntlie, came thither with an armie to recouer the place againe out of his aduerſaries hands, and ſo vpon knowledge hereof giuen vnto the earle of Crawfoꝛd, he himſelfe comming from Dundee vnto Arbꝛoth, at the verie inſtant when the battels were readie to ioine, cauſed firſt his ſonne to ſtaie; and after calling fꝛoth ſir Alexander Ogiluie to talke with him, in purpoſe to haue made peace betwixt him and his ſonne, was thꝛuſt into the mouth with a ſpeare, by a common ſouldier that knew nothing what his demand ment, ſo that he fell downe therewith, and pꝛeſentlie died in the place: wherevpon togither the parties went incontinentlie without moꝛe pꝛotracting of time, and ſo fought with ſuch ſucceſſe, as beforꝛe ye haue heard. The earle of Huntleie eſcaped by flight: but Alexander Ogiluie being taken and ſoꝛe wounded, was led to the caſtell of Fineluin, where ſhoꝛtlie after he died of his hurts. This battell was fought the 24 of Januarie, in the yéere of our Loꝛd 1445.

* The king thus ruled by the trope of the Dowglaſſes, the earle Dowglaſſe ſent to ſir William Creichton knight, to deliuer vp the caſtell of Edenburgh. But Creichton (ſaieng that the caſtell was committed to his gouernement by the whole realme, and that the king had not anie thing to doo therewith vntill he came to his full age) had all his goods fꝛoth-with confiſcat to the kings vſe, with his caſtell of Creichton, which the kings people entered into and poſſeſſed. But leaſt they ſhould ſéeme to offer anie manifeſt wꝛong to the ſaid Creichton, they gaue out the ſame edict (as a veile of their malice and enuie) which Creichton had beforꝛe cauſed to be eſtabliſhed and pꝛoclamed. Foꝛ he firſt of all others made a law, that whoſoeuer did denie oꝛ reſiſt the king, demanding the deliuerie of anie caſtell, ſhould be in danger of treaſon; the bꝛeach and execution of which law did firſt come and fall by and vpon him, by whome that might be woꝛthilie ſaid (which is vſed to be ſpoken in common pꝛouerbe) Ye is fallen into the ſnare which he pꝛepared foꝛ others. Wherevpon the Dowglaſſe (ſince the caſtell would not otherwiſe be deliuered) ſharplie beſieged the ſame by the ſpace of nine moneths, which in the end Creichton ſurrendered into his hands, on certeine conditions to be perfoꝛmed. At which time alſo the ſaid Creichton was reinueſted with the honoꝛ of the chancelloꝛſhip, although he neuer after intangled himſelfe with affaires of the kingdome, hoping that in time to come (when the darke clouds of the wicked men, which had now ouerſpꝛead all things, were ouerblowen) a better foꝛme of gouernement would be bꝛought in, as a certeine light to giue ſhine to the common-wealth.

The woman being credulous (and ignorant that Robert Boid was preſent at the death of hir husband) and caried out of Cardroſſe, into the Dunbreton caſtell, might eaſilie perceiue hir ſelfe hardlie beſet on euerie ſide by the deceipt of hir enimies, who (being ſo deceiued and ouercome with feare & griefe) was deliuered of child before hir time, and (togither with hir ſonne) died there within few houres after.

James Steward is baniſhed the realme. Sir James Steward ſurnamed the Blacke knight, husband to the queene the kings mother, was baniſhed the realme for ſpeaking words againſt the miſgouernement of the king and realme, wherewith he offended the earle of Dowglaſſe. As he paſſed the ſeas towards Flanders, he was taken by the Flemings, & ſhortlie after departed this life. The queene his wife being aduertiſed of his death, died alſo within a while after, and was buried in the Charterhouſe of Perth the fiftéenth of Julie, in the yeere 1446. Hir name was Jane Summerſet, daughter to the earle of Summerſet. James the firſt maried hir (as before ye may read) in England. She had by him eight children, two ſonnes, and ſir daughters, which were all honorablie maried: the firſt named Margaret, to the Dolphin of France: the ſecond Eleanor, to the duke of Britaine: the third, to the lord of Terucer in Zeland: the fourth, to the duke of Auſtrich: the fift, to the earle of Huntleie: and the firt, to the earle of Morton. And by James Steward hir ſecond husband, ſhe had three ſonnes: John earle of Atholl, James earle of Buchquhane, and Andrew biſhop of Murrey.

Sone after, ſir William Creichton, with the biſhop of Dunkeld, and Nicholas Oterburne a canon of Glaſcow, were ſent in ambaſſage vnto the duke of Gelderland, for his daughter called Marie, to be ioined in mariage with king James. Their ſute was obteined, and the ladie ſent into Scotland noblie accompanied with diuerſe lords both ſpirituall and temporall. At hir arriuall ſhe was receiued by the king with great triumph, and the mariage ſolemnized by the aſſiſtance of all the nobles of Scotland, with great banketting, ioifull mirth, and all pleaſant intertainment of thoſe ſtrangers that might be.

1447. 1448. Leſle. In the yeere 1447, there was a parlement holden at Edenburgh, in the which ſir Alexander Leuingſton of Kalendar late gouernour, James Dundas and Robert Dundas knights, at the purſute of the earle of Dowglaſſe were forfalted and condemned to perpetuall priſon in Dunbreton, and James Leuingſton his eldeſt ſonne, Robert Leuingſton treaſuror, and Dauid Leuingſton knights, loſt their heads. James before his execution made a verie wiſe declaration to the ſtanders by, declaring the vnſtabilitie of fortune, and change of court, exhorting all perſons to beware thereof; ſith enuie euer followed high eſtate, and wicked malice neuer ſuffered good men to gouerne long. In the ſame parlement, ſir William Creichton was alſo forfalted for diuerſe cauſes, but principallie for that his ſeruants would not deliuer the houſe of Creichton to the kings herald, who charged them ſo to do. This forfalture was concluded in parlement by vertue of an act which the ſaid William (when he was chancellor) cauſed to be made, and ſo being the firſt inuentor, was alſo the firſt againſt whome it was practiſed.

James Leuingſton made an oration. W. Creichton condemned.

Incurſions made. 1448. The yéere next inſuing were ſundrie incurſions made betwixt Scots and Engliſhmen on the borders, Dunfreis was burnt, and likewiſe Anwike in England: but ſhortlie after a truce was concluded for ſeuen yéeres, great offers of friendſhip made by the Engliſhmen for to haue the wars ceaſſe on that ſide, becauſe the warre betwixt them and France was verie hotlie purſued, and ciuill diſſention diſquieted the ſtate of England, which was raiſed betwixt the two houſes of Lancaſter & Yorke. * This yeere there were manie meetings or parlements of the nobilitie, in which were lawes eſtabliſhed for bridleing the wicked facts of ſuch as applied themſelues to ſpoiling of other men; whereupon a long peace followed in Scotland: beſide which, there were other lawes made for auoiding of treaſons, and chieflie of ſuch as touched the kinglie maieſtie. This lawe of treaſon was afterward executed firſt vpon Dowglaſſe, which was author thereof. In this parlement were manie earles and lords created, whereof the chiefe were Alexander Seton baron of Gordon, who was made earle of Huntleie, and George Leſlie baron was made earle of Rothſaie, both men ſingularlie famed for their wiſedome and valure.)

Engliſhmen fetch bowties out of Scotland. 1450. The Engliſhmen borderers of the weſt marches fetched a great bowtie of cattell out of Scotland, notwithſtanding the truce, in reuenge wherof the Scots inuading England, waſted the countrie, burnt townes and villages, ſlue the people, & with a great preie of priſoners, goods, and cattell, returned home into Scotland. Herewith followed dailie rodes and forraies made on both ſides betwixt the Scots and Engliſhmen, and that with ſuch rage and crueltie, that a great part of Cumberland was in manner laied waſt: for on that ſide the Scots chieflie made their inuaſions, becauſe that from thence the firſt occaſion of all this miſchiefe might ſéeme to haue had the beginning. When ſuch things were certified to the king of Englands councell, an armie was appointed forthwith to inuade Scotland, vnder the leading of the earle of Northumberland, and of one Magnus ſurnamed Redberd, a captéine of great experience, as he that had béene trained vp from his youth in the warres of France. The Scots, becauſe of his long red berd, called him in ſcorne and deriſion, Magnus with the red mane.

The Scots hearing of the approch of this armie towards their borders, leuied a power: George, or rather Hugh Dowglaſſe earle of Dzmont by the kings commiſſion, hauing the conduction thereof, who vnderſtanding that the enimies would enter into Annardale, drew thither with the ſaid armie to reſiſt their attempts. The Engliſhmen paſſing ouer the riuer of Sulweie and Annand, came to another riuer called Sare, & there pitched downe their tents. And on the next day they began to rob and ſpoile the countrie on ech ſide: but aduertiſed that the Scots were at hand with an armie, they that were thus gone forth, were with all ſpéed called backe to the campe by sound of trumpet, and forthwith their armie was brought into order of battell. Magnus with the red mane was appointed to lead the right wing, and sir John Penneinton a verie skilfull warriour gouerned the left wing, in the which the Welshmen were placed. The battell or middle ward the earle of Northumberland himselfe ruled.

Sir John Penneinton.

The earle of Ormont on the other side ordered his battels in this wise. He appointed a verie valiant knight called Wallase of Craggie, with an hardie number of souldiers to incounter with Magnus. And against the Welshmen he placed the lord Marwell, and lord Johnston, with a chosen companie of lustie Scotishmen, and commanding himselfe in the battell or middle ward, had scarse set his people in araie, when the trumpets in the English armie began to sound to the battell. He therefore exhorting his men to dw valiantlie, put them in remembrance that they had put on armor, being thereto prouoked by iniurie which their enimies had first offered them, whereupon they might conceiue good hope of victorie by the fauour of the righteous God, who giueth the vpper hand (for the most part) to that side that hath iust cause to make warre. He willed them then to put all feare out of their harts; and as they had force inough to vanquish their enimies that came thus to brag and threaten them with vtter destruction: so he besought them to shew no lesse manlike stomachs to deliuer their countrie by hardie fight from iniurie of the same enimies.

The battell is begun.

He had no sooner made an end of his speech, but that the arrowes came so thicke from the English archers, that the Scots began to looke about them, as it were to see which waie they might best escape by flight. But Wallase perceiuing their faintnesse of courage, with lowd voice reproued their cowardise, and with most pithie words exhorted them to remember their duties, and to follow the example of him their leader, whome they should perceiue to haue fullie vowed to spend his life in defense of his countrie. The Scots heerwith seemed to be so incouraged, that they rushed forward with great egernesse vpon the right wing of the Englishmen where Magnus stood, and so laied about them with speares, axes, and such like hand weapons, that with great slaughter they draue the Englishmen to breake araie and to flee: Magnus heerewith being more chafed than afraid, as should appeere, preassed forward vpon Wallase with great violence, and seeking to approch vnto him that he might haue wroken his griefe vpon him, was inclosed among the Scotish troopes, and slaine with a few other of his friends and seruants that followed him.

Magnus is slaine.

The slaughter of this man, in whome consisted no small hope of victorie on the English part, put the residue of their armie in such feare, that they were not able longer to resist the Scotishmens violent impression, but turning their backs fled amaine, whom the Scots pursued in chase verie fiercelie, so that manie of the Englishmen died in the battell, but more now in the chase: for the tide being come in, staied manie of them that made their course to haue escaped thorough the riuer, whereby diuerse that ventured into the water were drowned; & other that durst not take the water, were oppressed by the Scots that followed them. There died in this battell of English men, to the number neere hand of three thousand, and amongest other, Magnus (as before ye haue heard) with eleuen other knights of no small account and estimation. Of Scots were lost somewhat aboue six hundred. There were taken prisoners of Englishmen sir John Penneinton, and sir Robert Harington knights, and the lord Persie, sonne to the earle of Northumberland, who holpe his father to horsbacke, whereby he escaped by flight: & beside these, a great number of other were by the Scots taken prisoners, whome the sword and water had spared.

The earle of Ormont hauing got this honorable victorie, conueied the chiefest of the prisoners to the castle of Lochmaben, and after repaired to the court, where he was of the king ioifullie receiued, honorablie feasted, and highlie rewarded. After this, the Scots that dwelled vpon the borders, liued for a season in better quiet: for though the Englishmen wished to haue beene reuenged for this losse and ouerthrow of their people, yet by reson of ciuill wars that shortlie after followed, they were constreined to forbeare to make anie further wars against the Scots, till better occasion might serue. And for the auoiding of danger that might insue in time of this intestine trouble by forren enimies, they sued to haue a truce with the Scots, which for the terme of three yeares was granted. In this yeare, William earle of Dowglasse, with a great companie of nobles and gentlemen, as the lords Hamilton, Graie, Salton, Seiton, and Oliphant; also, Calder, Urquhart, Cambell, Frasier, and Lauder, knights, went into Italie, and was at Rome in time of the Jubile which was kept there that yeare. He left behind him to gouerne his lands in Scotland, Hugh earle of Ormont that was his brother: but in his absence (by counsell of such as were about him) the king summoned the erle to appeare before him within 40 daies; & because he came not within that set time, he was put to the horne, & his lands inuaded & spoiled.

*Whereupon the king sent William Sentclare earle of Orcades at that time chancellor first into Galloway, and then into Dowglasse, where he appointed collectors to take vp (to the kings vse) the reuenues of the Dowglasse. But when Sentclare was not of sufficient strength to performe what he would, because some & the most part reiected (though others imbraced) him, he returned home without doing anie thing. Wherewith the king greatlie moued (because he saw his authoritie contemned) called all the Dowglasses into law, and declared them publike enimies and detractors of his gouernement. And therevpon (prouiding an armie against them) he goeth into Galloway: where, at their first comming (since their capteins were all in prison) a small part of the armie (seeing the enimies dispersed into rougher parts of the countrie to hide themselues) turned backe to the king without anie thing done. Whereat the king highlie offended (in that such wandering theeues should so lightlie dare to contemne his power) followed them into their starting holes and caues, and with no great labor tooke the castell of Lochmaben, reducing the countrie of Dowglasse (with extreame labor of his soldiors) to his subiection, at what time he leuelled the castell thereof equall with the ground.)

The earle aduertised hereof, with all speed returned home through England, and sent his brother James vnto the king, to know his pleasure: who commanding the earle to see his countries (namelie Annandale) purged of theeues and robbers, pardoned him of all offenses, and receiued him into fauor againe, so that he was also eftsones proclamed the kings lieutenant; but shortlie after going into England without the kings licence, to common with the king of England about the recouerie of losses sustained by the Englishmen by certeine inrodes (as he alleged) the king tooke the matter in verie euill part, for that he should seeme so to be had in contempt of the earle: and withall he mistrusted also, least there were some secret practises in hand to the preiudice of him and his realme: so that he stormed not a little towards the earle. Who being thereof aduertised, came came in humble wiſe to the king, & beſought him of pardon, if he had in anie wiſe offended him, aſſuring him that from thenceforth, he would neuer commit anie act that might tend to his maieſties diſpleaſure.

Herewith the quéene alſo and other noble men made ſute to the king for the earles pardon, ſo that in the end he was receiued againe into fauor, but yet diſcharged of bearing anie publike office, which pinched him ſo ſore (namelie for that his aduerſaries William Chreichton lord chancellor, and the earle of Orkneie ſéemed to beare all the rule about the king) that he ſought to diſpatch the chancellor, procuring certeine of his ſeruants and friends to aſſault him on a morning as he was comming forth of Edenburgh, but yet he eſcaped to his caſtell of Chreichton, although wounded in déed right ſore, and within few daies after, gathering a power of his kinſmen, friends, & alies, he returned againe to Edenburgh, and had deſtroied (as was thought) the earle of Dowglaſſe at that preſent, if he had not ſhifted away the more ſpéedilie, who being thus to his great gréefe, and no ſmall diſhonor chaſed out of Edenburgh, deuiſed which way he might beſt be reuenged; and for the more eaſie accompliſhment of his purpoſe, he procured the earles of Crawford and Roſſe to ioine with him in that quarell againſt Chreichton and other his complices, by force of which confederacie they couenanted to aſſiſt one another againſt the malice of the ſaid Chreichton, and all other their aduerſaries.

The earle of Dowglas hauing concluded this bond of confederacie, bare himſelfe verie high, in preſuming further thereof than ſtood with reaſon: and this was one great cauſe of the kings diſpleaſure now paſſinglie increaſed againſt the ſaid earle. An other cauſe was this: a ſort of théeues and robbers brake into the lands of the lord John Herres, a noble man, and one that had continued euer faithfull to the king, taking with them out of the ſame lands a great bootie of cattell. And whereas the ſaid lord Herres complained vnto the earle of Dowglaſſe of that wrong, becauſe the offendors were inhabiting within his roome, and yet could haue no redreſſe; he attempted to fetch out of Annardale ſome preie, wherewith to ſatiſfie in part the wrong which had béene offered him by thoſe limmers and robbers. But ſuch was his euill hap, that taken he was with his retinue, and committed to priſon, and ſhortlie after by commandement of the earle of Dowglaſſe he was hanged as a fellon, notwithſtanding that the king by an herald commanded the contrarie.

The king being ſore offended herewith (as he had no leſſe cauſe) paſſed ouer his diſpleaſure with ſilence, till he ſaw time and opportunitie to reuenge the ſame: but in the meane ſeaſon manie an honeſt man bought the bargaine right déerelie, being ſpoiled of that he had, and otherwiſe euill intreated, and yet durſt not the meaner ſort once complaine for feare of further miſchiefe: where the higher powers alſo ſore lamented the great diſorders dailie increaſing, and yet were not able in anie wiſe to reforme the ſame, inſomuch as it was greatlie doubted, leaſt the earles of Dowglaſſe, Crawford, Roſſe, Murrey, and other of that faction ment to put the king beſide his ſeat. Which dout being put into the kings head, brought him into no ſmall perpleritie, whereupon by courteous meſſages he ſent for the earle of Dowglaſſe, willing him to repaire to his preſence, ſoiourning then in Striueling caſtell, which he refuſed to do, till he had aſſurance vnder the kings great ſeale for his ſafe comming and going (as ſome haue ſaid.) And then about Shrouetide in the yeare 1451, he came to the court at Striueling, where the king take him aſide, & in ſecret talke moued and requeſted him to forſake the league and bond of friendſhip betwixt him and the earle of Crawford, and other ſuch his confederats.

There was a ſecret murmuring amongſt a number, that this earle of Dowglaſſe purpoſed to make a praiſe on a day to get the garland beſide the kings head. In déed by reaſon of his kinſmen and alies, he was of more puiſſance in the realme, than (as it was thought) ſtood with the ſuertie of the kings eſtate, vnleſſe he were the more faithfull. He had at the ſame time two brethren that were alſo earles, as Archembald earle of Murrey, and Hugh, or (as other haue) George earle of Ormont, beſide the earle of Angus, and the earle of Mortoune, that were of his ſurname and blood, with a great number of other lords, knights, and men of great poſſeſſions and liuings, all of the ſame ſurname, and linked in friendſhip and alliance with other the chiefeſt linages of all the realme. Hereto (by reaſon there had béene ſo manie valiant men and worthie capteins of the Dowglaſſes one after another, as it had béene by ſucceſſion) the people and commons of Scotland bare ſuch good will and fauour towards that name, that they were readie to ride and go with them, they cared not whither, nor againſt whome. It is ſaid, that the earles of Dowglaſſes might haue raiſed thirtie or fortie thouſand warlike perſons readie at their commandement, whenſoeuer it had pleaſed them to call. In déed the Dowglaſſes had euer the gouernement of all matters perteining vnto the defenſe of the realme, ſo that the men of war had them ſtill in all the eſtimation and honor that might be.

But now to the purpoſe, touching the conference had betwixt king James the ſecond, and the earle of Dowglaſſe: it chanced in the end (vpon what occaſion I know not) that the earle anſwered the king ſomewhat ouerthwartlie, wherewith the king tooke ſuch indignation, that the earle here vpon was ſlaine by him, and ſuch other as were there about him, on Shroue éeuen. Then after the earle was thus made awaie, his brethren made open warre againſt the king, and ſlue all ſuch of his friends and ſeruants, as they might incounter with: inſomuch that thoſe which trauelled by the high waies, were in doubt to confeſſe whether they belonged to the king, or to the Dowglaſſes. The Lord of Cadzow being in the towne of Striueling, with a great companie of the earle of Dowglaſſes friends, in reuenge of his death incontinentlie burnt that towne, and did manie other great diſpleaſures to the king and his ſubiects, ſetting forth proclamations againſt the king and his councell, for the violating of the aſſurance granted (as before is ſaid) to the earle of Dowglas.

And yet ſuppoſing this not a ſufficient reuenge to quench the furie of their rebellious minds, they run with like rage, and with like order do ſpoile the countries & poſſeſſions of all ſuch as tooke part with the king, and ſtedfaſtlie remained in the execution of their obedient dutie. thence before they had taken and ſpoiled the ſame. being grieuouſlie offended with John the lord of that place, becauſe that he with the earle of Angus had ſeuered themſelues from the opinion & faction of the Dowglaſſes, whoſe furie (growing ſtill to extremitie) found ſuch support (by the inclining multitudes) that the king was put to his ſhifts) that he was determined to haue left the realme, and to haue fled by ſea into France, had not James Kenedie the biſhop of ſaint Andrews cauſed him to ſtaie, on the hope he had of aſſiſtance onelie by the earle of Huntleie, which earle hearing that the Dowglaſſes had gathered an armie in the ſouth againſt the king, raiſed an other armie in the north to aid the king.

The king would haue fled.

On the other ſide the earle of Crawford, hauing aſſembled a great power, incountered him at Brethume, in purpoſe to ſtop the earle of Huntleies paſſage, where betwixt them was fought a ſore battell, and the earle of Crawford chaſed into Finwin, ſo that manie noble men, gentlemen, and commons were ſlaine, and amongeſt other the earle of Crawfords brother was one. Hector Boetius writeth, that John Cullace of Bannamwin, whome the earle of Crawford had appointed to lead them that bare the battell ares, or (as I maie terme them) the bilmen, in the left wing of his armie, fled of purpoſe in the hotteſt of the fight, & ſo left the midle ward naked on the one ſide of the chiefeſt aid that the ſaid earle had, and ſo the victorie by that meanes onelie inclined to the kings ſtandard, which the earle of Huntleie had there with him. But howſoeuer it was, the ſaid erle of Huntleie had the honor of the field, who neuertheleſſe loſt diuerſe of his men alſo, though nothing ſo manie as his aduerſaries did. Which bountifulneſſe of the earle made them to fight more valiantlie. In recompenſe wherof the king gaue to the ſaid earle the lands of Badzenot & Lochquhaber. In the meane time, Archembald Dowglas earle of Murrey burnt the peill of Straboggie, perteining to the erle of Huntleie, and haried the lands thereabouts. In reuenge wherof, the erle of Huntleie at his returning backe, burnt & haried all the lands of the earledome of Murrey. In the meane time, at a parlement holden at Edenburgh, the earle of Crawford was denounced a traitor, and all his lands and goods deemed to be forfeited into the kings hands. James earle of Dowglas, James Lord Hammilton, the earles of Murrey, and Dzmont, the lord of Baluay, and manie other of that faction, were by publike proclamation made by an herald, commanded to appeare by a day to vnderlie the law. But in the nert night that followed the day of this proclamation, certeine of the Dowglaſſes ſeruants that were ſent priuilie to Edenburgh, to vnderſtand what was done there, faſtened writings vpon the church dores, ſealed with the Dowglaſſes ſeale in this forme. But the Dowglas ſéemed to paſſe little for the kings malice, and the erle himſelfe maried his brothers wife the countеſſe Beatrice, & ſent to Rome for a licence to haue that mariage made lawfull: but by the kings agents in that court, the earles ſute might not be obteined. The ſame yére, the king called a parlement at Edenburgh, in the which James earle of Dowglas, and his brothers wife the countеſſe Beatrice (whome he had taken to him by waie of a pretenſed & feined mariage) Archembald Dowglas earle of Murrey, George Dowglas earle of Dzmont, and John Dowglas baron of Baluay, were forfalted & condemned of treaſon. The earledome of Murrey was giuen to ſir James Creichton, or rather reſtored to him from whome it had béene wrongfullie taken by the vniuſt ſentence of William earle of Dowglas, who had procured it to be aſſigned vnto his brother the forſaid Archembald, though the right remained in the ſaid ſir James Creichton. But yet when the ſaid ſir James Creichton could not kéepe that earldome without enuie of diuerſe and ſundrie perſons, hée handled the matter ſo, that ſhortlie after it returned againe to the kings hands. Moreouer at this parlement, George Creichton was created erle of Cathneſſe, & William Haie conſtable of Scotland was made earle of Erroll. There were alſo diuerſe created lords of the parlement, whoſe titles were as follow; Darlie, Halis, Boid, Lile, and Lorne. After the breaking vp of the parlement, the king made a iournie againſt his aduerſaries into Galloway, and with ſmall adw brought all the caſtels of that countrie into his poſſeſſion, and then turning into Dowglaſdale, becauſe the inhabitants thereof would not obeie him, be abandoned the ſpoile thereof vnto his ſouldiors, who practiſed no ſmall crueltie againſt the inhabitants.

The lord Hammilton departeth from the Dowglas.

Herewith alſo, the lord Hammilton being wiſer than the reſidue, bad the Dowglas farewell, and ſo departed, concluding that he ſhould neuer ſée ſo faire a day againe, wherein he might haue caſt the dice for the whole kingdome. And being thus departed from the Dowglas, he repaired to the king as then lieng at the ſiege of Abircorne, who ſent him to the caſtell of Roſleine, there to remaine vnder ſafe kéeping with the earle of Orkenie, to whom the ſaid caſtell belonged: but at length, the king did not onlie pardon the lord Hämilton of all paſſed offenſes, but alſo receiued him into ſuch fauor, that he gaue him his eldeſt daughter in mariage, as after ſhall appeare. But now vpon the withdrawing thus of the ſaid lord Hammilton from the Dowglas, bicauſe the king had ſet forth an open proclamation of pardon to all thoſe that would forſake the earle of Dowglas, the moſt part of the ſame earles companie departed from him, by reaſon whereof he fled into England, togither with his brethren. The king lieng at the ſiege of Abircorne, loſt diuerſe of his men, beſides manie that were wounded; but yet taking firſt a ſtrong tower, being one of the chiefeſt limmes of that fortreſſe, ſhortlie after hee wan the reſt.

The earle of Dowglas being withdrawne (as yée haue heard) into England, within a while after got togither certeine companies of men, and with the ſame returned againe into Scotland by the weſt borders, in hope to find friends in thoſe parties: but ſuch as the king had appointed there to defend the countrie, aſſembling themſelues togither, and ſetting vpon him, diſcomfited his people, ſlue his brother Archembald, and toke the erle of Ormont priſoner, being firſt ſore wounded. The baron of Baluay eſcaped into a wood, and ſo got away. The earle himſelfe alſo (as Hector Boetius ſaith) eſcaped by flight, and got vnto Dunſtafage, where finding Donald earle of Roſſe and lord of the Iles, he procured him (being of nature inclined and readie inough to follow ſuch counſell) to make warre in his fauour againſt the king. And after he had once ſet him on worke, he got him backe againe into England. Donald walked not onelie the kings poſſeſſions that lay néere to Dunſtafage, but alſo paſſing through Argile, did much hurt in all places where he came. He inuaded alſo the Ile of Arrane, and chaſed the biſhop of Liſmore, conſtreining him to take ſanctuarie. This done, he entered into Lochquhabir, & ſo into Murrey land, where he burnt the towne of Inuernes, and wan the caſtell by a guilefull traine.

In the meane time, the earle of Ormont after he was recouered of his hurts (as the ſaid Boetius writeth) was preſented to the king, and after he had remained in priſon a certeine time, he was at length beheaded. Moreouer the counteſſe Beatrice, after ſhe ſaw no hope left that the earle of Dowglas ſhould recouer his former eſtate, came to the king, and ſubmitted hirſelfe, laieng all the blame in the earle, who had procured hir vnto ſuch vnlawfull mariage with him, being hir former huſbands brother. The king receiued hir right courteouſlie, and gaue to hir the baronie of Baluay, to mainteine therwith hir eſtate. Shortlie after alſo the counteſſe of Roſſe fled from hir huſband, & came to the king for feare of hir huſbands crueltie, wherof partlie ſhe had alreadie taſted. The king becauſe he had made the mariage betwixt hir and hir huſband, aſſigned hir forth ſufficient reuenues alſo for the maintenance of hir eſtate. About the ſame time Patrike Thornton one of the kings ſeruants, but a fauourer of the Dowglaſſe, ſlue John Sandlands of Calder the kings couſine, and Alane Steward at Dunbreton, for that they fauored the contrarie faction: but the king getting the offendor into his hands, cauſed him and his complices to die for their wicked offenſe committed. In the yeere following, died William Haie earle of Erroll, and conſtable of Scotland: alſo George Creichton earle of Catnes, and William Creichton chiefe of that familie. 1455. Death of noble men.

In this meane while, the earle of Dowglas remaining in England, procured the Engliſhmen diuers times to make rodes into Scotland, wherby he loſt (as the Scotiſh writers affirme) the loue of his owne countrimen, when they ſaw him thus ioine with the Engliſhmen, to the damage of his natiue land. At one time, Henrie earle of Northumberland, and the ſaid earle of Dowglas inuaded the Mers, but taking little héed to themſelues, and ſuffering their people to ride abrode to harie the countrie without order; Dowglas earle of Angus with a mightie armie of Scotiſhmen ſet vpon them, and put them to flight, ſleaing diuers, and taking to the number of ſeuen hundred priſoners. Thus (as ſhould appeare) the earle of Dowglas in vaine ſought to diſquiet his countrie, for all his friends in Scotland continued faithfull to the king, who had granted peace to all other of the Dowglaſſes and their complices: for it was Gods will the matter ſhould be taken vp without more bloudſhed, that the right line of the Scotiſh kings might be preſerued. [For (as it appeareth) he was amongſt the Engliſh inuading Scotland, ſubdued and taken by the barons Johnſton and Cokpull, who preſented him vnto the king, whereupon the king after a ſort baniſhed him into the monaſterie of Lendore, where he was bountifullie and honorablie receiued (according to his nobilitie) of the religious perſons, in which place he liued manie yeres, and then died.] Fr. Thin. 1454. Leſleus. lib. 8. pag. 305.

And though the almightie God might haue brought that to paſſe by other meanes, according as it ſhould haue pleaſed his good will and omnipotent power; yet he choſe this way, whereby the effuſion of much bloud might be auoided, which by ciuill battell had béene ſpilled, if the parties hauing their harts filled with rancor & ire, had buckled togither in battell. But the K. vſing the aduiſe of his kinſman James Kenedie archbiſhop of S. Andrews, compaſſed his purpoſe in the end, diſpatching out of the way ſuch as he anie waies forth miſtruſted, of which number namelie were the Dowglaſſes, whoſe puiſſance and authoritie not without cauſe he euermore ſuſpected. Many haue reported (as before is ſaid) that in the beginning king James the ſecond, through feare of the great power of theſe Dowglaſſes, was in mind to haue fled the realme, but being recomforted by the counſell and authoritie of the ſaid biſhop James Kenedie, he aduanced his ſtudie to matters of greater importance. James Kenedie archbiſh. of S. Andrews, chéefe chancellor to the king.

The ſaid Kenedie turned the earle of Angus, being of the ſurname of the Dowglaſſes, and brother to him by his mother, to take part with the king. He procured alſo diuers other of the ſame bloud and ſurname, to reuolt from the other confederats, and to ſubmit themſelues vpon promiſe of pardon vnto the kings mercie; and ſo infeebling the forces of ſuch as were aduerſaries to the king, in the end he had them all at his pleaſure. It was thought, that forſomuch as the Dowglaſſes had their lands lieng ſo vpon the weſt and middle marches of the realme, (that no man might beare anie rule in thoſe parts, but onelie they themſelues) if they had happilie ioined with the Engliſhmen, conſidering the great intelligence beſide, which they had in all other parts of the realme, what by kinred and alliance, the realme might The practiſe of biſhop Kenedie. might haue fallen into great perill: for truelie it is a dangerous thing (as Io. Maior ſaith) for the eſtate of a realme to haue men of great power and authoritie inhabiting on the borders and vttermoſt parts therof. For if they chance (vpon anie occaſion giuen) to renounce their obedience to their naturall prince & ſupreme gouernor, the preiudice may be great and irrecouerable, that oftentimes thereof inſueth; as well appeareth in the earles of March, and other before mentioned in this hiſtorie: and likewiſe in France by the duke of Burgognie, Britaine, and Normandie: for till thoſe countries were incorporated and annexed vnto the crowne of France, the kings of that realme were oftentimes put to great hinderance through rebellion by them, whome they accounted for their ſubiects.

But now to returne where I left. After the Dowglaſſes were once diſpatched, and things quieted, King James the ſecond began then to reigne and rule reallie, not doubting the controlment of anie other perſon. For then he ordeined lawes for his people as ſeemed beſt to his liking, commanding the ſame to be kept vnder great penalties and forfeitures. And being counſelled chieflie by the biſhop of ſaint Andrews, James Kenedie that was his vncle, and the earle of Orkenie, he paſſed through all the parts of his realme, granting a generall pardon of all offenſes paſſed. And ſo he ruled and gouerned his ſubiects in great quietneſſe, and cauſed iuſtice ſo dulie to be miniſtred on all ſides, that it was ſaid in his daies, how he cauſed the raſh buſh to keepe the cow.

In the yeere 1455, the king held a parlement, in which were manie good lawes made and eſtabliſhed for the weale of all the realme, as in the bookes of the acts of parlement is conteined. He vſed the matter alſo in ſuch wiſe with the principall capteins of the Iles, and of the hie lands, that the ſame were as quietlie gouerned, as anie part of the low lands, ſhewing all obedience as well in paieng ſuch duties as they owed to the king for their lands, as alſo in readineſſe to ſerue in the warres with great companies of men, as became them to do: ſpeciallie Donald lord of the Iles and earle of Roſſe, who had before ioined himſelfe in confederacie with the earles of Dowglas and Crawford againſt the king, and had taken into his hands the kings houſe, and caſtell of Inuernelle (as before ye haue head) naming himſelfe king of the Iles.

Neuertheleſſe, he was now at length reconciled to the king, and gaue pledges for his good demeanor, and afterwards brought to the king three thouſand men in aid at the ſiege of Roxburgh, * whoſe reconciliation was after this maner. When this Donald perceiued aduerſe fortune to beſiege him on euerie ſide, he ſent meſſengers to the king, craning peace and pardon for himſelfe and for his offenſes. Who comming before the king (and with manie humble ſpéeches, remembring the manie parts of clemencie which the king had vſed to the earle of Crawford, and ſuch as followed his faction) they did ſo purge the fault of Donald (by tranſferring the ſame to the fatall rage and iniurie of the preſent times, and by promiſing in his behalfe that hereafter he ſhould liue moſt quietlie in dutifull obedience) that they moued the kings mind to haue compaſſion vpon him.

Fr. Thin. Buchanan. lib. 11.

"But yet the king anſwered in a meane ſort betweene both, not vtterlie pardoning, nor flatlie reiecting him: for (ſaith he) there be yet manie ſhewes extant of his wickedneſſe, and he hath not giuen forth anie one token of a changed mind. Wherefore, to the end that we may beléeue the ſame to be true (which you haue promiſed in his behalfe) hereafter to become a dutifull ſubiect and louing neighbour to vs, and to thoſe which are about him, he muſt with repentance (proceeding from an vnfeined tong) craue pardon from vs whome he hath greeuouſlie offended, and (with ſufficient reſtitution) recompenſe thoſe whome (by ſpoiling) he had iniured: beſides which alſo, he muſt with ſome worthie exploit wipe awaie the memories and blot of all his former committed wickednes. And although I well know that no vertue doth more beſéeme a kinglie maieſtie than clemencie, yet we ought ſo to prouide, that (meaſuring all things by the line of reaſon) the wicked war not ſo proud and rebellious (by ouermuch lenitie and looſe gouernement) as the good may be excited to the honeſt performance of their dutie by fauour and iuſtice. Wherefore I will inioine a time to Donald, and the reſt of his aſſociats, wherein they may openlie ſhew ſome déeds of an altered diſpoſition, and from henceforth we will ſo account of him, as his works and not his words ſhall iuſtifie him to be. But in the meane time, I will him to reſt in quiet, leauing it in the power of him and his, whether I, he, and they, will héereafter be accounted (by due deſerts) happie or miſerable. Which ſaid, the meſſengers departed, and Donald reſted ſatisfied.)"

In the meane while great diſſention roſe in England betwéene the two houſes of Lancaſter & Yorke; the king being principall of the houſe of Lancaſter, was taken himſelfe at the battell of ſaint Albons. But the quéene with hir ſonne the prince, and Henrie the yong duke of Summerſet, with diuers other fled into the north parts of England, and ſent to the king of Scotland to deſire him of aid, who vpon good aduiſe taken with his councell, for that king Henrie had euer kept well the peace with the realme of Scotland, and alſo for reuenge of his vncle the duke of Summerſet his death, prepared an armie of twentie thouſand men to paſſe into England: and in the meane time all the north parts of England, hearing that king James was readie to ſupport the quéene of England, ioined with hir, and paſt forward into the ſouth parts, conſtreining the duke of Yorke to flée the realme, and ſo king Henrie inioied the gouernement of his realme againe, and for that time concluded an agréement with the duke of Yorke his aduerſarie; which laſted not long.

The duke of Yorke remembring how readie king James was to prepare an armie in ſupport of his aduerſarie king Henrie, procured the borderers to make incurſions vpon the Scotiſh ſubiects, & would ſuffer no redreſſe to be had, nor daies of truce to be kept on the borders, as in time of peace the cuſtome was. Wherevpon king James raiſed a power, and in perſon entered with the ſame into England, doing great hurt by deſtroieng diuers townes, caſtels and peſles in Northumberland, the biſhoprike and other parts, till at length vpon faire promiſes made by the Engliſhmen, he returned into his owne countrie. 1458.

After this, king Henrie of England, perceiuing that the duke of Yorke by the counſell of the earle of Warwike, ceaſſed not to practiſe conſpiracies againſt him, ſent eſſſones to king James, requiring him of aid againſt them, and promiſed therefore to reſtore vnto the king of Scotland the lands in Northumberland, Cumberland, the biſhoprike of Dureſme, and ſuch like, which the kings of Scotland had held before. deſire to ſupport hir againſt the houſe of Yorke, king James with a great armie entered England, but after that the quéene in the meane time had ſlaine the duke of Yorke, & got the vpper hand of hir enimies, at the ſame quéenes requeſt, he retired into Scotland againe. Neuertheleſſe ſhortlie after, when the earles of March and Warwike ſought ſtill to mainteine their quarrell againſt the quéene of England, ſhe was conſtreined to withdraw into the north parts, and to deſire king James to approch eſtſones 1460. with his armie vnto the borders: which he did, meaning to win the caſtels of Rockſburgh and Warke, which were amongeſt other things promiſed to be deliuered vnto him by king Henrie, and ſo comming to Rockſburgh, laied his armie round about that caſtell, and planted his ſiege in full warlike manner.

Héere the king hauing great experience in knowledge of ſhooting great artillerie, departed from his campe, accompanied with the earle of Angus, and others, and came to the trenches where the great ordinance was planted, which he cauſed to be ſhot off. King James the ſecond is ſlaine. And héere by great miſfortune, this worthie prince James the ſecond, was ſlaine by the ſlice of a great péece of artillerie, which by ouercharging chanced to breake, and flue not onelie the king ſtanding ſomewhat néere it, but alſo hurt the earle of Angus, with other: being a notable preſident from henceforth, how ſuch great princes approch ſo néere within danger of ſuch péeces of ordinance, when they are ſhot off. Alias 17. 23. Buchan. He was thus killed the third day of Auguſt, in the yéere of his life 29, of his reigne 24, and after the incarnation 1460. His bodie was buried with all funerall obſequies according to his eſtate, within the monaſterie of Holie rod houſe at Edenburgh, the people generallie lamenting his death with no leſſe ſorow and dolefull mone, than as is ſéene in a priuat houſe for the deceaſſe of the welbeloued maiſter and owner thereof. 1460. In time of warre, amongeſt his ſubiects in the campe, he behaued himſelfe ſo gentlie towards all men, that they ſéemed not to feare him as their king, but to reuerence & loue him like a father. He would ride vp and downe amongeſt them, and eat & drinke with them, euen as he had béene fellowlike with the meaneſt. He had iſſue by his wife quéene Marie thrée ſonnes, and two daughters. His eldeſt ſonne named James, ſucceeded him in the kingdome; the ſecond named Alexander, was created duke of Albanie; and his third ſonne called John, was made earle of Mar. ✻ All the time of the reigne of this king, chriſtian religion did greatlie flouriſh amongeſt the Scots: for there were amongeſt them twelue notable and famous biſhops, whereof the chiefeſt were James Kennedie biſhop of ſaint Andrewes, Turnebull biſhop of Glaſcow, Thomas Spenſer biſhop of Aberden, and Henrie Lichton biſhop of Murrey. At what time likewiſe there were manie religious abbats that kept ſuch great houſes, as both the nobilitie and communaltie trauelling through out the kingdome, did neuer almoſt lodge in anie publike hoſterie, but in the monaſteries: which were neuer vered or ſpoiled, during the time of the ciuill warres of the kingdome. Beſide theſe men of eminent learning, there flouriſhed alſo Nicholas Deſdone, and John Eldmaire, ſingular diuines, with manie other doctors laudablie ſéene in all kind of learning. In the reigne of which king alſo, Charles the 7, king of France, for ſingular ſeruice done vnto him by the Scots, in the warres (betwéene the Engliſh and the French) did honorablie indow manie of the Scots (for recompenſe thereof) with manie rich poſſeſſions in Aquitaine, who by that meanes (ſetling themſelues in that countrie) were the originall of manie worthie families of that prouince, amongeſt which is that famous kinred of Caldell de la Campania in Tolouſe, at this time greatlie flouriſhing, which had his beginning from Caldell a thane (or baron) being knight in the north parts of Scotland: for the grandfather of him which is now liuing, head of that houſe did inioy the place of magiſtrat or ruler of the Capitoline in that citie, hauing that title confirmed to his poſteritie. Some ſtrange ſights there appéered before the death of this king James the ſecond: for the day before he was ſlaine, a blazing ſtar was plainlie ſéene, which ſignified (as was thought) the death of the ſaid king. A blaſing ſtarre. In the yéere before the ſiege, there was in Dundee an hermophrodyt, that is, a perſon with both ſhapes, but eſtéemed for a woman onelie, till it was prooued, that lieng with hir maiſters daughter nightlie where ſhe dwelt, ſhe had got the yong damſell with child; for the which act, becauſe ſhe had counterfeited hir ſelfe a woman, and yet had wrought the part of a man, ſhe was condemned to be buried quicke, and ſuffered according to that iudgement. At the ſame time, there was a certeine theefe, that with his familie liued apart from the companie of men, remaining ſecretlie within a den in Angus called Fenilden, who vſed to kill yong perſons, and to feed on their flеſh, for the which abhominable offenſe, being apprehended with his wife and all his familie, they were burnt to death. One of his daughters that was ſcarſe twelue moneths of age, onelie excepted, the which being preſerued and brought vp in Dundee, before ſhe came to the age of twelue yéeres, ſhe was taken in the like crime for the which hir father died, whereupon ſhe was iudged to be buried quicke: and going to execution, when the people in great multitudes followed hir, in wondering at ſo horrible an offenſe committed by one of hir age and ſexe, ſhe turned to them that thus deteſted hir wicked doing, and with a countenance repreſenting hir cruell inclination, ſaid to them: What néed you thus to raile vpon me, as if I had done an heinous act contrarie to the nature of man? I tell you, that if you knew how pleaſant mans flеſh is in taſte, there would none of you all forbeare to eat it. And thus with an impenitent and ſtubborne mind ſhe ſuffered the appointed execution. Iames the third.

After the death of James the ſecond, his ſonne James the third a child of ſeuen yeares of age ſucceeded, and forthwith was ſent for to the ſiege of Rorſburgh, whither he was conueied by the quéene, a woman of a ſtout ſtomach, repreſenting the manlike race of hir countrie Gelderland, of the which ſhe was deſcended. For comming with hir ſonne thus to the ſiege, ſhe ſpent not time in lamenting and womaniſh bewailing the irrecouerable loſſe of hir huſband, but rather in comforting the lords, whoſe part had bin to haue comforted hir: and aboue all things ſhe exhorted them with all diligence to imploie their whole indeuors and forces to the winning of that caſtell. Whoſe words ſo incouraged the capteins and whole armie, that the ſiege was continued till the caſtell was wone, raced, and beaten downe flat to the ground; and the yong king was crowned The ſtout ſtomach of the quéene. Warke beſieged and woon. This done, they beſieged the caſtell of Warke, which likewiſe they tooke, and threw downe, and afterwards the king with the nobles of his realme came to Edenburgh, to take order for the quiet gouernement of the realme. And becauſe the king was yoong, there were choſen ſeuen regents to gouerne both king & realme, as theſe, the quéene his mother, Seuen gouernors choſen. James Kenedie biſhop of S. Andrews, that was ſiſters ſonne to James the firſt, the biſhop of Glaſcow, the earles of Angus, Huntlie, Argile, and Orkeneie. Theſe, ſo long as James Kenedie liued, agréed well togither about the gouernement of the realme; but within a while after his deceaſſe, they fell at ſquare, or rather before, as appeareth by Hector Boetius, who ſaieth, that in the ſecond yéere of this kings reigne, there was diſcord in brewing betwixt the quéene and the archbiſhop Kenedie, who perceiuing that the woman ſought to vſurpe wholie the gouernement vnto hir ſelfe, withſtood hir in that behalfe, in ſo much that it was doubted leaſt the matter would haue broken forth into ſome ciuill warre, if the biſhops of Glaſcow, Dunkeld, and Aberden, and certeine abbats had not taken in hand to trauell betwixt the parties for an attonement, who did ſo much in the matter, that they compounded the variance in this wiſe.

The quéene mother was appointed to haue the charge of the kings perſon, and of his brethren, Alexander duke of Albanie, and Iohn earle of Mar, and likewiſe of his two ſiſters; but as for the adminiſtration and gouernance of the realme, ſhe ſhould leaue it vnto the peeres. There were therefore elected by common conſent as rulers, the biſhops of Glaſcow and Dunkeld, the earle of Orkeneie, the lord Graham, Thomas Boid, and the chancellor. About the ſame time, one Alane Keir, in hope to get the heritage of his brother, Iohn lord of Lorne tooke him, and kept him in priſon. But Colen Campbell earle of Argile, taking great indignation with ſo preſumptuous a part, gathered a power, and comming againſt Keir, tooke him, and ſet his brother at libertie, and brought the offendor vnto Edenburgh, where he died in priſon. Moreouer, ſhortlie after Donald lord of the Iles and earle of Roſſe, who had ſerued obedientlie in the armie at Roxburgh, and was (as outwardlie appeared) well reconciled, began anew to vſe his old maners, ſpoiling & harrieng the whole countrie of Atholl, and tooke the earle thereof, and the counteſſe his wife captiues with him into the Iles.

Donald of the Iles eſtſoones rebelleth.

To repreſſe his iniurious attempts, the regents togither were preparing an armie; but therewith came true aduertiſements, that the ſaid lord of the Iles, and other the principall offendors of his companie, were ſtricken through the hand of God with a certeine frenſie or madneſſe, and had loſt all their ſhips and ſpoiles in the ſea, ſo that the earle of Atholl and his ladie were reſtored, and thoſe frantike perſons were brought vnto ſaint Brides church in Atholl, for the recouerie of their health, but it would not be. Donald himſelfe was afterward ſlaine in the caſtell of Inuernes by an Iriſhman that was a minſtrell. In the yeare 1461, Henrie the firſt king of England being vanquiſhed by his aduerſarie Edward the fourth, purchaſed of king James the third a ſafe conduct for himſelfe and a thouſand horſſe to enter into Scotland; and hereupon he came to Edenburgh, and was lodged in the houſe of the friers preachers, with his wife quéene Margaret, and his ſonne prince Edward. There was alſo with him the duke of Exceſter, and the duke of Sommerſet, with manie other of the Engliſh nobilitie.

Donald became mad.

Hitherto hath Hector Boetius continued the Scotiſh hiſtorie.

He was killed 1461.

Henrie king of England by ſafe conduct commeth into Scotland.

* And to the end this firme amitie thus begun, might more increaſe, and be further ſtrengthened: the two quéenes Margaret (of England) and Marie (of Scotland) both French (by birth and nature) began to intreat of a mariage (hoping by affinitie to eſtabliſh that perfect amitie) to be ſolemnized betweene the daughter of James the ſecond king of Scots, and the ſonne of Henrie (king of England) being called prince of Wales, although none of them as yet was aboue ſeuen yeares old. Which mariage, Philip duke of Burgognie (vncle to the quéene of Scots, and deadlie enimie to the quéene of England) labored by all means to hinder, by his ambaſſador Gruthuſius, a noble man and of great iudgement; for this Philip did vſe ſuch bitter enimitie againſt Reinold, grandfather to the ſon of king Henrie by the mothers ſide, that he did déepelie enuie anie good ſucceſſe to happen to anie of that race, whereby it might increaſe or flouriſh; and therefore ſought occaſion by all deuiſe to hinder it: for whoſe cauſe, and at whoſe requeſt, the ſaid mariage was at that time rather deferred, than vtterlie broken off. But the end thereof (which was greatlie feared by this Philip to be the conſummation of the mariage) was by the aduerſe fortune of king Henrie vtterlie diſappointed. For (as after ſhall appeare) this Henrie being incouraged (by the benéuolence of the Scots towards him) and throughlie confirmed (by the letters of his friend ſent vnto him) diſpatched his wife into France to Reinold hir father, to procure what aid ſhe could of hir friends beyond the ſeas, to helpe to reſtore him to the kingdome: which iournie ſucceéded not to hir in vaine, obteining ſuccor from thence.)

The quéene went into France for aid.

The ſame time, king Henrie deliuered the towne & caſtell of Berwike into the Scotiſhmens hands, whether by couenant thereby to haue the foreſaid ſafe conduct granted, or of his owne voluntarie will, to the end he might haue the more ſupport and fauor amongeſt them, it is vncerteine by the variable report of writers. Neuertheleſſe, ſhortlie after a truce was taken betwixt king James and king Edward, for the tearme of fiftéene yeares, vpon what conditions or promiſes made on king Edwards part I find not. This truce was concluded in the moneth of Maie, in the yeare 1462, at the citie of Yorke, whither had bin ſent the biſhop of Glaſcow, the earle of Argile, kéeper of the priute ſeale, the abbat of Holie rood houſe, ſir Alexander Boid, and ſir William Crawſton knights, ambaſſadors and commiſſioners for king James.

Berwike deliuered to the Scotiſhmen.

A truce for 15 yeares.

All things in this ſeaſon were ordered in Scotland by the aduiſe and counſell of James Kenedie biſhop of ſaint Andrews, a man of great wiſedome and policie, as well appeared in his prudent & ſage gouernement of the realme, as well during the minoritie of this James the third, as alſo in the daies of his father king James the ſecond. Pierre de Breze, otherwiſe called le Seigneur de la Varenne, great ſeneſhall of Normandie, was ſent by the French king Lewes the eleuenth, with two thouſand fighting men, to aid the part of king Henrie againſt king Edward. This Breze was one moſt in fauour with king Charles the ſeuenth, father vnto the ſaid king Lewes, and therefore (as manie did ſuppoſe) he was appointed by K. Lewes (who greatlie loued him not) to be chiefe in this iourneie, to the end his life might be put in hazard and aduenture; notwithſtanding, after ſome danger both of tempeſt on the ſea, and alſo of the enimies hands, he wan the caſtels of Bamburgh and Dunſtanburgh, which he caſt to the ground, and after tooke in hand to kéepe the caſtell of Anwike, and being beſieged therein,

James Kenedie the archbiſhop gouerneth the realme.

Monſieur de la Varrenne ſent forth of France to aid the part of Margaret quéene of England.

He kéepeth Anwike caſtell, and is beſieged.

ſent for aid to the Scots.

He is reſcued by the earle of Angus.

George Dowglaſſe earle of Angus as then warden of the marches, immediatlie raiſed a power of 23000, men, and comming with the ſame to the borders, choſe forth of all his numbers fiue thouſand of the moſt able horſſemen in all his armie, and comming with them to the caſtell about the middeſt of the day, tooke the Frenchmen away with him into Scotland: the Engliſh armie that lay there at ſiege beholding the maner, and not once making proffer to fight with him. Some Engliſhmen there were, that would faine haue fought with the Scots; but other (whoſe counſell was followed) were otherwiſe minded, alleging that better it were to let them paſſe without incounter, ſith they left the caſtell void, than to ieopard vpon the doubtfull chance of battell, for though their number were not great, yet were they piked and choſen men, able to atchiue a great enterpriſe.

Alias 13000.

1463. The quéene mother died.

After this, the ſixteenth of November, in the yeare 1463, the quéene of Scots, mother to James the third, died at Edenburgh, and was buried in the college of the Trinitie, which ſhe hir ſelfe had founded. This woman, after the deceaſſe of hir huſband James the ſecond, liued ſomewhat diſſolutelie, procuring Adam Hepborne of Hales a maried man to kéepe hir ſuch familiar companie, as ſounded greatlie to hir diſhonor: for that ſhe could not within the whole realme find ſome ſingle man amongeſt all the nobilitie, with whome ſhe might haue maried, & in ſome ſort to haue auoided the greater open ſlander & infamie.

Adam Hepborns familiaritie with the quéene of Scots, mother to James the third.

Alexander duke of Albanie taken on the ſea.

In the ſame yeare, Alexander duke of Albanie, and brother to the king, was taken on the ſea by the Engliſhmen in the moneth of June, as he was returning from his grandfather the duke of Gilder: but the biſhop of ſaint Andrews James Kenedie, cauſed both the ſaid duke and alſo the ſhip, with all the goods there in being, at the time of the taking of it, to be reſtored; for otherwiſe (as he flatlie proteſted) he would not kéepe the truce anie longer concluded betwixt the two realmes.

1464. King Henrie returneth into England.

The duke of Summerſet, in hope of great fauor which he ſhould find in England, perſuaded king Henrie to paſſe thither, and with a great companie of Scotiſhmen he entered England, and manie of the north parts reſorted vnto him: but at length, at his comming to Eram, the lord Montacute with a great power was readie to giue him battell, and there diſcomfited him and his whole armie. The duke of Summerſet and the lords Hungerford and Roſſe were taken and put to death; the duke at Eram, and the lords at Newcaſtell. King Henrie eſcaped verie hardlie into Scotland againe, and there remained a certeine ſpace after, till at length he thought to returne into England in ſuch ſecret wiſe, as he ſhould not haue béene once knowen, till he might haue got amongeſt his friends, which would haue ſupported him: but ſuch diligent watch was laid for him all alongſt the borders, that he was eſpied, taken, and deliuered to king Edward his aduerſarie, who ſhut him vp in the tower of London till he was at length there made away, as in the hiſtorie of England ye may ſée more at large.

King Henrie is impriſoned.

1466. In the yeare 1466, that famous biſhop James Kenedie departed this life, and was buried in the college of ſaint Sauiour, founded by him within the towne of ſaint Andrewes in moſt ſumptuous wiſe. This prelat in prudent policie excelled all other Scotiſh biſhops, of whome anie writer maketh mention. He kept the realme in good quiet, and obſerued the truce concluded with the Engliſhmen, to the great weale and commoditie of the poore commons. He was verie rich, as appeared by ſundrie buildings and works which he left behind him, as a memoriall of his name. [Whereof the three eſpeciall things for rareneſſe and magnificence, were his college of ſaint Sauiour (wherein youth might be trained to learning and religion) the other his ſepulchre, wherein he was buried (being a ſtatelie péece of worke, ſuch as before had not béene accuſtomed for biſhops of Scotland) & the third was a ſhip of wonderfull burden: all which three, the common people affirmed were of one price, and ſtood him in like charge.] Beſides his biſhoprike, he held in his hands the commandarie of the abbeie of Pettinweme, which was worth vnto him eight hundred crowns by yeare. [Afterward, at the parlement holden in October and Januarie, there were manie edicts made for the benefit of the common wealth, & chiefelie for the eſtate of the merchants; at what time alſo there was a proclamation made, that none of the Engliſhmen ſhould beare anie office, nor receiue anie benefice or benefit in Scotland.]

1469. The mariage of James the third.

In the yeare 1469, on the tenth day of Julie, king James the third, being as then about twentie yeares of age, maried in the abbeie of Holie rood houſe néere Edenburgh, the ladie Margaret, daughter to the king of Denmarke and Norwaie, which ladie was at the ſame time not paſt twelue yeares of age, ſome ſaie ſixteene. Hir father the king of Denmarke and Norwaie, in name of hir dower, tranſported and reſigned to K. James all his right, title, and intereſt which he pretended to the out Iles.

The king of Norwaie reſigneth his title to the out Iles.

The ambaſſadors that were ſent into Denmarke to conclude this mariage, and to conuete the bride into Scotland, were theſe: Andrew Buſdeir biſhop of Glaſcow, the biſhop of Orknie, the lord Auandale chancellor of Scotland, and Thomas Boid earle of Arrane, who had maried the kings ſiſter, and was now in his abſence run into the kings diſpleaſure; whereof his wife hauing intelligence, hearing of hir huſbands arriuall with the other in the Forth, got out of Edenburgh, & comming on ſhipbord to him, gaue him to vnderſtand what diſpleaſure the king had conceiued againſt him: who perceiuing himſelfe in what danger he ſtood if he tooke land, returned backe into Denmarke, taking his wife with him.

The earle of Arrane in the kings diſpleaſure.

The king herewith was ſo offended, that he cauſed both the ſaid earle and his father to be attainted of high treaſon, and ſent for his ſiſter backe into Scotland, cauſing a diuorſe in abſence of hir huſband to be ſued & gotten forth againſt them, marieng hir afterwards to James lord Hamilton, to whome he gaue the earldome of Arrane, which hir former huſband had in gift before. Of this mariage, thoſe of the houſe of Hamiltons are deſcended, & are néereſt of blood to the crowne of Scotland, as they pretend. [For (as ſaith Leſleus, lib. 8. pag. 316.) if the line of the Stewards faile, the crowne is to come to them.]

The lord Hamilton marieth the kings ſiſter.

But now to ſhew further what we find written concerning the maner and cauſe of the baniſhment of the afore remembred Thomas Boid, Giouan Ferrerio, in his appendix of the Scotiſh hiſtorie annexed vnto Hector Boetius laſtlie printed at Paris in the yeare 1574, agreeth not with that which ye haue red before. For as he telleth the tale, the ſaid lord Boid being one of the gouernors of the realme, elected thereto (as before ye haue heard) within ſhort time grew ſo far in fauor with the king, that he might do all things with him at his pleaſure, although his aſſociats in authoritie did neuer ſo much go about to hinder his deuiſes: by reaſon whereof, he ſéemed to vſurpe the whole rule & adminiſtration of the realme into his owne hands, ſore to the griefe of thoſe his ſaid aſſociats being ioined with him in like office.

The lord Boid beareth all the rule about the king.

Hereof the ſtate of the common-wealth through the diſſention thus bred among the gouernors, was brought brought into a miſerable plight; for iuſtice in moſt places wanted hir due courſe, ſo as theeues and robbers taking boldneſſe thereof, not onelie vpon the borders, but alſo elſewhere, began to exerciſe great outrage, to the breach of publike peace, and namelie the inhabitants of the out Iles fell to their wonted trade of pilfering, ſo that paſſing ouer in their long boats or barges, and landing here & there on the ſhore, they toke preies of cattell and other goods, greatlie to their profit, and no leſſe damage of the people that inhabited on the coaſts ouer againſt them. In the north parts alſo, ſeditious tumults amongeſt the nobles, gentlemen, and people were raiſed, to the great diſquieting of the whole countrie. Such diſorders continued no ſmall time, and becauſe the ſaid Thomas lord Boid bare greateſt rule about the king, the blame (as it commonlie happeneth) was imputed to him.

They that be in authoritie be euer ſubiect to the ſpitefull blow of enuies dart.

At length, when the king was growen to ripe yeares, and able to ſée to the adminiſtration of the common-wealth himſelfe, he was admoniſhed by certeine graue perſonages to haue ſome regard, that ſuch miſorders as diſquieted the whole ſtate of the realme, might be reformed. Herevpon he called a parlement, in the which, whether through enuie that the lords had conceiued againſt the lord Boid, or for that his doings no leſſe deſerued ſuch complaint, was exhibited by generall voices of the ſtats againſt him, that it was decreed by authoritie of the whole aſſemblie, that he ſhould come to anſwer in iudgement ſuch crimes wherewith he was charged; but when he refuſed ſo to do, and in contempt of the kings authoritie got togither a power of armed men to defend him from iniurie, that might ſéeme (as he pretended) to be offered him: at length, the king was driuen of neceſſitie to make preparation for the leuieng of an armie to apprehend him by force. Whereof Boid being aduertiſed, fled into England, becauſe he perceiued himſelfe not able to reſiſt the kings power. The king aſſured that he was thus auoided out of his realme, baniſhed him for euer, and ſeized vpon his lands and goods as forfeited.

The lord Boid is accuſed.

He refuſeth to be tried by way of arrainment.

He fléeth into England.

After this, when the ſaid Boid ſaw no hope to returne againe into the kings fauor, and finding no great comfort among the Engliſhmen, he paſſed from thence into Denmarke, where he remained till the mariage was concluded betwixt the king, and the ladie Margaret, daughter to the king of Denmarke, as ye before haue heard: and then in hope by occaſion of this mariage to obteine pardon, returned now in companie of the bride, and of thoſe ambaſſadors that were ſent to haue the conueiance of hir into Scotland: neuertheleſſe, vnderſtanding by his wife that came to him on ſhipbord before he ſet foot on land, that the kings diſpleaſure continued ſtill towards him ſo greatlie, that if he came on land, he ſhould be ſure to loſe his head, he returned into Denmarke, and toke his wife with him; as before is mentioned. Finallie he went into Italie, where at length he was murthered by one, whoſe wife he went about to allure for the ſatiſfieng of his ſenſuall luſt. Before he was diuorſed from his wife the kings ſiſter, he begat on hir a ſonne, the which in the daies of king James the fourth, in a priuat quarrell that roſe betwixt him and an other noble man, chanced to be ſlaine. Thus much touching the lord Thomas Boid of Kalmarnocke out of Ferrerio, who alſo in report of the matter touching the mariage betwixt the king and the daughter of Denmarke, ſomewhat varieth from an other that writ thereof.

He paſſeth into Denmarke.

1468. The ambaſſadors ſent vnto Denmarke as Ferrerio ſaith.

The ambaſſadors ſent vnto Chriſtierne king of Denmarke & Norwaie in the yeare 1468, as the ſaid Ferrerio affirmeth, were theſe; Andrew biſhop of Glaſcow, William biſhop of Orkeneie, Andrew lord of Anandale chancellor of the realme, Martine Wane the great almoner, & the kings confeſſor, Gilbert de Kericke archdeacon of Glaſcow, Dauid Creichton of Craukton, & John Shaw of Halie. Theſe ambaſſadors being diſpatched into Denmarke in Julie, in the yeare aforeſaid, came at length to Hafknen, where K. Chriſtierne then remained, and were of him ioifullie receiued, & well heard concerning their ſute, in ſo much at length, after he had proponed the matter to his councell about the eight of September, it was agréed in this ſort, that the ladie Margaret, daughter to the ſaid king Chriſtierne, ſhould be giuen in mariage vnto K. James of Scotland, and that the Iles of Orkeneie, being in number 28, and likewiſe the Iles of Shetland, of which there are eightéene, ſhould remaine in poſſeſſion of the kings of Scotland, till either the ſaid king Chriſtierne or his ſucceſſors in name of the mariage monie ſhould pay vnto king James, or to his ſucceſſors, the ſumme of fiftie thouſand florens of the Rheine. This mariage was thought, by reaſon of this ingaging of thoſe Iles, right profitable vnto the realme of Scotland, becauſe of the controuerſie and variance which had continued long before thoſe daies betwixt the kings of Scotland and Denmarke, about the right of poſſeſſing thoſe Iles.

vnto Denmarke as Ferrerio ſaith.

The mariage concluded.

The Iles of Orkeneie and Shetland ingaged.

In the moneth of November next inſuing, after the mariage had béene conſummate in Julie before, within the abbeie church of Holie rood houſe (as before ye haue heard) or in ſaint Giles church in Edenburgh (as other write) the three eſtates were called to aſſemble in Edenburgh, where the queene was crowned, and the parlement holden, the moſt part of the lords remaining ſtill in Edenburgh all the next winter: and in the ſummer following, the king and queene made their progreſſe into the north parts, and were honorablie receiued in the principall cities and townes where they came, and likewiſe by the nobles of the countrie, to the great reioiſing of the whole realme. After their returning to Edenburgh, the king called a parlement in the moneth of Maie 1471, in the which among other things it was ordeined, that the lords, barons, and burroughs of the realme, ſhould build ſhips and boats, and prouide nets for fiſhing. Alſo it was ordeined that none ſhould weare ſilks in dublet, gowne, or cloake, except knights, minſtrels, & heralds; except they might diſpend one hundred pounds in lands by yéere: and that the footbal and other vnlawfull games ſhould be debarred, and the exerciſe of ſhoting maintained. James eldeſt ſonne to king James the third, was borne the tenth day of March, in the yéere 1472, who afterwards ſuccéeded his father, and was called James the fourth. Chriſtierne K. of Denmarke, to congratulate the happie birth of this young prince being his nephue by his daughter, releaſed all the right, title & claime which he or his ſucceſſors might haue to the Iles of Orkeneie and Shetland.

vacant, the couent chose one of their owne monks called Alexander Thomson, and the king promoted Henrie Creichton abbat of Pasley thervnto, whom the pope admitted, & Robert Shaw parson of Minto was preferred by the king vnto the abbasie of Pasley, and then in such wise began promotings of secular priests to abbasies at the princes request, and the laudable elections ancientlie vsed, made void: bicause the court of Rome admitted such as the princes made sute for and named, getting great rewards and notable summes of monie thereby, so that neither the bishops durst admit such as the couents elected, nor such as were elected durst pursue their right, and so the abbasies were bestowed vpon such as followed the court, and liued courtlie, secularlie, and voluptuouslie, to the great slander of religious men, which by the naughtie examples of their gouernors fell to the works of wickednesse, whereupon dailie much euill increased, and vertue in all estates decaied.

Abbeies giuen by vnlawfull means.

This yéere in September, the indulgence of the sée of saint Andrews was published by Patrike Graham bishop thereof, and the same sée erected into the dignitie of an archbishops sée, at the sute of the said Patrike, who gaue information to the pope, that bicause the archbishop of Yorke was metropolitan of Scotland, and that there was oftentimes warre betwixt the realmes of England and Scotland, the Scotishmen could not haue accesse to their metropolitan, speciallie in cases of appellation. And therefore the pope (as some write) thought it reason to make saint Andrews primat and metropolitan of Scotland, and ordeined that the twelue other bishops of Scotland should be vnder his primasie, who would not agrée therto; but promised the king by way of a taxation eleuen thousand marks for his maintenance against the said archbishop: and the prelats sent to Rome about this matter. This yéere was a great death in the realme of Scotland, so that where a parlement was called in September, it was prorogued vntill the twelfe day after Christmas. In Januarie the parlement was holden at Edenburgh, in which John lord of the Iles and earle of Ros was atteinted, partlie for his owne euill déeds, but most speciallie for the defaults of his father Donald lord of the Iles.

In May, in the yéere 1477, the king raised a puissant armie of the most able men vpon the north side of the water of Forth, to pursue the lord of the Iles both by sea and land. The earle of Crawford was made admerall of the armie by sea, and the erle of Atholl the kings vncle by his father was lieutenant of the armie by land. But such meanes was vsed by the earle of Atholl, that the lord of the Iles humbled himselfe to the kings pleasure, vpon certeine conditions; and thervpon in the beginning of Julie next insuing, the said lord of the Iles came to the parlement vnto Edenburgh, and there was the agréement made and confirmed betwixt the king and him: he resigned into the kings hands all the right he had to the earledome of Rosse, the lands of Cantire and Knapden, which earledome the king annexed to the crowne, and pardoned him and his seruants of all offenses and transgressions before that day committed, and inuested him anew in the lordship and seignioric of the Iles, and other his lands not released, to hold the same of the king by the seruice of ward and reliefe. The king also gaue vnto the earle of Atholl for his diligence shewed, in reducing the said lord of the Iles vnto order, the lands and forrest of Clouie.

There was an inquisitor called Husman this yeere sent by pope Sextus into Scotland, to examin by vertue of his commission Patrike Graham archbishop of saint Andrews, whose examination and proofes being sent vnto the pope, he pronounced him an heretike, schismatike, and simoniake, and declared him accursed, condemning him to perpetuall prison: and so he was degraded from all orders, cure, and dignitie of ecclesiasticall office, and William Schews archdeacon of the same sée was promoted in his place, to whome he was also committed to sée him safelie kept in prison. He was first sent vnto saint Colmes inch, and from thence to Dunfermling, and lastlie to Lochleuin, where he died, and was buried in saint Sarffis Ile in Lochleuin. The said William Schewes was consecrated archbishop of saint Andrews on Passion sunday in Lent, within Holie rod house, the king being present, and manie of the nobles of the realme. And there the said archbishop receiued the pall, as a signe of his archbishops dignitie, and so was confirmed primat and legat of the realme, notwithstanding the impediment made against Graham before by the bishops about the same.

This yéere also Alexander duke of Albanie was committed to prison by the king his brother, within the castell of Edenburgh, through euill counsell; but he brake out and escaped to Dunbar, where he caused the castell to be furnished with all necessaries: and leauing his seruants within it, passed himselfe into France, and was there of the king honorablie receiued, and louinglie intreated. In the beginning of Maie following, the king besieged that castell by his lieutenant the earle of Auendale, who lost at that siege three good knights, the lord of Lute, sir John Schaw of Sauch, & the lord of Cragiwallase, with the shot of a gun, & John Ramsete was slaine with a stone cast by hand. When they within saw they could not long indure, they left the castell and fled awaie by sea, and the earle of Auendale entered, and found it void of all things whereof anie account was to be made.

Doctor Ireland being graduat in diuinitie at Paris, was sent from the French king vnto the king of Scots, to persuade him to make war vpon England, to the end that king Edward should not aid the duke of Burgognie. And moreouer, he had in charge to moue for the pardon of the duke of Albanie, and shortlie after returned with answer. The erle of Mar called John Steward the kings yonger brother, this yéere in the moneth of December, was taken in the night within his owne house, and conueied vnto Cragmiller, where he was kept as prisoner by the kings commandement, and after was conuict of conspiracie for witchcraft which he should practise against the king: and herevpon in Cannogate beside Edenburgh, his veines were cut, and so he bled to death. There were manie and diuerse witches and sorcerers, as well men as women conuicted of that crime, and burnt for the same at Edenburgh. The king sent ambassadors into England to make sute to haue the ladie Cicill, daughter to king Edward, ioined in mariage with his sonne James the prince, which was granted, and the mariage concluded to be solemnized, when the prince of Scotland should come to perfect age: as in the English historie it more plainlie appeareth. Doctor Ireland, with a knight, and another religious man, came againe to king James from the French king, to persuade him to make warres against England: and at length, king James and his nobles condescended to breake the peace, wherwith Thomas Spenser bishop of Abirden (that was full tenderlie beloued of king Edward, and had beene euer a mediator for peace betwixt the kings of England, France, and Scotland, & the duke of Burgognie) when he heard that warre would follow, he died through griefe of mind

The king ſent two heralds vnto king Edward, requeſting him not to aid the duke of Burgognie, nor anie other againſt the king of France: for if he did, he muſt néeds ſupport the Frenchmen, by reaſon of the league betwixt France and Scotland: but king Edward would not admit thoſe heralds to his preſence, but kept them ſtill without anſwer, till he had ſent forth a nauie of ſhips into the Forth before Lieth, Kingorne, and Pettenwen, and then were the heralds licenced to returne. The king of Scotland prepared an armie.

The king aſſembled an armie from all parts of the realme, and amongeſt other, the lord of the Iles came with a great companie: and now the king being readie to enter into England, there came to him a meſſenger of king Edward, ſent from a cardinall legat that was reſident as then in England, commanding king James by authoritie apoſtolike, not to procéed anie further in his purpoſed iournie, to the end that peace being obſerued, all chriſtian princes might bend their powers againſt the Turke & Infidels. This commandement did king James obeie, and ſo diſcharged his armie, notwithſtanding that king Edward ſent forth his nauie againe into the Forth, to the Ile of Ins Keith, but they did no hurt: for the countrie men kept them off. The Scotiſh borderers inuaded the Engliſh marches, deſtroied townes, and led manie priſoners awaie with them into Scotland. The king of England cauſed Berwike to be alleged both by ſea and land all the winter ſeaſon, and ouerthrew a wall that was newlie made about it for defenſe thereof: but the Scots within it defended the towne for that time ſo ſtoutlie, that the enimies might not win it from them.

The duke of Albanie, after his wife was dead, whom he had maried in France, perceiuing himſelfe not ſo well intreated as before, came ouer into England, where king Edward receiued him verie honorablie, promiſing (as ſome haue written) to make him king of Scotland: and thereupon aſſembled an armie of thirtie thouſand men, with a great nauie by ſea to inuade Scotland, and appointed capteins and leaders of the armie by land, his owne brother the duke of Gloceſter, the duke of Albanie, and others. The king of Scots hearing of their approch to inuade his realme, raiſed a puiſſant armie to reſiſt them, and came forward with the ſame vnto the towne of Lowder, where being incamped, the principall nobles of his realme, as Archembald earle of Angus, George earle of Huntleie, John earle of Lenor, James earle of Buchquhane, Andrew lord Greie, Robert lord Lile, and diuerſe other being armed, entered the kings lodging, where they accuſed him of diuerſe things done and practiſed by him contrarie to his honor and the common-weale of his realme; and ſpeciallie, becauſe he vſed yong counſell of lewd perſons, vnworthie and baſe of birth, ſuch as Thomas Cochram, whome of a maſon he had made earle of Mar, through whoſe deuiſe and counſell he had cauſed to be coined certeine monie of copper, not conuenient to be currant in anie realme, which the people refuſed, and ſo great dearth and hunger was raiſed through the countrie. Moreouer, that he would not ſuffer the noble men to come néere his preſence, nor to take their counſell in gouerning the realme, but gaue himſelfe to voluptuous pleaſure, ſetting naught by the quéene his lawfull wife, & kéeping a naughtie harlot called the Daiſie in hir place.

Alſo they laied to his charge, that he had put his brother the earle of Mar to death, and baniſhed his other brother the duke of Albanie, and therefore they could not ſuffer him and the whole realme to be longer miſled by ſuch naughtie perſons. And heerupon they toke Thomas Cochram earle of Mar, William Roger, and James Hommill tailor, who with others being conuicted, were hanged ouer the bridge at Lowder. Onelie John Kamſeie a yong man of eightéene yéeres of age, for whome the king made great inſtance, was pardoned of life. This done, they returned to Edenburgh, and appointed the king himſelfe to be kept in the caſtell by the earle of Atholl, and in the meane time, the ſecond of Auguſt, they ſent Andrew Steward elect biſhop of Murrey, & John lord Darneleie to the Engliſh armie, lieng then at Tuder, to take truce for thrée moneths: but the dukes of Gloceſter and Albanie came forward vnto Reſtalrig, where they incamped without anie reſiſtance. Hérevpon, certeine noble men of Scotland, as the archbiſhop of ſaint Andreines, the biſhop of Dunkeld, Colin earle of Argile, and Andrew Steward lord Auendale, great chancellor of Scotland, went to the Engliſh campe, & treating with the two dukes, agréed vpon certeine articles, whereby the duke of Albanie was receiued into his countrie againe in peaceable wiſe, and had giuen to him the caſtell of Dunbar with the earledoms of March and Mar. He was proclamed alſo generall lieutenant to the king. And ſo the Engliſhmen returned homewards, and came vnto Berwike, where they hauing woone the towne as they paſſed that waies into Scotland, had left the lord Stanleie, and ſir John Eldrington, with foure thouſand men, to kéepe a ſiege before the caſtell, and now they inforced the ſame: but the lord of Halis then capteine within that caſtell, defended it verie manfullie, ſending to the duke of Albanie and other, the lords of the councell, for reliefe to raiſe the ſiege. The duke in déed raiſed an armie, and came to Lamer moore, but when they within perceiued that through diſſention betwixt the king and the nobles of the realme, they were not like to be reſcued, they yéelded the caſtell into the Engliſhmens hands, the 24 of Auguſt, in that yéere 1482, after it had remained now at this time in the Scotiſhmens hands the ſpace of 21 yeares.

The king remaining as priſoner in Edenburgh caſtell, all things were ordered by the duke of Albanie, Andrew Steward lord of Auendale, chancellor, and others, till the ſaid duke, the archbiſhop of ſaint Andrewes, the chancellor, the earle of Argile, and diuerſe others, went to Striueling to viſit the quéene and prince, where the duke was perſuaded by the quéene, without knowledge thereof giuen to the other, to go vnto Edenburgh, and to reſtore the king vnto libertie. The duke accordinglie to the quéenes pleaſure comming to Edenburgh, beſieged the caſtell and wan it, removed the earle of Atholl, and ſet the king and all his ſeruants at libertie, for the which good turne, the king ſhewed great tokens of loue to his brother the duke, although it laſted not long. The earle of Argile, the biſhop of ſaint Andrewes, the chancellor, and others, which remained at Striueling, when they heard thoſe newes, fled into their owne countries: and ſhortlie after, the biſhop of S. Andrewes, at requeſt of the king, reſigned his biſhoprike in fauor of maiſter Andrew Steward prouoſt of Glemelowden, and was content in recompenſe thereof, with the biſhoprike of Murrey. This yéere there was great theft, reiffe, and ſlaughter in diuerſe parts of the realme, by occaſion of the variance betwixt the king and his nobles.

teine ambaſſadors, which were Beroald or Bernard Steward, lord of Aubignie, marſhall of France, and Peter Mallart doctor of both lawes, to renew the old league betweene this James the third, and the king of France: for which cauſe the king of Scots and the nobles aſſembled at Edenburgh, where (with the French ambaſſadors) ſeeking all the rols of all 1483. the ancient leagues, they reconfirmed the ſame, with the ſeales of both parts ſet thereunto; which done, the Frenchmen (with whome were ſent into France diuerſe Scots) returned home. Amongeſt the Scots, one Robertſon was the chiefe, a man famous for the feates of battell, and hauing imploied his ſeruice on the parts of the French in the Italian warres, which being ended, the ſaid choſen ſoldiors following the conduct of Beroald Steward, went into England with Henrie earle of Richmont, after king, whoſe part they tooke againſt Richard at that time vſurper vpon the Engliſh, for which cauſe the earle of Richmont (when he was after king) did dærelie loue the Scots.

The ſeditions alſo, which a long time did burne in France, cauſed deadlie wars to grow betweene the king of France and the duke of Burgognie. Whereunto, when the death of Charles (the laſt duke of Burgognie, ſlaine at Nants by the duke of Loraine) did ſet end: Charles the eight of that name, king of France (aſſembling a great armie) did applie all his force and deuiſe to expell Alphonſe out of the kingdom of Naples, which at that time ſucceeded happilie vnto him, by reaſon that Alphonſe was then eaſilie remoued. But after, when the Neapolitane people did reuolt (from the French faction) to Ferdinand the ſon of Alphonſe, there aroſe great flames of warre and ſedition through Italie, each part ſtudieng to ſupport the ſtrength of his owne. The adminiſtration of which warre againſt Ferdinand, was chieflie performed by the Scots, as principall capteins of that armie, or at the leaſt equall with the beſt. Of which Scots the chiefe were Alexander duke of Albanie, ſon to James the ſecond king of Scots, John alſo duke of Albanie ſonne of this Alexander, George Montgomerie lord of Lorges, Bernard Steward (who was after made viceroy of Naples, which office he wiſelie manie yeeres did execute) Robert Steward marſhall of France, Nicholas Scot, and others, wherof manie (for their worthie exploits) were by the French honorablie rewarded with great poſſeſſions. Who alſo (as manie of the Scots before had done) planting themſelues in Iſubria, became the authors of manie ancient families. For though by the euill cuſtome of common ſpeech, they reteine the name of Scot (as taken of their countrie) yet by the enſignes, and tokens which they had and vſed, it may eaſilie be knowne of what families the Scots their anceſtors did deſcend.

Certeine noble families in Italie and Iſubria ſprong from the Scots.

Wherefore it followeth by moſt certeine conjecture, that the ancient familie of the earles (to whome vſe of ſpeech hath long obteined the ſurname of Scots) flouriſhing in Placentia, had their originall from the ſtocke of the Dowglaſſes, as the armes of them both do well witneſſe: which kindred (beſides manie other earles thereof) is at this day notablie beautified by Chriſtopher Scot, who (with ſingular pietie and learning) doth gouerne the church of Canalion. Againe, there is another familie of Scots, commonlie called the Scoties in Iſubria, whereof Bernard Scotia and Horace his brother (the one a ſenator of Mantua, and the other a prelat) are both famous, as well for their vertue, as nobilitie: alſo Francis Scotia, lord of Pine and Mondone, and other nobles of the marqueſdome of Saluce, are deſcended from the Scots, with the large familie of the Schities (deſcended of James Orlando Scot, which we haue heard confirmed by the armes of that familie) are well aduanced about Cremona, Mantua, and Verona, as are alſo the Paparons in Rome (ſo called for their armes and enſignes) whoſe anceſtors to be of the Scotiſh nobilitie, is witneſſed by a worthie monument thereof in the church of ſaint Marie the great, in which the father and the ſon called Paparons, being there buried, are both adorned with the enſignes of knighthod out of Scotland.)

The duke of Albanie, for that he vnderſtood there was poiſon giuen to him in drinke in the kings chamber, and therefore ſtod in feare of his life, fled from the court vnto the caſtell of Dunbar, whereby inſued great diſcord. The king fearing the diſpleaſure of his nobles, got him alſo into the caſtell of Edenburgh. The earles of Angus, Buchquhane, and others, left the king, and aſſiſted the duke of Albanie. And the king through counſell of certeine meane perſons whome he had againe taken vnto him, ſummoned the duke and other his aſſiſtants, to come to anſwer for ſuch treaſon as he had to lay againſt them, & withall prepared an armie to beſiege Dunbar, wherof the duke being aduertiſed, fled into England, and afterwards being accompanied with the earle of Dowglaſſe, and a great number of Engliſhmen, inuaded Scotland vpon the weſt marches, where manie Engliſhmen were ſlaine and taken by the reſiſtance of the lords Cokpull, Johnſton, and others, the duke was put to flight, and the earle Dowglaſſe taken and brought to the king, who becauſe he was an aged man, and had beene long baniſhed his countrie, was ſent to the abbeie of Lundoris, where he remained the reſt of his daies, and at length, departing this life, was buried there.

The duke of Albanie for the loſſe of that armie, was blamed of the king of England, and therevpon taking a miſliking, ſecretlie departed ouer into France by the helpe of John Liddell, ſonne to ſir James Liddell knight, who afterwards loſt his life for the ſame. The duke was well interteined in France by the king there: and finallie running at tilt with Lewes duke of Orleance, was hurt with the ſplint of a ſpeare, and thereof died. He left behind him two ſonnes, John duke of Albanie, that was after gouernor and tutor to king James the fift, and Alexander that was after biſhop of Murrey, and abbat of Scone. This yeere the lord Hume, Torreklis, Oliphant, and Drummond, were made lords of the parlement. In the yeere 1484, the king ſent the archbiſhop of ſaint Andrewes vnto Rome, for certeine priuileges which he obteined. And the ſame yeere, pope Innocent the eight of that name, ſent the biſhop of Imola to treat of peace, betwixt Richard king of England, & James king of Scotland. James king of Scots, hauing not long before made diuerſe incurſions and rodes into England, and that to his profit, he ſued therevpon for a truce, which came to paſſe euen as king Richard wiſhed, ſo that condeſcending to haue a communication, commiſſioners were appointed for both parts to meet at Notingham, the ſeuenth day of September next inſuing.

The biſhop is ſent to Rome.

The pope ſent to intreat for peace.

Commiſſioners appointed on the behalfe of the king of England & Scotland, to treat for a peace at Notingham.

For the king of Scots there appeered Colin earle of Argile, the lord Campbell, the lord chancellor of Scotland, William biſhop of Aberden, Robert lord Lile, Laurence lord Oliphant, John Drummond of Stubhall, Archembald Quitelaw archdeacon of Lawden, and ſecretarie to king James, Lion king of armes, and Duncan Dundas. For king Richard, there came Richard biſhop of ſaint Aſaph, John duke of Norffolke, Henrie earle of Northumberland, Thomas lord Stanleie, George Stanleie lord Strange, John Greie lord Powes, Richard lord Fitzhugh, John Gunthorpe keeper of the kings priuie ſeale, Thomas Barrow maiſter of the rols, ſir Thomas

Thomas Bzian chiefe iuſtice of the common plées, ſir Richard Ratcliffe knight, William Catesbie, & Richard Salkeld eſquires. Theſe councellozs in the later end of September, after ſundzie mætings and communications had togither, concluded (as followeth) a peace to be had betwixt both the realmes foz the ſpace of thzée yéeres, the ſame to begin at the rising of the ſunne, on the 29 of September in the yéere 1484, and to continue vnto the ſetting of the ſunne on the 29 of September in the yéere 1487.

A peace concluded foz thzée yéeres.

During which terme, it was agréed, that not onelie all hoſtilitie and warre ſhould ceaſſe betwixt the two realmes, but that alſo all aid and abatement of enimies ſhould be auoided, & by no colozable meanes oz waie in anie caſe vſed. The towne and caſtell of Berwike to remaine in the Engliſhmens hands, foz the ſpace of the ſaid terme, with the ſame bounds as the Engliſhmen poſſeſſed it at that ſeaſon, when it was deliuered to the Scotiſhmen by king Henrie the firt. It was likewiſe condeſcended, that all other caſtels, holds, and foztreſſes, during the tearme of the ſaid thzee yéeres, ſhould abide in the hands of thoſe that held them at that pzeſent, the caſtell of Dunbar onelie excepted. This caſtell of Dunbar was deliuered vnto the Engliſhmen by the duke of Albanie, when he fled into France, and ſo remained in their hands at that time of concluding this truce.

The caſtell of Dunbar in the Engliſhmens hands.

Héere vpon (by reaſon the Scotiſh commiſſioners had not authozitie to conclude ante full agrément foz that caſtell, vnleſſe the ſame might be reſtozed vnto the king their maiſters hands) it was accozded, that if the king of Scots, within the ſpace of foztie daies nert inſuing, did intimate his reſolute refuſall to be agreeable, that the ſaid caſtell ſhould remaine in the Engliſhmens hands aboue the ſpace of ſix moneths, that then during that terme of ſix moneths, thoſe that kept the caſtell foz the Engliſhmen ſhould remaine in quiet, and not be troubled noz moleſted by anie kind of meanes by the ſaid king of Scots, oz anie other by his pzocurement, ſo that they within the caſtell likewiſe abſteining from making anie iſſues oz reiſſes vpon the Scotiſh people. And if after that the ſaid terme of ſix moneths were once expired, it ſhould chance that anie warre aroſe foz defending oz recouering the ſaid caſtell, yet the truce ſhould indure foz all other rights and poſſeſſions; notwithſtanding that it might be lawfull to doo what lay in ante of their powers, either foz winning oz defending the foreſaid caſtell, as though no truce had béene concluded.

It was further agreed, that no traitoz of either realme ſhould be receiued by the pzince of either realme; and if anie traitoz oz rebell chanced to arriue in either realme, the pzince thereof to deliuer him vpon demand made. Scots alreadie abiding in England & ſwozne to the king there, may remaine ſtill, ſo their names be certified to the Scotiſh king within foztie daies. If anie warden of either realme ſhould inuade the others ſubiects, he to whome ſuch warden is ſubiect, ſhall within ſix daies pzoclame him traitoz, and certifie the other pzince therof within 12 daies. And in euerie ſafe conduct this clauſe ſhould be conteined; Pzouided alwaies that the obteiner of this ſafe conduct be no traitoz. If anie of the ſubiects of either pzince doo pzeſume to aid, helpe, mainteine, oz ſerue anie other pzince againſt anie of the contractozs of this truce, then it ſhall be lawfull foz him, to whome he ſhewed himſelfe enimie, to apprehend and attach the ſaid ſubiect, going, comming, oz tarieng within anie of his dominions.

On the Scotiſh part, Charles the French king, John king of Denmarke and Nozwaie, the duke of Gelderland, and the duke of Britaine. The lozdſhip of Lozne in the realme of Scotland, and the Iland of Lundaie lieng in the riuer of Seurne, in the realme of England, were not compzehended in this agrément. This concozd, peace, and amitie thus concluded, was appointed to be publiſhed the firſt day of October, in the moſt notable cities and townes of both the realmes.

For the ſure obſeruation, keeping, & perfozmance of this truce & league, there were appointed foz conſeruatozs on the Scotiſh ſide, Dauid earle of Crawford and lozd Lindſeie, Geozge earle of Huntleie lozd Gozdon and Badzenath, John lozd Darneleie, John lozd Kenedie, Robert lozd Lile, Patrike lozd Haleene, Laurence lozd Oliphant, William lozd Bozthwike; ſir John Roſſe of Halkheid, ſir Gilbert Johnſton of Elphinſton, ſir John Lundie, ſir John Ogiluie of Arlie, ſir Robert Hammilton of Fingalton, ſir William Balze of Lamington, ſir John Kenedie of Blarqhone, ſir John Wemes, ſir William Rochwen; Edward Stochton of Kirke patie, John Dundas, John Roſſe of Mountgrenan, eſquires.

It was further agréed, that commiſſioners ſhould mæt at Loughmaben on the eightéenth day of Nouember, as well foz redzeſſe of certeine offenſes done on the weſt marches, as alſo foz declaring and publiſhing the peace. On the Engliſh part, the lozd Dacres, the lozd Fitzhugh, ſir Richard Ratcliffe, ſir Chriſtopher Mozeſbie, ſir Richard Salkeild, oz thzée of them. At which two places foz Scotland, there were aſſigned to appeere the earle of Huntleie, the earle of Angus, the earle of Argile chancellor of Scotland, the lozd Auandale, the lozd Seiton, the lozd Oliphant, the lozd Stubhall, with others.

Commiſſioners appointed to mæt at Loughmaben.

Commiſſioners to mæt at Koldenbozne. And at Yaldan Stanke.

Foz England, the earle of Northumberland, the lozd Greiſtocke, the lozd Scrope of Yallan, ſir William Gaſcoigne, ſir Robert Conſtable, and other. The ſame commiſſioners had authozitie to aſſigne certeine perſons, to viewe and declare the bounds and limits apperteining to Berwike, accozding to the true meaning of the leagtie. Foz the battell ground it was accozded, that the ſame ſhould remaine without ſowing, earing, building, oz inhabiting, as it had done befoze. Shortlie after the concluding of this truce, king Richard intreated foz a mariage to be had betwixt the pzince of Rothſaie, eldeſt ſonne to king James & ladie Anne de la Pole, daughter to John duke of Suffolke and to the ladie Anne his wife, that was ſiſter to the ſaid king Richard. Foz the concluding of this mariage, both the kings ſent their ambaſſadozs againe vnto Notingham, where their treatie had ſuch ſucceſſe foz that time, that the mariage was agréed vpon, and writings thereof drawen, ingroſſed, and ſealed, and aſſiances made and taken by pzoctozs and deputies on both parts. The foreſaid yong ladie was immediatlie called pzinceſſe of Rothſaie, but by the ſhort life of king Richard hir vncle ſhe ſhoztlie after loſt that name.

King James by letters signifieth his mind touching the articles of Dunbar.

during the tearme of the whole truce in the Englishmens possessions, he wrote vnto king Richard a louing letter, signifieng vnto him, that he was not minded to séeke the recouerie of the said castell by force of armes, but rather to leaue it in his hand, during the whole terme of the truce. Neuertheless, he instantlie required him for the bond of that loue and familiaritie, which now by treatie and alliance was sprong vp betwixt them, that he would redeliuer the said castell into his hands, according as reason might moue him thereto; considering the Englishmen had no right to it, being onelie deliuered to them by traitors of their natiue countrie, without anie reasonable cause, or commission lawfullie authorised.

K. Richard would not deliuer the castell of Dunbar.

King Richard dalied in this matter with pleasant letters and faire words feeding forth king James, without minding to gratifie him in that sute, so that as long as king Richard liued, king James could neuer get it for anie thing he might do. In the Bernard Steward a Scotishman was chiefe capteine, landed in Wales, and passing through the countrie into England, at length incountred king Richard, and slue him, so obteining the crowne of that realme. And after he was somewhat quietlie established in the same, he came into the north parts, where he remained the most part of the next summer, and regarding nothing more than to haue the loue and friendship of his neighbors, & to be confederat with the kings and princes ioining next vnto him, he sent from Newcastell one of his councellors Richard For bishop of Excester, and sir Richard Edgcombe knight, ambassadors vnto king James, to treat a contract, and renew the bond of peace and truce betwixt the said kings and their realmes.

An ambassage sent into Scotland.

The kings answer.

These ambassadors were gladlie receiued of king James, who declared vnto them, that he bare great fauor and loue vnto their maister, and would be glad to pleasure him in all he might: howbeit, that his subiects were not of so good a mind towards the English nation as he himselfe wished, and therefore he willed them to be contented with a truce for seuen yeares, sith further he could not do, for doubt to offend his nobilitie and subiects. But he promised secretlie, that when those seuen yeares were expired, he would renew the same for the tearme of other seuen yeares, and so from seuen yeares to seuen yeares so long as he liued. This he did, because he perceiued that his people had him in such hatred, that they would not consent to anie bond that he should make. The ambassadors perceiuing his good meaning toward king Henrie, confirmed the truce for those seuen yeares, and so returned home to king Henrie, who was glad of that they had done.

concluded betwixt the two realmes, king James caused the three estates to assemble in parlement at Edenburgh the first of October in the yeare 1487,

No pardon to be granted to offendors for the space of seuen yeares.

in the which order was taken, that iustice oires should be holden through all the parts of the realme, & that no pardons should be granted for anie great crime that shuld be committed for the space of seuen yeares to come, so that the king began to vse sharpe execution of iustice in all parts, which was right displeasant to manie.

Ambassadors sent to the king of the Romans.

At the same time was an ambassador sent to the king of Romans, for the calling in of a letter of marque, which had béene granted against Scotish merchants, at the sute and instance of certeine Hollanders and Burgognions, and was shortlie after herevpon reuoked. After the parlement was ended, the king remoued vnto Striueling, leauing his wife the queene, and hir sonne the prince at Edenburgh castell, whilest he keeping persons about him of meane calling, gaue himselfe to take his pleasure with women, & to gather vp gold and siluer, greatlie to the offense of his subiects. Yet in the meane time, now after the death of king Richard, whether it was by treson or appointment, the castell of Dunbar was deliuered to the hands of king James, and that to his great ioy and high contentation; for he that ruled his kingdome more with rigor than with anie tractable meane of fauorable iustice, stood euer in feare of some troublesome tumult that might be raised by his owne people, if occasion were ministred either through hope of forren aid or otherwise.

The king giueth himselfe to satisfie his lust in keeping women and gathering treasure.

After the deth of king Richard, Dunbar is deliuered.

So long therefore as the castell was in the Englishmens hands, he doubted least through practise, some conspiracie should be contriued betwixt his owne subiects and the English nation, greatlie to the annoiance of his estate, & therevpon he was the more desirous to reduce the same castell into his possession. But the onelie meane to haue assured himselfe from the hands of such as sought his life, had bene to haue changed his wilfull maner of gouernment, & to haue leaned vnto such counsell as would haue aduised him for the wealth of his whole realme, and not vpon desire to please, haue maintained his vndiscréet opinions, to the wronging aswell of his commons as of the nobles and peeres of his realme; for the nobilitie of Scotland, namelie the earles of Angus, Argile, and Lenor, the lords Halis, Hume, Drummond, Greie, and others, perceiuing themselues oppressed by such as from base birth had risen (without worthie deseruing) to the degree of councellors, and therewith aduanced to so high authoritie, as all things were ordered at their appointment, conspired togither, & determined by force of armes to sée a reformation in such a disordered maner of gouernement.

But yet because it should not be thought that they minded the destruction of their countrie, but rather the aduancement thereof, they made the lord James duke of Rothsaie sonne to the king (a child borne to goodnesse and vertue) the chiefe capteine in this their enterprise, and that in maner against his will; hereby openlie protesting, that they minded and purposed the suppressing and confusion of an euill king, and not the subuersion of their natiue countrie. By which their craftie imagined inuention, they thought to remoue all suspicion of their purposed vntruth and shamefull disloialtie. They had sent to the earle of Dowglasse, who remained prisoner (as ye haue heard) in the abbeie of Lundoris, and required him to assist them in their begun enterprise, promising that they would restore him againe to his lands and former dignitie, and honor him as principall of their faction. But that noble, wise, and ancient earle, being alreadie schooled with troubles, and hauing learned by experience (to his great griefe) what such matter meant, refused to breake his ward, or to assist them in anie wise, dissuading them from their enterprise, because it séemed to him neither godlie nor honorable, sithens both himselfe and his friends had tasted for the like, great hinderance, which might be an example to him and others to beware in time to come.

The king being once informed of this rebellion and and conſpiracie againſt him, was ſore diſquieted in his mind, and to meet their miſchiefous attempts, gathered an armie. Yet before the vſing of anie force, he ſent meſſengers to his ſonne, and to the nobles with him, to trie if he might come to ſome agreement with them. He ſent alſo letters to the king of England, & to the French king, requiring them to take ſome paines in the matter, to procure an attonement betwixt him and his nobles. And beſides this, he wrote to pope Innocent about the ſame purpoſe, praieng him to intermeddle his authoritie by ſending ſome legate into Scotland, to appeaſe the troubles thereof. But the Scotiſh nobilitie, and ſuch of the people as were vp in armor againſt him, were ſo deſperatlie ſet, and wholie bent on reuenge, that no wholeſome counſell nor medicinable aduiſe might appeaſe their furious rage, ſo that for anſwer to his meſſengers, they ſent him word, that if hee would reſigne the title of his crowne and realme, & depoſe himſelfe of his whole regall dignitie, then they would come to ſome communication with him or elſe not. The like anſwer was giuen to the ambaſſadors of England and France, that were ſent vnto them from the kings of both thoſe realmes, which ſore lamented the fortune of their friend and alie the Scotiſh king.

The anſwer of the rebels to the kings meſſage.

But Adrian the biſhop of Romes legat came too late, as who ſhould ſay, a day after the faire: for when their grounded malice and ſpitefull hatred conceiued againſt him might not be qualified by anie maner of means, but that they were now comming forward with all their puiſance to Striueling, where he then remained, he would not ſtaie till the erles of Huntleie, Erroll, Atholl, Crawford, Rothus, Sutherland, Cathneſſe, & Marſhall; the barons, Forbes, Ogiluie, Granth, Fraiſer, and others, were arriued with their powers, amounting to the number of fortie thouſand men, with the which they were comming forth of the north parts to his aid: but raſhlie and without good aduiſe he iſſued out of the towne, accompanied with the earles of Glencarne & Montros, the lords Graham, Ruthuen, Parwell, and certeine other's, and forthwith ioined battell with his aduerſaries at Banockesborne, within two miles of Striueling.

Now when nothing might quiet them, at length they met thus in a pitched field, where after great ſlaughter & murther made of an huge multitude of people, the king being put to the worſſe, fled into a mill, whither being fiercelie followed and found therin, he was cruellie ſlaine, and vnreuerentlie left ſtarke naked. ¶ A notable mirror to all princes, that calling to remembrance ſuch a miſerable and moſt dolorous ſight, they may take heed by what maner of perſons they ſuffer themſelues to be led and abuſed. For if this prince king James the third had not followed vpon a wilfull pretenſe, and obſtinat mind, the counſell and aduiſe of vantperlors, and ſuch as (being aduanced from baſe degree vnto high authoritie) ſtudied more to keepe themſelues in fauor, than to giue true aduertiſements, and faithfull aduiſe vnto their prince, he might haue reigned longer by manie daies & yéeres, in great and high felicitie.

They met in a pitched field.

The king is put to the worſſe.

He is ſlaine.

[In which conflict was on the kings part ſlaine (as ſaith Buchanan) Alexander Coningham earle of Glencarne.] He was thus ſlaine neere Striueling, on the ſeuenth day of June, the yéere after the incarnation 1488, being alſo the 29 of his reigne.

NOw then, after that the barons of Scotland had thus ſlaine their ſouereigne lord and liege king James, the third of that name: his eldeſt ſon James the fourth was crowned king of Scotland, and began his reigne the 24 of June, in the yéere 1488, being not paſt ſixteene yeeres of age, who notwithſtanding that he had béene in the field with the nobles of the realme againſt his father, that contrarie to his mind was ſlaine; yet neuertheleſſe afterwards, hée became a right noble prince, & ſeemed to take great repentance for that his offenſe, and in token therof, he ware continuallie an iron chaine about his midle all the daies of his life. He was greatlie giuen to deuotion and praier, viſiting religious houſes, and beſtowing on them ſundrie gifts. He gouerned his realme in great reſt, peace, iuſtice, and quietneſſe, riding him ſelfe in proper perſon diuerſe daies and nights, to ſuppreſſe and take théeues, robbers, and oppreſſors of his ſubiects in all parts of his realme, till he had brought the countrie to great quietneſſe. He was learned and liberall, and indued with manie other good vertues and qualities.

The king was repentant.

The king wore an iron chaine.

He was giuen to deuotion.

He was a great iuſticer.

He was learned.

Anon after his coronation, the earle of Lennor, and the lord Lile, with diuers other their aſſiſtants, notwithſtanding that they had beene with him at the ſlaughter of his father, ſéeing that things went not as they wiſhed, raiſed an armie, and cauſed the dead kings bloudie ſhirt to be borne afore them for a banner: and comming forwards toward Striueling againſt the yong king, were ouerthrowne at Tolimoſſe, where the Lennor men, and ſundrie other of the barons ſide were ſlaine, as the lord of Biltrucht, and other taken and hanged for their offenſes. The king called a parlement at Edenburgh, which was holden the firſt of October, where he being moued by clemencie, granted a generall pardon to all thoſe that came in field at Striueling with his father againſt him, and appointed euerie one to haue ſpeciall pardons therevpon vnder his ſeales. He likewiſe diſpenſed with the heires of them that were ſlaine with his father there in field, appointing them their particular diſpenſations vnder his ſeales, after the ſame maner. Further it was ordeined, that all iuſtices, ſhiriffes, ſtewards, baliffes, lieutenants, and other which had offices in heritage, and had béene with his father at the field, ſhould be ſuſpended from the ſame offices for the tearme of three yeeres: and thoſe which had offices for life, or for terme of yéeres, ſhould be vtterlie excluded from the ſame.

The nobles raiſe an armie againe.

They were ouerthrowne.

A parlement.

A generall pardon.

Moreouer, he tooke order that all ſuch goods as had béene taken from landed men and burgeſſes, ſhould be reſtored to them againe, except that which was taken from ſuch landed men and burgeſſes as were in the field againſt him; for that was deemed a lawfull preie. It was alſo iudged that the death of his father came vpon him through his owne default, and that king James the fourth then reigning, and all his adherents and partakers in that field, were innocent and giltleſſe of all ſlaughter made there at that time, and clearlie acquit of all purſute and occaſion thereof: the three eſtates granting to giue their ſeales to teſtifie the ſame, with the kings great ſeale of the realme, to be ſhewed vnto the pope, the kings of France, Spaine, Denmarke, and other princes their confederats. And for the ceaſſing of theft, reiffe, & ſuch other great enormities, the king was appointed to ride in perſon once euerie yéere through all parts of the realme. And certeine noble men were ordeined to exerciſe iuſtice in euerie ſhire nert adioining to the places where they had their chiefe reſidence: and hereunto they gaue their othes to be diligent in the adminiſtration of iuſtice. Theſe ordinances were right well obſerued all the daies of K. James the fourth his life time, ſo that the realme was reduced to great tranquillitie, and gouerned in good peace and iuſtice. Furthermore, all gifts made by his father in preiudice of the crowne, were reuoked, from the ſecond day of February immediatlie preceading his death, to the day in which hée was ſlaine.

* About

Fr. Thin. Buchan.lib.13.

✻ About this time was a monster borne of a strange forme, hauing from the nauill downeward the perfect parts of one man, not different from the right proportion of a man: but from the nauill vpward, it was double bodied, hauing all perfect parts answering euerie of those bodies, sundered to all actions and shew. This monster the king commanded to be diligentlie nourished and instructed, but chiefflie in musike (wherein it profited verie much.) Further also learning diuers sorts of languages, whose seuerall wits and natures manifestlie appeared by diuers dispositions of their minds. For sometime they would fall out one with another, and when anie thing displeased them, they would most bitterly contend the one with the other: contrarilie, when anie thing happened to their liking or desire, they would consult and agrée togither as friends. In which this was worthie remembrance, that if the legges or loines had béene hurt below, they both togither felt the paine; but if they were pinched or grieued in any part aboue seuered from the other, then that bodie onelie felt the same which had that hurt done vnto it. Which different sense did more plainelie appeare in the death of the one of them: for when the one bodie died manie daies before the other, that which liued, did after by little and little consume, by the putrifaction of the other bodie then dead; which monster liued 28 yéeres, and in the time of John the gouernor: of which thing we doubt not to write (more boldlie) sith there are men yet liuing of honest fame which saw these things.)

Buchan.li.13. This king in the beginning of his reigne, to make his estate the surer, and more faithfull to reconcile the harts of such as had mainteined factions against him, determined to marie the daughters of his aunt by two husbands, to two of those noble men: for which cause he maried Grecina Boid to Alexander Forbois, and Margaret Hammilton to Matthew Steward, by which in time there followed a most singular peace in the kingdome.) Also an esquier, and an herald were sent into France, Spaine, and other places, to learne where the king might be a suter for some great ladie to ioine with him in mariage. Moreouer beside these, there were sent honorable ambassadors into France, Spaine, and Denmarke, to renew the old amities & leagues betwixt those realmes and Scotland, as had béene vsed in the daies of this kings progenitors. His two brethren, the duke of Rothsele, and the earle of Mar, he caused to be brought vp in good nourture and vertuous exercise, appointing to them such liuings for maintenance of their estates, as his father had assigned them.

1486 Mariage sought for the king.

For his councell he chose a certeine number of the prelats, noble men, and barons of his realme, such as were thought most meet, taking this order, that six of them at the least should continuallie remaine about him, by whose aduise he should do all things that touched the affaires of the realme: and in case any thing was done without their aduise, the same should be iudged void, & not to be obeied, & this was inuiolablie kept all his daies. When the esquier and herald were returned againe into Scotland, which had bene to visit strange countries, and made report of that they had séene, there was a parlement holden, in which it was ordeined, that the bishop of Glascow, the earle Bothwell, and others, should go as ambassadors to sue for the kings mariage in place where it should be most expedient, and most to the kings liking. Great variance rose betwixt the archbishop of saint Andrews, and the bishop of Glascow, touching the preheminence of their iurisdiction, which drew the noble men into factions, till the king commanded the same to cease, and that they should trie it by law before competent iudges.

✻ James Ogiluie knight of Aire, was sent ambassador to the king of Denmarke, to whome the king gaue in charge, that he should labor to renew the old league that was betwéene the Danes and the Scots, which he wiselie executed and obteined, with certeine priuileges for the benefit of the merchants. By means whereof at his returne, he purchased such fauour of the king, as that he was aduanced to the title of a lord, in which the name of the Ogiluies was first increased with anie honorable title.) The king about the same time tooke order for increase of some number of ships to be had in his realme, and that euerie hauen towne should build some, as well for fishing, as to transport merchandize from place to place.

The lords and barons, and such other as would, were commanded to helpe the merchants toward the building of such ships: and for good example, the king caused to make certeine ships at his owne charges, which might vse the trade of fishing. Moreouer, the king considering the ignorance that was amongst the landed men of his realme, when they should passe vpon inquests, he ordeined that euerie landed man should put his eldest sonne to schole, that he might learne perfectlie the lawes of the realme, and that vpon great forfeiture. Thus in the beginning of his reigne, diuers good lawes and constitutions were made, for the aduancement of the common-wealth, which he caused to be dulie obserued and kept during his time. The pope sent a protonotarie called Forman into Scotland, with a rose and a scepter of gold, to be presented vnto the king, desiring him to perseuere in godlinesse, honor, and vertue, as he had begun. The most part of this yéere the king spent in riding abroad through all parts of his realme to sée iustice ministred, speciallie in the north parts, where the people are commonlie furthest out of order.

1492. The king goeth on progresse.

There was shortlie after some appearance of warres betwixt England and France, whereupon king Charles sent vnto king James, requiring him of assistance, if it came to passe that the Englishmen did inuade France: and further declared, that he had one with him called Richard duke of Yorke, second sonne to king Edward the fourth, who had béene preserued now manie yéeres secretlie by his aunt Margaret duches of Burgognie, and therefore was iust inheritor to the realme of England, whom he would send into Scotland, praieng the king to assist him to recouer his rightfull heritage, the said realme of England. And shortlie after hereupon, the said feined duke (whose right name was Perkin Warbecke, as in the English historie it appeareth) arriued in Scotland well and honorablie accompanied, to trie what purchase he might make there for succors to atteine his pretended right to the crowne of England.

Perkin warbecke.

✻ After whose arriuall he was brought to the presence of king James, before whom he did lamentablie bewaile (as he well could) the fall of the house of Yorke, and his owne calamities: most humblie and vehementlie beséeching him, to ransome the kinglie bloud from that contumelie. For answer whereunto at that present time, the king bid him be of good heart, for he would so worke, that he should find his suite not defrauded of all due effect, in obteining succor in his distresse. Few daies after, the king assembling togither his councell, commanded this (counterfeit) duke of Yorke to be brought vnto him, who now (more than before) did in this assemblie bitterlie complaine of his misfortune, shewing, that being borne to great hope of a kingdome (as the sonne of the noblest king of that age) he was left

void of all helpe by the death of his father, & had like to haue fallen into the tyrannie of his vncle Richard duke of Gloceſter, before he could vnderſtand what calamitie or miſfortune might ſignifie.

But aided by diuine aſſiſtance, he (when his elder brother was murthered by his vncle) was preſerued by the helpe of his fathers friends, and conueied away from the bloudie hands of the vſurping king Richard, who (not able in that kingdome, whoſe heire by right he was) to lead a bare and begged life, did ſo liue in forrein countries, as he counted the condition of his brother (taken from thoſe miſeries by ſudden death) to be happie in reſpect of his owne troubles and extremitie: for he was reſerued aliue to the ſcorne of fortune, not daring at the firſt to bewaile his calamitie amongſt ſtrangers, whereby he might moue their pitie towards him: yea (and after) when by little and little he came to open what perſon hée was, how noblie borne, whoſe heire, and to whome alied, he was (to increaſe all his former miſeries) more grieuouſlie aſſaulted by the malice of fortune than before. For then he could not almoſt liue in ſafetie in anie place, bicauſe of the ſubtiltie of his enimies, who would haue bought his life (of thoſe with whom he remained) priuilie ſolliciting them to diſcouer his ſecrets, and (vnder the colour of feined amitie) to corrupt his true friends, to ſearch out and diſcouer his hidden friends, and to defame him amongſt the common people.

Herewithall not yet ſatiſfied, they reuile (ſaid he) the ladie Margaret his aunt, and impriſon the nobles of England that ſéemed to fauor his cauſe; notwithſtanding all which (ſhe vſing the truth of hir owne conſcience againſt the ſlanders of hir and his enimies, and moued with pitie for the diſtreſſe of hir kinſman) did with hir abilitie relieue his neceſſitie. But at length, when he ſaw no ſure defenſe in a woman and widow (whoſe authoritie could not ſtretch to the command of hir people in that liberall ſort as ſhe would) he was driuen to ſéeke the aid of other princes, and to requeſt them to loke into the miſfortunes that might light vpon ſuch great eſtates, and that they would not ſuffer kinglie bloud (oppreſſed by tyrants) to lament in ſuch extremitie. For yet he was not ſo baſe minded (although hee were in manie great miſeries) that he would not hope at one time or other to be reſtored to his kingdome, by the helpe of ſuch friends as he had in Ireland and England: adding thereunto the helpe which he ſhould haue out of France, whereof he had alreadie made ſome triall by the ſingular beneuolence of the ſame king, hauing liberallie imparted manie benefits vnto him.

Beſides which, not ſuppoſing this to allure the kings mind to his fauor, he began by flattrie to extoll him, not douting but he (whoſe fauor had bene liberallie ſhewd to the deſtreſſed) would now diminiſh the ſame to him; but that he hoped that he would (for his ſingular humanitie to all baniſhed perſons, for pitie towards a miſerable creature, for loue towards his kinſman, for neceſſities cauſe towards his friend, and for the néereneſſe of league that ought to be among princes) ſuccor and relieue him with men and monie, thereby to helpe him to the recouerie of his kingdom. Wherfore againe he importunatly requireth the king of aid in this extremitie, ſince the ſame was honorable to himſelfe, acceptable to God, beneficiall for his realme, and a ſingular fame among other princes in ioining with them determined to reſtore him. Which if he might obteine (and that the rather by his furtherance) he did liberallie promiſe alwaies to ſtand a moſt firme friend to the Scots, for whoſe cauſe he would ſpend his crowne and life.)

Thus Perkin Warbecke did vſe the matter in ſuch ſubtill wiſe, that king James either giuing, or ſéeming to giue credit to his words, after aduiſe and deliberation had and taken with his councell, receiued him in honorable wiſe, naming and reputing him duke of Yorke, and therefore promiſed him to aid him in all that he might. And ſhortlie after, hée maried him to his nære kinſwoman the ladie Katharine, daughter to the earle of Huntleie, and moreouer raiſed a great armie, ſpeciallie of the borderers, and with the ſame hauing this pretenſed duke in companie with him, inuaded England, burnt towns ſpoiled houſes, and toke great booties and rich preies both of goods and priſoners, & allured with the ſweetneſſe of ſuch ſpoile and gaine, waſted all the countrie of Northumberland, and had gone further, but that he could perceiue no aid comming in vnto this new found duke, contrarie to ſuch golden promiſes as he had made, that as ſoone as they were entered into England, there would flocke vnto him both of the nobilitie and commons, and that in great numbers.

Perkin Warbecke marieth the earle of Huntleies daughter. 1495.

King James inuadeth Northumberland. 1496.

King James perceiuing no ſuch matter, thought it better to returne with aſſured gaine, than to tarie this new ſprong dukes doubtfull and vncerteine victorie. And ſo hauing his people laden and peſtered with ſpoile and priſoners, he drew backe into Scotland. The king of England aduertiſed hereof, made preparation for the raiſing of an armie, meaning to ſend the ſame againſt the Scots: but the rebellion of the Corniſhmen, which chanced the ſame time about a tare leuied then of the people, conſtreined him to implote that armie to repreſſe the enterpriſe of thoſe rebels. Yet neuertheleſſe he ſent the earle of Surreie to the borders, that with the power of the countrie adioining, he might defend the ſame from the inuaſions of the Scots, if they attempted to breake in: and ſo the earle laie on the borders all that yéere.

King James then perceiuing that no maine armie came againſt him, inuaded eſtſoones the borders of England, and laied ſiege to the caſtell of Norham, ſending his light horſſemen abroad into Northumberland, and the biſhoprike of Durham, where they burned and ſpoiled all about in the countrie: but hearing that the earle of Surreie had raiſed an armie, and was comming towards them, they returned to the hoſt lieng before Norham, where king James perceiuing he could not win the caſtell, notwithſtanding he had done great hurt and damage thereto, he raiſed his ſiege, retired into his countrie, and left great companies on the borders for defenſe thereof. And ſo before the comming of the Engliſh armie, king James was returned. The earle of Surreie yet (as the Engliſh writers affirme) followed into Scotland, and toke diuerſe caſtels and towers, remaining within the countrie the ſpace of ſix or ſeuen daies, and then came backe without battell or anie notable ſkirmiſh offered.

About the ſame time was one Peter Hialas ſent ambaſſador from Ferdinando king of Spaine, to treat as a mediator for the concluding of peace betwixt the kings of England and Scotland, which Hialas trauelled ſo earneſtlie in the matter, that at length it was agréed, that certeine commiſſioners of both the realmes ſhould méet at Melroſſe, where for the king of England, doctor Fox, then biſhop of Durham, with this Hialas, and other graue perſonages, met the Scotiſh commiſſioners. After long conference and much talke had, for the concluſion of a generall peace, finallie nothing but a truce might be accorded for certeine yéeres, though Hialas did what he poſſiblie might, to haue agréed them for all maner of matters, quarrels, demands, and cauſes, whatſoeuer the ſame had bene, that a perpetuall peace might haue béene concluded, becauſe he was chieflie ſent for that intent.

The king of England required to haue the counterfeit duke of Yorke (otherwiſe named Perkin Warbecke) deliuered to him: but king James (eſteeming his honor more than anie earthlie thing) would in no wiſe ſeeme to betraie him that fled to him for ſuccour, and with whome he had coupled one of his owne kinſwomen in mariage: but he was contented to couenant, that the ſame Perkin ſhould be conſtreined to depart out of Scotland, and not to be further aided by him, or by anie other through his meanes or procurement. The king of Scots to keepe promiſe made in the ſaid treatie of peace, and knowing himſelfe to be abuſed by the ſaid Richard, whom he had reputed to be verelie duke of Yorke (although he was not ſo) called him before his preſence, and declared to him the great fauour and good will which he had borne towards him, putting him in remembrance that for his ſake he had taken warre in hand againſt England, and inuaded the countrie in hope of aſſiſtance by his friends within the land, where not one reſorted to him.

In article for Perkin Warbecke.

King James reaſoneth with the counterfeit duke of Yorke.

And albeit he had maried his neere kinſwoman, yet might he not keepe longer warre with England for his ſake onelie; except he might be ſure of ſome aid through his meanes, whereof he could ſee no appearance. He deſired him therefore to withdraw forth of his realme, either into Flanders to his fathers ſiſter the ladie Margaret; or into ſome other place where it pleaſed him to abide, and expect ſome better time more conuenient for his purpoſe. The ſaid Richard gaue the king thanks, and obeied his pleaſure, departing ſhortlie after out of Scotland, and ſailed into Ireland, from thence to tranſport into Flanders. But finallie making an attempt into England, he was taken priſoner in the abbeie of Beaulieu, together with his wife, whoſe beautie was ſuch, as king Henrie thought hir a more meet preie for an emperor, than for ſouldiors, and therefore vſed hir verie honorablie, appointing hir to remaine in the court with the queene his wife, where ſhe continued ſo long as the ſaid king liued.

Perkin warbeck went into Ireland to come into Flanders.

1499. This yeere, the peace being well kept betwixt England and Scotland, the ſame was neere at point to haue beene broken; by reaſon that the Engliſhmen which laie in garriſon within the caſtell of Norham, did make a fraie with certeine Scotiſhmen that came riding neere to the caſtell, as it had beene to haue viewed it. But although they ment no euill, yet diuerſe of the Scotiſhmen were ſlaine, and manie wounded and ſore hurt; ſo that king James hauing information thereof, was ſore diſpleaſed therewith, thinking and ſaieng, that there was no more vncerteine thing, than to haue peace with England. And herevpon he ſent his herald Yorkmount with ſharpe and vehement letters vnto the king of England, making great complaint for this iniurie and wrong done to his ſubiects, by thoſe within the caſtell of Norham. But receiuing moſt reaſonable letters for excuſe of that which was done, as well from the king of England himſelfe, as from the biſhop of Durham owner of the caſtell, he was indifferentlie well appeaſed & ſatiſfied, ſo that he required to haue the biſhop to come into Scotland vpon ſafe conduct to common with him, as well for the full quieting of this matter, as for other things which he had to talke with him of.

The truce like to be broken.

King James requireth to talke with the biſhop of Durham.

The biſhop by licence of the king his maiſter, accompliſhed the Scotiſh kings requeſt; ſo that comming into Scotland, he was receiued by him verie honorablie at Melroſſe, where (after certeine talke had betwixt them for the appeaſing of this laſt diſpleaſure) the king brake with the biſhop for the hauing of the ladie Margaret, eldeſt daughter to Henrie the ſeuenth, as then king of England, to be giuen him in mariage: and further declared that he was minded to ſend his orators vnto hir father the ſaid king Henrie, about the ſame matter. And forſomuch as he knew that the biſhop was one that might doo much with king Henrie, who highlie fauoured him for his ſingular wiſedome and learning, he deſired him to be a meane to further his ſute, which if it were obteined, he truſted it ſhould highlie redound to the honor & wealth of both the realmes. The biſhop conſidering heerein as much as the king was able to tell him, did not onelie promiſe to doo all that in him lay, but alſo incouraged him to ſend his orators with all ſpeed, truſting that they ſhould receiue a verie towardlie anſwer.

Ambaſſadors ſent into England. 1500.

King James following the biſhops aduiſe, anon after his returne into England, ſent certeine perſons ambaſſadors vnto king Henrie, to moue him to the effect aboue mentioned. Theſe ambaſſadors were highlie welcomed, and verie well heard, ſo that to be briefe, their requeſt ſeemed ſo agreeable to king Henries mind, that the mariage was ſhortlie thereupon concluded (but not conſummate betwixt the foreſaid James king of Scotland, and the ſaid ladie Margaret daughter to king Henrie) in the ſeuentéenth yeere of the ſaid king Henries reigne. At the ſame time, when this mariage was ſo agreed vpon, a peace was alſo concluded betwixt the kings of England and Scotland, for the terme of their two liues. And to auoid that none of either of the ſaid kings ſubiects that had offended the lawes, ſhould be receiued into anie of their dominions; it was accorded, that no Engliſhman ſhould come within Scotland, without his princes letters ſupplicatorie vnto the king of Scots, nor anie Scotiſhman to come within England, without the like letters from his prince, deſiring ſafe conduct and paſſeport.

1501. In the yeere next inſuing, Robert Blakater the biſhop of Glaſcow, Adam Hepborne the earle Bothwell, and other noble men of Scotland, were ſent in ambaſſage from king James vnto the king of England, for the perfecting of the foreſaid mariage betwixt king James, and the ladie Margaret, eldeſt daughter to king Henrie, which earle by letters of procuracie and mandat, in the name of his maiſter king James, affied and handfaſted the foreſaid ladie Margaret in all ſolemne wiſe, according to the maner: which aſſurance and contract thus made, was publiſhed at Paules croſſe in London, on the day of the conuerſion of ſaint Paule, in reioiſing whereof Te Deum was ſong, and fiers made, with great feaſting & banketting throughout that citie. This done, the ambaſſadors returned into Scotland, and then afterwards was great preparation made in England for the conueieng of the ſaid ladie into Scotland, and likewiſe great purueiance there for the receiuing of hir.

This was in the yeere 1502.

1503. Leſſe. On the ſirteenth of June, king Henrie toke his iournie from Richmond, with his daughter the ſaid ladie Margaret, and came to Colliweſton, where his mother the counteſſe of Richmond then laie. And after he had remained there certeine daies in paſtime and great ſolace, he toke leaue of his daughter, giuing hir his bleſſing with a fatherlie exhortation, and committed the conueiance of hir into Scotland vnto the earle of Surreie, and others. The earle of Northumberland, as then warden of the marches, was appointed to deliuer hir vpon the borders vnto the king of Scotland. And ſo this faire ladie was conueied with a great companie of lords, ladies, knights, eſquires, and gentlemen, vntill ſhe came to the towne of Berwike, and from thence vnto Lambert church in Lamer more within Scotland, where ſhe was receiued by the king and all the nobles of

And verelie the Engliſh lords (as the earle of Surreie and others) which gaue their attendance on the ſaid ladie till the mariage and feaſt were ended) at their returne home, gaue great praiſe not onelie to the manhod of the Scots, but alſo to their maners and heartie interteinment. For aſwell the noble men as the ladies and gentlewomen of Scotland at that preſent, were nothing behind the Engliſh lords & ladies in coſtlie apparell, maſſie chaines, and other furniture, as well for themſelues as their horſſes, and made great bankets to the Engliſhmen, and ſhewed them ſuch iuſts and other pleaſant paſtimes in honor of the mariage, ſo well, as after the maner of the countrie could be deuiſed. By reaſon of this mariage and aliance, men were in great good hope that perfect peace and ſincere amitie ſhould continue betwixt the two realmes of England and Scotland a long time after: and verelie during the life of king Henrie the ſeuenth, no cauſe of breach was miniſtred betwixt him and his ſonne in law, but that they liued in great loue and amitie.

The king of Denmarke commeth into Scotland.

About this time, the king of Denmarke, through diuiſion that did riſe betwixt him & his lords, was conſtreined to forſake his countrie, and to come for aid into Scotland, where the king receiued him louingly, and vpon his earneſt ſute, for that he was both his coſine and confederat, and alſo the rather, at the contemplation of the French kings requeſt and perſuaſion, he prepared an armie of ten thouſand men, the which vnder the conduct of the earle of Arrane, he ſent with the ſaid king of Denmarke to aſſiſt him againſt his aduerſaries. The earle of Arrane according to his commiſſion, attending the Daniſh king into his countrie, reſtored him to his kingdome and former gouernement, and ſo leauing him in peaceable poſſeſſion thereof, returned with his armie againe into Scotland, with great honor both to himſelfe, the king, and realme.

He is reſtored to his kingdome by the earle of Arrane lieutenant to king James.

Shortlie after was a parlement called, during the which the queene was crowned, and manie good acts and conſtitutions made, eſpeciallie touching the limiting of places where iuſtice ſhould be miniſtred in the Iles and hie lands: whereby it came to paſſe, that the king was aſwell obeied, & his lawes were as duelie obſerued and kept by the hie land men, as by thoſe that dwelled in anie part of the low land.

The hie land men obedient to lawes.

1505. Leſl. 1504. The king then being at peace with England, and iuſtice ſo miniſtred amongeſt his owne ſubiects, that they liued in great reſt and quietneſſe, certeine of his councell [as William Elfinſtone biſhop of Aberden] deuiſed waies to win the king great profit and gaines, by calling his barons & all thoſe that held anie lands within his realme, to ſhew their euidences by way of recognition: and if they had not writings to ſhew, according to the ancient inſtruments and lawes of the realme ſufficient for their warrant, the lands ſhould remaine at the kings pleaſure.

Fr. Thin. A deuiſe to get the king monie.

But when the king perceiued his people to grudge herewith, and not without cauſe, as with a thing deuiſed to diſquiet his people and the whole countrie, of his owne curteous & gentle nature he eaſilie agréed with the poſſeſſors of ſuch lands: for the which he purchaſed great loue amongeſt his people, & the deuiſers of that ordinance wan paſſing great hatred and malice. This yeare in Maie the king held his court of iuſtice at Lowder, and remouing it to Edenburgh, there continued the ſame, where the lord of Thorneton was conuicted for killing his wife, and therefore loſt his head [at Edenburgh by the kings ſentence.] Fr. Thin.

1506. There came an ambaſſador this yeare alſo from the duke of Gelderland, to renew the league betwixt the king and the ſaid duke. Alſo an herald came out of France, who brought news which the king liked well.

A great ſhip made. This yeare alſo, the king cauſed a mightie ſhip to be made, the which was put forth into the rode the ſeuenth of Julie, and the king ſailed himſelfe into the Maie, an Iland in the Forth, and was driuen in againe with tempeſt: but the ſame ſhip was after appointed forth, and ſent to the ſea with ſundrie valiant gentlemen in hir, to meet with the Hollanders which had taken and ſpoiled diuerſe Scotiſh ſhips, and throwne the merchants and other that were in the ſame ouer bord. For reuenge whereof, Andrew Barton toke manie ſhips of the Hollanders and filled certeine pipes with their heads, which he ſent vnto the king for a witneſſe how he had ſped. A ſtar like a comet appeared the tenth of Auguſt, giuing great light in the night ſeaſon like to the ſun beams. A Frenchman named ſir Anthonie Darcie knight, called afterward Le ſir de la Bawtie, came through England into Scotland to ſéeke feats of arms. And comming to the king the foure and twentith of September, the lord Hamilton fought with him right valiantlie, and ſo as neither of them loſt anie péece of honor. This yeare James prince of Scotland and of the Iles was borne in the abbeie of the Holie rod houſe, the one and twentith of Januarie; and on the three and twentith of the ſame moneth, he was baptiſed in the ſaid abbeie church. His godfathers were theſe, Robert biſhop of Glaſcow, and Patrike earle Bothwell; and the counteſſe of Huntleie was his godmother. The quéene, after ſhe was brought to bed, was verie weake and troubled with great ſickeneſſe, ſo that ſhe lay in great danger: for recouerie of whoſe helth the king went on foot vnto ſaint Ninians in pilgrimage; and afterwards in Julie, both the king and the quéene went thither to viſit the ſame ſaint.

Pope Julius the ſecond ſent an ambaſſador vnto king James, declaring him protector and defendor of the faith, and in ſigne thereof ſent vnto him a purpure diadem or crowne wrought with flowers of gold, togither with a ſword, hauing the hilts and ſkabbert of gold ſet with pretious ſtones, which were preſented vnto him by the ſaid ambaſſador, and the abbat of Dunfermling, within the abbeie church of Holie rod houſe. At that time the peace contracted betwixt the two kings of Scotland and England was there confirmed. The lord of Terueer or Camfire in Zealand (whoſe anceſtors not long ago came forth of Scotland) ſent his meſſenger the bailiffe of Terueer to the king, who preſented vnto him certeine great horſſes and other rich preſents, in remembrance that he came of the Scotiſh race; and the king in recompenſe thereof, ſent vnto the ſaid lord his order, and made his ambaſſador knight, rewarding him at his departing (which was in Auguſt) with right honorable gifts.

Horſſes preſented vnto the king.

The whole realme remained in ſuch peace and quietneſſe in theſe daies, that the king rode one day himſelfe alone in poſt from Sterling, by S. Johns towne, and Aberden, vnto Elgin; and reposing a little part of the night in the houſe of maiſter Thomas Leſleie then parſon of Angus, went to horſſe againe, and came to ſaint Duthois in Roſſe, by that time they were readie to go to maſſe. This was on the one & thirtith day of Auguſt. About the latter end of September, the archbiſhop of ſaint Andrews, and the earle of Arrane, were ſent ambaſſadors into France. They toke ſhip the ſeuen and twentith of September. The ſeuentéenth of Februarie, James prince of Scotland departed this life at Striueling, and the bishop of Galloway also, who was appointed to be his gouernor.

Fr. Thin. Lesleus. lib. 8. pag. 345.

*About this time, the K. (to tell you here, as saith Lesleus, a matter that to this day is remembred amongest the Romane people with great laughter) created a certeine Italian (with whose wit and pleasant speach he was delighted) abbat of Tungland. This man (being a noble framer of deceipt, & boaster of his wit) did on a time persuade the king, that he was so conuersant in all hidden knowledge of naturall things, and in the secret science of Alchumie, that he could turne all other mettals into pure gold, if anie would beare the charge thereof. But after much time spent thereabout (with long loking of the king, and the nobilitie, to see the effect hereof) there was nothing done, but that their pursses were emptied, and the vaine man was defamed by the breach of his promise. At length when he was fallen into the hatred and offense of all men, he did (partlie to gather againe an opinion & report of his vaine glorie, and partlie to recouer the kings fauor) giue out a rumor, that he would (by flieng) be in France before the ambassadors (which were sent thither, and had losed from shore to take their iournie) should come thither. For the performance whereof, he appointed a day for them to meet at Striueling, from whence he would take his flight, and begin his iournie. At what time, and to what place, manie resorted togither, desirous to see this new bird; amongest whome (for recreations cause) came the king also.

What need manie words. This man fastening (which he had caused to be made of the fethers of diuerse foules) vnto both his sides, lifted vp himselfe from the castell of Striueling, into the aire to take his iournie: but this deceiuer suddenlie fell headlong to the ground, not able to be holpen by the force of his wings: wherewith the people (vncerteine whether they should rebuke the follie of the man, or pittie his misfortune) flocked about him, demanding this winged abbat how he did: to whome he answered, that he had broken the bone of his thigh, and was out of hope to flie anie more hereafter. To conclude, they all were like to die with laughing, to see him, which before would flie like Icarus, did now lie like Simon Magus, with all his bodie almost broken in peeces. At length when euerie one had laughed their fill, this worthie abbat, to salue all the matter, referred the default of his flieng wholie to his wings, because they were not made of eagles fethers and such like, but onelie of pullens fethers, not meet or accustomed to cut the aire with flight; and which by a certeine inward vertue (working according to the nature of those foules) did draw the fethers downe toward the downghill (wherupon those birds liue) as the adamant draweth iron.]

1508. In ambassage sent vnto the king.

The 9 of Maie in the yeare after, the lord D'obinie, and the president of Tholous, came from Lewes the French king as ambassadors to declare vnto king James, that he ment to match his eldest daughter in mariage with Francis de Vallois of Vien, and duke of Angolesme; notwithstanding that Charles king of Castile that was after emperor, made sute for hir. Because therefore he ment not to conclude anie thing in such a weightie matter without consent of his confederats, of which he esteemed king James as chiefe, he required him of his aduise and counsell therein; who after aduisement taken, made answer, that albeit the king of France had sufficient counsell about him, yet sith he had desired his aduise, he would friendlie giue the same: which was that he should rather marie his daughter within his owne realme, vnto such as should succeed him, than to bestow hir vpon anie forren prince, sith otherwise some claime might be made in time comming vnto the crowne by such as should match with hir. And so with this answer, the president of Tholous departed, reporting the same at his comming home vnto the French king, who thereupon followed his owne determination therein, confirmed and allowed thus by his confederat the king of Scotland.

The king's answer.

The lord D'obignie died.

The lord D'obignie tooke a sickneslie and died thereof at Corstorphin, in the moneth of June, and caused his heart to be sent vnto saint Ninians in Galloway; because he had vowed a pilgrimage thither whilest he remained the French kings lieutenant in Naples, where he had atchiued manie high enterprises against his enimies. His name was Bernard Steward, lieutenant of those men of warre which Charles the eight of that name king of France did send with Henrie earle of Richmond into England, when the same earle came against king Richard, whome he vanquished, and thereby got the crowne. And so after manie noble victories and valiant acts atchiued, this lord D'obignie ended his life in his owne countrie of Scotland, where he was borne.

This was the king himselfe.

This yeare also in Maie and June, there were kept great iusts and tourneies in Edenburgh, by one calling himselfe the wild knight, who counterfeited the round table.

Ambassadors sent.

There were diuerse ambassadors sent forth this yeare also, as the archdeacon of saint Andrews, and sir Anthonie Darcie into France, and the bishop of Murrey into England. The fiftéenth of Julie, the queene was deliuered of a daughter, which shortlie after she had receiued baptisme, deceassed, and the queene in that childbed was againe in great perill of death.

The archbishop of Glascow died.

The bishop of Glascow died this yeare in his iournie to Jerusalem, the nine and twentith of Julie; James Beton succeeded him in that see.

A bickering.

The thirtith of Julie, there was a great fraie betwixt the lord Warwell, and the lord Creichton of Sanchar, where the lord Creichton was chased with his companie from Dunfreis, & the lord of Daliell and the yong lord of Crauthlaie with diuerse other were slaine.

An earthquake.

The nineteenth of September was a great earthquake in manie places both of England and Scotland, namelie, the same was perceiued in churches.

Horsses sent vnto king James.

The king of England sent a gentleman with horsses trimlie trapped with bards of steele to be presented to king James, who thankefullie receiued them, and right honorablie rewarded the messenger.

The archdeacon of saint Andrews came out of France.

The archdeacon of saint Andrews returned forth of France in a great ship called the treasuror, which ship was cast away on the coast of England, and the archdeacon, and foure hundred persons that were in hir, were brought to the king of England: but the archdeacon in November following returned home and came to Edenburgh.

The earle Bothwell died.

Adam earle of Bothwell and lord Hales departed this life at Edenburgh the seuentéenth day of October, and earle Patrike succéeded him. Henrie the seuenth king of England, passed out of this world the two and twentith of Aprill, in the yeare 1509, and his sonne Henrie the eight succéeded him, after whose coronation king James sent an honorable ambassage of certeine lords and a bishop to congratulat him at his first entrie into the rule of his kingdome, as to the maner in such cases appertaineth.

*At this time, John and Andrew Barton (obteining letters of marque from the king against the Portingals) preieng on the borderers of Portingale did take manie of their ships (landed with rich merchandize) which they brought into Scotland. Which kind of prises being often made by the Bartons vnto the Portingals, gaue them cause greeuouslie to complaine to their king, of the wicked piracie of the Scots.

Scots: but neither the king of Portingale with his councell, nor his people with their force, could at anie time ſuppreſſe the Bartons (defended with the Scotiſh letters of marque) but that he would inuade, ſpoile, & carie awaie the Portingale ſhips, if he happened vpon anie of them. Touching which, becauſe it ſhall not ſéeme to be a manifeſt iniurie by the Bartons to the other (and not rather a iuſt cauſe giuen by the Portingals) we haue here inſerted the letters of our king James the fift (as they be found amongſt the records) written to Immanuell king of Portingale for this matter. In which it ſhall manifeſtlie appeare, whether the fault were not moſtlie in the Portingals or no.

Iames the fift, king of Scotland, to Immanuell the woorthie king of Portingale.

Worthie king, friend, and dære cõſine, certeine yeares paſt, a Scotiſh ſhip laden with merchandize, & loſing from the port of Sluis in Flanders, was inuaded by two armed ſhips, gouerned by Portingals; whereof, the one was called John Uaſque, and the other John Pret. Which ſhip (after certeine of hir merchants ſlaine, manie wounded, manie taken priſoners, and the reſt caſt into a fiſher-bote to be ſet on land at the next ſhore) was by them caried into Portingale: all which was done in the ſight of the reſt of the Luſitan ſhips, which at the ſame time did alſo loſe out of that hauen to paſſe into Portingale. The full trueth whereof, Charles the duke of Burgognie, and earle of Flanders, vnderſtanding (and moued not ſo much for the ſingular iniurie done to the Scots, as by the breach of the priuilege, & right of his harborows) did ſignifie the ſame (knowne, and found by order of iudgement) to the king of Portingale, admoniſhing him, that vnleſſe he tooke order for ſuch wicked dæds, and for the reſtitution of the hurt and loſſe: that he would indeuor, that all the Portingals (which frequented the marts of Flanders) ſhould by ſentence of iudgement, ſatiſfie all the damages which the Scots had ſuſteined. But the vntimelie death (of that iuſt and valiant man) did fruſtrat all his determination.

The king alſo our grandfather (when he had by his letters complained of that iniurie to the king of Portingale, and had not much profited) gaue forth letters of marque, that is, he gaue authoritie to John & Robert Barton, brothers & heires to that John, which was maiſter of that ſhip ſo caried away, to recouer ſo much of the Luſitans. Before the execution whereof, my grandfather died: after which (my father being yet verie yong) the whole ſtate of the realme did ſuppoſe it beſt to alter nothing in forren cauſes, vntill he came to full age. At time (being of ſufficient yeares) he did forbeare to grant the vſe of the ſaid letter of marque, till he had firſt conſulted with the king of Portingale thereabouts. Wherevpon (diſpatching an ambaſſador vnto him) our father alſo died (before we could againe heare anie anſwer from thence) leauing me a child not paſt three yeres old. For which cauſe, the gouernor of the kingdome iudged it beſt (during our minoritie) to defer theſe letters of marque, vntill we came to riper yeares; which was done, not without great griefe and complaint of thoſe miſerable and poore men.

Wherevpon, we alſo for theſe laſt two yeares (being now growen to riper age) are moued aſwell to prouide, that other merchants which in that ſhip of Julian, haue loſt their goods and kinred, as alſo to permit the heirs of the ſaid John Barton (by way of letter of marque before granted) to haue power giuen them, onelie to take ſo much recompenſe of the Portingals. Whereof yet, we thought it meet, that they ſhould not vſe any of them, vntill we had firſt (by this Snadone our eſquier) laid before your maieſtie the whole order of the matter, which is the iudiciall knowledge of the piracie, the value of the loſſe, and the cauſe of our long ſilence, aſſuredlie hoping that you will not do anie thing, in reſpect of your humanitie and vprightnes, but that which ſhall be good and iuſt. The which, if you dæme is yet to be deferred; we require your woorthineſſe to conſider, that we cannot forſake our ſubiects, afflicted with ſo great iniuries, whome hereafter we refer to the law of all nations, for recouerie of their goods taken away, which thing ought not to ſéeme to anie man (by anie meanes) to be the violating of friendſhip, league, or conſanguinitie, wherewith we haue bæne linked. Wherefore, when that ſame ſhall happen, we deſire your excellencie to take the ſame in good part (moſt woorthie cõſine and confederat king) to whom I wiſh long and happie life. From Edenburgh, the day before the Ides of Aprill, in the yeare, 1540.

The king about this time gaue liberall poſſeſſions to Robert Borthwike, a notable artificer for making of field pæces and other guns; for the which liberalitie, he ſhould make certeine great pæces in the caſtell of Edenburgh, whereof there are manie yet to be ſéene in Scotland, with this ſuperſcription: Machina ſum Scoto Borthuik fabricata Roberto.) Fr. Thin. Leſleus lib. 8. pag. 353.

This ſummer the king went in pilgrimage vnto ſaint Duthois in Roſſe, and the quéene remaining at Holie rood houſe, was brought to bed of a prince, the twentie day of October, the which the third day after was baptiſed and named Arthur. Two great ſhips came forth of France to the king, fraught with guns, ſpeares, and all other kind of munition for warre. Alexander, baſtard ſonne to the king, newlie made archbiſhop of ſaint Andrews, who had bæne long in Germanie ſtudent there in the ſchooles with that famous clearke Eraſmus Roterodamus, and had profited verie well, came from Flanders by ſea into Scotland, and was ioifullie receiued, becauſe he had beſtowed his time ſo well in vertues and learning.

The 14 of Julie, Arthur prince of Scotland and the Iles, departed this life in the castell of Edenburgh. Two scorpions were found, the one quicke, and the other dead, in the orchard of the castell of Cragmiller, which thing was reputed for a maruellous great wonder, that anie should be séene within the Ile of Britaine. In the moneth of September, an vniuersall sickenesse reigned through all Scotland, whereof manie died. It was verie contagious, and they called it Stope gallant.

There came also a passing faire woman into Scotland about the same time, naming hir selfe Katharine Gordon, wife to Perkin Warbecke, that had named himselfe duke of Yorke, but at length being brought to the king, she confessed what shée was, and so auoided the realme. In which meane while, the ladie Katharine Gordon hir selfe remained in England, and had right good maintenance, so that she liued there verie well and honorablie manie yéeres after. Furthermore, the king vpon the eighth day of Nouember comming from Edenburgh to the water of Rule, tooke diuers misgouerned persons, & brought them to Jedworth, where the principall of the Trumbils, with naked swords in their hands, and withs about their necks met him, putting themselues in the kings mercie, which were sent to sundrie places to be kept in ward, with diuers other of those countrimen, whereby the marches were more quiet afterwards: and from thence the king passed to saint Johns towne, where iustice were holden the residue of the winter.

The next yéere in the beginning of Maie, the quéene went from Dunfermling toward saint Duthois in Rosse, and was all the way right honorablie vsed and interteined. About the tenth of Julie, she returned to Edenburgh, where she found the lord Dacres, and sir Robert Durie knight come thither as ambassadors from the king of England hir brother, who were honorablie receiued. In the yéere next insuing, in June, Andrew Barton being on the seas to meet the Portingals (against whom he had a letter of marque) sir Edmund Howard lord admerall of England, and the lord Thomas Howard, sonne and heire vnto the earle of Surrey, were appointed by the king of England to go likewise to sea with certeine ships, and met with the said Andrew as he returned homewards néere to the Downes, hauing with him onelie one ship and one barke.

The Englishmen at the first made signe vnto the Scots as though they ment none euill, saue onelie to salute them as friends; but getting within them, they set vpon them right fiercelie, and the Scots for a while did as valiantlie defend themselues, so that manie were slaine on both sides: but in the end the Englishmen got the vpper hand, wounded Andrew Barton the chiefe capteine of the Scots, that he died of the hurts that he there receiued, and the ship called the Unicorne, and the barke called Jennie Peruine, were both taken, with all the Scotishmen that remained aliue in the same, which were had to London, and staied as prisoners in the bishop of Yorke his house for a time, and after sent home into Scotland. King James was sore offended with this matter, and therevpon sent an herald with letters, requiring redresse for the slaughter of his people, and restitution of his ships, sith otherwise it might séeme to giue occasion of breach of the peace. But the king of England denied, that the slaughter of a pirat (as he tooke Andrew Barton to be) ought to breake anie bond of peace, yet neuertheless he promised to send commissioners to the borders, that should intreat of that matter, and other enormities chanced betweene the two realmes.

Two ships taken by the Englishmen.

* About this time was Alexander Hume the onlie gouernor of all the marches of Scotland (which before were accustomed to be diuided into three parts) deerelie beloued to king James, being a man of a fiercer disposition than was conuenient for the profit of the common-wealth. This man promised to the king (troubled with the cares of warre, and carefull to wipe awaie the reproch of late receiued by the English) that shortlie he and his followers with their kindred and aliances, would so bring the matter about, that the English should as greatlie lament for their losses, as they had now conceiued ioies of their victories. To the performance whereof, he gathered three thousand souldiers, wherewith he entered England, and there spoiled seuen townes before anie succour might come to rescue them: but as he returned backe laden with booties of all kinds, his men (being accustomed to pilfries and robberies) impatient of delaie, presentlie diuided the preie in the host, euerie one departing home to his owne as it was nerest vnto him. Yet Alexander did not disperse such as he might keepe togither: but assembling as manie of them as would tarie, with a small companie abode the end of all things, alwaies hauing an eie to sée if anie pursute were made after them. But when he perceiued no bodie to follow, and that there was no doubt of danger (passing the time more careles than before) he fell vnwares into the hands of three hundred English laid in wait for him, who (taking the opportunitie of the time) did set vpon him and his, and (driuing them into extreme feare) they killed and put to flight all such as they incountered. In which tumult diuers of the Scots were slaine, and two hundred taken, of whome George Hume, brother of the said Alexander (exchanged for Comarch, Heron, and Ford, taken prisoners, and long reteined in Scotland for reuenge of the death of Robert Car) was one, and the chiefest, whereby he departed quietlie into Scotland.)

Fr. Thin. Buchanan. lib. 12.

The French king and the duke of Gelderland, perceiuing that the king of England was minded through procurement of the pope & others, to make them warres, either of them sent ambassadors into Scotland vnto king James, requiring his assistance against England: but king James minding to mainteine peace and concord betwixt the parties, sent an ambassador vnto the king of England, desiring him in brotherlie and most louing wise to liue in peace and quietnesse, and not to make anie wars against his confederat friends, offering himselfe to agrée and compound anie difference that was fallen betwixt the king of England and the said princes. The king of England, who had alreadie sent aid vnto the ladie regent of the low countries against the duke of Gelderland, made such faire answer hereunto as he thought good with reason, and so dispatched the ambassadour backe againe to his maister, without anie more adoo in that matter, about the which he came for that time.

Shortlie after came the biſhop of Murrey home, hauing beene at Rome, in France, and England, bringing with him from the pope, and the kings of France and England, manie good and pleaſant letters: and with him came a clearke of Spaine in ambaſſage vnto the king. This yeere the eleuenth day of Aprill, the queene was deliuered of a yong prince in the palace of Luithgo, who was ſhortlie after baptiſed, and named James the fift prince of Scotland, and of the Iles, that after ſucceeded his father in the kingdome. The lord Dacres, and doctor Weſt came in ambaſſage from the king of England, and Monſieur de la Mot came with letters alſo from the French king, to perſuade king James to make warre againſt England, promiſing him monie, munition, and all other neceſſarie prouiſions of warre. In his waie as he paſſed the ſeas towards Scotland, he had drowned three Engliſh ſhips, & brought ſeuen awaie with him vnto Lieth for priſes, in the which were but three Engliſhmen left aliue. Shortlie after, maiſter James Dgiluie abbat of Dzburgh came forth of France with letters of the like effect. After this Robert Barton went to the ſea, and in Julie brought into Scotland 14 priſes of Engliſh men which he had taken.

Great miſrule was exerciſed on the borders in this ſeaſon, and therefore the king aſſembled the lords in Edenburgh for reformation thereof; and while they were there, the queene was brought to bed of a child, which died ſhortlie after it was chriſtened. There came a great ſhip into Scotland, which the king of France had ſent vnto the king, laden with artillerie, powder, and wines, & then was the league and band renewed betwixt Scotland and France. The ſame ſhip landed at Blackneſſe the nineteenth of November. Purſeuants ſent into England and France.

Vpon the ſaid Ilaies returne, Monſieur de la Mot was ſent backe into France, and with him ſir Walter Dgiluie, and a meſſenger whome the pope had ſent into Scotland. On the ſirteenth of March next inſuing, doctor Weſt came as ambaſſador into Scotland from the king of England, appointing that certeine commiſſioners ſhould meet on the borders for redreſſe of all quarrels betwixt the two realmes, in the moneth of June next inſuing. And this appointment was kept, but no good could be done, as after ſhall appeare. The king ſent Forman biſhop of Murrey into France, to ſignifie vnto the French king the meſſage of the ſaid doctor Weſt, and other things. In the moneth of Maie, there came certeine ſhips out of Denmarke laden with guns, powder, armor, & other kind of munition. Alſo Monſieur de la Mot landed in the weſt part of Scotland the ſirteenth of Maie, with foure ſhips fraught with wine and flower, and returned againe the nineteenth of the ſame moneth.

The great Odonell of Ireland came to king James at Edenburgh, the firſt of June, offering his friendſhip and ſeruice to him before all other princes, and ſpeciallie againſt the king of England; wherupon he was thankfullie receiued, honorablie interteined, & richlie rewarded. And ſo the band of friendſhip being with him concluded, he returned into his countrie. The king prepared a great nauie of ſhips, the principall whereof were the Michaell, Margaret, and James. They made ſaile towards the ſea the twentie ſeuenth of Julie; and the king ſailed in the Michaell himſelfe, till they were paſt the Iland of Maie, James Gordon ſon to George earle of Huntleie being one of the capteins of the ſame ſhip.

A nauie ſent out.

The commiſſioners met on the borders in June, according to the appointment: but becauſe the Engliſhmen would not conſent to make anie redreſſe or reſtitution, till the fiftéenth of October next, thinking by that delaie and continuance of time, they ſhould vnderſtand the ſtate of their kings procéedings in France, and in the meane time reteine in their hands the Scotiſhmens goods which they had taken both by ſea and land (as the Scotiſh writers affirme) the king of Scots being thereof aduertiſed, ſent Lion king of armes vnto king Henrie then lieng at ſiege before Terwine, with letters of complaint, commanding him that if king Henrie refuſed to accompliſh the contents of his ſaid letters, he ſhould denounce warre vnto him. Wherevpon Lion arriuing in the Engliſh armie with his cote of arms on his backe, about the middeſt of Auguſt, deſired to ſpeake with the king, and was within a ſhort ſpace by Garter chiefe king at arms of England brought to the kings preſence, hauing his nobles and councellors about him, where, with due reuerence, & some good words firſt vttered, he deliuered his letters, the tenor whereof inſueth.

Commiſſioners met at the borders.

The Engliſhmen protract the time.

A king of armes ſent vnto K. Henrie of England.

The tenor of the king of Scots letters.

RIght excellent, right high, and mightie prince, our deereſt brother and cowſine, we commaund vs vnto you in our maiſt hartie manner, and receiued fra Raff Heraulde your letters, quhar vntill ye approue and allow the doings of your commiſſiouners latelie being with ours at the borders of bathe the realmes, for making of redreſſe quhilk is thought to you and your councell ſhould be continuet and delaet to the fiftæenth day of October. Als ye write ſlaars by ſee aught not compeere perſonallie, but by their attourneys. And in your letters with our herauld Ilaie, ye aſcertaine vs ye will naught enter in the treur taken betwixt the maiſt chriſtian king and your father of Aragoun, becauſe ye and others of the hale liege nether ſhould nor may take peace, treur, nor abſtinence of warre with your common enimie, without conſent of all the confederats. And that the emperor, king of Aragoun, yea and euery of you be bounded to make actuall warre this inſtant ſommer againſt your common enimy. And that ſo to do is concluded and openlie ſworne in Paules kirke at London, vpon S. Markes day laſt by paſt. And farther haue denied ſafe conduct vpon our requeſts that a ſeruitor of ours might haue reſorted

to your presence (as our herauld Ilaie reports.

Right excellent, right high, and mightie prince, our derest brother and cousing, the said meting of our and your commissiouners at the borders, was peremptorily appointed betwirt you and vs after diuerse diets, for reformatioun before continuet to the commissiouners meting, to effect that due redresse suld haue bene made at the said meting, like as for our part our commissioners offred to haue made that time. And for your part, no malefactor was then arrestet to the said diet. And to glose the same, ye now write that slaars by se ned not compere personallie, but by their attourneis, quhilk is again law of God and man. And gef in criminall action all slaars suld naught compere personallie, na punitioun suld follow for slaughter, and then vane it were to seke farther metings or redresse. And hereby apperes (as the ded shewes) that ye will nouther kepe gud waies of iustice and equitie nor kindnes with vs.

The great wrongs and vnkindnes done before to vs and our leiges we ponderate, quhilk we haue suffred this long time in vpbearing, mainswering, noundressing of attemptates, so as the bill of the taken of inhalding of bastard Heron and his complices in your contrie, quha slue our wardan vnder trust of daies of meting for iustice, & thereof was filat & ordeint to be deliuerd, in slaing our liege noblemen, vnder color by your folks, in taking of vthers out of our realme prisonet and chanet by the cragis in your cuntrie, withhalding of our wiues legacie promist in your diuerse letters for despite of vs, slaughter of Androw Barton by your awn commaund, quha than had naught offended to you nor your leiges vnredrest, and breaking of the amity in that behalfe by your ded, and withhalding of our ships and artillarie to your vse.

Quharvpon, eft our diuerse requisitions at your wardens, commissiouners, ambassadors, & your selfe, ye wrate and als shew by vthers vnto vs, that full redresse suld be made at the said meting of commissiouners, and sa were in hope of reformatioun, or at the lest ye for our sake wald haue desisted fra inuasioun of our friendes and cousings within their awne countries that haue naught offended at you, as we first required you, in fauour of our tender cousing the duke of Gelder, quham to destroy and disinherit ye sent your folks, and dud what was in them. And right sa we lately desired for our brother & cousing the maist christen king of France, quham ye haue caused to tine his countrie of Willaine, and now inuades his selfe, quha is with vs in second degree of blude, and hase bene vnto you kind without offense, and more kindar than to vs.

Notwithstanding, in defense of his person we mon take part, and thereto ye because of vthers, haue giuen occasion to vs and to our leiges in time by past, nouther doing iustlie nor kindlie toward vs, proceding alwaies to the vtter destructioun of our nerest friendes, quha mon do for vs quhan it shall be necessarie; in euill example that ye will hereafter be better vnto vs, quham ye lightlie fauour, manifestlie wranged your sister for our sake incontrarie our writs: and saieng to our herauld that we giue you faire wordes, and thinke the cõtrarie. Inded such it is, we gaue you words as ye dud vs, trusting that ye suld haue emended to vs, or worthin kinder to our frends for our sakes, and suld naughtight haue stopped our seruitors passage to labour pear, that they mought as the papes halines exhorted vs by his breuites to do. And therevpon we were contented to haue ouersene our harmes, and to haue remitted the same, though vther informatioun was made to our halie father pape Julie, by the cardinall of Yorke, your ambassador.

And sen you haue now put vs fra our gude beleue through the premisses, and speciallie in denieng of safe conduct to our seruants, to resort to your presence, as your ambassador doctor Wiest instantlie desired we suld sende one of our councell vnto you vpon great matters, and appointing of differences debatable betwirt you and vs, furthering of pear if we might, betwirt the most christen king & you, we neuer hard to this purpose safe conduct denied betwirt Infidels. Herefore we write to you this time at length plainesse of our mind, that we require and desire you to desist fra farther inuasioun and vtter destructioun of our brother and cousing the maist christen king, to quham by all confederatioun, blude and alie, and also by new band quhilk you haue compelled vs latelie to take through your iniuries & harmes without remedie done dailie vnto vs, our leiges and subiects, we are bounden and oblist for mutuall defense ilk of vthers, like as ye & your confederates be oblist for mutuall inuasiouns and actuall warre.

Certifieng you, we will take part in defense of our brother and cousing the maist christen king, and will do what thing we truist may cause you to desist fra pursute of him, and for deuit and postponit iustice to our leiges we mon giue letters of marque according to the amitie betwirt you and vs, quharto ye haue had little regard in time by past, as we haue ordaint our herauld the bearer hereof to say, gif it like you to heare him and gif him credence. Right excellent, right hie & mightie prince our derest brother and cousing, the Trinitie haue you in keping. Geuen vnder our signet at Edenburgh the twentie sixt day of Julie.

The herald is sent for.

King Henrie hauing read the letter, and considered thereof with aduise of his councell, sent for the herald againe, and told him that he had read and well perceiued the contents of the letters which he had deliuered to him, and would make him answer with condition, condition, that he would promiſe to declare the ſame to his maiſter. Wherevnto Lion made this anſwer: Sir, I am his naturall ſubiect, and he is my naturall lord, and what he commandeth me to ſay, I may boldlie ſay with fauour; but the commandements of others I may not, nor dare ſay vnto my ſouereigne lord. But your letters ſent by me, may declare your maiſters pleaſure, albeit your anſwer requireth dooings and not ſaiengs, that is, that you immediatlie ſhould returne home. Then ſaid the king: I will returne at my pleaſure to your damage, and not at thy maiſters ſummons. And herewith he cauſed an anſwer to be written to the king of Scots, in forme as followeth.

The heralds anſwer.

King Henrie his anſwer.

RIght excellent, right high & mightie prince, &c. We haue receiued your writing dated at Edenburgh the twentie firſt day of Julie, by your herald Lion this bearer, wherein after rehearſall and accumulation of manie ſurmiſed iniuries, griefs and dangers doon by vs and our ſubiects to you and your lieges, the ſpecialties whereof were ſuperfluous to rehearſe, remembring that to them and euerie of them in effect reaſonable anſwer founded vpon law and conſcience, hath tofore bene made to you & your councell; ye not onelie require vs to deſiſt from further iuuaſion and vtter deſtruction of your brother and cooſine the French king, but alſo certifie vs that you will take part in defenſe of the ſaid king, and that thing which ye truſt may rather cauſe vs to deſiſt from purſute of him, with manie contriued occaſions and communications by you cauſeleſſe ſought & imagined, ſounding to the breach of the perpetuall peace paſſed, concluded, and ſworne betwixt you and vs, of which your imagined quarrels cauſeleſſe deuiſed to breake to vs, contrarie to your oth promiſed, all honor & kindneſſe, we can not maruell; conſidering the ancient accuſtomed manners of your progenitors, which neuer kept longer faith & promiſe than pleaſed them.

Howbeit, if the loue and dread of God, nighneſſe of bloud, honor of the world, law and reaſon had bound you, we ſuppoſe ye would neuer haue ſo farre procæded, ſpeciallie in our abſence. Wherin the pope and all princes chriſtened may well note in you diſhonorable demeanour, when ye lieng in wait, ſæke the waies to doo that in our ſaid abſence, which ye would haue bene well aduiſed to attempt, we being within our realme and preſent. And for euident approbation hereof, we næd none other prowes nor witneſſes, but your owne writings heretofore to vs ſent, we being within our realme, wherein ye neuer made mention of taking part with our enimie the French king, but paſſed the time with vs till after our departure from our ſaid realme. And now percaſe ye ſuppoſing vs ſo farre from our ſaid realme, to be deſtitute of defenſe againſt your inuaſions, haue vttered the old rancour of your mind, which in couert manner ye haue long kept ſecret.

Neuertheleſſe, we remembring the brittlenes of your promiſe, & ſuſpecting though not wholie beleæuing ſo much vnſtedfaſtneſſe, thought it verie expedient and neceſſarie to put our ſaid realme in a readines for reſiſting of your ſaid enterpriſes, hauing firme truſt in our Lord God, and the righteouſneſſe of our cauſe, with the aſſiſtance of our confederats & alies, we ſhall be able to reſiſt the malice of ſchiſmatiks and their adherents, being by the generall councell expreſſlie excommunicate and interdicted; truſting alſo in time conuenient to remember our friends, and requite you and our enimies, which by ſuch vnnaturall demeanor haue giuen ſufficient cauſe to the diſheriſon of you and your poſteritie for euer, from the poſſibilitie that ye thinke to haue to the realme, which ye now attempt to inuade.

And if the example of the king of Nauarre, being excluded from his realme for aſſiſtance giuen to the French king, can not reſtraine you from this vnnaturall dealing; we ſuppoſe ye ſhall haue like aſſiſtance of the French king, as the king of Nauarre hath now, who is a king without a realme, & ſo the French king peaceablie ſuffereth him to continue, wherevnto good regard would be taken. And like as we heretofore touched in this our writing, we næd not to make anie further anſwer to the manifold griefs by you ſurmiſed in your letter: forſomuch as if anie law or reaſon could haue remoued you from your ſenſuall opinions, ye haue bene manie and oftentimes ſufficientlie anſwered to the ſame: except onelie to the pretended græfs touching the denieng of our ſafe conduct to your ambaſſador laſt ſent vnto vs.

Wherevnto we make this anſwer, that we had granted the ſaid ſafe conduct; and if your herald would haue taken the ſame with him, like as he hath bene accuſtomed to ſolicit ſafe conducts for merchants and others heretofore, ye might as ſoone haue had that, as anie other: for we neuer denied ſafe conduct to anie your lieges to come vnto vs and no further to paſſe, but we ſee well, like as your ſaid herald had hertofore made ſiniſter report contrarie to truth, ſo hath he doone now in this caſe, as it is manifeſt and open. Finallie, as touching your requiſition to deſiſt from further attempting againſt our enimie the French king, we know you for no competent iudge of ſo high authoritie to require vs in that behalfe. Wherfore (God willing) we purpoſe with the aid and aſſiſtance of our confederats and alies to proſecute the ſame; and as ye doo to vs and our realme, ſo it ſhall be remembred and acquited hereafter by the helpe of our Lord & our patrone ſaint George, who right excellent, right high and mightie prince, &c. Dated vnder our ſignet in our campe before Tirwine, the twelfth day of Auguſt.

This

This letter being deliuered vnto the Scotish herald, he departed with the same into Flanders, there to haue taken ship: but for want of readie passage he staied, and returned not into Scotland till Flodden field was fought, and the king slaine. For king James perceiuing all the Englishmens doings to tend vnto war rather than to peace, hauing taken order for the assembling of his people, immediatlie after he had sent forth his herald with commandement to denounce the warre, he determined to inuade the English confines, and first before his maine force was come togither, the lord Humes that was lord chamberlaine and warden of Scotland, the thirteenth day of August, hearing that the Englishmen had fetched a bootie within the Scotish ground, assembled a power, & followed them into Northumberland, but yet he could returne he was forelaid [in Brome house, or Brome field] by the Englishmen, which breaking out of their ambushes, put the Scotishmen to the worse, and of them tooke and slue manie.

Englishmen fetched a bootie in Scotland.

Fr. Thin. ✻These wars thus begun, the king determined to go to his armie (as it seemeth) not yet fullie assembled. Wherevpon comming to Limuch, he went to the church to heare euensong; as the maner was. Buchan. lib. 13. To whome, after he had entered the chappell, there came an old man, whose heare was somewhat yellowish red, hanging downe vpon his shoulders, his forehead high with baldnesse, bare headed, hauing his bodie couered with a blewish garment, girded with white, and verie reuerent in his countenance. This man seeking the king, passed through the companie standing there, and drew neere to the king. Who being now come vnto him (and with a certeine rude behauiour, leaning vpon the seat wherein the king was placed) in homelie sort saied vnto him:

"King James sent vnto thee, to giue thee admonishment that thou hasten not forward to the place which thou hast determined: which warning if thou dost despise, it shall succeed ill with thee, and with all such as shall attend vpon thee. Further I am commanded to giue thee intelligence before hand, that thou eschue the familiaritie, custome, or counsell of women, and if thou doest otherwise, it shall succeed to thy hurt and reproch. After which thus spoken, he mingled himselfe with the other companie, neither could after be found (the euensong being ended) when he was sought for by the king: for he was neuer seene after that he had thus deliuered his message. Which seemed the more strange, because that manie which stood neere him (marking all his order, and desirous to haue heard more things from him) could not perceiue his departure; amongest which persons (of those that meant to haue asked him further questions) Dauid Lindsete (a man of approued credit and vertue, verie well learned, and whose life was far estranged from lieng and falshood) was one, who told this same to me (saith Buchanan) as a thing most certeine; or else I would haue ouerpassed it as a fable caried about by common report.]

The king of Scots made too much hast.

Norham. The Braies.

In the meane time was the whole power of Scotland assembled, with the which king James approching to the borders, and nothing abashed with the euill lucke thus at the beginning chanced to his people, purposed with greater aduantage of victorie to recouer that detriment; and herevpon he made such hast, that he would not staie for the whole power of his realme, which was in preparing to come forward vnto him; but comming to the borders, he passed ouer the water of Tweed the two and twentith of August, and entered into England, lodging that night at Wesilham neere to the riuer of Tuisell, and the nert day laid siege vnto the castell of Norham, and within short space wan the Braies, ouerthrew the Barnekine, & slue diuerse within the castell, so that the capteine and such as had charge within it, desired the king to delaie the siege, while they might send to the earle of Surreie alreadie come with an armie into the north parts, couenanting if they were not rescued by the nineteenth day of that moneth, they should deliuer the castell vnto the king. This was granted: and because none came within the time to the rescue, the castell was deliuered at the appointed day; a great part of it was ouerthrowne and beaten downe. After this he wan the castels of Fourd and Etell, & diuerse other places of strength, of which, part were ouerthrowne. He also tooke manie prisoners, and sent them away into Scotland, and diuerse he assured: and thus he abode an eightéene daies within England, till two parts of his armie were scaled & departed home from him, which they did vpon this occasion. Barnekine. Fourd and Etell taken.

✻The king was determined & persuaded to haue besieged Berwike (beyond which he was now passed) since the same alone was more honor (than all the other places besides) if they wan it; the taking whereof they supposed not to be verie hard, because they were sure that the towne and castell were vnfurnished of all things for the defense thereof. Wherevpon, the king (deeming nothing too hard for his armie, especiallie, since the English were set on worke as much as they might in the French wars) being nourished in that vanitie (by his flattering courtiers) did leaue the same vndone at this time, meaning in his returne easilie to haue obteined it. But as they were yet at Ford, a herald of the English came vnto them, requiring that they would appoint a day and place, where and when both the armies might ioine in battell. Wherevpon, there was a councell called amongest the Scots, in which it was agréed by the greater part, that the Scots should returne home into their countrie, least with so small a companie they might hazard the state of the whole countrie; especiallie, since that they had alreadie sufficientlie obteined fame, glorie and riches, and to the vttermost satisfied the band of amitie with the French; for there was no iust cause, why they for number (so few) and for trauell (in ouerthrowing so manie forts) so much weakened, should now againe be laid open to so great a multitude of the English dailie increasing with succors. For it was said at that time; that Thomas Hayward brought into the field (besides the rest of his armie) 6000 of chosen and valiant souldiers from the English campe (in France) before Turweine. Fr. Thin. Buchan. li. 13.

To which persuasion (to make the matter more strange) it was further added, that if the king did depart; the English host of necessitie must be dissolued, and could not that yeare againe be repared, because their souldiers were fet from the furthest parts of the realme; and that if the king would needs fight, that he then should do it in his owne realme, keeping the time & place in his power alwaies to be appointed. But when the French ambassador (and certeine other, fed with the French pensions) labored to the contrarie; the king being by nature fierce, and greedie of warre, was easilie persuaded to abide his enimie in that place. In the meane time, when the English came not forth (at the day appointed to them by the herald, which before had béene with the Scots) the noblemen of Scotland, taking occasion thereof, did afresh go to the king, declaring that their not comming to battell was onelie a traine and deceipt, deferring the matter from day to day, to the end that their force might be increased, and the Scots diminished.

Wherefore said they, we should vse the like policie against them. For since they haue not attended the time time preſcribed vnto them, it is no ſhame to the Scots to returne into their countrie without battell, or to fight within their owne limits. Of both which, the ſurer counſell were to follow the firſt; which if it be not liked, then is there good occaſion offered to execute the other. For ſince the riuer of Till (hauing hie banks) is not paſſable, but at certeine miles hence (except it be by a bridge) ſome few may there reſiſt a great multitude. Beſides which, when a part of the Engliſh armie is paſſed the bridge, the ſame bridge maie eaſilie (by engins placed therefore) be cut in ſunder; ſo that there ſhall not be paſſage for anie more: by meanes whereof, the one part of them ſhall be ſubdued on the one ſide of this riuer, before that anie aid can come vnto them from the other banke. The king liked neither of theſe deuiſes and perſuaſions; but anſwered, that he would not ſuffer the Engliſh to depart (vnfoughten with) although there were an 100000 againſt him. At which raſh anſwer, the whole nobilitie was greeuouſlie offended.

Wherevpon Archembald Dowglas earle of Angus (which farre excelled all the others both in peeres and authoritie) laboured to turne the kings mind with all gentle perſuaſions, and began to make a more ample diſcourſe vpon the two former counſels giuen by the nobilitie. For he ſhewed that the king had fullie ſatisfied the requeſt of the French, in that he had now turned the greateſt part of the Engliſh armie before bent againſt the French, againſt himſelfe and his owne people; and had ſo wrought, that thoſe great armies ſhould neither hurt France nor do anie iniurie vnto the Scots, ſith they were not able long to remaine in campe in thoſe cold places, and in a barren countrie vnfurniſhed of all things (by the calamities of the laſt warres) and in which there was no corne; and if there were, it could not be ripened (the winter comming on ſo faſt) in thoſe northerne parts of the realme.

And where the French ambaſſador doth ſo much vrge vs vnto the battell, I ſuppoſe that the ſame ſhould not ſeeme either new or ſtrange vnto vs, that a ſtrange man (which doth not reſpect the common euill of the realme, but the priuat commoditie of his owne nation) be ouer lauiſh in powring out the bloud of other men. Beſides which, his requeſt is ouer impudent, to demand of the Scots that which the French king (a man of ſingular experience and wiſedome) doth not iudge conuenient for his owne kingdome or dignitie, if we be ouerthrowne. Neither ſhould the loſſe of his hoſt ſeeme more light vnto him (although we are few in number) bicauſe that all they of Scotland (which excell in force, authoritie or counſell) are aſſembled here togither, who being ſlaine, the reſt of the realme would ſoone be a preie to the victor. What? Is it more ſafe for vs, and more profitable to the eſchewing of all danger, for him to fight at this preſent? No trulie. For if Lewes do ſuppoſe, that the Engliſh (by imagined meanes) may be either made needie of monie, or elſe wearied by delaie; what can be done more neceſſarie for the preſent ſtate of things, than to compell the enimie to diuide his armie, to the end that we may eaſe the weight of warre againſt the French by one part of the hoſt to be ſent againſt vs, and ſtill to hold them plaie as it were alwaies to keepe them readie to ſet vpon vs, & by remouing to giue them cauſe to follow vs? For ſo I ſuppoſe ſhall the glorie and ſhew (which theſe men I feare rather valiant in words than deeds, do with their raſhneſſe ſo much pretend) be fullie anſwered. For what can happen more honorable to the king, than that we (by the ouerthrow of ſo manie caſtels, by the ſpoile of ſo manie countries with ſword and fire, and by the driuing home of ſo great booties and preies) haue done that iniurie to them, as that their countrie ſhall not by the peace of manie yeeres recouer hir former eſtate? What greater profit may we looke for by warre, than in ſo great tumult of warres, with great praiſe and honor to vs, and with ſhame and reproch to our enimies, to obteine quiet, ioined with gaine and glorie for the refreſhing of our ſelues? Which kind of victorie (that is gotten more by words than by ſwords) chieflie belongeth to men, and of men ſpeciallie to the leaders and capteins, as ſuch a glorie whereof the common ſouldiors may not challenge anie part.

Which being thus ſpoken by earle Dowglas, although all they which were preſent ſeemed (by their countenance) to giue conſent thereto: yet the king (who had with other bound himſelfe to fight with the Engliſh) receiued theſe counſels with contrarie eares; and in heat commanded Dowglas to depart home, if he were afraid of the enimie. Wherevpon he (conceiuing ſome vnkindneſſe, and inwardlie beholding wherevnto all theſe things would come by the kings raſhneſſe) forthwith burſt out in teares. After which (as ſoone as he could ſettle himſelfe thereto) he ſpake theſe few words. If (ſaid he) my former life did not cleare me from the reproch of a coward, I know not with what reaſon or perſuaſion I might cleare or defend my ſelfe. For trulie ſo long as this my bodie was able to ſuſteine anie labor, I neuer ſpared to ſpend the ſame in the defenſe of my countries helpe, and my ſouereignes honor. But ſince I ſee their eares to exclude my counſell (which is the onelie thing wherewith I can now be profitable) I here leaue my two ſonnes (who nert vnto my countrie are moſt deare to me) and the reſt of my kinred (of whom I greatlie account) as a certeine pledge of the truth and loue of my mind towards thee, and the common helpe of my countrie. And I pray God that he make this feare of mine to be falſe, and that I may rather be counted a lieng prophet, than behold thoſe things which I feare will happen vnto vs. Which words when the Dowglas had ſaid to the king, he departed thence with his companie. The reſt of the nobilitie (bicauſe they ſaw they could not draw the king to their mind) tooke that place for battell which was next vnto them, to the end (ſeeing they were much inferior in number to their enimies, for there were 26000 fighting men in the Engliſh armie, as it was knowne by the ſcouts) to defend themſelues with the benefit of the place, and thereupon got the hill nert vnto their campe.)

The power of the north countrie raiſed.

In which meane time, the earle of Surrie, lieutenant to the king of England, hauing raiſed all the power of the north parts of England, came with the ſame towards the place where he heard that king Iames was incamped, and approching within three miles of the Scotiſh campe in full ſight of the Scotiſhmen, pitcht downe his tents, and incamped with his whole armie. Although king Iames had great deſire to fight with his enimies thus lodged in full view of his campe; yet bicauſe he was incamped in a place of great aduantage, ſo as the enimies could not approch to fight with him, but with great loſſe and danger to caſt themſelues away, he thought good to keepe his ground, ſpeciallie bicauſe all thoſe of the nobilitie, who were knowne to be of experience, did not hold with their aduiſe that counſelled him to giue battell.

The Engliſh campe in ſight of the Scotiſh campe.

King Iames was minded to keepe his ground.

At what time the earle of Surrie had ſent an officer at armes vnto him, requiring him to come forth of his ſtrength vnto ſome indifferent ground, where he would be readie to incounter him, & namelie the earle of Huntleie, a man for his high valiancie ioined with wiſedome and policie, had in moſt reputation of all the reſidue, affirmed in plaine words [beſides that which Dowglaſſe had before ſaid] that nothing

The earle of Huntleie his counſell.

Fr. Thin.

nothing could be either more fond or foolish, than to fight at pleasure of the enimie, and to set all on a maine chance at his will and appointment, and therfore it should be good for them to remaine there in place of aduantage, and with prolonging the time to His persuasions. trifle with the enimie, in whose campe there was alreadie great scarsitie of vittels, neither was it possible that they should be vittelled from the inner parts of the realme, by reason of the cumbersome waies for carriage to passe now after such abundance of continuall raine as of late was fallen, and not like as yet to ceasse, so that in sitting still and attempting nothing rashlie without aduisement, the king should haue his enimies at his pleasure, as vanquished without stroke striken through disaduantage of the place, and lacke of vittels to susteine their languishing bodies.

Foule weather. And suerlie beside the want of vittels, the foule and euill weather sore annoied both parties; for there had not bæne one faire day, no scarse one houre of faire weather of all the time the Scotish armie had lien within England, but great cold, wind & raine, which had not onelie caused manie of the Scots to returne home, but also sore vexed the Englishmen, as well in their iournie thitherwards, as also while they lay in campe against the Scotish armie. There was sending of messengers betwixt them to and fro, and the king had sent his quarell in writing vnto the earle of Surrie by his herald Ilaie the night before the battell, conteining as followeth.

King Iames his quarell vnto the earle of Surrie.

WHere it is alledged that we are come into England against our bond and promise, thereto we answer: that our brother was bound as farre to vs as we were to him, and when we sware last before his ambassadors in presence of our councell, we expressed speciallie in our oth, that we would kæpe to our brother, if our brother kept to vs, and not else. We sweare that our brother brake first to vs, and of his breach we required him diuers times of amends: and latelie we warned him, as he did not vs yer we brake. And this we take for our quarell, and by Gods grace shall defend the same at your assired time, which with Gods helpe we shall abide. ¶ Thus was the king verie desirous to trie the matter by battell, although the wisest sort of his nobles wished not that he should do anie thing ouer rashlie.

Prodigious chances. There chanced also manie things taken (as yée would say) for warnings of some great mischance to follow, which though some reputed but as vaine and casuall haps; yet the impression of them bred a certeine religious feare and new terror in his heart. For as he was in councell with his lords, to vnderstand their opinions touching the order of his battels, there was an hare start amongst them, which An hare. hauing a thousand arrowes, daggers, and other kind of things bestowed at hir, with great noise and showting, yet she escaped from them all safe and without hurt. The same night also, mise had gnawne in sunder the buckle and leather of his helmet therewith he should fasten the same to his hed. And moreouer, the cloth or veile of his inner tent (as is said) about the breake of the day, appeared as though the dewie moisture thereof had bæne of a bloudie colour.

The cloth of his tent of bloodie colour.

Herevpon the king kéeping himselfe within his tent, the earle of Surrie constreined by necessitie to séeke all waies whereby to traine the king downe from the hill where he was lodged, remoued his campe towards the hils of Floddon, where the king of Scots laie incamped: and on the ninth day of September passed the water of Till at Twisell bridge; the rereward going ouer at Wilford, putting themselues as nére as they could betwixt the Scotish campe and Scotland. King Iames perceiuing the Englishmen to passe the water, iudged that they had ment to win an hill that laie betwixt them and his campe, and therefore to preuent them, he caused his field to be raised, and fier to be set on the litter & cabins which they had made of boughs, and so with all spéed remoued to the other hill, being gotten thither yer the English men could perceiue him to be remoued out of his former lodgings, bicause the smoke of the fiers which the Scots had made, couered all the countrie betwixt the two armies.

The English campe remoued by the earle.

The Scots campe remoued also.

In the meane while were the Englishmen aduanced to the foot of Floddon hill, hauing thereby gotten double aduantage: for the Scotish ordinance could not much annoie them in marching vpwards vnder the leuill thereof, and they againe might gall the Scots in shooting off at them, as they came downewards vpon them. For king Iames hauing disappointed the Englishmen of the hill, thought verelie it should be an easie matter for him to ouerthrow them, which being put beside the place where they intended (as he thought) to haue camped, would neuer abide the countenance of his puissant armie, if he might atteine to ioine with them. Therefore the Scotish armie [after they had appointed the same into three wards, whereof (as saith Lesleus) the earle of Huntleie and the lord Hume led the right wing, the left had the earle of Crawford and Montrosse; and the king himselfe kept the middle ward, with the earles of Argile and Lennox] making downwards, incountered with the English host nére to the foot of the mounteine called Branxton, and first sir Edmund Haward leading one of the out wings of the English armie, hauing with him three thousand men, being fiercelie assailed by the Scots on foot, hauing speares and long weapons, and also by certeine horsemen, was in the end discomfited, and his people beaten downe and put to flight, so that being of them forsaken, he was constreined to follow. But yet he and diuerse other which escaped, ioined themselues to the next battell as well as they might. This so prosperous a beginning, who would thinke should haue turned to the losse of the Scots part, and aduancement of the English side. But so it came to passe, for king Iames no sooner saw that wing of the English host ouerthrowne and discomfited, but that he déemed how all the whole power of the Englishmen had bæne fleéing away: and therfore alighting beside his horsse, and commanding those that were about him to follow, prepared himselfe to pursue the chase.

Advantage gotten by the ground.

King Iames his practise.

Fr. Thin.

Sir Edmund Haward was fiercelie assailed.

A good beginning had an euill ending.

King Iames deceiued himselfe and aught ted from his horsse.

His capteins did what they could by words to remoue him from his purpose, declaring to him the dutie of a prince: which is not rashlie to enter the fight, but to prouide and sée that euerie thing be done in order: and whereas comming to trie the matter by hand blowes, he can do no more than another man; yet kæping his place as apperteineth to his person, he may be worth manie thousands of other. The king nothing moued with these exhortations, breaking his arraie of battell, with a companie of noble men, rushed forward into the fore ward, where accomplishing the office of a footman, he found the Englishmen not fleéing, but manfullie standing at resistance,

The capteins good counsell not regarded.

The kings hardinesse marred all.

resistance, so that there was a right hard incounter, and manie arrowes shot on euerie side, and great hurt done therewith.

Sir Edward Stanlie inuaded the backe of the reregard.

At length sir Edward Stanlie with the reregard of the Englishmen came fiercelie downe from the hill of Brankston, vpon the backe of the kings armie, wherein they fought cruellie on both parts for a long space; but at length the victorie inclined to the Englishmen. For the king himselfe was there beaten downe and slaine, with all that whole battell which first entered the fight. The other part of the Scotish host, whereof Alexander Hume lord chamberlaine had the gouernance, although he saw where the other Scotishmen were in danger, and closed in on euerie side, yet would he not once remoue one foot forward out of the place (where he stood) to aid them. Moreouer, the lacke of discretion in the king, which would needs run vpon his owne death, amazed the minds of all men, and brought them into such perplexitie, that they knew not what to do; but looked one vpon another without stirring to or fro, as those that were in despaire now after the death of their king to recouer the victorie, which by so strange a chance seemed as it were slipped out of their hands.

King James slaine.

The lord chamberlaine stood still.

The lord chamberlaine beareth the blame.

Howbeit, the lord chamberlaine bare the most blame, for that he did not cause a new onset to be giuen. But it happened well for the Englishmen: for if king James had ordered himselfe wiselie in this battell, or that after he was slaine, a new furie had moued the Scots to haue renewed the fight in reuenge of the kings death, as had beene expedient, the victorie vndoubtedlie had béene theirs (as was thought by men of great vnderstanding.) Whereupon the Englishmen remembring how manifestlie Gods goodnesse appeared towards them in this battell, confessed themselues long after bound to God for their safetie and deliuerance out of that present danger. The fight began about foure of the clocke in the after noone, and continued three houres, in the which fiftéene thousand men were slaine on both parts: and of that number a third part at the least was of Englishmen (as was crediblie reported) but (as our English writers affirme) there died of Englishmen not past fiftéene hundred.

The Englishmen thanked God for this noble victorie.

15000 men slaine.

But yet the Scotishmen hold, that there died more of the Englishmen than of their nation at this field, and that manie thought it was not the bodie of king James which the Englishmen found in the field, and tooke it for his; but rather an other Scotish mans corps, called the lard of Bonehard, who was also slaine there. And it was affirmed by sundrie, that the king was seene the same night aliue at Kelso: and so it was commonlie thought that he was liuing long after, and that he passed the seas into other countries, namelie to Jerusalem to visit the holie sepulchre, and so to driue forth the residue of his daies, in doing penance for his former passed offenses: but he appeared not in Scotland after as king, no more than Charles duke of Burgognie did appeare in his countries after the battell of Nancie, although his people had the like vaine opinion that he escaped from that discomfiture aliue.

But now to returne to the truth of the matter where we left. In the night following after this terrible battell, the residue of the Scotish armie returned homewards the same way they came, walking and spoiling the English borders as they passed. At their comming home, euerie man spake euill of them, for that as cowards and naughtie persons, they neither sought to reuenge the death of their noble king, nor yet to succour their fellowes that were beaten downe and slaine before their faces. But namelie Alexander Hume lord chamberlaine was reproued, as cause of all that mischiefe, which behaued himselfe not as a captetne, but as a traitor or enimie to his countrie. * Upon the honor of this victorie, Thomas Howard earle of Surrie (as a note of the conquest) gaue to his seruants this cognisance (to weare on their left armc) which was a white lion (the beast which he before bare as the proper ensigne of that house) standing ouer a red lion (the peculiar note of the kingdome of Scotland) and tearing the same red lion with his pawes.]

The Scotish men returne home againe.

They were reuiled of their owne people.

Fr. Thin. Buchan. li. 13

Thus haue you heard how through rashnesse and lacke of skilfull order, the Scotish armie was ouercome, and that worthie prince king James the fourth brought to his fatall end, on the ninth day of September, in the twentie and fift yéere of his reigne, and thirtie and ninth of his age, which was in the yéere from the incarnation 1513. For his politike gouernment and due administration of iustice, which he exercised during the time of his reigne, hée deserued to be numbred amongest the best princes that euer reigned ouer the Scotish nation. All theft, reiffe, murther, and robberie ceassed in his daies, by such rigorous execution of lawes penall as he caused to be exercised through all the bounds of Scotland: insomuch that the sauage people of the out Iles sorted themselues through terror and dread of due punishment to liue after the order of lawes and iustice, where otherwise of themselues they are naturallie inclined to sedition, & disquieting of each other. To conclude, men were in great hope, that if it had pleased the hie determinate power of almightie God to haue lent to him longer life, he should haue brought the realme of Scotland to such a flourishing estate, as the like in none of his predecessors times was yet euer heard of.

The sauage people reformed themselues.

There died with him in that infortunate battell, of noble men (beside others of the meaner sort) the archbishop of saint Andrewes his bastard sonne, the bishop of the Iles: the abbats of Inchaffreie and Kilwennie: the earles of Montrosse, Crawford, Argile, Lennor, Glencar, Cathnes, Castelles, Bothwell; Arrell high constable of Scotland, Addell, Atholl, and Morton: the lords Louet, Forbois, Clueston, Rws, Inderbie, Saintcleare, Marwell, and his three brethren, Daunlie, Sempill, Borthicke, Bogonie, Arskill, Blackater, and Cowin: knights and gentlemen of name, sir John Dowglas, Cuthbert Hume of Fast castell, sir Alexander Seton, sir Danie, maister John Grant, sir Dunkin Cawfield, sir Sander Lowder, sir George Lowder, maister Marshall, maister Key, maister Ellot, maister Cawell clerke of the chancerie, the deane of Ellester, Macke Rene, Macke Clene, with manie others.

* This James the fourth was of a firme bodie, of iust stature, of most comelie countenance, and of sharpe wit, but altogither vnlearned, as the fault of that age was. But he did diligentlie applie himselfe to an old custome of the countrie, cunninglie to cure wounds, the knowledge whereof in times past was a thing common to all the nobilitie, being alwaies vsed to the warres. He was easilie to be spoken vnto, gentle in his answers, iust in his iudgements, and so moderat in punishments, that all men might easilie see he was vnwillinglie drawen vnto them. Against the detraction of the euill, and admonishment of the good, there was such worthinesse of mind in him (confirmed by the quiet of a good conscience, and the hope of his innocencie) that he would not onelie not be angrie, but not so much as vse a sharpe word vnto them. Amongest which vertues, there were certeine vices crept in by the ouermuch desire to please the people, for whilest he labored to auoid the note of couetousnesse (obiected to his father) and sought to win the fauour of the common sort (with sumptuous feasts, gorgeous shewes, and large gifts) he fell into

The quéene ſent louing letters vnto the king of England hir brother, requiring him of peace. Whereupon a truce was taken betwixt the two realmes of England and Scotland, for the ſpace of one yeare and a day. In the beginning of Februarie, the king of England, hearing that a parlement ſhould be holden in Scotland, for the bringing in of the duke of Albanie to be tutor, wrote to his ſiſter that ſhe ſhould in anie wiſe impeach and ſtaie his comming thither; declaring how dangerous it was, not onelie for hir, but alſo for hir ſonne to haue him gouernor, which was to ſucceed, if hir ſon were once out of the way. But the chiefeſt cauſe that moued the king of England to labour, that the duke ſhould haue nothing to do in Scotland, was (as manie thought) for that he knew how the duke, in fauour of the king of France, would ſhew himſelfe an enimie againſt England, with all the force he might make or procure.

The king of England writeth to his ſiſter.

Now ſhortlie after that the peace was concluded betwixt him and the king of France, he ſent a letter alſo, requiring him not to ſuffer the duke to paſſe into Scotland, for the reaſon firſt alleged. But notwithſtanding the labor that king Henrie made to the contrarie, it was concluded by the ſtates in parlement aſſembled in Edenburgh, at the time preſixed, that ſir Patrike Hamilton, and Lion king of armes ſhould be ſent into France, to procure the duke to come into Scotland, being now confirmed tutor and gouernor, according to the lawes of the realme in ſuch caſes prouided. Whereupon, in Aprill then next following they tooke the ſeas, and paſſed into France, accordinglie as by the ſtates had béene deuiſed.

The duke of Albanie confirmed tutor by parliament.

This yeare came a legat into Scotland from the pope, with certeine priuileges granted to the king and realme. The thirtith of Aprill was the quéene deliuered of a prince in the caſtell of Striueling, which was baptiſed by the poſtulat of Dunfermling, and the archdeane of ſaint Andrewes, and inſtantlie confirmed by the biſhop of Caithneſſe, by the name of Alexander. During the time that the quéene lay in childbed, great diſcord fell out betwixt the lords of the weſt parts, and the other lords of the realme: but ſhortlie after the quéene called an aſſemblie at Edenburgh the twelfth of Julie, where they were all well agreed. And herewith two of the clergie were ſent into England for peace. And the 28 of the ſame moneth, maiſter Iames Ogilbie abbat of Dunbarre, and ſir Patrike Hamilton, and Lion the herald came forth of France with articles in writing from the king there, and the duke of Albanie; by the which the dukes comming was excuſed, becauſe the king could not want him, till ſome end were had touching the warres betwixt him and the king of England, which was concluded in October next inſuing.

Monsieur de la Bautie.

The 20 of Nouember, Le sire de la Bautie receiued the castell of Dunbar in the name of the duke of Albanie, at the hands of the deane of Glascow brother to the bishop of Murrey, called Forman. Shortlie after, John Hepborne the prior of saint Andrews then elect archbishop of that sée, besieged the castell of saint Andrews, and wan it by force from the kéepers of it, which were appointed to defend it in the name of Gawin Dowglasse, wherewith the quéene and the earle of Angus were highlie offended. The twelfth of Januarie, being a verie darke & windie night, the earle of Lennor, and the maister of Glencarne vndermined the nether groundsoile of the castell gate of Dunbreton, & entered thereby into the castell, & so tooke it, putting out thereof the lord Erskin. Shortlie after (that is to say) the fifteenth of that moneth, a great assemblie was made betwixt the earles of Angus and Arrane, the one to haue fought with the other, which was the cause and beginning of great trouble that insued.

The same day in Edenburgh were the buls published, which Forman the bishop of Murrey had purchased at Rome, for the obteining of the archbishoprike of saint Andrews, the abbasies of Dunfirmeling, and Arbroeth, through supplication of the quéene and duke of Albanie. From which buls the prior of saint Andrews appealed, pretending title to the archbishops sée by election and generall gift of the lords of the realme; and herupon got togither his friends in Edenburgh, as the maister of Hales and others. And on the other part, the lord chamberleine, and diuerse of the bishop of Murreis friends got the kings letters, by vertue whereof they proclamed the said maister of Hales, and the prior of saint Andrews rebels, with all their assistants, putting them to the horne: whereupon they were constreined to depart out of Edenburgh. And in Maie following, the prior went vnto Rome, there to iustifie his appeale.

Contention about the intoieng of the sée of saint Andrews.

The foure and twentith of Februarie, a parlement was assembled at Striueling; but because the lords could not agrée amongst themselues, it was proroged till the comming of the duke of Albanie, which was loked for to be in Scotland, in Aprill; or at the furthest in Maie next insuing, as he had sent word by sir John Striueling of the Keir, that was latelie come from him with letters vnto the lords and péeres of the realme. The fifteenth of Maie, truce was proclamed betwixt England and Scotland, to indure for three yeares, or three moneths (as saith Lesleus) but the same day at six of the clocke in the afternoone, the Englishmen entered the borders of Scotland vpon the water of Rule, and forraied the countrie, doing great hurt therein, notwithstanding the truce. The seuentéenth day of Maie, John duke of Albanie, tutor and gouernor of Scotland, arriued at the towne of Aire, with eight ships well appointed, and furnished with men and all kind of necessarie prouision for his estate.

Truce betwixt England and Scotland.

The duke of Albanie his arriuall in Scotland.

From thence taking the sea againe, he sailed alongst the coast till he came to Dunbreton, and there came on land, & on the next day passed forth to Glascow, where all the westland lords receiued him with great semblance of reioising for his arriuall. The six and twentith day of Maie, he was receiued into Edenburgh, a great number of lords méeting him on the way. The quéene also came from hir owne lodging and met him, to do him honor. Sundrie conceipts, pageants, & plaies were shewed by the burgesses, to honor his entrie in the best maner they could deuise. Shortlie after his comming to Edenburgh, there came thither forth of all parts of the realme, the lords and barons, where they being assembled in councell, he tooke vpon him the gouernement of the realme, which he promised to vse by their aduise, so that they would assist him in setting forth of iustice and good orders, which they vndertooke to do.

The duke of Albanie receiued into Edenburgh.

A parlement summoned.

Herevpon was the parlement, which had béene proroged till his comming, summoned to be kept at Edenburgh the twelfth of Julie, in the which diuerse acts were concluded and made; and the lord Drummond was adiudged in the dukes mercie, for striking Lion king of armes. The duke pardoned him of life and honor, but his lands and goods remained in the kings hands: notwithstanding, he was afterwards restored to the same againe. In this parlement also, the duke of Albanie was confirmed by the three estates of the realme tutor and gouernor to the king, the scepter and sword being deliuered to him: his oth also was taken by the lords, and theirs giuen to him, that each of them should be faithfull to others, and namelie to their king and souereigne lord, and also should mainteine iustice to the vttermost of their powers, for the aduancement of his honor, and suertie of the realme.

The king deliuered to the kéeping of certeine lords.

In the meane time, whilest this parlement was in hand, the gouernor was aduertised that the king should haue béene conueied forth of the realme secretlie into England: whereupon he suddenlie departed in the night time from Edenburgh, with his men of warre in good order, & came to Striueling, where the king, with his brother Alexander, laie with the quéene; which castell, togither with the kings person, and the other within it, were deliuered to him the third day of August: whereupon he committed them and the castell to the kéeping of foure lords of the realme, whereof the earles of Eglenton and Montrosse were two. The lord Hume, because he had assisted the earle of Angus and the quéene against the gouernor, was denounced a rebell; and the earles of Lennor & Arrane, with manie others, were sent to his houses to seize the same into the kings hands. In the castell of Hume was laid gunpowder by a traine, wherby diuerse of them that entered first into the castell were burned.

The lord Hume denounced a rebell.

The lord Hume himselfe got him into England, and sore disquieted the marches, so that no day of truce was holden, neither on the east nor middle marches. The twelfth of August, the quéene, the earle of Angus, and his brother George Dowglas, went from Temptallon vnto Berwike, and from thence passed to the nunrie of Candstreame; whereupon aduertisement being giuen to the K. of England, and his pleasure therein knowne, the six and twentith of that moneth she was receiued by the lord Dacres, & conueied to Harbottell castell, where she remained till she was deliuered of a daughter, called Margaret Dowglasse, afterwards maried to the earle of Lennor, as in place conuenient it shall further appeare. There was no Scotishman at this time receiued into England with hir. The gouernor perceiuing the rebellion of the lord Hume, passed to the borders with his Frenchmen, where the first of October, the said lord Hume came & submitted himselfe to the gouernors pleasure, and his brother Alexander shortlie after did the same, and they were both deliuered to the earle of Arrane, who was appointed to kéepe them in safetie within the towne of Edenburgh.

Herevpon, the gouernor cauſing the parlement to be holden that was ſummoned to begin the foure and twentith of October, the ſaid lord Yume, maiſter William Yume, and Dauid Yume, were conuict of treaſon by all the ſtates, to loſe their liues, lands, and goods. This parlement was prorogued till fifteene daies after, within which time the earle of Arrane was appointed to make appearance, or elſe it was agreed that they ſhould proceed againſt him in like maner. And in that meane ſpace, the gouernor went to beſiege the caſtell of Hamilton, where that noble aged ladie, the old counteſſe of Arrane, daughter to king James the ſecond, & mother to the earle of Arrane, and aunt to the duke by his fathers ſide, cauſed not onelie the caſtell to be ſurrendered at the dukes pleaſure, but procured alſo the earle of Arrans peace, which earle, the twelfth of Nouember next inſuing, came with the biſhop of Glaſcow vnto Edenburgh, and there ſubmitted himſelfe to the dukes will.

The old counteſſe of Arrane purchaſeth hir ſons pardon.

About the ſame time, certeine lords toke part with the earle of Murreie the kings baſtard brother, and the earle of Erroll, againſt the erle of Huntleie, and raiſed a commotion; ſo that being got into Edenburgh, there was much adoo, & the towne greatlie diſquieted. The gouernor lieng in the abbeie, came into the towne, and toke the earles of Huntleie, Erroll, Murreie, and others; and committed them to ward within the caſtell, while he tried the cauſe: and finding that maiſter William Yaie being with the earle of Murreie had raiſed that ſturre, he ſent the ſame Yaie into France, there to remaine during his pleaſure, and forthwith the ſaid earles were ſet at libertie. Lion king of armes appointed to go into England with letters to king Henrie, was ſtopped at Caldſtreame by the lord Yume, who toke his letters from him, and kept him priſoner, till Alexander Yumes mother, that remained priſoner in Dunbar, was exchanged for him. The eightéenth day of December, Alexander duke of Roſſeie the kings brother departed this life at Striueling.

A commotion betwixt the earles of Murreie and Huntleie.

Lion king of armes ſtaied by the lord Yumes.

The ſeuentéenth day of Januarie, a truce was taken betwixt England and Scotland, till the feaſt of Pentecoſt nert. This truce was agréed vpon at Coldingham, by certeine commiſſioners, appointed on either part there, to treat for peace. For the realme of Scotland were theſe: Monſieur de Planes the French ambaſſador, archdeacon of ſaint Andrews, maiſter Gawin de Dunbar, and ſir William Scot of Baluerie knights. The Engliſhmen compriſed for their part, the earle of Angus and the lord Yume within the compaſſe of this truce. In the meane time, the earle of Arrane departed from the gouernor againe, and repaired to the weſt parts, where he confederated himſelfe with certeine lords, notwithſtanding that ſir James Hamilton, and the lord of Cauder remained pledges for his good demeanor within the caſtell of Edenburgh. The earles of Lennor, Glencarne, and other cauſed the caſtell of Dunbreton and diuerſe other to be furniſhed, and toke the caſtell of Glaſcow with the kings great artillerie that laie within it, and ſpoiled the ſame.

A truce concluded betwixt England & Scotland.

The earle of Lenor furniſheth Dunbreton.

The gouernor aduertiſed thereof, raiſed an armie & went to Glaſcow, where, by the labor of the biſhop of that place, an appointment was taken, ſo that the caſtell was deliuered into the biſhops hands. The earle of Lennor came in to the gouernor, and toke a new reſpit, and about the beginning of March nert following, the earle of Arrane and the lord Yume did the like. Forman the archbiſhop of ſaint Andrews, againſt whome the prior of ſaint Andrews did ſtand (as ye haue heard) for that ſame benefice, to the great diſquieting of the realme, by ſuch partakings as chanced thereabout among the lords, came now to the towne of Edenburgh, and reſigned all the three benefices, whereof he had purchaſed buls of the pope, that is to ſay, the archbiſhoprike of ſaint Andrews, the abbaſies of Arbroth and Dunfirmeling in the gouernors hands, to beſtow the ſame at his pleaſure: who by the counſell of certeine lords, to ſatiſfie ſuch as claimed intereſt to the ſame, and pacifieng of all debates, beſtowed them as followeth.

The earles of Lennor and Arrane take a reſpit.

Forman reſigneth his title to the archbiſhops ſée.

First, the ſaid archbiſhoprike he gaue to the ſaid Forman with the abbaſies of Dunfirmeling, and to maiſter James Hepborne he gaue the biſhoprike of Murrey, and benefices worth a thouſand marks by the yeare vnto the prior of ſaint Andrews for a recompenſe; the abbaſie of Driburgh he gaue vnto maiſter James Ogiluie, and the biſhoprike of Aberden (then vacant) vnto Alexander Gurdon, and to the archbiſhop of Glaſcow called Beton he gaue the abbaſie of Arbroth, aſſigning to the earle of Murrey a large penſion out thereof. One of the Hamiltons was made abbat of Kilwinning [and George Dundaſſe was made prior of the knights of the roads.] And thus he beſtowed the benefices which had béene vacant euer ſince Floddon field, vnto diuerſe lords, or to their kinſmen, that by ſuch liberalitie vſed towards them, all debates and diſcords might ceaſſe, which had happened amongeſt them, ſpeciallie about the beſtowing of the ſame benefices. This was done in the moneth of Februarie.

Shortlie after, the gouernor, by counſell of the lords, to the end the realme might come to a perfect quietneſſe, and the noble men vnited togither, receiued into fauor the earle of Angus, & maiſter Patrike Pantoun ſecretarie, who for his cauſe had béene kept as priſoner in Inſche gaile. He likewiſe receiued the lord Yume, and his brother, pardoning them all their offenſes paſt. And in parlement holden the fift of Maie, they were reſtored to all their lands, heritages, fées, and honors. About that time, the lord of Strawen in Atholl committed diuerſe great offenſes and crimes, for the which he was taken by the earle of Atholl, and beheaded at Logiraith by the gouernors commiſſion.

The earle of Angus and others receiued into fauor.

All this while, the parlement was not diſſolued but vpon prorogation, and ſo the ſame began againe the firſt day of Julie, at what time the king of England, at requeſt of his ſiſter the queene of Scotland, wrote letters to the lords now aſſembled in parlement, requeſting them to expell the gouernor forth of the realme. But all the lords and ſtates with vniuerſall conſent ſent Albanie the herald with letters to the ſaid king, excuſing them, that they might not in anie wiſe ſatiſfie his deſire therein, the ſame being againſt reaſon and the lawes of their countrie.

The parlement began againe.

The king of Englands letters to the lords.

In the moneth of September, the gouernor commanded the lord Yume, with his brother maiſter William Yume, and Dauid Bar of Fernihurſt, to be arreſted and beſtowed in ſeuerall places, that better rule might be kept vpon the borders: but they lieng now in ward, ſundrie informations were giuen vp againſt them: and therevpon, the eight of October, the ſaid lord Yume and his brother were conuict of treaſon, for aſſiſting and mainteining of the théeues vpon the borders, and other crimes; for the which he was beheaded: and on the morrow after, his brother the foreſaid William Yume was likewiſe beheaded, and their heads were ſet vpon the Tolbuith in Edenburgh: Dauid Bar was ſpared.

remained in England amongeſt his friends. Iohn abbat of Jedworth was baniſhed beyond Taie. Dauid the yonger brother, which was prior of Coldingham two yeares after the death of his brethren, was (by Iames Hepborne, the huſband of his ſiſter) ſlaine by a traine, vnder color of a meeting and parlée, wherevnto he was called; whome all men did pittie, becauſe he was a harmleſſe yong gentleman, of a ſingular wit, and fowlie betraied by thoſe of whom he ought not ſo to haue bin intrapped.

Another parlement.

The duke of Albanie ſecond perſon of the realme.

Shortlie after, the duke rode to Jedworth with a great companie of men, & ſtaied the great robbing & reauing which had béene vſed on the borders, & left there good wardens to kéepe good rule in thoſe parts, and ſo returned to Edenburgh. The third of Nouember, another parlement was holden, in which it was decréed, that the gouernor ſhould be déemed and reputed for ſecond perſon of the realme, notwithſtanding the claime made by his elder brother Alexander Steward, that was begotten on the daughter of the earle of Dirkeneie, which was alleged to haue béene firſt maried to their father the duke of Albanie, before he was maried to the earle of Bullognes daughter, on whome he begot the gouernor. Whereupon this Alexander made proteſtation to be heire to his father; but they were afterward agréed, and Alexander renounced his title in his brothers fauor, and was made biſhop of Murreie, and abbat of Scone. At this parlement, the gouernor required licence to go into France, and to be abſent there ſix moneths: but this ſute was not granted till Aprill following.

The gouernor aſketh licence to go into France.

The earle of Lennox in ward.

At the ſame time was the earle of Lennor put in ward within the caſtell of Edenburgh, till he had cauſed the caſtell of Dunbreton to be deliuered vnto one Alane Steward in the conſtables name, & then he was ſet at libertie. In the moneth of December, Monſieur de la Bautie was made warden of the eaſt marches in ſtead of the lord Hume, and kept daies of truce: which procured ſuch hatred, that it coſt him afterwards his life. In the moneth of Ianuarie, the gouernor went to ſaint Johns towne, and there held his ſeat of iuſtice, where the lord Fleming for the time was made great chamberlaine of Scotland, with all the fées thereof. In the yeare 1517, there came ambaſſadors from Francis the new French king, to deſire, that the ancient league might be renewed betwixt him and the king of Scotland, their realmes, dominions, and ſubiects.

Monſieur de la Bautie made warden of the marches.

Ambaſſadors from France.

For this cauſe, all the lords of the realme were aſſembled at Edenburgh, where, by them it was concluded, that the gouernor himſelfe ſhould paſſe the ſeas into France; and alſo that the biſhop of Dunkeild, the ſecretarie, and the maiſter of Glencarne as ambaſſadors ſhould go thither: the which the thirteenth of Maie, went a ſhipbord, and by the eaſt ſeas ſailed thither, and the gouernor toke ſhip at Newmarke beſide Dunbreton the ſeuenth of June, taking his courſe by the weſt ſeas, and ſo paſſed into France, where it was agréed, that he ſhould haue remained but onelie foure moneths, he hauing appointed the biſhops of ſaint Andrews and Glaſcow, the earles of Huntleie, Argile, Angus, and Arrane, to gouerne in his place, whileſt he was abſent. Alſo he ordeined Anthonie Darcie, or Monſieur de la Bautie lieutenant of the borders.

Gouernors appointed to the kings perſon.

He alſo had cauſed the king to be brought into Edenburgh caſtell, within the which he ſhould remaine in the kéeping of the earle Marſhall, the lords Erſkin, Borthwike, Rithuen; of the which, two at leaſt ſhould be alwaies preſent. The quéene that remained as then in England, after ſhe vnderſtood that the gouernor was departed towards France, returned to Edenburgh the ſeuentéenth of June, but ſhe was not ſuffered to ſée the king till Auguſt following: at what time, for feare of the peſtilence to be crept into the caſtell, he was remoued to Cragmiller, where the quéene oftentimes came vnto him; but at length, through ſome ſuſpicion conceiued, leaſt the quéene might conueie him away from thence into England, he was eftſoones brought vnto the caſtell of Edenburgh, in which he was kept after, according to the order taken in that behalfe.

The king remoued.

The doubt which the Scots had in the quéene.

* Much about this time in the which theſe things were done, John Gordon (the eldeſt ſonne of that Alexander earle of Huntleie, which for the praiſe of his ſingular goodneſſe obteined the ſurname of good) returning out of France (whither a little before he had ſailed with the gouernor) was ſingularlie welcomed and interteined of all men, who going vnto his owne people (in the north parts) was vrged with ſuch grieuous ſickneſſe that he died therwith, and by his father (to whom he ſhould by courſe of nature execute the ſame office) ſhortlie after buried in the abbeie of Kilroſſe, with a goodlie towne erected on him by his ſaid father. The death of which John gaue (for manie cauſes) manie griefes vnto manie perſons: but amongſt other the chiefeſt to his father, who liued not long after his ſonne. Which Alexander when he died, left the ſaid earledome to his nephue, ſonne of his ſonne John; who bicauſe he was but ten yéeres old, was committed to the earle of Angus, to be inſtructed in all goodneſſe of maners anſwering to the excellencie of that wit wherewith he was indued.

Fr. Thin. Leſleus lib. 9. pag. 386.

This earle Huntleie adorned with excellent ſwéetneſſe of maners and pleaſantneſſe of wit, the earle of Angus would neuer or verie hardlie ſuffer to depart out of his companie. For which cauſe when the erle of Angus, for certeine ſuſpicions of treſon was baniſhed Scotland into England, he attempted by all deuiſes and perſuaſions to intiſe the child to haue gone with him: but the yong boie could not be allured with anie flatteries or perſuaſions to ſubmit himſelfe to the leaſt note of reproch, in forſaking his king and countrie. Wherefore when the earle of Angus was departed into England, the child lifting vp his crauing hands to the king, did grant himſelfe and all he had to the king and his countrie, whome the king receiued with all kind of humanitie; and prouided that he ſhould be inſtructed in euerie ſort of vertue and learning, that was to be deſired in ſuch a prince; bicauſe the ſaid child was borne of his ſiſters mariage.

The lords and other nobles highlie offended (as well for the death of the lord Hume, as for that they ſaw Anthonie Darcie lord Bautie the French aduanced to greater credit than themſelues, and not onelie to be made warden of the marches, but alſo capteine of Dunbreton, the ſtrongeſt fort of Scotland) began to raiſe tumults in the land. For William Cockborne (vncle of Comarch Lanton) who (expelling the gardians of the pupill) did kéepe the caſtell of Lanton, aſſiſted with the helpe of Dauid Hume lord of Wodburne (whoſe ſiſter the ſaid Cokeborne had maried) firſt began a commotion in thoſe parts. For when they ſaw that all means were taken from them openlie to reuenge the ſame, and to ſet vpon Bautie, they determined to performe the ſame (with ſome ſecret deuiſe) by lieng in wait for him.

Buchan. lib. 14

For the caſtell of Langton or Lanton, being kept in the poſſeſſion of Wodburne (and ſuch as toke his part againſt the king) he the ſaid Wodburne appointed ſubtill fellows ſecretlie to enter the caſtell, and to reteine it in the kings name. After which, this Wodburne feining a counterfeit anger (for he was a man full of all ſubtiltie) that this caſtell was ſo iniurioullie taken from him, and kept to the kings behoofe, he laid siege to the castell (as though he went about to recouer the same with all the power he could) to the intent that Bautie might be intised to come thither to raise the siege. For which cause Bautie (supposing in truth that the castell had bene kept to the vse of the king) hastening the rescue thereof, came forth of the castell of Dunbar to assemble the men of the countrie to raise the siege, as lieutenant of the borders, he was chased by the said lord of Wodburne and other so fiercelie, that in the end he was slaine, and foure Frenchmen with him: his head was cut from the shoulders, and set vp in the towne of Duns [vpon the castell of Hume] the nintéenth of Januarie.

Monsieur de la Bautie slaine by the lord of Woodburne. Fr. Thin.

The lords regents were herewith meruelouslie offended, & chose the earle of Arrane to be warden of the borders in de la Bauties place, who was also chosen to be prouost of Edenburgh: wherewith the earle of Angus was highlie displeased. But the erle of Arrane, not séeming to passe much thereof, toke George Dowglas the said earle of Angus his brother, and Parke Bar, committing them to ward within the castell of Edenburgh, because of the fauor he bare vnto the said lord of Wodburne & his complices. Moreouer, for due punishment of the murther of the foresaid de la Bautie, there was a parlement called the nintéenth of Februarie next, in the which, Dauid Hume lord of Wodburne, and his thrée brethren, William Cockborne & John Hume, with diuerse other their partakers, were indicted for the besieging of the castell of Langton, the slaughter of monsieur de la Bautie, and for the setting vp of his head, intercommuning with the Englishmen, and diuers other misdoings.

Immediatlie after the end of this parlement, the earle of Arrane came into the Mers, with a great armie, and hauing with him the kings great artillerie, ment to haue besieged such places as would haue resisted him. But at his being in Lowder, the keies of the castell of Hume were brought vnto him, which on the next morrow he receiued, and put men within it to keepe it, as he did in Langton and Wodburne, which he receiued at the same time. The maister of Hales was also sought for at that time, that hée might haue bene apprehended to answer the slaughter of Dauid Hume, prior of Coldingham, whom he had slaine traitorouslie. A litle before this parlement, the bishop of Dunkeld was returned from the French king with a bond of the league renewed betwixt Scotland and France. And at that same time was one capteine Mores a Frenchman sent forth of France, with a certeine number of men, to receiue the castell of Dunbar into his kéeping, which accordinglie he did, the same béeing deliuered vnto him.

The earle of Lennox, who had béene with the gouernor in France, returned home into Scotland, & with him came a French herald from the king with letters, and maister Walter Steward abbat of Glenluce came likewise from the gouernor. And about that time, because the queene and lords were aduertised that the French king had contracted new bonds of peace and amitie with the king of England, without making mention of Scotland, they thought themselues euill vsed, being his confederat friends, and thervpon sent sharpe letters to the king of France, and to the gouernor, by Albanie the herald. In the moneth of June, maister Gawen Dunbar, archdeane of saint Andrews, and clearke of the register, was preferred to the bishops sée of Abberden that was vacant by the death of Alexander Gourdon.

This Gawen founded an hospitall in Abberden, and indowed the same with lands for sustenance of twelue pore men, with a prouost to haue care ouer them. He also builded a faire bridge, with seuen arches ouer the water of Dee beside Abberden, and purchased lands for the perpetuall vpholding thereof. He also builded two steeples in the cathedrall church, with halfe of the crosse church, and a faire palace for the small prebendaries, called the chapleins. Moreouer, he bestowed manie rich & pretious ornaments vpon the same church of Abberden, as copes, chalices, and other such like things, which remained there long after. Manie right commendable works were accomplished by this diligent prelat, greatlie to his praise and high renowme; for he spent not the fruits of his benefice in vaine, but on such maner of buildings.

The seuentéenth of June, there rose great stur in Edenburgh, by the falling out of the earle of Rothes, and the lord Lindsey, about the inioieng of the shiriffewike of Fife, by reason whereof, they were put in ward, the one in Dunbar, and the other in Dunbreton. About the beginning of August, the quéene remaining in Edenburgh, vnderstood that the earle of Angus hir husband, as then soiourning in Dowglas dale, had taken a faire gentlewoman in those parts, and kept hir as his concubine; for the which act she conceiued such hatred against him, that there was neuer no perfect loue betwixt them afterwards. In the beginning of Februarie, there came a clearke as ambassador from the French king with letters, concerning the concluding of the truce betwixt Scotland and England, which message the lords made small account of, because the king had omitted to comprehend Scotland in the league which he lastlie made with England. The seuenth of June, a mad man in Dundee slue in his mad fit a ladie of inheritance, a nun, with two other women, the one of them being great with child, and also two men.

The king of England writeth vnto the French king, desiring him to staie the duke of Albanie, that he might not come into Scotland; and furthermore, he laid ships of warre in the pase vpon the seas to watch for his comming, and to take him by the waie as he should passe. In September the king was remoued forth of the castell of Edenburgh vnto Dalkith, for doubt of the pestilence, which was suspected to be in the castell of Edenburgh. And from Dalkith the erle of Arrane rode to Edenburgh to haue bin effsones elected regent & prouost of that towne: but he missed his purpose, for the townesmen would not suffer him to enter, but repelled him backe, so that diuerse were hurt on both sides.

Herevpon, great dissention rose betwixt the said earle of Arrane, and the earle of Angus, because of his repulse in that sute: whereby the whole realme was diuided into partakings, so that sundrie slaughters thereof insued, as of the prior of Coldingham, and six of his men murthered, by the lord of Wodburne at Lamerton, the first of October. About the same time, the king returned to the castell of Edenburgh, and in the towne there were remaining at the same time the earles of Angus, Errol, and Crawford; the lord Glames, and other; the bishops of saint Andrews, Abberden, Orkeneie, and Dublane, with diuerse abbats and other prelats. And in the towne of Glascow was the bishop of Glascows chancellor, with the earles of Arrane, Lennox, Eglenton, and Cassels; the lords Rosse, Sempill, the abbat of Paisley, the bishop of Galloway, and other noble men of the west. Thus the lords were diuided, and would not take anie order for the good gouernment of the common-wealth.

and England, with an ambaſſador alſo from the gouernor, with a concluſion of peace taken for one yeere, betwixt Scotland and England: who comming to Edenburgh, were receiued by the earle of Angus, and the other lords there with him, the which ſent for the chancellor & the earle of Arrane to come thither; but they would not come anie neerer than to Linlithgo. The ambaſſador therefore toke in hand to perſuade, that an aſſemblie might be had in Striueling: but the earle of Angus would not come there. Neuertheleſſe, the ſaid ambaſſadors went thither, where the earle of Arrane and his partakers, as the chancellor and others, receiued them thankfullie, and proclamed the peace, according to the treatie which they had brought, and ſo with courteous anſwer and great rewards licenced them to depart. But in their returne toward England, the earle of Angus with a great number of men met them at Carlauerok, reprouing them ſharpelie for their demeanor, and for taking their anſwer of the chancellor, ſo that they were not a little afraid, leaſt the earle in his diſpleaſure would haue vſed ſome outrage towards them, which otherwiſe than in words it ſhould appeare he did not.

The peace proclamed.

1520. In Januarie, about the keeping of a court at Jedworth, there was raiſing of people betwixt the earle of Angus on the one part, and Andrew Kar the lord of Fernihurſt; in whoſe aid, James Hamilton came with foure hundred Mers men: but the lord of Seſſeford then warden, aſſiſting the earle of Angus his part, met Hamilton at Kelſo with a great companie, and when they were lighted on foot, and ſhould haue foughten, the Mers men left ſir James Hamilton, the baſtard of the earle of Arrane, in all the danger, with a few of his owne men about him, ſo that with much paine he was horſſed, and eſcaped in great danger vnto Hume, with loſſe of foure of his ſeruants which were ſlaine: and on the other part, there was an Engliſhman ſlaine called Rafe Kar, that came in aid of the warden. On the morrow after, the lord of Fernihurſt, as baliffe to the earle of Arrane, of that regalitie, held his court at the principall place of the forreſt of Jedburgh, and the earle himſelfe held his court likewiſe in an other part of the ſame land, three miles diſtant from the other.

Variance betwixt the earle of Angus and the lord of Fernihurſt.

The thirtieth day of Aprill, the lord of Wodburne, and maiſter William Dowglaſſe, newlie made prior of Coldingham, with their partakers in great numbers, came to Edenburgh to aid the earle of Angus, who was within the towne, againſt the earle of Arrane, and James Beton the chancellor, who were alſo there. But now by the comming of theſe ſuccors, which entered by force at the neather bowe, and ſlue the maiſter of Mountgomerie, ſonne of the earle Eglenton, and ſir Patrike Hamilton knight; the earle of Arrane, and the chancellor, were conſtreined to forſake the towne, & to paſſe through the north loch. [To reuenge this contumelie, the Hamiltons beſieged the cell of Parnocke (which is the caſtell of Cuningham) but they ſhortlie returned backe without doing anie thing againſt them.]

Fr. Thin. Buchan. li. 14.

The one and twentith of Julie, the earle of Angus being in the towne of Edenburgh, George Hume, brother to the late lord Hume beheaded, came thither with the abbat of Coldingham, brother to the earle of Angus, and Dauid Hume of Wodburne, and a great companie of gentlemen, and others, and paſſed to the Tolbuith, where they remained, till the heads of the lord Hume, and of his brother William were taken downe beſide the place where they were faſtened on a tauill, and this was done in preſence of the prouoſt for the time being. The nert day they went to Linlithgo, and from thence to Striueling, in hope to haue found the chancellor, and ſome other of that faction there. But miſſing of their purpoſe, they returned to Edenburgh againe, and cauſing ſolemne funerall obſequies to be kept in the blacke friers, for them that owght thoſe heads, with offerings and bankets, they afterwards returned home to their owne dwellings, without attempting anie other thing for that preſent.

In November, the duke of Albanie arriued in Scotland on the weſt parts, at an hauen called Grawrach, the nineteenth of the ſame moneth; and on the three and twentith he came to Edenburgh, accompanied with the queene, the archbiſhop of Glaſcows chancellor, the earle of Huntleie, and manie other lords, knights, barons, and gentlemen; and within ſir daies after their comming thither, the prouoſt and baillifes were depoſed, becauſe they had beene choſen in fauour of the earle of Angus, and other appointed in their roomes. Then was there a parlement ſummoned to be kept at Edenburgh, the ſix and twentith of Januarie nert following; and on the ninth of Januarie, a generall ſummons of forfalture was proclamed at the market croſſe in Edenburgh, wherein were ſummoned the earle of Angus and his brother, the prior of Coldingham, the lord of Wodburne, the lord of Dalehouſie, John Summerwell of Cawdſtreme, and William Cockborne of Langton, with their complices, to make their appearance in the ſaid parlement, to be tried for ſundrie great offenſes by them committed.

Maiſter Gawin Dowglaſſe biſhop of Dunkeld, hearing of this proclamation, fled into England, and remained in London at the Sauoie, where he departed this life, and is buried in the church there. He was a cunning clearke, and a verie good poet: he tranſlated the twelue bookes of the Aeneidos of Virgill in Scotiſh meeter, and compiled alſo The palace of honor, with diuerſe other treatiſes in the Scotiſh language, which are yet extant. The earle of Angus fearing the ſentence of forfalture to be laied againſt him at the parlement, procured his wife (although there was ſmall liking betwixt them) to labor for his pardon to the gouernor. Whereupon it was agreed, that the earle, and his brother George Dowglaſſe ſhould paſſe out of the realme into France, and there to remaine during the gouernors pleaſure: and ſo they departed into France, and remained there all the nert yeere following.

The earle of Angus feareth the ſentence of forfalture.

He and his brother baniſhed.

The king of England, hearing that the duke of Albanie was arriued in Scotland, and had taken the rule vpon him, doubting leaſt he ſhould perſuade the Scotiſhmen to aſſiſt the French king, againſt whome, by perſuaſion of the emperor he ment ſhortlie to make warre, ſent his herald Clarencieux into Scotland, to require the duke to depart from thence, alledging, that it was promiſed by the king of France at the laſt enterview betwixt them, which chanced the ſummer before, that he ſhould not come into Scotland. And moreouer, whereas the king of England was vncle vnto the king of Scots, he conſidered with himſelfe that by nature he was bound to defend his nephue, as he ment to do; and therefore he thought it not reaſon, that the duke being nert to the crowne to ſucceed, if ought came to the yong king, ſhould haue the gouernement of him, leaſt he might be made awaie, as other yong kings had beene. He further complained, that the earle of Angus ſhould be ſent out of the realme, ſo that he could not inioy the companie of his wife, ſiſter vnto the ſame king of England.

Clarencieux an Engliſh herald ſent into Scotland.

The king of England douteth to haue the duke of Albanie gouernor to the king his nephue.

Clarencieux had therefore commandement, that if the duke refuſed to depart out of the realme of Scotland, he ſhould intimate a defiance with open warre againſt him: which the ſaid Clarencieux did, declaring his meſſage vnto the duke from point to point at Hollirod houſe, as he had in commandement. To whome the duke anſwered, that neither the king of France, nor the king of England ſhould ſtaie him from comming into his countrie. And as touching the king, who was as yet young in yeares, he loued him as his ſouereigne lord, and would haue him, and defend both him and his realme againſt all other that would attempt to inuade the ſame, according to his conſcience, honor, and dutie. And as touching the caſtle of Angus, he had died towards him all cleanneſſe and meetnie, notwithſtanding his euill demerits, and that principallie for the queenes cauſe, whome he would honor as mother to his ſouereigne lord. This anſwer being reported vnto the king of England, contented him nothing at all, and therefore prepared to make warre.

1522. The tenth of Aprill, there came ſeuen great ſhips into the Frith, vnto Inchkeith, to haue ſpoiled the ſhips, and inuade the coaſt there: but they were ſo ſtoutlie reſiſted and kept off, that they were not ſuffered to do anie great exploit, and ſo they returned without preie or pelfe. In this ſeaſon, Andrew Foreman biſhop of Saint Andrewes deceaſſed, and biſhop James Beton archbiſhop of Glaſcow, chancellor of Scotland, was removed to Saint Andrewes, & made abbat alſo of Dunfermling, and the archbiſhoprike of Glaſcow was giuen a young man one Gawin Dunbar, that was the kings ſchoolemaiſter. In the moneth of Maie, there was great ado in Edenburgh, by the falling out of the ſeruants of the earles of Murrey and Cuntll, with the ſeruants of the earle of Huntlie, by reaſon whereof, the whole towne fell to partakings; but the duke comming ſuddenlie from the abbeie of Holie rod houſe, ſtaied the matter, and committed the ſaid earles vnto ward within the caſtell.

The emperor commeth into England. Scots and Frenchmen baniſhed out of England. The earle of Shrewſburie murdreth Scotland.

The emperor came into England, and perſuaded the king there to moue warres againſt the French king, and to not onelie the Frenchmen but alſo the Scots were commanded to auoid out of England, their goods confiſcated, and they commanded forth of the land, with a white croſſe ſowed vpon their vppermoſt garment. In Julie, the earle of Shrewſburie was ſent by the king of England into the borders, with commiſſion, to raiſe the power of the moſt parts to inuade Scotland, who vpon the ſunder entered and came to Kelſo, where he burnt one part of the towne, but the borderers of the Mers and Teuidale, not being halfe ſo manie in number as the other, ſet vpon them, ſlue, and tooke manie priſoners, and ſo conſtreined them to returne into England with ſmall honor.

In Thin. Lelleus lib. 9. pag. 400.

The gouernor after this (when he ſaw the Engliſh ouerrun all the borders of Scotland) called a parlement at Edenburgh, the 9 kalends of Auguſt, to raiſe the ſame warre. Beſide this, the French fearing them ſelues (becauſe of a prepared and well furniſhed nauie of the Engliſh which did euerie waie couer and keepe the ſea) ſent manie (and thoſe wiſe and of excellent knowledge) vnto the gouernor, to requeſt him that he would either by counſell perſuade, or by authoritie inforce his Scots to take armes againſt the Engliſh. After which (the matter being with great conſultation and manie reaſons toſſed in argument to and fro) it was decreed by common conſent of the parlement, that a choſen number of ſouldiers ſhould be prepared, to defend the borders from the inuaſion of the enimie, & (the more ſtrongly to repell the Engliſh force) it was concluded, that the children of ſuch as were ſlaine in that expedition, ſhould be freed from all charges or troubles that might light on them during their minoritie: and further, that the wiues of all ſuch which had anie lands (during their liues) fell in that conflict, ſhould after the death of their huſbands keepe the ſame for the terme of fiue yeares.

The duke of Albanie, hearing of the great preparation that the earle of Shrewſburie made, to raiſe an armie of foure foure thouſand men to inuade Scotland, he cauſed (as it was before decreed) ſent vnto all the earles, lords, and nobles of the realme, willing them to raiſe all ſuch power as they could make in defenſe of their countrie, which they did. And ſo being aſſembled, the duke with a mightie armie of Scotiſhmen and certeine Frenchmen, with great artillerie, marched forward till he came to the bordor of Eſke ouer againſt Carlell: and perceiuing that the Engliſh armie came out them forward, he did what he could to perſuade the noble men to enter into England: but as they were in councell togither about that earneſt motion made to them by the duke, a certeine graue perſonage ſaid to them in this maner.

The duke of Albanie raiſeth an armie to inuade England.

The words of a councellor.

My lards, hither we be come by the commandement of my lord gouernor duke of Albanie, and alſo if we be readie to defend our alone native realme, contrarie the inuaſions of our auld enimies of England, yet neuertheleſſe it ſeemeth not guid, nor for the weale of our realme of Scotland, to paſſe within England with our armie to inuade the ſame at this time. And the earneſt perſuaſions quhilk the gouernor makes to vs to do the ſame, proceedes alsmeikle for the pleaſure of France. It appeareth to be ſufficient inough for vs ſo lang as the king our ſouereigne lord is within age to defend our alone realme, and not to inuade: otherwiſe, we may put the haile countrie and nobilitie thereof in hazard of tinſall: for king James the fourth brought the realme of Scotland to the beſt that it euer was, and by the ſame it was brought to the higheſt almoſt that might be: ſo by that warre, was he and his nobilitie ſlaine, quhilk Scotland ſare laments. Wherefore by mine aduiſe, let vs go to the gouernor, and know of him the cauſe why he would perſuade vs to inuade England.

Then they all came to the gouernors tent, and the earle of Arrane, an auncient wiſe man ſpake for them all, and ſaid: My lord gouernor, by your will and commandement, here is aſſembled the maiſt of the nobilitie of Scotland with their power, vpon a pretenſe to enter within England. My lards heare would know the cauſe and quarrell why this warre is begun, gif it might pleaſe your goodneſſe, it ſhould well ſatiſfie their minds. The duke fruited a little ſpace, and ſaid: This queſtion would haif bin demaunded per auin, for well you know, that I for deuie luſe I beare to the realme of Scotland (of the quhilk I haue my name, honor, and lignage) haife paſſed the ſeas from the noble realme of France, into this realme of Scotland. And great cauſe there was for me ſo to do, to bring you to a vnitie, when ye were in diuiſioun, by reaſoun whereof, your realme was like to haue bin conquered and deſtroied. And alſo the king of France, by my ſuites and interceſſioun, will ioine with you in aid againſt the Engliſh nation: and when this warre was determinate in the parlement, you made me capteine, authorizing me to inuade England with banner diſplaied. Then was no demaund made of the cauſe or quarrell, and that I haif done, is by your aſſent and agreement, and that I will iuſtifie. But to anſwer your demaund, me thinke you haif iuſt cauſe to inuade England with fire, ſword, and blood, gif ye be not forgetfull, and without you will beare diſhonor and reproch for euer. For ye know that this realme of Scotland is our inheritance, as a portioun of the world allotted to our nation and anncetors whome we ſucceed. Then where may there be better warre, than

The earle of Arrane declareth to the gouernor the mind of the lords.

The duke anſwer to the earle of Arrane.

"than to mainteine this our naturall inheritance? Is it not dailie ſéene, the great inuaſiouns that the "Engliſhmen on vs make, the great manſlaughters and murders, with theſts and ſpoiles that they do dailie? Is not this one cauſe of warre? To defend "the countrie is the office of a king, the honor of noble men, and the verie ſeruice of chiualrie, and the dutie "naturall of the communaltie: for I thinke it a iuſt quarrell, gif we might conquer the realme of Eng- "laund, and anner it to our owne realme, for the great iniuries and wrongs done by that natioun to vs and "our predeceſſors. For ſéene the begining of our habi- "tatioun in this Ile of Britaine, the Engliſhmen and we haue euer bin enimies, and vs hatſ they euer ha- "ted, and yet haue we euer withſtand them. Suppoſe, we at the laſt battell of Floddoun field by chaunce "loſt our ſouereigne lard, & diuerſe noble men, quhilk was rather by treaſoun of the lard chamberlaine, "than otherwiſe, who would not relieue the kings ar- "mie when he might. And yet I thinke we wan the field, quhilk murder all we noble men ought to re- "uenge. Therefore I wauld that you ſuld couragi- ouſlie aduance your ſelues in this quarrell to get ho- "nor, and to be reuenged.

1522. The replie of a wiſe counſellor.

Then one wiſe man that was preſident of the councell, anſwered the gouernor, ſaieng: My lard, fortune of weir is led by him that all leides, and he ſtriks the ſtrake, we can warke na meracles, & heare "are the lards of Englaund readie to incounter vs. And gif we inuade their realme, ſuerlie they will "fight, for their power ſall increaſe dailie, and ours "will diminiſh. And gif God graunt vs the victorie (as I truſt he ſall) yet haue we not won the field, "for readie comming is the earle of Shrewesburie ſa mikell dread in Fraunce (as ye knaw well) with an "great puiſſant armie, and there is na doubt, but the king of Englaund will ſend or bring another armie "gif we ſuld chance to get the firſt battell. And gif we get the ſecound field, that will not be without great loſſe of manie nobles, by reaſoun whereof, the "realme ſhall be weaker. And gif we be ouercommen how manie ſuld be ſlaine, God knawes. They that "ſée are worthie to be reputed as traitors to the king, and ſo by wilfulneſſe and fule hardineſſe, the realme "may be in ieopardie to be vndone. I ſay, while the king is within age, we aught to moue na weir, leaſt by weir we may bring him to deſtructioun.

The gouernors words to the preſidents replie.

Then ſaid the valiant gouernor: Héere is an puiſſaunt armie of Scotlaund, gif we returne, we ſall incourage our enimies. Therefore ſéene you thinke "it not gude to inuade, my councell is that we campe "ſtill on the bordures, while we ſée what the Engliſh- men pretends to do againſt our relme. To the which the nobles conſented, and laie ſtill there in campe certeine daies after. After this conference had be- twirt the nobles and the gouernor, the quéene as then being not with them, but aduertiſed of all the proceé- dings and determinations, ſent word to the gouer- nor, and deſired him that there might be a treatie of peace had, and ſhe promiſed to get the warden of the Engliſh marches to come to the gouernors campe, vpon pledges, whervnto the gouernor condeſcended.

The lord Da- cres.

Héere vpon, the lord Dacres, warden of the weſt marches of England [with Thomas Mulgraue] came vnto the gouernors campe, and thither alſo at that time was the quéene hir ſelfe come, and ſo vp- on the eleuenth of September, an abſtinence of war was taken and couenanted, that in the meane time the duke and quéene ſhould ſend ambaſſadors into England, to treat and conclude a reſolute peace.

In the moneth of October nert inſuing, there were thrée ambaſſadors ſent into England, accor- ding to the agreement in the laſt treatie, but there were ſo hard and extreame conditions proponed on the king of Englands behalfe, that the ſame could not be accepted, as being contrarie to the honor and weale of the realme of Scotland, as the Scotiſhmen toke the matter. And ſo thoſe ambaſſadors returned without agréement or concluſion of peace: whereu- on followed great trouble betwirt them of the bor- ders of both realmes. The earle of Northumberland was made warden of the whole marches, but ſhortlie after, he began to make ſute to be diſcharged of that office, & ceaſſed not till he obteined it: and then was the earle of Surreie made generall warden, and the lord marqueſſe Dorſet warden of the eaſt & middle marches; the lord Dacres continuing ſtill in his of- fice of wardenſhip ouer the weſt marches.

About the firſt day of March, the ſaid lords came to the borders, about which time, the duke of Albanie conſidering that the warres betwirt Scotland and England were irkſome to the nobles of the realme, becauſe the ſame wars were taken in hand chieflie to ſerue the French kings turne, therefore he paſſed by the weſt ſeas into France. And in the beginning of March, where he was verie hartilie and gladlie re- ceiued of the king, his requeſt was onelie to haue fiue thouſand horſſemen, and ten thouſand footmen of Almains, to be tranſported into Scotland: and doubted not, if he might haue this granted, but that with that power, and the aſſiſtance of the Scots, he ſhould be able to ouerthrow the king of England in battell, or elſe to driue him out of his realme. But the French king neither beléeued this vaine brag, nor yet might ſpare anie ſuch power, hauing warre at that time both againſt England, and the emperor: neuertheleſſe, he promiſed him ſome aid, whereupon the duke abode and waited for the ſame a long ſea- ſon. In the meane while, the lords of Scotland cau- ſed certeine noble men to lie vpon the borders mo- nethlie, in defenſe of the ſame againſt the Engliſh- men, dailie looking for ſupport from France. Euerie companie remained their moneths, and then depar- ted home as the cuſtome is, and thus they continued ſtill till September following. Much hurt was done on either part, and diuerſe houſes were ouerthrowne and deſtroied both in England and Scotland.

The borders watched.

During which time, the king of France prepared certeine ſhips, with men, and munition, to paſſe with the duke of Albanie into Scotland. But the king of England, to catch him by the way, had laid a great nauie of ſhips in the paſe on the ſeas, as he ſhould make his courſe. But the duke embarquing himſelfe with his people at Brell in Britaine, ſai- led by the weſt parts of Scotland: and the one and twentith day of September landed at Kirkowbre in the weſt part of Scotland; he brought with him (beſide a good number of Frenchmen) Richard de la Pole, a man of great parentage, borne in Eng- land, and baniſhed his countrie. Whileſt the duke was on the ſea making ſaile toward Scotland, the earle of Surreie, with an armie of twentie thou- ſand men, entered into Scotland, and comming to Edenburgh, burned the towne and the abbeie. [But Leſleus, lib. 9. pag. 407. ſaith it was Jedworth which the earle burnt.] It was thought they ment to haue paſſed further, but the Scotiſhmen aſſembling themſelues againſt their inuaſions, they were con- ſtreined to returne with loſſe (as ſome Scotiſhmen haue written.)

*In this place, Buchanan (before he commeth to the parlement aſſembled by the duke of Albanie af- ter his returne out of France) writeth in this ſort. We haue ſhewed (ſaieth he) how miſerable the ſtate of Scotland was the laſt ſummer (through the diſ- ſention which was amongeſt the nobilitie) by the Engliſh (with all kind of ſlaughter) ſpoiling the places bordering néere vnto them, and beſetting the the ſea on euerie ſide, whereby we might be out of hope of all forren aid. For the deuiſe of the enimie tended to compell the fierce minds of the Scots (abated with ſuch euils) to conclude a league with him; wherewith the Scots were not behind (by reaſon of the French faction) that by the means of the quéene there might be a perpetuall truce taken betwéene them. For when the lord Hume was (by death) taken away, the Dowglaſſe baniſhed, and all the reſt of the nobilitie rather méet for companions than leaders in battels; ſuch as had withdrawen their mind from the French, applied themſelues to the quéenes faction.

Whereupon ſhe (to gratifie hir brother, and to wreſt all the gouernement into hir owne hands) did (diſſembling hir gréedie deſire to rule) perſuade them, to deliuer their ſonne (almoſt now paſt childiſh yeares) out of the hands of ſtrangers, and themſelues from the yoke of other mens bondage. For the quæne did well foreſée, that preparation and ſuccor was made, and did come againſt hir huſband, whome before ſhe had begun to hate extreamelie. The king of England alſo did commend and prefer to the Scots the counſell of his ſiſter, by manie letters ſent, and with faire promiſes offered; becauſe he had none other mind, but that a perpetuall friendſhip might alwaies remaine betwéene the adioined kingdoms; the which, as he had at other times deſired; ſo now he moſtlie wiſhed it, not for anie commoditie to himſelfe, but to the end that all men might well perceiue that he would imbrace, defend, and aſmuch as reſted within his abilitie, ſéeke the commoditie of his ſiſters ſonne by all the means he might. And if the Scots would perſuade themſelues to breake the league with the French, and ſoine in amitie with the Engliſh; they ſhould ſhortlie well vnderſtand, that the king of England did not ſéeke after ſouereingtie, glorie, power, or honor; but onelie ſtudied for a concord amongſt themſelues, & a league betwéene their nations. For which cauſe, he would beſtow his onelie daughter Marie vpon James the king of Scotland; by which mariage, the Scots ſhould not be ſubiect to the gouernement of England; but contrarie, the Engliſh vnder the rule of the Scots. For by that means, beſides the quenching of great hatred betweene the nations (and intercourſe of merchandize, exchange of mutuall courteſies and ioinings in affinitie) there ſhould be an indiſſoluble knot made for the honor of the whole Iland.

And with this, they (for England) remembred the profit and diſaduantage that might riſe to the one from other, by the friendſhip or hatred of either kingdome, and the benefit that they might looke for from their Engliſh neighbours, more than by anie poſſibilitie they might obteine from their French confederats. For on the one ſide, the Engliſh and they were borne in one continent, brought vp vnder the ſame influence of the heauen, and ſo like in all things, in tong, in maners, in lawes, in decrées, in countenance, in color, and in lineaments of bodie, as that they rather ſéeme one than two nations. On the other ſide, the French are not onelie different from them, by naturall ſoile and clemencie of the heauens; but more ſeuered from them in order and forme of liuing, being further ſuch a people, as if they were enimies vnto them, they could not greatlie hurt them; and if they be their friends they can not greatlie helpe them. But the Engliſh are at hand with men, munition, and monie; when the French, being ſo far off, are onelie with allurements, inforcements, and for their owne commoditie drawen to take their part. Beſides which, there can be no ſuccor from France but by ſea, which the enimie may eaſilie ſtop; and ſo the Scots not able to be ſuccored by them. But from the Engliſh they may haue aid by land with ſpeed, and no man can hinder them thereof. Wherefore they ſhould conſider how diſcommodious (for the diſpatch of their affairs) and how vnapt (for the defenſe of themſelues) it ſhould be, to hang all the hope of their ſuccor vpon the fauor of the wind, and to place the moſt ſuertie of their eſtate in the vnconſtant friendſhip of the vncerteine elements. For (if neuer before) yet at this time the Scots might not onlie perceiue in thought but feele in déed what helpe is to be hoped (in preſent dangers) from abſent friends, when that the Engliſh can not onelie helpe you now, but at this inſtant do alſo kéepe away your promiſed and long expected aid, which they haue ſo beſieged vpon the ſea, that you can receiue no benefit or helpe from them.

After that theſe things were thus laid abroad for the knitting of the Engliſh league, as there were not a few which gaue conſent to that motion, ſo were there manie that ſtiflie argued to the contrarie. For in that aſſemblie, there were manie penſioners of the French faction, who (increaſing their priuat commoditie by the publike detriment) did vtterlie abhor from all peace; beſides whome, there were alſo ſome, which ſuſpected the facilitie of promiſe in the Engliſh: eſpeciallie, ſince the whole eſtate of England did then chiefelie hang vpon the backe of Thomas Wolſeie the cardinall, an euill and ambitious perſon, and who referred all counſels and conſultations to the amplifieng of his owne priuat authoritie and dignitie; and for that cauſe, applied that and all other things to euerie blaſt of fortune. All our men although they were moued by diuerſe reaſons (as the varietie of diuerſe wits bred diuerſe minds) did yet with like endeuor tend vnto one end, which was alwaies to defend the French league; for they denied, that the ſame ſudden liberalitie of the enimie, could anie way ſort to their benefit; ſince this was not the firſt time that the Engliſh had vſed that policie to intrap vnwarie men: as did Edward the firſt, who (ſwearing and binding himſelfe with all bonds of law, when he was choſen an arbitrator to ceaſe the ſtrife of the kingdome of Scotland) did with great iniurie make a king of Scots at his pleaſure: and of late alſo, Edward the fourth king of England (when he had promiſed his daughter Cecilie to the ſonne of James the third) did (the maid being readie for the mariage) diſſolue the ſame, by taking occaſion of warre through our ciuill diſſentions. According to which, the Engliſh do now alſo ſéeke none other matter, than (caſting a vaine hope before vs to gouerne them, to bring vs into right ſeruitude; and (when we are deſtitute of all forren helpe) to oppreſſe vs with all the power of their kingdome.

Neither is that true alſo (wherein the chiefeſt ſtrength of their ſpéech conſiſteth) that the aid of our neighbors néere at hand, is better or ſurer to vs than further friendſhip. For how may we looke for anie good from thoſe our neighbors, ſince commonlie amongeſt neighbors there neuer want occaſions of diſſention; which oftentimes chance bringeth forth, and the ſtronger (hauing ſmall or no occaſion) will manie times ſéeke to offer: at what time, he which is greateſt in armes, muſt & will appoint lawes of agréement as ſéemes beſt to his liking. Beſide, there was neuer yet ſo ſacred or firme a bond of amitie betwéene adioining kingdoms, which was not oftentimes broken, either by offered or ſought occaſions of diſpleaſure & breach: neither is it to be hoped, that the Engliſh will abſteine from offering violence vnto vs; that haue not ſpared the bloud of ſo manie of their owne kings. For the ſanctitie of leagues, & the religion of an oth, and the faith of compacts and

and couenants, are in truth firme bonds of amitie amongeſt the good: but amongeſt the wicked, they are nets to intrap others, if occaſion of commoditie be offered for breach of them. All which benefits and iniuries, do dwell in people, whome neereneſſe of bounds, conuerſation of language, and not vnlike maner of life hath ioined togither.

And if all theſe things ſhould be far otherwiſe, yet there be two things which we ought ſpeciallie to foreſee and prouide for; whereof, the one is, that we ſpend not our time in vaine by chiding and diſagreement, as perſons drawen into diuerſe factions; the other, that we reiect not our old friends (for this new alliance) before we haue heard what they can ſay; eſpeciallie in ſuch a cauſe (as this) which may not be determined, but by the conſent of the parlement. Vpon which, the French followers did earneſtlie ſtand, that there ſhould not anie thing be done therein; and therefore ſent certeine of the French aid as ambaſſadors about the cauſe. This thus ended, and the comming of the gouernour ſpread abroad, the ſame made manie glad, confirmed the doubtfull thereof, and withdrew others (that were inclined to the Engliſh part) from the ſame opinion they were of.]

The duke immediatlie after his arriuall came to Edenburgh, where he cauſed all the lords of the realme to aſſemble in that towne, where he declared the great loue and affection that the king of France bare to the realme of Scotland, inſomuch as hearing of the ſlaughters, murthers and burnings, practiſed by the Engliſhmen, he thought that he felt the ſame done vnto him, reputing himſelfe one of their members. And for reuenging thereof, he would bee partner with them as their member: for more credit whereof, he ſhewed the kings letter, confirming his declaration. He therefore exhorted them to aſſemble an armie, in reuenge of iniuries & wrongs done to them and their countrie; for he had brought with him monie, men, and artillerie to the furtherance thereof. Herevpon it was concluded, that the armie ſhould aſſemble at Dowglas dale the eighteenth of October: the which concluſion they kept, and from thence they marched to Caldſtreame vpon Tweed, and ſent ouer the water certeine of their great artillerie, with a companie of Frenchmen and Scots, by the guiding of Dauid Car; and being got ouer, they lay ſiege to the caſtell of Warke, which was kept by ſir William Liſle capteine thereof, hauing with him a ſtrong garriſon of Engliſh ſouldiors, and great prouiſion of artillerie, and all things neceſſarie: yet at the firſt aſſault, the vtter barnekin was woone, and the ſaid companie of Scotiſhmen and Frenchmen lay within the ſame, indamaging the caſtell in all they might.

The earle of Surrie and diuerſe others of the Engliſh nobilitie, with an armie of fortie thouſand men, were at Anwike, not far diſtant from Warke, and the marqueſſe Dorſet was ſent with a great companie to keepe the towne of Berwike, for doubt leaſt the ſame ſhould haue béene beſieged. Alſo in the meane time, a new aſſault was made to the inner barnekin of Warke, and the ſame woone likewiſe as the other had béene before. After this was the caſtell aſſailed, and part of it beaten downe with the artillerie lieng on the Scotiſh ſide of the water of Tweed. At which breach, the aſſault was giuen, and the ſame continued, till that through darkneſſe and lacke of light, the aſſailants were driuen to retire. Great ſlaughter was made at that aſſault on both ſides, but eſpeciallie of them within the houſe. The aſſailants ment to haue giuen a freſh aſſault the next day, being the fourth of Nouember: but a ſore and vehement ſtorme and tempeſt of raine chanced that night, ſo that they were conſtreined to leaue off that enterpriſe, and to get themſelues ouer the riuer againe vnto the armie, leaſt by the riſing of the water of Tweed, they might haue béene cut off by their enimies, before they could haue bæne ſuccoured.

Warke aſſaulted.

The Scots and French retire backe ouer the water.

In the meane time, whileſt this ſiege continued, a number of Scotiſhmen made a road into the countrie of Glendale within the Engliſh marches, and burnt and ſpoiled diuerſe townes, caſt downe ſundrie piles, and returned without anie reſiſtance: for the earle of Surrie would ſuffer none of his people to depart from the armie, nor breake order, for feare of more inconuenience. The duke of Albanie lieng on the Scotiſh ſide of Tweed, ſent an herald vnto the earle of Surrie, willing him to call to remembrance, how in his abſence he had inuaded Scotland with fire and ſword: for the which cruell dealing, he required him vpon his honor to come forward, and he would meet him in the confines of both the realmes, and giue him battell. To the which meſſage the earle anſwered, that he had no commiſſion to inuade Scotland at that time, but it onlie to defend. And (as ſome haue reported) he cauſed a ſecret meſſenger to paſſe to the queene, as then lieng a good way diſtant from the armie, to moue for ſome abſtinence and truce, and further to perſuade the duke to retire home; which he did, ſo that by hir labor, a truce was taken for that inſtant, and afterward confirmed for a longer time: and thus the duke returned with honor (as the Scotiſhmen report.) This truce was well kept all the nert winter following, and no inuaſion made, till the moneth of Maie: and then was the erle of Surrie ſent againe to the Engliſh borders, and the lords of Scotland on the other part monethlie laie on their borders by quarters, for defenſe of their countrie, as the vſe is.

On Trinitie ſunndaie, being the one and twentith of Maie, fiue hundred Scots entered England, to ſurpriſe the Engliſh merchants, and others, going that day vnto Berwike, where yerelie on that day the faire is kept; and ſo by reaſon therof, they met with diuerſe of them that went to this faire, and tooke to the number of two hundred priſoners, whom they led with them into Scotland. But Hall ſaith, that by the comming of the yong lord of Fulberie to the ſuccors of the Engliſhmen, the Scots were chaſed, and loſt two hundred of their numbers. On the firſt of Julie, ſir William Fenwike, Leonard Vulgraue, & Baſtard Heron, with diuers other, to the number of nine hundred Engliſhmen, entred into the Mers, and began to ſpoile and rob the countrie: but they were ſhortlie compaſſed about with Scotiſhmen, & ſo hardlie aſſailed, that although they fought valiantlie a good while, yet by fine force they were compelled to giue ground, and ſeeke to ſaue themſelues by flight, in which two hundred of them were taken priſoners, and Baſtard Heron with diuerſe other ſlaine. Amongeſt the priſoners, were ſir Rafe Fenwike, Leonard Vulgraue, and diuers other gentlemen of good calling.

On the ſeuententh of Julie, the lord Marwell, and ſir Alexander Jordein, with diuerſe other Scotiſhmen in great numbers, entred England at the weſt marches by Caerleill, with diſplaied banners, and began to harrie the countrie, and burne diuers places. The Engliſhmen aſſembled on euerie ſide, ſo that they were farre more in number than the Scotiſhmen, and therevpon ſet fiercelie vpon their enimies, inſomuch that for the ſpace of an houre, there was a ſore fight continued betwixt them. But the lord Marwell like a right politike capteine (as of all that knew him he was no leſſe reputed) ceaſſed not to incourage his people; & after that, by the taking of

In aſſemblie of the lords.

After this iourneie, there was an aſſemblie of the lords in Edenburgh, with the duke of Albanie, where ſome of the lords were of mind that the warre ſhould continue: other thought it not reaſon, that for the pleaſure onelie of France, the realme ſhould ſuſteine ſuch damage, as it had done by thoſe three laſt yéeres wars now paſſed, and therefore they perſuaded peace. Moreouer, there was alſo much debating of the matter, touching the age and gouernement of the king; ſome of the lords holding that he was now of age to take the rule vpon himſelfe, and that the gardianſhip or tutorie of a king expired ſoner than of another priuate perſon. The duke of Albanie perceiuing how the lords were diuided amongeſt themſelues, and neither content with his gouernement, nor willing to mainteine the warres which he had ſo earneſtlie perſuaded for the pleaſure of France, hée declared to them that he wold returne into France, and ſo taking his leaue of the nobilitie, went to Striueling where the king was, of whome he tooke leaue, alſo giuing vnto him ſuch louing and faithfull counſell, as to his knowledge ſéemed expedient, and ſo went into the weſt countrie, where he tooke the ſeas in September, and ſailed forth into France, [neuer to returne into Scotland.]

The duke of Albanie returneth into France. Fr. Thin.

The king of England [before the rumor of the departure of the duke of Albanie] hauing in the moneth of June ſent ouer into France, vnto Archembald earle of Angus, that remained there vpon the commandement of the duke of Albanie, perſuaded him to come from thence ſecretlie into England, which accordinglie he did; and being ſafelie arriued in England, king Henrie procured him to paſſe into Scotland, that with the aſſiſtance of ſuch lords as would be readie to take his part, he might raiſe war againſt the duke of Albanie, which ſought by all meanes (as the king of England was informed) to deſtroie him & his: but yet the earle could come into Scotland, the duke was departed toward France. On the ſix and twentith of Julie, the king by the aduiſe of his mother, and certeine yoong lords, came from Striueling vnto Edenburgh; and three daies after, the quéene tooke the whole gouernment of the king vpon hir, and entered into the caſtell of Edenburgh with the king, where they ſoiourned the moſt part of the next winter. The prouoſt of Edenburgh was diſcharged, whom the towne had choſen, and the lord Marwell was appointed by the queene, prouoſt in his place. For the performance wherof, there was a parlement alſo ſummoned to be holden at Edenburgh the third day of Februarie next inſuing [and the biſhop of ſaint Andrews and Aberden (as ſaith Buchanan li. 14.) were caſt into priſon, who after gathering armes (and curſſing all others) within the ſpace of a moneth following were reconciled to the king.]

The king of England glad to beare that the duke of Albanie was departed into France, ſent into Scotland in ambaſſage one maiſter Iohn Magnus, and Roger Ratcliffe eſquier, to declare vnto the quéene and lords, that he would be content that a truce might be accorded betwixt the two realmes of England and Scotland, now that the duke of Albanie was returned into France, who had beene the onlie procurer of the warres. Herevpon they agréed to take truce to indure for one yéere, and in the meane time they appointed to ſend ambaſſadors into England to treat vpon a continuall peace, alliance, and amitie to be had betwixt both the realmes. In this meane while, the earle of Angus came into Scotland: and bicauſe of the diſpleaſure which the quéene bare him, there inſued occaſions of great diuiſions within the realme. Notwithſtanding the quéene by aduiſe of certeine lords, ſent the lord Gilbert earle of Caſſels, Robert Cockeborne biſhop of Dunkeld, and doctor Mille abbat of Cambuſkenneth, ambaſſadors into England, in the moneth of December; the which were receiued at Gréenewich by the king of England the foure and twentith of the ſame moneth: where the biſhop of Dunkeld made an eloquent oration in Latine, declaring the cauſe of their comming, the which in effect was for intreatment of peace, loue, and amitie betwixt the two realmes: and for the more ſure eſtabliſhment thereof, they required that a mariage might be concluded betwixt their king & the ladie Marie, daughter to the king of England.

Ambaſſadors into England

This requeſt was well heard by the king, who thereupon appointed commiſſioners to common thereof with the ſaid ambaſſadors. Diuerſe articles were propoſed by the ſaid commiſſioners on the king of England his behalfe, and in eſpeciall one; which was, that the king of Scotland ſhould renounce the league with the king of France; and that further he ſhould come into England, and remaine there till he came to perfect age to be maried. Bicauſe the ambaſſadors had not commiſſion to conclude ſo farre, the earle of Caſſels returned into Scotland, to vnderſtand the minds of the lords and councell in theſe points, the other remaining at London till his returne to them againe. * Vpon All ſaints day there was a great motion of wind, with ſuch ſtormes and tempeſts of thunder and lightning which ſuddenlie aroſe, that the ſame (ouerthrowing manie priuat houſes in Edenburgh, and the pinacle of the tower of Dauid in the ſame caſtell) entered into the quéenes lodging with a great flame, which burnt ſo vehementlie, and went ſo farre, that it had almoſt conſumed the ſame; which ſtorme (ouerthrowing the buildings about the chamber of the biſhop of Whitchurch) the biſhops lodging did yet remaine ſafe not touched with the violence of the flame.)

Candida Caſa.

When the day of the parlement appointed to be holden in the Tolbuith of Edenburgh was come, the king, queene, and lords, fearing ſome tumult in the towne to be raiſed by the earle of Angus, would not paſſe forth of the caſtell, but kept the parlement within the ſame. Archembald Douglaſſe earle of Angus, and Iohn Steward earle of Lennor, with diuerſe others, to the number of two thouſand men, came in the night ſeaſon vnto Edenburgh, bicauſe they durſt not enter the towne in the day time, for feare of the gunnes that laie in the caſtell. The next day, being the fourteenth day of Februarie, the ſaid earles with the archbiſhop of ſaint Andrews, the biſhop of Aberden, that by the quéenes appointment had béene kept before in ward, the biſhop of Dublane, Calene Campbell, the earle of Argile, and diuerſe other lords and barons being in the towne, ſent to the caſtell, alledging that the king was kept as priſoner by the queene, and iuſtice ſuppreſſed, with great damage of the common wealth; and therefore he deſired, that the king might be deliuered vnto them, to be gouerned by the aduiſe of the three eſtates, and if they refuſed to deliuer him, they would beſiege the caſtell, and if they wan it, all their liues within ſhould reſt at their pleaſures, the kings onelie excepted.

The quéene, by the counſell of the earles of Arrane and Murrey, refuſed not onelie to deliuer the king, but ſent them word, that except they did depart the towne, they would ſuerlie diſcharge all the artillerie artillerie of the caſtell againſt them. Hereupon, great feare roſe in the towne, ſpeciallie among the burgeſſes, but by the diligence of certeine perſons that trauelled betweene the parties, an aſſurance was taken on either ſide for certeine daies. In the meane time, the earle of Angus cauſed the caſtell to be forſet, that neither meat nor other thing might be ſuffered to be conueied into it, except ſo much as might ſerue for the ſuſtentation of the kings owne perſon. At length, all the parties were agreed, ſo that the foure and twentith day of Februarie, the king came vnto the parlement holden in the Tolbuith in moſt honorable wiſe, with the aſſiſtance of all the eſtates, hauing the crowne, ſcepter, and ſword borne before him, and from thence he was brought to the abbeie, where he remained.

He forſetteth the caſtell of Edenburgh.

The parties are agreed.

In this parlement, there were eight lords choſen to be of the kings priuie councell, the which toke the gouernement of the king and realme vpon them, as theſe: the archbiſhops of ſaint Andrews and Glaſcow, the biſhops of of Aberden and Dublane: the earles of Angus, Argile, Arrane, and Lennor: the queene was adioined to them as principall, without whoſe aduiſe nothing ſhould be done. From this parlement alſo was the earle of Caſſels ſent, with anſwer to the king of England; who came to London the nintéenth of March. But bicauſe the king had knowledge that the French king was taken at the battell of Pauie, he would not proceed in the treatie of mariage betwixt the king of Scotland and his daughter, till he had the emperors aduiſe, whome he affirmed to be his confederat friend: and ſo renewing the truce for three yéers and ſix moneths, the ambaſſadors returned into Scotland about the beginning of Aprill next inſuing, without anie contract of mariage at that time. The agréement betwixt the queene and lords continued not long, for anon after died the biſhop of Dublane or Dunkeld (as ſaith Leſleus) whoſe benefice the earle of Angus obteined of the king for his brother William Dowglas, without the aduiſe of the queene and other lords. Whereupon the quéene departed and went vnto Striueling, leauing the king with the eale of Angus, who toke the whole rule and gouernment of the realme and king vpon him, and made his vncle Archembald Dowglas treaſuror of the realme, and beſtowed benefices, offices, and all other things, by the aduiſe of his brother George Dowglas, and the earle of Lennor, who aſſiſted him.

Leſleus lib. 9. pag. 417.

In this meane time, the archbiſhop of ſaint Andrewes, and the earles of Arrane, Argile, and Purrey, remaining with the quéene at Striueling, alledged that the king was withholden from them by the earle of Angus ſore againſt his will: and therefore they ſent vnto the earle, requiring him to deliuer him. But the earle cauſed the king to giue the anſwer himſelfe, that he would not come from the erle of Angus, albeit he would gladlie haue beene out of his hands if he might; as by ſecret meſſages ſent to ſundrie of the lords, and likewiſe at that time it appéered, for he willed them by priuie meanes to aſſemble an armie, and to come & fetch him out of their hands that thus deteined him. Hereupon ſhortlie after, they raiſed a power, and comming therewith to Linlithgew, purpoſing to paſſe into Edenburgh, that they might get the king out of the earle of Angus his hands: the ſaid earle, with the earle of Lennor and other his aſſiſtants being thereof aduertiſed, came to the field with the kings banner diſplaied, and brought the king with him, although partlie againſt his will.

The king not in his owne power.

The quéne mother in armes.

The queene and ſuch lords as were with hir there in the armie, for the reuerence they bare vnto the kings perſon, and alſo fearing the danger that might chance to them if they buckled togither in a foughten field, they withdrew themſelues to Striueling, and from thence the quéene went into Purrey land with the earle of Purrey, and there remained a long time after. The earles of Arrane and Argile went into the weſt countrie, and the biſhop of ſaint Andrews to Dumbarmling: and then the earle of Angus toke vpon him more boldlie the gouernment of the king and realme, and ſent to the biſhop of ſaint Andrews (who was chancellor) for the great ſeale, which was deliuered to them that were ſo ſent for it. The nobles of the realme remaining thus at variance, and diuided among themſelues, there was ſmall obedience of lawes & iuſtice. Diuerſe ſlaughters in ſundrie parts were committed, great theefts & robberies made by the borderers vpon the inland countries. Moreouer, a diuorſe this yére (as ſome haue ſaid) was ſued before the archbiſhop of S. Andrews, betwixt thequéene, and the earle of Angus hir huſband, and then afterwards ſhe toke to huſband one Henrie Steward, ſonne to the lord of Auendale, the which Henrie was after created by the king lord of Methwen.

On the foure and twentith of Julie, the king being accompanied with the earle of Angus, the lord Hume, the Barres & others, rode vnto Jedburgh, in purpoſe to haue reformed the miſgouernance of the borderers; but after that they had remained there three daies with little obedience ſhewed towards them, they all returned. And vpon the 29 day of Julie, at the bridge of Melroſſe, the lard of Boclouth, accompanied with a thouſand horſſemen, began to ſhew himſelfe in ſight, whoſe principall purpoſe was to haue taken the king from the earle of Angus and his aſſiſtants, being requeſted and commanded by the king himſelfe ſo to do. The earle of Angus incontinentlie ſent an herald vnto the lard of Boclough, to know what his intention was to do; who anſwered, that he came to do the king honor and ſeruice, and to ſhew his friends and power as the vſe is of the borderers.

The lard of Boclough his enterpriſe, to take the king from the earle of Angus.

The earle of Angus, with the lord Hume, and the reſt, not being content with this anſwer, becauſe of the great feud betwixt him and the Humes, and the Kars, ſent vnto him a commandement in the kings name to depart, and not to approch néere to the kings preſence, vnder paine of high treaſon. Whervnto he anſwered, that he knew the kings mind well inough & would not ſpare for this commandement to come to his graces preſence. Which anſwer receiued from him, incontinentlie the earle of Angus, the lords Fleming and Hume, the Kars, the lard of Seſſeford, with their friends, alighted on foot; the king remaining on horſbacke, accompanied with the earle of Lennor, the lord Parwell, George Dowglaſſe, and Ninian Creichton, tutor of Sainquhar.

The lard of Boclough lighted alſo on foot, but becauſe the moſt part of his men were of the theeues and outlawes of the borders, commonlie called broken men, vpon their firſt comming to ioining with their ſpeares, they fled, leauing the lard of Boclough with a ſmall number of his owne ſeruants about him in all the danger: yet they defended themſelues verie manfullie, and ſlue the lard of Seſſeford and diuerſe other, on the earle of Angus his ſide: but finallie, oppreſſed with multitude, they were put to flight, and foure ſcore of Boclowghes men ſlaine in the chaſe. After this, the king returned to Jedburgh, and remained there the ſpace of foure daies, and then returned to Edenburgh.

The lard of Boclough put to flight.

All this while, the king was gouerned and holden againſt his will, by the earle of Angus and his aſſiſters, although he did not outwardlie ſhew ſo in countenance, but diſſembled the matter as well as he might, might, yet perceiuing two enterpriſes to haue quailed that had béene attempted for his deliuerance, he thought to aſſaie the third; and héerevpon, procured the earle of Lennox to aſſemble an armie, with aſſiſtance of the quéene and hir friends, to helpe to deliuer him from the hands of his enimies. The earle of Lennox did ſo, and came with ſuch power as he could raiſe from the weſt parts vnto Linlithgo. The earle of Angus being aduertiſed, that the earle of Lennox was gathering men, ſent to the earle of Arrane for aid, requiring him to come with ſuch power as he could make, and to méet him at Linlithgo. The earle of Arrane immediatlie héerewith gathered a power, and with the ſame came to Linlithgo before the earle of Lennox came thither, who ſhortlie after comming with his people, approched that towne, vnto whome the earle of Arrane ſent a meſſenger, requiring him to turne and ſaue his enterpriſe, aſſuring him, that albeit he was his ſiſters ſonne, he would not ſpare him, if he held forward vpon his iournie. The earle of Lennox héerewith anſwered in a great rage, that he would not ſtaie, till he came to Edenburgh, or elſe die for it by the waie. The earle of Arrane therefore not ſtaieng for the earle of Angus his comming from Edenburgh, iſſued forth of Linlithgo at the weſt end of the towne, and incountered the earle of Lennox and his companie, where there was a cruell onſet giuen on both ſides, but ſuddenlie the earle of Lennox his companie fled, and he himſelfe with the lord of Hunſton and diuerſe other gentlemen were ſlaine.

The earle of Lennox ſlaine

Fr. Thin. Buchan. lib. 14.

*The death of which Dowglas the king did greatlie lament, and hearing the clamor and noiſe that was made in that conflict, did ſend forth (but all to late) Andrew Wood (his familiar) to haue ſuccored the Lennox, if by anie meanes he could. After this victorie, the faction of the Dowglaſſes (to the end that ſtriking a feare in thoſe that were enuious againſt them, they might make them alwaies to be in danger to them) began to moue queſtions and ſutes in law, againſt ſuch as had borne armor againſt the king: for feare whereof ſome bought their peace with monie, ſome toke part with the Dowglaſſes, ſome followed the Hamiltons, and ſome ſtiflie ſtanding in the matter, were followed and called into the law. Of which number Gilbert earle of Caſſiles (when he was earneſtlie preſſed by James Hamilton the baſtard, to yéeld himſelfe to the part of the Hamiltons) being a man of great ſtomach, gaue this anſwer, that the old league of friendſhip, which was betwéene their grandfathers (in which his grandfather was alwaies the more honorable and firſt named) ſhould not make him now ſo forgetfull of the honor of his familie, that he would ſéeme to degenerat from his anceſtors, and willinglie grant to be vnder defenſe (which is the nert degrée of ſeruitude) of them, whoſe head in making an equall league and couenant was contented with the ſecond place of honor.

Wherefore, when the ſaid Gilbert appéered in the law at the day appointed, for the deciding of his cauſe: Hugh Kennedie his kinſman anſwered for him, that he was preſent in that battell, as ſent thither by the king, and not as enimie to the king, and he would (if néed required) bring forth the kings letters therfore, notwithſtanding the Hamiltons frowning and fretting againſt his boldneſſe: for the king had written as well to Gilbert (going home) as to manie others, to ioine with John Steward earle of Lennox, who ſéeing the battell at hand, and that he had not time left to call togither his friends and followers, did with his preſent companie (taking his iournie out of the waie) turne to Striueling. Wherfore (the power of the Hamiltons in that cauſe ſomewhat ſuppreſſed) James Hamilton the baſtard ſtirred with great hatred againſt Kennedie, did procure Hugh Campbell ſhiriffe of Aire to diſpatch him out of the waie, which he ſhortlie after did in his returne home. Afterward this Hugh, to the end he might diſſemble his conſcience or knowledge of this euill (the execution wherof he had committed to his fellowes) was remaining at the day and time of the ſame murther, with John Areſkine, whoſe ſiſter was the wife of Gilbert Kennedie.

The death of the earle of Caſſiles.

But ſhe (as ſoone as ſhe heard of that déed) did with manie bitter words lay the fault vnto him, becauſe by that fact the noble houſe of the Kennedies had almoſt béene brought to vtter ſubuerſion, had he not left a yoong ſonne behind him. This yoong earle, after the death of his father, fled to his kinſman Archembald Dowglaſſe then the kings treaſuror, to whome he committed the defenſe of himſelfe and his familie. This done, Hugh Campbell was called into law for the ſaid déed, who being manifeſtlie convicted thereof, was baniſhed into an other place. Neither did the Dowglaſſes with leſſe bitternelle exerciſe their anger againſt James Beton, for bringing their power to ſaint Andrewes, which they ſpoiled, as after appéereth.)

In the meane time, the earle of Angus bringing the king with him, arriued, and had come to the battell, but that the king was not willing to come forth of Edenburgh in that quarrell (as ſome haue written) and therefore made excuſes, as he did alſo by the waie, fained himſelfe ſicke: but George Dowglas droue and called vpon his horſſe verie sharpelie, and conſtreined him to ride forth with faſter paſe than he would haue done, giuing him manie iniurious words, which he remembred afterwards, and would not forget them. They went that night to Striueling, and ſhortlie after paſſed through Fife, ſearching for the quéene, and the biſhop of ſaint Andrewes; and becauſe they were kept ſecretlie in their friends houſes, ſo that they could not be heard of, they ſpoiled the abbeie of Dunfirmeling, and the caſtell of ſaint Andrewes, taking awaie all the moueables which the archbiſhop had within the ſame.

The quéene ſought for.

*In the north parts alſo, the two families of the Leſlées and the Forboiſes, intangled with mutuall hatred, raiſed great flames of tumults and parts taking: which enimities did after grow to be the greater, becauſe there were dailie manie ſlaughters of the nobles & other people committed in War, Garreoth, and Aberden, whileſt ech faction labored to defend it ſelfe againſt the others. For which cauſe (when the common-wealth was much deformed thereby, and all iuſtice ſeemed almoſt vtterlie ouerthrowne in thoſe parts) the earle of Angus and other of the nobilitie (which were of the kings priuie councell) did not ceaſſe, vntill they had made vnitie betwéene thoſe two families. But in the end (the heire of the Forboiſes, & the lord Lenturke, hauing by wait killed the noble baron Meldrume, which fauored the Leſlées) thoſe buried contentions began againe to be raiſed from the dead; whoſe enimities being once againe knowne to the nobilitie (and what hurt might inſue thereof to the common ſtate) they attempted all poſſible meanes once more to quench that deadlie flame, and afreſh to ioine their minds togither in amitie, with this prouiſo, that the murtherers of Meldrume ſhould (for puniſhment of their offenſe) be baniſhed into France, where the greateſt part of them died, after manie miſeries and reproches ſuſteined in their pitifull life. Which laſt league ſo ſincerelie vnited betwéene the Forboiſes and the Leſlées, was imbraced with ſuch faith ech to other, by renewing thereof with continuall mariages & other courteſies, that it continueth moſt firme euen vnto this day.

In which north parts alſo, the inhabitants (partlie following their naturall diſpoſition, and partlie excited by the example of the former times long ſuffered ſo to be vſed) did in like ſort ouerrun and ſpoile all things, by reaſon of ouermuch libertie. But of all other ſturs raiſed in thoſe parts, that was the greateſt and moſt troubleſome, which was raiſed by the Makintoſches. Of which vnrulie people, the one familie was called the Glenchattens, and the other was ſurnamed Makintoſches after the head of that kindred; in which, the chiefe was called Lachlane Makintoſche a man of great poſſeſſions, and of ſuch excellencie in ſingularitie of wiſedome, that with great commendation he did conteine all his followers within the limits of their dueties, more than others did. Which conſtreints (when they could hardlie beare (as loth to liue in order) hauing ſo long paſſed their time licentiouſlie) did withdraw the hearts of manie men from him. Amongeſt whome was James Malcolmeſon his kinſman (who thirſting after the deſire to rule) toke occaſion (by the iniurie of the time) traitorouſlie with deceipt to kill this Makintoſche; after which (fearing further trouble to inſue towards him) he flieth to the Ile (at the lake Rothmurcoſſie) as a ſanctuarie or defenſe for him. But the reſt of the familie of the Makintoſches did purſue him with ſuch eager minds, that by force taking him in the Ile, they worthilie killed him, and manie of his confederats, guiltie of that wickednelle. After which (becauſe the ſonne of Makintoſche, for his tender yeares, was not ſufficient with feare & puniſhment to bridle the minds of his fierce ſubiects) by common conſent they choſe the baſtard brother of the ſlaine man (called Hector Makintoſche) to be head and leader of that familie, vntill this yoong nephue might grow to yéeres, and might wéeld the gouernement of his owne tribe.

Rothmurcoſſie

New tumults in that familie.

Now when when the earle of Murreie perceiued that if the ſonne of Makintoſche were committed to the raſhneſſe of a people ſomewhat fierce and cruell, that he ſhould (on euerie ſide) be oppreſſed with manie troubles, he did moſt godlie (for the care he had of him his nephue being his ſiſters ſonne) prouide, that he ſhould be caried to an other place, to the Dgiluies, the childs kin on the mothers ſide, where he ſhould be well inſtructed and imbued with the precepts of all learning and vertue. Whereat Hector was greatlie offended, to ſée that the child ſhould ſo ſubtilie be taken from him. Wherefore (affirming that much of his authoritie was thereby diminiſhed) he attempted (euerie way he might) to get the child againe into his poſſeſſion, that thereby he might ſaiue and recouer his credit and authoritie. But ſome there were, which ſuppoſed that the great care and labor which he ſo much employed (for getting the child into his hands) was to none other intent, but that he might make him waie, and prepare a path whereby to lead his owne ſonne to the gouernement of that familie. Which conceipt being déeplie grauen in the mind of the earle of Murreie, cauſed him to ſéeke the preſeruation of the child, that by no means he might fall into the hands of Hector.

Wherewith Hector being highlie incenſed (and determining to ſpue out his choler, ſéeking reuenge by anie kind of means) he did cauſe his brother William & other of his kindred, that ioining their force, they might ſtronglie ver the earle of Murreie, and ſpoile his poſſeſſions: which they did with ſo great furie, that ouerthrowing the fort of Dikes, and beſieging the caſtell of Tornewaie, they executed manie cruelties, ſlaughters, ſpoiles, burnings, and other miſchiefes vpon all ſorts of people, men, women, and children, and all ſuch as fauored them. For their hatred not limited againſt the earle of Murreie, extended further againſt the familie of the Dgiluies, amongeſt whome the child was left in cuſtodie for educations cauſe. With which mind this Hector and his complices placing their campe at the caſtell of Pettens, which belonged to the lord of Durnens (one of the familie of the Dgiluies) they did ſo furiouſlie beſiege the ſame, as the people of the ſame were in the end forced to yéeld the fort: which when they had entred, they killed foure and twentie of the Dgiluies, whom they found therein. Wherupon (their minds being now aduanced with ſpoiles and happie ſucceſſes) they became ſo proud, as (truſting ouermuch to proſperous euent in all their actions) they neuer ſet end to their wicked crueltie, vntill the erle of Murreie did with force execute iuſt iudgement vpon them. For when the earle beheld them immoderatlie reioiſing, in ſpoiling his lands, and committing other exceſſiue euils; he obteined of the king and his councell, that he might be made the kings deputie and gouernor in that battell, to bridle the rage and boldneſſe of thoſe in that order ſpoiling the common-wealth.

Wherefore the earle aſſembling an armie, did with ſuch ſpædie valure come vpon them and their countrie, that at the firſt he toke almoſt two hundred of their capteins, and committed them to the gallowes. All whoſe faith was ſo true to their capteine, as (when life was ſcuerallie promiſed to euerie one man as he was alone lead to the gallowes) there would not anie one of them confeſſe where their capteine Hector had hidden himſelfe. For euerie one anſwered (with bold ſpirit) that they knew not where he was become; and if ſo be they did, that yet they would not (by anie paine or terror of death) be induced to breake their faith and to betraie their maiſter. But hanging not being thought a ſufficient reuenge (for ſuch capteins as the earle had taken) there were more grieuous puniſhments laid vpon William Makintoſche (brother to Hector) becauſe in the beginning he nouriſhed thoſe coles of choler for his brothers cauſe. For after that this William was hanged, his head was chopped off and faſtned vpon a pole at Dikes, and the other foure parts of his bodie were ſent to the townes of Elgin, Forreſſe, Inuerneſſe, and Alderne, there to be ſet vp publikelie to the reproch of them, and the example of others.

Wonderfull faith of euill men to their capteine.

Now, after all theſe ſturs, Hector (ſéeing his men were thus diſperſed and executed, and that himſelfe was excluded from anie other ſuccor) fled to the faithfull helpe of Alexander Dunbar deane of Murreie, by whoſe aduiſe he goeth humblie and ſecretlie to the king, beſeeching his mercie and fauor to be extended vnto him: for he ſuppoſed it better, rather to craue the doubtfull mercie of his lord, than to make triall of the earle of Murreis certeine reuenge. Wherevpon the king (ſéeing his humble ſubmiſſion) receiued him into his fauor; and did with all his heart louinglie after embrace him, becauſe he was valiant and wiſe in warre, and in counſell. But God, whoſe iuſtice is alwaies ſhewed in puniſhing of wickednelle, would not ſuffer this filthineſſe of crueltie, theft, murther, & ſpoile (wherewith Hector did wickedlie defile his life) to go vnreuenged with moſt grieuous paine vpon the ſaid Hector. For in the citie of ſaint Andrews, ſudden death (than which there can be no greater puniſhment) was laid vpon him by one James Spenſe a prieſt, who was himſelfe afterwards beheaded.

The familie of Makintoſche raiſe ſeditions.

When the earle of Murreie had ſhewed ſuch reuenge vpon the friends of Hector and their companions; the people of the prouince of Glencatten did from thenceforth keepe themſelues within the limits of their duetie: vntill that the ſonne of Lachlane lane Makintoſche came to mans eſtate and full age. Which yong man was in his firſt yeares imbued with ſuch learnings and policie of life conformed therevnto, that when he was imploied about the common-wealth; all the capteins of them (who naturallie ſpeake Iriſh in the furtheſt part of Scotland) did embrace him as a perfect paterne of all vertue, and an excellent workemaiſter to frame a well ordered ſtate. Wherefore certeine (not able to ſuſteine the brightneſſe of his vertue) did ſoine in counſell with ſuch as were néereſt of blond vnto him, and had before laid violent hands on his father, to take his life away by forceable means. Whereof we ſhall more liberallie intreat in an other place.]

This yeare the king by counſell of the earle of Angus, Arrane, and others, went with eight thouſand men vnto Jedburgh, to ſet ſome order amongeſt the borderers, for the kéeping of better rule: and ſo on the eight of June, the principals of all the ſurnames of the clans on the borders, came to the king, binding themſelues, and deliuering pledges for their good demenors. The ſeuenteenth of Julie, there was 1527. Leſle. a great aſſemblie of the lords at Holie rood houſe, at what time, there came a ſimple fellow (to looke vpon) ſeruant and horſkeeper ſometime to the earle of Lennor, who in the midſt of a great companie of people in the abbeie cloſe, ſtrake ſir James Hamilton knight verie deſperatlie with a ſhort prage or dagger in the bellie thrée ſeuerall ſtripes vp to the haft, and yet the ſaid ſir James died not of thoſe hurts. Sir James Hamilton hurt by a deſperat perſon.

The man being taken, by & by confeſſed the déed " without repentance, ſaieng; Fy on the feeble hand " quilke wald not dow that thing the heart thought, and " was determinat to dow. And being inquired what he was, and who cauſed him to dow the ſame; he anſwered that he was a ſeruant of God, ſent by him to dow that déed. And albeit he was put to great torture and paines dailie by the ſpace of a moneth, yet would he neuer giue other anſwer, and ſo he was hanged, and his head ſet ouer one of the gates of Edenburgh towne. About the ſame time, there came out of Germanie maiſter Patrike Hamilton, abbat of Ferne, brothers ſonne to the earle of Arrane, who had béene ſcholer to Martin Luther, & others there. This man being conuented and examined vpon certeine articles, as of iuſtification, predeſtination, of frée will, and ſuch like, contrarie to the doctrine taught by the church in that time, becauſe he did affirme, and conſtantlie defend them, he was declared an heretike and burned. The abbat of Ferne burnt.

The eightéenth of March, the king beſieged the caſtell of Edenburgh, the queene and hir husband Henrie Steward, with James his brother being within it. But as ſoone as the quéene vnderſtood, that hir ſonne the king was there in perſon, ſhe cauſed the gates to be ſet open, and vpon hir knées beſought him of grace for hir husband and his brother, and would not reſt, till ſhe had obteined the ſame; but yet they were kept in ward within the caſtell, till the king afterwards releaſed them. In the yeare following, the king being now come to the age of ſeuenteéne yeares, and of good diſcretion and wit for his time, would not longer remaine vnder the gouernement of the earle of Angus and his companie. Therevpon he aſſembled diuerſe noble men of Striueling, & by their counſell ſent an herald vnto the earle of Angus & his aſſiſtans reſiant as then in Edenburgh, commanding them on paine of high treaſon, that they ſhould depart forth of that towne, & that none of them ſhould come within foure miles of the court, whereſoeuer the ſame chanced to lie. Edenburgh caſtell beſieged. 1528 Leſle. The king being ſeuenteéne yeares of age, refuſeth to be longer vnder gouernement.

Shortlie after, the king himſelfe with two thouſand men, followed the herald: therevpon the earle of Angus, both being charged by the herald, and aduertiſed of the kings comming toward the towne, departed thence immediatlie. And ſhortlie after, the ſame herald was ſent vnto him againe with commandement from the king, that he ſhould remaine priſoner within ward in the countrie of Murrey, till the kings pleaſure were further knowen: which he would not obeie; wherefore both he and his adherents were ſummoned to appeare in parlement to be holden at Edenburgh, in September nert following. In this parlement begun at Edenburgh the firt of September in this yeare 1528, the earle of Angus, with his brother George Dowglas, his vncle by his father Archembald Dowglas, Alexander Drommond of Carnocke, and diuerſe other, were by decrée of parlement atteinted, and forfalted for diuerſe offenſes, and ſpeciallie, for aſſembling the kings people to haue aſſailed the kings perſon: and becauſe he had deteined the king againſt his will with him the ſpace of two yeares and more, all which time he ſtood in feare of his life. 1528. The earle of Angus forfalted. The earle of Angus atteinted by parlement.

In this parlement Henrie Steward the quéenes husband was created lord of Methwen, and made maiſter of the ordinance. * Beſides which, in place of earle Dowglas was Gawin Dunbar, the kings ſchoolemaiſter made chancellor, a good and a learned man, and one in whome manie did deſire more ciuill policie; and in the place of Archembald Dowglas the treaſuror was admitted Robert Carnicruce, more famous for his monie than his vertue. In this parlement there was onelie one found, called John Bannatine, who fauoring the Dowglas, did boldlie there proteſt, that whatſoeuer was therin don, ought by no meanes to be hurtfull to the earle Dowglas; ſince iuſt feare of his appearance there, was a iuſt cauſe to force him to be abſent from thence. Within a few daies after, a brother of the earles called William, abbat of the monaſterie of Holirood died, partlie by ſickeneſſe, and partlie by griefe of mind, being wearied with the preſent ſtate of things; whoſe place Robert Carnicruce, a man of baſe birth, but well monied, did obteine of the king: who had granted vnto him the auoidance of the next ſpirituall liuing. At length, the Dowglas out of hope of all good ſucceſſe, burnt the townes of Conſtandie and Cranſtoune, and ſo fled to the caſtell of Tantallon. Fr. Thin. Buchanan. lib. 14.

In October following, the king aſſembled a great companie of men, with artillerie, and diuerſe kinds of munition, to beſiege the caſtell of Tantallon, which the earle of Angus did hold, who aduertiſed of the preparation made for the ſame ſiege, furniſhed the caſtell with men and all kind of neceſſaries, and went himſelfe into England. When the ſiege then was laid about the caſtell, it was ſo ſtrong and ſo well prouided, that it might not be wone for all that could be done at that ſeaſon: in ſomuch that after Dauid Fauconer, principall gunner of the kings ſide was ſlaine, the king cauſed the ſiege to be raiſed; yet at length (though not till a long time after this) it was deliuered to the king by appointment. * Before the deliuerie whereof, the king déepelie ſware that he would not leaue one aliue to ſucceed in the inheritance and name of the Dowglaſſes, ſo long as he liued and was king. The caſtell of Tantallon beſieged. Dauid Fauconer ſlaine. Fr. Thin. Buchanan. lib. 14.

Whereupon he came to Edenburgh, where (to the end he might diſtreſſe them the more) he determined by the aduiſe of his councell to ſend a daillie companie (though no great number) to Coldingham, which ſhould defend the husbandmen from the ſpoile. Which office appointed to Bothwell chiefe of Louthaine, he did vtterlie refuſe; either fearing the power of the Dowglas (whereunto all the other ſtrength of Scotland did of late not ſeeme to be equall) or that he would not (being then yong) imbrue his hands with the deſtruction of ſo famous a familie. Whereupon, ſince ſince the king durſt not truſt the Hamiltons (as friends to his enimies, & being offended with them for the death of Iohn Steward earle of Lennor, nor durſt commit the matter to anie of the adioining nobilitie) at length the ſame came ſo about, that Calene Campbell (dwelling on the furtheſt borders of the kingdome, being a man of good eſtimation for his wiſedome, and approued experience in feats of warre, and for his iuſtice déerelie loued of the people) was ſent by the king (with great authoritie) to the rebels. Whereby the Dowglaſſes (being forſaken of the Hamiltons and their other friends) were brought to thoſe extremities, that they were inforced to depart into England to K. Henrie the eight, who honorablie and liberallie receiued and interteined them. After this, the king (as is ſaid) getting the caſtell of Tantillone by compoſition, did ſcarſe keepe all the couenants of his grant thereof in writing; although he performed this, that Alexander Drumman at the requeſt of Robert Bretton, had licence to returne home into his countrie, a little before which (as it ſéemeth) when James Coluille and Robert Carnicruſe were remoued from the court (as perſons ſuſpected to fauor the Dowglaſſes) their offices were beſtowed vpon Robert Bretton, then in great fauor with the king and courtiers, and aduanced to the gouernement of manie places.)

1529. The eightéenth of Maie, in the yéere 1529, the earle of Cathneſſe and the lord of Sincler, with a great armie by ſea paſſed into Orkenie, to haue taken that Ile into poſſeſſion; but the people of the countrie aſſembled at the commandement of James Sincler of Kirkewall their capteine, who gaue battell to the earle and his armie with ſuch courage, that he diſcomfited the enimies: the earle with fiue hundred of his men was ſlaine, and drowned in the ſea, vnto the which they were driuen. The lord Sincler and all the reſidue were taken. The Orkenie men held opinion, that their patrone ſaint Magnus was ſéene that day to fight in the field on their ſide againſt their enimies. In the ſame moneth on the fiftéenth day, there was a great aſſemblie of the lords in Edenburgh, where the king himſelfe ſate in iudgement. The lard of Hinderland called Cockburne, and one Adam Scot of Tuſhlaw, who was named king of théeues, were accuſed of theft, and of receiuing and maintening of théeues, ſlaughters, and other crimes; of the which being conuict, they loſt their heads, which were ſet ouer the Tolbuith of Edenburgh.

On the ſame day, the earle of Bothwell was alſo conuict, for mainteining them and their crimes, and his life, lands, and goods, were in the kings hands. He was therefore kept in ward within Edenburgh caſtell, and after ſent into Murrey land, & laſtlie baniſhed the realme during the kings daies [and remained at Uenice.] Alſo, the lord Yarwell, the lord Hume, the lards of Walglueth, Fernihurſt, Pollort, Johnſon, Yarke Kar [with the earle Bothwell] and other principall men of the borders, were conuict by aſſiſe, and put in ward: by reaſon whereof, the borderers kept better rule euer after, during the kings reigne. [Few moneths after, the king commanded the noble men (before impriſoned, and then to be baniſhed) to be reſtored to libertie, taking pledges for their allegiance. Of which companie, one Walter Scot (killing Robert Johnſtone a théefe of noted crueltie, therwith to gratifie the king) began deadlie enimitie with that familie, to the great hurt of both thoſe kinreds.]

John Scot faſted fortie daies without receiuing any food. 1231. Buch.

About this ſeaſon, a landed man named John Scot, that had trauelled abroad in the world [ouer England, France, Italie and the holie land, as ſaith Leſleus] who now being returned into Scotland, (bicauſe it was bruted in other countries that hée had faſted 40 daies without either meat or drinke) was for triall therof put in Dauids tower in Edenburgh caſtell, and diligent watch ſet vpon him to ſée that he had no ſuſtenance to relieue him withall, and ſo kept for fortie daies, he faſted all that time without anie kind of nouriſhment, to the great wonder of the people. In the ſummer of this yeare 1529, Archembald Dowglas, that had béene forfalted (as ye haue heard) came alone to the king while he was on hunting in Striueling parke, & beſought his grace of pardon, which he had obteined fullie at his hands, bicauſe he fauoured him more than anie of that ſurname, if he had not béene (as he was indéed) altogither determined that none of them ſhould remaine within the land at that time, and ſo he baniſhed him into France, where ſhortlie after through griefe of mind he departed this life.

In the moneth of June, the king with an armie went to the borders to ſet order there for better rule to be kept, and to puniſh ſuch as were knowen to be moſt culpable. And herevpon he cauſed fortie and eight of the moſt notable théeues, with their capteine John Armſtrong to be apprehended; the which being conuict of murther, theft, & treaſon, were all hanged on growing trées, to the example of other. There was one cruell théefe amongſt the reſt, which had burned a houſe with a woman and hir children within it: he was burned to death. George Armſtrong, brother to John, was pardoned, to the end he ſhould appeach the reſidue, which he did; ſo that they were apprehended by the kings commandement, and puniſhed for their miſdoings, according as they had deſerued. In Auguſt following, manie meruellous ſights were ſéene about Striueling, as candels burning on the tops of hils in the nights, and in the morning afore ſunne riſing. Diuerſe armed men appeared fighting vpon the ground, which was taken to be a foretoken of ſome trouble to inſue in thoſe parties. The fiftéenth day of Auguſt, a great number of people being aſſembled at the market in Campſcenneth, fiftie & two perſons were drowned in the ferrie bote; amongſt the which were diuerſe honeſt men and women of the countrie.

The firſt of March, in the yéere 1530, the abbat of Culroſe called James Inglis, was cruellie murthered by the lord of Tulliallan and his ſeruants, amongſt whom there was a prieſt called ſir William Louthien, for the which they were apprehended, and the ſaid ſir William the twentie and ſeuenth of the ſame moneth, vpon a publike ſcaffold in Edenburgh was degraded (the king, quéene, and a great companie of people being preſent) and after his degradation, he was deliuered to the earle of Argile high iuſtice, and the next day the ſaid Tulliallan and the ſame prieſt were beheaded. This yéere the colege court of iuſtice called the ſeſſions was inſtituted in Edenburgh by the king, with conſent of the three eſtates in parlement aſſembled, and after confirmed in Rome; in the which are fiftéene councellors ordinarie, eight of them being ſpirituall perſons, of the which the moſt ancient is preſident, and ſeuen temporall men, but ſo as by this number the chancellor of the realme is aboue the preſident, when he is preſent. There are alſo foure councellors extraordinarie, remoueable at the princes pleaſure. In the yéere 1531, I find little done to make account of, for the erle of Angus remaining in England, could not perſuade the king of England in his fauor to breake the peace with Scotland, though the ſame earle earneſtlie laboured to bring that to paſſe.

caſtell of Edenburgh, & ſir Iohn Sandland knight was ſent with authoritie to the hermitage (a caſtell in Liddeſdale) to repreſſe the ſpoiles and robberies committed there. When of ancient time there had béene no certeine daies and place appointed for the deciding of monie, contentions, or debts amongeſt the citizens and people of Scotland, Iohn duke of Albanie obteined from the biſhop of Rome, that a yærelie ſumme of monie (as much as ſhould be ſufficient to paie the ſtipend of a few iudges that ſhuld be appointed therefore) ſhould be leuied of the cleargie, of euerie one according to his eſtate and ſubſtance. Wherupon Gawin Dunbar biſhop of Aberden for himſelfe in the name of the cleargie, appealed to the ſaid biſhop of Rome. Which controuerſie continued from the fift Ides of March, vntill the tenth kalends of Maie, at which day the college of the iudges of Edenburgh was eſtabliſhed, of whom in the beginning there were many profitable things done, and law was equallie miniſtred; but yet the ſame end did not follow which was then hoped amongſt them. For ſince in Scotland there be almoſt no lawes but ſuch as are decréed by parlement, which are not commonlie perpetuall, but made for a time; and that the iudges as much as in them lieth do hinder the making of ſuch lawes: the goods of all men were committed to the arbitrement of fifteene men, which haue perpetuall power therfore, being in truth but tyrannicall gouernment, ſince their onelie arbitrements muſt ſtand for law. Thus much Buchanan.

But bicauſe Leſleus treateth in more ample and other ſort of that matter; and for that I will not depriue the reader of the ſeuerall writings of them both touching one thing: I will alſo ſet downe Leſleus words, writing in this order. In this parlement (ſaith he) by the conſent of the ſtates, it ſéemed good that the forme of iudgement vſed by our anceſtors ſhould be taken away. For where certeine of the cleargie, of the barons, and of the citizens, were choſen euerie yeere to trauell ouer the foure parts of the realme, to giue iudgement of ciuill cauſes (as they terme it) and of other things intangled with the controuerſie of law: and that then it oftentimes happened, either by the ignorance of the iudge that did not atteine to the perfection of the law, or by the malice of them which were corrupted with bribes, that the worſer part had vniuſtlie the vpper hand againſt the righter; to which diſcommoditie this was alſo ioined, that no cauſe could be well examined to the vttermoſt by one man at one time, bicauſe the iudges were ſo often changed; whereby it muſt néeds follow, that ſeuerall iudges (hauing ſeuerall minds and wits) muſt for one matter giue inconſtant & contrarie iudgements. Wherefore to take awaie this varietie of iudgements and other diſcommodities, wherewith the common-wealth was afflicted; it pleaſed the parlement by the perſuaſion of the king, that a certeine deſined number of ſenators (being perſons of the greateſt knowledge in law) ſhould haue a permanent place at Edenburgh, to decide all matters of controuerſie, the maner & order whereof we haue ſet downe in our former booke, ſaith Leſleus. And I for my part thinke not vnmeet for the more erplaning thereof, to ſet it downe in this place out of the ſame Leſleus.

The companie (ſaith he) of theſe men (whom wee call the ſenat of the publike wealth) receiue none but ſuch, whoſe praiſe of vertue and ſharpeneſſe of wit (eſpeciallie in matters of law) doth aduance them to that place. This court is ſo apted of the cleargie and ſecular nobilitie (as a man may tearme them) that the one part of the laitie doth anſwer the other number of the cleargie. Which we thinke to bée done by the great beneſit of God, that the religion and ſimplicitie of the cleargie may temper the ſingular wiſedome of the temporaltie, obteined by the experience of worldlie cauſes; and againe, the iudgement of the laitie may further and moderate the pure religion and ancient ſimplicitie of the cleargie. Ouer all theſe is one chiefe and head (which is a ſpirituall man) who hath the higheſt place in ſentence and pronouncing of iudgement; except the iudgement of the chancellor of the kingdome happen to come in place; for then thereunto the Scots giue the chiefeſt preheminence in all the affaires of the common-wealth. Thus much he.)

In the yéere 1532, ſir Arthur Darcie was ſent to the borders, who being at Berwike, by the counſell of the earle of Angus then being there, they made a rode into Scotland, and burned certeine places: wherevpon the Scots aſſembling themſelues to defend their countrie, made towards the Engliſhmen, who retired themſelues to Berwike againe. After this were diuerſe inuaſions made on euerie ſide vpon the borders, and ſhips likewiſe taken by ſea, and yet no warre was proclamed. In September, in the yære 1533, certeine commiſſioners of either realme were at Newcaſtell, to intreat for a redreſſe and recompenſe to be made for burning of townes and villages, taking of goods, caſting downe of piles, taking of ſhips, ſlaughters of men, and diuerſe other ſpoiles and iniuries done, as well by the ſea as by the land, from the 23 day of Aprill in the yéere 1532, vnto the day of the méeting of the ſame commiſſioners; which doings were little leſſe in effect than had béene vſed in time of open warre, although the ſame was not proclamed. Bicauſe therefore that the ſcathes & iniuries fell out to be ſo great on both ſides, that particular redreſſe could not bée had, the order thereof was referred to the pleaſure of both the princes.

Further it was agréed, that for a perpetuall peace to be concluded, certeine commiſſioners ſhould be appointed to treat therof at London, as afterwards they did. For the king of Scotland there were ſent as commiſſioners about this treatie, William Steward biſhop of Aberden, Robert Reid the abbat of Kinlos, and ſir Adam Sterburie knight [or (as ſaith Leſleus li. 9. pa. 439.) Adam Otterburne] the which accompanied with diuerſe other knights, barons, and gentlemen, came to London, and were there right honorablie receiued the 25 of March. After they had béene before the kings preſence, there were certeine commiſſioners appointed by him to treat with them of peace, the which agréed vpon certeine conditions and articles for a peace to continue betwixt both kings during their naturall liues, and one yere after the deceaſe of that prince which firſt chanced to depart this world: and ſo the commiſſioners returned into Scotland in the moneth of Maie next inſuing.

About the ſame time were ſent into France Dauid Beton abbat of Arbroth, and Iames Erſkin ſecretarie, as ambaſſadors to require the duke of Vandoſmes ſiſter in mariage for the king: with which motion the ladie and hir friends were verie well contented. Neuertheleſſe (as afterwards ſhall appéere) the king himſelfe paſſing ſecretlie into France in proper perſon, when he had once ſéene the ladie, he liked hir not; & ſo became a ſuter to the French king his eldeſt daughter Magdalen, whome he obteined: wherefore the duke of Vandoſmes ſiſter would neuer after match hir ſelfe with anie other in mariage, but profeſſed hir ſelfe in a houſe of religion, where ſhe remained the reſidue of hir life time. The peace concluded with England.

✻ The king in thoſe daies did ſhew ſuch hope of honorable vertue in him, that the wiſeſt and the moſt valiant princes of the world did honor him with the ornaments of their orders: for firſt Henrie king of England adopted him into the order of the garter, the emperor made him a fellow of the golden fléece, and ſhortlie after the French king clothed him with the order of ſaint Michaell. In remembrance of all which (for a note to be left to poſteritie) he cauſed the armes of Scotland, honored with theſe thrée orders, to be ſet vp ouer the gate of his palace of Lithquoe, with the ornaments of the honor of ſaint Andrew, which are proper to the kingdome of Scotland.)

The ſame yeere, the king paſſed through the north parts of his realme, and cauſed iuſtice dulie to be miniſtred in places where he came, againſt offendors. Moreouer, in Edenburgh was great inquiſition made, and puniſhment exerciſed againſt ſuch as were detected to hold opinions againſt the religion then vſed, the king himſelfe aſſiſtant thereto. Engliſh fugitiues receiued into Scotland.

✻ About this time (to conclude a league with Charles the fift, emperor) this Charles ſent Godeſcall Erike (to the end the matter might be handled more ſecretlie) from Toledo (by Ireland) into Scotland, who when he had declared his meſſage to him from the emperor [ conteining the iniuries done to his aunt Katharine quéene of England, & to hir daughter by Henrie the eight, king of England: the calling of a generall councell: the ouerthrow of the Lutheran hereſie (to vſe Buchanans word) and for contracting of mariage ] the ſaid ambaſſador did deliuer to the king the emperors letter, wherein was ſet downe the offer and choiſe of which of thoſe thrée Maries the king would take to wife: which were Marie (the ſiſter of Charles) a widow by Lodowike of Hungarie, hir huſband ſlaine by the Turke: Marie of Portingale his néece by his ſiſter Leonara: or Marie of England his coſine germane by his aunt Katharine. Wherevnto the king anſwered, that the mariage with England ſhould be moſt profitable, but the ſame was a thing of vncerteine hope, of greater danger & labour, & of longer delaie than his carefulneſſe (being the onelie man left of that line) might well indure. Wherefore of all the emperors kinred, that mariage by manie reaſons ſhould be moſt beneficiall for him, to take to wife the daughter of Chriſtern, king of Denmark, begotten vpon Iſabell ſiſter to the emperor. Wherevnto for denial thereof, Charles did ſhortlie make anſwer (at Madrike) that he was affianced to another.)

In the yeere 1535, the pope ſent a meſſenger into Scotland, requiring king James to aſſiſt him againſt the king of England, whome he had decréed an heretike, a ſchiſmatike, a wedlocke breaker, a publike murtherer, and a ſacrileger; and therefore he had declared him to be depriued of the ſaid kingdome, the which he would beſtow vpon him, and other catholike princes. In the yeere 1536, the king tooke the ſea with fiue ſhips, without knowledge of the moſt part of the lords of his realme, and ſailed about the Iles of Skie and Lewes, and the other Iles, and by ſtorme was driuen to take land at ſaint Ninians in Galloway, & ſo returned to Striueling, from whence he paſſed on foot in pilgrimage vnto our ladie chappell of Lauret beſide Muſkelburgh, and afterward ſent for diuerſe of his lords, and by their counſell tooke his voiage againe by ſea with fiue ſhips, to paſſe into France, as he was minded to haue done the firſt time: but what cauſed him to alter his purpoſe then, we find not. This ſecond time he imbarked at Kirkaldie the laſt of Auguſt, and with good and proſperous wind he ſhortlie after arriued in France, there being with him in companie the earles of Argile, and Arrane, the lords Boid and Fleming, with diuerſe other barons, knights, and gentlemen; and before him there were in France the earles of Murrey, Lennor, and Caſſiles, the lord Erſkin, the abbat of Arbroth, and others.

He ſaileth into France.

Immediatlie after his arriuall, he rode in ſecret manner diſguiſed vnto Vandoſmes in Picardie, taking with him but one ſeruant named John Tennent, whome he cauſed to take vpon him as he had béene maiſter; and ſo comming to the duke of Vandoſme his place, got ſight of the ladie who ſhuld haue béene his wife; but not liking hir, he returned againe without talking either with hir or hir friends: and comming to Rouen where his companie were abiding for him, he paſſed from thence towards Paris, where the Dolphin of France was appointed by the king his father to méet him ſeuen leagues from the citie, who brought him to the king, who receiued him in ſuch hartie manner, as if he had bæne his owne ſonne, and with as much honor as might haue béene ſhewed to the greateſt prince in earth. There were iuſtes, tourneis, and other princelie paſtimes practiſed and ſet forth; in which iuſtes and other exerciſes of warlike feates, he ſhewed himſelfe as hardie, cunning and valiant, as anie other perſon within all the realme of France, for the which he wan paſſing great praiſe.

He rideth to Vandoſme.

He is receiued into Paris.

In the meane time, he cauſed his ambaſſadors and the noble men that were with him, to declare vnto the king of France, that the cauſe of his comming was for mariage to be had betwéene him and the ladie Magdalen, eldeſt daughter to the king, whome he loued & fauoured aboue all other within his realme. The French king was glad héereof, that the ancient band betwixt Scotland and France might thus with new aliance be confirmed, and therefore declared that he would willinglie giue him his daughter in mariage. But héerewith he let him vnderſtand, that his daughter was much ſubiect to ſickneſſe, and therfore he referred that vnto the king of Scotland his owne pleaſure, whether he would haue hir, or his yongeſt daughter the ladie Margaret, who was after maried to the duke of Sauoy. This offer of choiſe being reported to the king of Scotland, he continued in his former purpoſe, which was, to match with the ladie Magdalen, who was in déed a pleſant yong ladie, beautifull, of good fauour, louelie countenance, and comelie manners, aboue all others within that realme.

Héerevpon the mariage was contracted betwixt them, and an hundred thouſand crownes of the ſun promiſed with hir in dowrie, with thirtie thouſand franks of penſion, during the life of king James: which monie was deliuered vnto him at his returne homewards, beſides manie rich hangings, cupbords of plate, ſumptuous apparell, and rich iewels giuen to him and his wife, farre aboue the ſumme of an other hundred thouſand crownes, with two great ſhips (the one called the ſalamander) and great plentie of artillerie, powder, and other munition. uer, all his charges and expenses were borne by the French king, during his being within the realme of France. At the same time also, was the ancient league and bond of amitie betwirt the two realmes of Scotland and France renewed, and the day of the solemnization of the mariage appointed to be holden the first of Januarie.

In the meane time, great preparation for the same was made, and all the nobles of France sent for to be there at that day. On the which within the church of Nostre dame in the citie of Paris, the king of Scotland openlie maried the said ladie Magdalen, in presence of the king hir father, the king of Nauarre, seuen cardinals, and diuerse great dukes, marquesses, earles, lords, barons, bishops, & others. After the solemnization of the mariage, king James remained in France, till the moneth of Maie, passing the time with all kind of pleasure and disport that might be deuised for his honorable interteinement.

Finallie, the king and his wife queene Magdalen tooke their leaue of the king of France their father at Paris, about the latter end of Aprill, and so rode to Rouen, where they were receiued with great triumph, and from thence they passed downe the riuer to Newhauen where they imbarked, being accompanied by the admerall of France, and manie other noble men of the realme, appointed by the French king to attend vpon them into Scotland, & so they sailed forth with pleasant wind and prosperous weather, through the seas, till they came into the Forth, and there landed at the peare of Lieth hauen, the 29 of Maie, in the yeere 1537, where a great number of earles, bishops, barons, & other noble men & gentlemen of Scotland were readie to receiue them with passing ioy and gladnesse, & from thence with great triumph they were conueied to the abbeie of Holie rod house.

This noble ladie with hir louelie countenance and seemelie demeanor, at hir first arriuall wone the loues and hartie good wils of all the nobles & people of the realme, and withall contented so highlie the mind and fantasie of the king hir husband, that there was neuer more hope of wealth and prosperitie to succeed within the realme, than at that present. But fortune enuieng so great felicitie, would not suffer them to continue anie longer time togither: for about the end of June she fell sicke of a vehement feuer, whereof she departed this life the tenth of Julie next insuing, and was buried in the church of Holie rod house, for whose death the king was verie sorowfull, & stirred not abroad of a long time after: [whose death (saith Buchanan) was so lamented of all men, that then (as he supposeth) began the first vse of morning garments amongest the Scots, which yet at this day, not being past fortie yeeres, is not verie common, though publike orders and manners do euerie day grow worse and worse.]

In the summer of this yeere, Jone Dowglasse the ladie of Glames, sister to the earle of Angus, was apprehended, and likewise hir husband Dauid Lion, and both of them brought to Edenburgh, where they were accused and conuict by an assise, for conspiracie of the kings death: the said ladie was burned, and hir husband hanged. Hir son the lord Glames was also conuict for misprision and concealement of that crime, and therfore forfalting all his lands, was condemned to die: but because he was yong and of tender yeeres, the king pardoned him of life, and commanded him to perpetuall prison, in the which he remained so long as the king liued. [This yeere was Bothwell, for that he was ouer familiar with the English, banished into France (as saith Buchanan.]

Shortlie after, John maister of the Forbois, and eldest sonne to the lord Forbois, who had maried a sister of the said ladie Glames, was at Edenburgh likewise indicted and conuict by an assise, by procurement of the earle Huntleie, for the like conspiracie of the kings death, for the which he was beheaded and quartered, and his head and quarters set aloft vpon the gates of Edenburgh. His father the lord Forbois, vpon suspicion of the same conspiracie, was long after kept in prison within the castell of Edenburgh; but at length when nothing might be proued against him, he was released and set at libertie.

This yeere, the king in September caused iustices to sit in the north parts of the realme, and likewise in October; and in the winter following he caused the like to be done in the south and west parts. The king himselfe was often times present, assisting the lords whome he had appointed his commissioners for the furtherance of iustice, and maintenance thereof thorough all parts of his realme. * The king appointed an assemblie of the nobles, by whose consent an edict was made to confirme the former law, in which all his grants made at Roane in his minoritie were voided and of no authoritie. At what time also by the said persons it was brought to passe by great labor, that the kings patrimonie should be augmented with manie possessions. Wherefore when they perceiued that the kings charge and dignitie could not be mainteined with so small reuenues, they aduanced his foure sonnes (borne of diuerse women) to the rich abbeies & priories of Melrosse, Kelso, Coldingham, Holie rod, and of saint Andrewes, whose reuenues they transferred to the kings coffers so long as he liued: by which (perhaps) there came no lesse monie (saith Lesleus) vnto his coffers, than did arise of his kinglie inheritance.)

Fr. Thin: Buchan. lib. 14. pag. 447.

The king by the aduise of these noble men of his realme, thinking it necessarie for him to match againe in mariage with some noble princesse, sent into France vnto the earle of Murrey, and Dauid Beton abbat of Arbroth [whome (as saith Lesleus lib. 9. pa. 447) Paule the third had made a cardinall, & they of France had made bishop of Miropreuse] his ambassadors there resident, willing them by the aduise of the French king to treat for a mariage to be had betwirt him and the ladie Marie de Lorraine, dutchesse of Longuile, widow, daughter to the duke of Guise. And being aduertised from his said ambassadors, that the king of France, the ladie hir selfe, and hir friends, were well contented therewith, he sent in the beginning of Maie the lord Robert Marwell, and the maister of Glencarne, well accompanied into France, to ioine with his other ambassadors for the contracting of that mariage, the which according to their commission treated thereof, and concluded vpon resolute articles, and so espoused hir by procurators, as the vse is amongst such estates, with great triumph in the citie of Paris, whereat the king and manie noble men were present.

After this she was conueied to Newhauen, and there taking the seas, passed through the same till she came to Carell in Fife, where she landed the tenth of June; and from thence she was conueied to the new palace in the abbeie of saint Andrewes, being honorablie prepared for the receiuing of hir. And there the king accompanied with manie noble men, openlie solemnized and confirmed the foresaid mariage with the said ladie in the abbeie church, with great ioy and triumph. The king with his queene remained there the most part of that summer. And within a few moneths after the mariage, she conceiued with child, to the great comfort of the king and the whole realme, for the hope of succession thereby; and therefore generall processions and publike praiers were made thorough all parts of the realme, for the prosperous successe of the same. After that the king had pacified the borders

The king therefore, to bring them to order, cauſed to prepare a good nauie of ſhips, and in the moneth of Maie went aboord the ſame in the rode of Lieth, hauing with him the earles of Arrane, Huntleie, Argile, and diuerſe other earles, lords, and barons, with whome he ſailed forth by the coaſts of Fife, Angus, Aberden, Murrey firth, Southerland, and Cathneſſe, till he came to Orkenie, where he landing and all his companie with him, were receiued verie honorablie by the biſhop Robert Warwell. Heere they furniſhed themſelues with freſh vittels, and other ſuch things as were neceſſarie; and taking the ſeas againe, ſailed to the Iles of Skie and Lewes, where Mac Clewd of the Lewes, a principall clan of his kin, was brought vnto the king, who ſent forth alſo a companie to Mac Clewd Haugh, who came likewiſe out of his Ile, and preſented himſelfe to the king.

From thence trauelling through the reſidue of the Iles, Maclane and James Maconile of Kinter, being the two principall capteins of the ſmall Iles, came likewiſe to the king who at length landed at Dunbreton, and ſent the capteins and ſhips with priſoners to paſſe the ſame waie he came round about the coaſt, ſo to come to Edenburgh, where the ſame priſoners being arriued, the chiefe heads of them were kept in ward as pledges for good rule in their countries, and were not ſuffered to depart ſo long as the king liued, whereby there followed great quietneſſe, and as good obedience to the lawes throughout all the Iles, as there was in anie part of the realme; and as good account and paiment made to the kings controller in his excheker for the lands of the ſame Iles perteining to the crowne, as for anie part of the reuenues belonging thereunto within the maine land. [In this yéere (ſaith Buchanan lib. 4.) were manie taken for Lutheraniſme, whereof ſome were burnt; nine recanted, and manie were baniſhed: amongeſt whom, George Buchanan was one, who eſcaped by a rope out of a window of a chamber.]

Whileſt the king was in this voiage, the quæne was deliuered of a ſonne at ſaint Andrewes, whereof the king being aduertiſed at his landing, haſted with all poſſible diligence to the quéene, and ſhortlie after was the child baptiſed, and called James. The archbiſhop of ſaint Andrewes, and the earle of Arrane were godfathers, and the quéene the kings mother was godmother. For the birth of this prince, there were bonnfiers made through all parts of the realme, with great triumph and giuing of thanks to God for the ſame. After this the quéene, mother to the king, returned vnto Methwen, where after ſhe had remained a certeine time, a ſickneſſe toke hir, of the which ſhortlie after ſhe departed this life, and was buried in the Charterhouſe church of ſaint Johns towne, by the tome of king James the firſt. The ſame yeare were burnt at Edenburgh for hereſie (as it was then taken) a regular canon, two blacke friers, and a ſecular man. Alſo two prieſts were degraded, and condemned to perpetuall priſon. The ſame time there was a graie frier in the citie of Glaſcow burnt for the like cauſe, and manie other ſummoned; and becauſe they would not appeare, they were denounced heretikes. About the ſame time, James Beton archbiſhop of ſaint Andrews, a man of great age departed this life, and was buried in ſaint Andrews. Before his departure, he had prouided ſucceſſors to all his benefices, firſt to his archbiſhops ſée, and to the abbeie of Arbroth, maiſter Dauid Beton, afterwards cardinall; and to the abbeie of Dunfermeling maiſter George Durie that was archdeacon of ſaint Andrews. Theſe men, without anie gaineſaieng of the king, entered with his good will into the ſame benefices, immediatlie after his deceaſſe. This James Beton builded a great part of the new college of ſaint Andrewes, and left great ſummes of monie and treaſure to go through to make an end of the ſame worke.

Which commandement he willinglie obeied, thinking himſelfe ſure inough, as well by reaſon of the good ſeruice he had done to the king, ſpeciallie in reparing the palaces of Striueling and Linletgew; as alſo for that the king had him in ſo high fauor, that he ſtood in no feare of himſelfe at all. Neuertheleſſe, ſhortlie after he was brought forth to iudgement, and conuict in the Tolbuith of Edenburgh, of certeine points of treaſon laid againſt him, which he would neuer confeſſe; but that notwithſtanding, he was beheaded in the moneth of September next inſuing [after that he had liberallie confeſſed at the place of execution, that he had neuer in anie iot offended the kings maieſtie, and that this death was yet worthilie inflicted vpon him by the diuine iuſtice; becauſe he had often offended the law of God to pleaſe the prince, thereby to obteine greater countenance with him. Wherefore he admoniſhed all perſons, that (moued by his example) they ſhould rather follow the diuine pleaſure, than vnluſtlie ſéeke the kings fauor, ſince it is better to pleaſe God than man.]

On the verie ſame daie, prince James the kings eldeſt ſonne being at ſaint Andrews departed this life alſo, in ſuch wiſe, that there was but onlie ſix houres betwixt the time of their departures out of this world; which cauſed no leſſe lamentation through the whole realme, than there was ioy at their births. After this, the quæne went vnto ſaint Johns towne, where ſhe was honorablie receiued with great triumph made by the towne. She was accompanied with the principall men of the countrie, and from thence ſhe roade to Aberden, the king then being come vnto hir, where, by the towne and vniuerſitie they were receiued with great ioy, triumph, pageants, verſes, & plaies, ſet forth in the beſt maner for their paſtime. An image was made to reſemble him, and at the market croſſe of the ſaid citie, as a ſigne and memoriall of his condemnation, it was burned, to the feare of others, but he himſelfe eſcaped their hands and got into England, where he was receiued.

For by that new title, king James his authoritie did ſeeme to be diminiſhed, when the king of England did write himſelfe king of all Ireland: whereof a portion by manie ages was vnder the rule of the king of Scots. 1541.

The king of England ſendeth to the king of Scots.

This yeare the king of England aduertiſed of the meeting of the emperor, the French king, and pope, at the citie of Nice, doubting ſome practiſe to be deuiſed there againſt him, ſent to the king of Scotland the biſhop of ſaint Dauids, & the lord William Howard, deſiring him as his moſt tender kinſman and nephue, to meete him at the citie of Yorke in England, where he would communicat ſuch things with him, as ſhould be for the weale of both the realmes. And therewith the king of England, truſting that the king of Scotland would haue fulfilled his deſire, cauſed great preparation to be made at Yorke for the receiuing of him. But albeit the king of Scotland was willing of himſelfe to haue paſſed into England, to haue met and ſeene his vncle; yet after long reaſoning and deliberation of his councell and prelats [eſpeciallie James Beton biſhop of ſaint Andrews, and George Crichtoune biſhop of Aberden (as ſaith Buchanan. lib. 14.] aſſembled for that purpoſe, caſting in their minds (as they tooke it) what danger might fall to him and his realme, if he ſhould paſſe into England, in caſe he ſhould be ſtaied and holden there, contrarie to his will, as king James his predeceſſor was, hauing no ſucceſſion of his bodie.

Fr. Thin.

And againe, for that it was certeinelie knowen, that the principall cauſe, why the king of England required this meeting or interuiew, was to perſuade the king of Scotland to vſe the like order in Scotland, as he had done within his realme of England, in aboliſhing the popes authoritie, making himſelfe ſupreame head of the church, expelling religious perſons out of their houſes, and ſeizing the iewels of their houſes, their lands and rents, and ſuch like information. And if it chanced the king ſhould attempt the like, they ſhould loſe the friendſhip which was betwixt him, the pope, the emperor, and French king, that were his great friends and confederats. Hereupon they perſuaded him to ſtaie, and by their aduiſe ſent pleaſant letters & meſſages vnto the ſaid king of England, deſiring him to haue him excuſed, for that he could not come into England at that time, hauing ſuch lets and cauſes of abiding at home, as ſhortlie he ſhould vnderſtand by his ambaſſadors, whom he ment to ſend to him, as well for this matter as other cauſes. And ſhortlie after ſir James Leirmouth was appointed to go as ambaſſador into England, as well to make the kings excuſe for his not comming to meet the king of England at Yorke; as alſo to make complaint vpon certeine inuaſions made by the borderers of England into Scotland, and alſo for the vſing of the debatable ground betwixt the two realmes.

Sir James Leirmouth ambaſſador into England

But the king of England ſore offended that the king of Scots would not ſatiſfie his requeſt, to meet him at Yorke (as before is recited, would admit no excuſe, but determined to make warre into Scotland, albeit as the Scotiſhmen allege, he would not ſuffer the ſame to be vnderſtood, till he had prepared all things in a redineſſe. In the meane time he ſent commiſſioners to meet with the Scots commiſſioners vpon the debatable ground, to talke for redreſſe to be made of harmes done vpon the borders, but no good concluſion could be agreed vpon by theſe commiſſioners, neither touching the debatable land, nor yet for reparing of wrongs done by the inuaſions. ¶ But that the truth concerning the cauſes of this war, moued at this preſent by that noble prince king Henrie the eight, may the better appeare; I haue thought good here to ſet downe the ſame, as they were drawen forth and publiſhed in print to the whole world by the ſaid king in a little pamphlet, vnder this title.

The king of England meaneth to make warre into Scotland.

A declaration conteining the iuſt cauſes and conſiderations of this preſent warre with the Scots, wherein alſo appeareth the true and right title that the kings moſt roiall maieſtie hath to his ſouereigntie of Scotland, and thus it beginneth.

A declaration of the iuſt cauſes of the war againſt the king of Scots.

BEing now inforced to the war which we haue alwaies hitherto ſo much abhorred & fled, by our neighbour & nephew the K. of Scots, one who aboue all other for our manifold benefits toward him, hath moſt iuſt cauſe to loue vs, and to reioiſe in our quietneſſe; we haue thought good to notifie vnto the world his doings and behauiour in the prouocation of this war, & likewiſe the meanes & waies by vs to eſchew & auoid it, & the iuſt & true occaſions whereby we be now prouoked to proſecute the ſame, and by vtterance and diſulging of that matter, to diſburden ſome part of our inward diſpleaſure and griefe: and the circumſtances knowen, to lament openlie with the world the infidelitie of this time, in which things of ſuch enormitie do burſt out and appeare.

the king of Scots our nephue & neighbor, whome we in his youth and tender age preſerued and mainteined from the great danger of others, and by our authoritie and power conducted him ſafelie to the roiall poſſeſſion of his eſtate, he now compelleth & inforceth vs (for preſeruation of our honor & right) to vſe our puiſſance & power againſt him. The like vnkindneſſe hath beene heretofore ſhewed by other in ſemblable caſes againſt Gods law, mans law, & all humanitie; but the oftener it chanceth, the more it is to be abhorred, and yet in the perſons of princes, for the raritie of them, can ſo happen but ſeldome as it hath now come to paſſe. It hath beene verie rarelie & ſeldome ſeene tofore, that a king of Scots hath had in mariage a daughter of England. We cannot nor will not reprehend the king our fathers act therein, but lament and be ſorie that it tooke no better effect.

The king our father in that matter minded loue, amitie, amitie, and perpetuall friendſhip betweene the poſteritie of both: which how ſone it failed, the death of the king of Scots, as a due puniſhment of God, for his vniuſt inuaſion into this our realme, is and ſhall be a perpetuall teſtimonie of their repꝛoch foꝛ euer. And yet in that pꝛeſent time could not the vnkindneſſe of the father extinguiſh in vs the naturall loue of our nephue his ſonne, being then in the miſerable age of tender youth. But we then foꝛgetting the diſpleaſure that ſhould haue woꝛthilie pꝛouoked vs to inuade that realme, nouriſhed and bꝛought vp our nephue, to atchiue his fathers poſſeſſion and gouernement, wherein he now ſo vnkindlie vſeth and behaueth himſelfe towards vs, as he compelleth vs to take armoꝛ and warre againſt him.

It is ſpeciallie to be noted, vpon what grounds, and by what means we be compelled to this warre, wherin among other is our chiefe græfe and diſpleaſure, that vnder a colour of faire ſpeach and flattering woꝛds, we be indéed ſo iniuried, contemned and deſpiſed, as we ought not with ſufferance to permit and paſſe ouer. Woꝛds, wꝛitings, letters, meſſages, ambaſſages, excuſes, allegations, could not moꝛe pleaſantlie, moꝛe gentlie, noꝛ moꝛe reuerentlie be deuiſed and ſent, than hath béene made on the king of Scots behalfe vnto vs: and euer we truſted the tꝛée would bꝛing foꝛth good fruit, that was of the one part of ſo good a ſtocke, and continuallie in appearance put foꝛth ſo faire buds: and theꝛefoꝛe would hardlie beléeue oꝛ giue eare to other, that euer alledged the déeds of the contrarie, being neuertheleſſe the ſame déeds ſo manifeſt, as we muſt néeds haue regarded them, had not we bin ſo loth to thinke euill of our nephue, whome we had ſo manie waies bound to be of the beſt ſoꝛt toward vs.

And theꝛefoꝛe hauing a meſſage ſent vnto vs the yéere paſt, from our ſaid nephue, and a pꝛomiſe made foꝛ the repairing of the ſaid king of Scots vnto vs to Yoꝛke, and after great pꝛeparation on our part made theꝛefoꝛe, the ſame méeting was not onelie diſappointed, but alſo at our being at Yoꝛke in the lieu thereof, an inuaſion made by our ſaid nephue his ſubiects into our land, declaring an euident contempt and deſpite of vs. We were yet glad to impute the default of the méeting to the aduiſe of his councell, and the inuaſion to the lewdneſſe of his ſubiects, and accoꝛding theꝛevnto gaue as benigne and gentle audience to ſuch ambaſſadoꝛs as repaired hither at Chꝛiſtmas afteꝛward, as if no ſuch cauſe of diſpleaſure had occurred, ſpeciallie conſidering the good woꝛds, ſweet woꝛds, pleaſant woꝛds, exſcuſes pꝛoponed by the ſaid ambaſſadoꝛs, not onelie to excuſe that was paſt, but alſo to perſuade kindneſſe and perfect amitie to inſue.

And albeit the king of Scots hauing (contrarie to the article of the league of amitie) receiued and interteined ſuch rebels as were of the chéefe and pꝛincipall, in ſtirring the inſurrection in the noꝛth againſt vs, with refuſall beforе time, vpon requeſt made to reſtoꝛe the ſame; yet neuertheleſſe, vpon offer made, the ſaid ambaſſadoꝛs to ſend commiſſion to the boꝛderers, to determine debates of the confines in the ſame, with ſo great a pꝛetenſe of amitie, and ſo faire woꝛds as could be in ſpéech deſired, we were content foꝛ the time to foꝛbeare to pꝛeſſe them ouer extreamlie in the matter of rebels. Alleit we neuer remitted the ſame, but deſiring to make triall of our ſaid nephue in ſome coꝛreſpondence of déeds, condeſcended to the ſending of commiſſioners to the boꝛders, which to our great charge we did, and the king of Scots our ſaid nephue the ſemblable.

Where after great trauell made by our commiſſioners, this fruit inſued, that being foꝛ our part challenged, a péece of our ground plainlie vſurped by the Scots, and of no great value, being alſo foꝛ the ſame ſhewed ſuch euidence, as moꝛe ſubſtantiall, moꝛe autentike, plaine and euident, cannot be bꝛought foꝛth foꝛ anie part of ground within our realme: the ſame was neuertheleſſe by them denied, refuſed, and the euidence onelie foꝛ this cauſe reiected, that it was made (as they alledged) by Engliſhmen: and yet it was ſo ancient, as it could not be counterfeit now, and the value of the ground ſo little, and of ſo ſmall weight, as no man would haue attempted to falſifie foꝛ ſuch a matter. And yet this denial being in this wiſe made vnto our commiſſioners, they neuertheleſſe by our commandement departed as friends from the commiſſioners of Scotland, taking oꝛder as hath bæne accuſtomed, foꝛ good rule vpon the boꝛders in the meane time.

After which their receſſe, the loꝛd Waꝛwell wardẽ of the weſt marches of Scotland, made pꝛoclamation foꝛ good rule; but yet added therwith, that the boꝛderers of Scotland ſhould withdꝛaw their goods from the boꝛderers of England; and incontinent the Scotiſhmen boꝛderers, the fourth of Julie entered into our realme ſuddenlie, and ſpoiled our ſubiects contrarie to our leagues, euen after ſuch extremitie as it had bëene in the time of open warre, whereat we much maruelled, and were compelled theꝛefoꝛe to furniſh our boꝛders with a garriſon foꝛ defenſe of the ſame. Whereupon the king of Scots ſent vnto vs James Leirmouth maiſter of his houſhold, with letters deuiſed in the moſt pleaſant maner, offering redꝛeſſe & reforꝛmation of all attempts. And yet neuertheleſſe, at the entrie of the ſaid Leirmouth into England, a great number of the Scots then not loked foꝛ, made a foꝛraie into our boꝛders, to the great annoiance of our ſubiects, & to their extreame detriment. Wherewith, and with that vnſeemelie diſſimulation, we were not a little moued, as reaſon would we ſhould; and yet did we not finallie ſo extreamelie pꝛoſecute and continue our ſaid diſpleaſure, but that we gaue benigne audience to the ſaid Leirmouth, and ſuffered our ſelfe to be ſomewhat altered by his woꝛds and faire pꝛomiſes, tending to the perſuaſion that we euer deſired, to find the king of Scots ſuch a nephue vnto vs, as our pꝛoximitie of bloud (with our gratuitie vnto him) did require.

In the meane time of theſe faire woꝛds, the déeds of the boꝛderers were as extreame as might be, and our ſubiects ſpoiled: and in a rode made by ſir Robert Bowes foꝛ a reuenge thereof, the ſame ſir Robert Bowes, with manie other were taken pꝛiſoners, and yet deteined in Scotland without putting them to fine oꝛ ranſome, as hath bëene euer accuſtomed. And being at the ſame time a ſurſeſance made on both ſides, at the ſute of the ſaid Leirmouth foꝛ a ſeaſon; the Scots ceaſſed not to make ſundꝛe inuaſions into our realme, in ſuch wiſe as we were compelled to foꝛget faire woꝛds, and onelie to conſider the king of Scots déeds, which appeared vnto vs of that ſoꝛt, as they ought not foꝛ our dutie in defenſe of our ſubiects, ne could not in reſpect of our honoꝛ, be paſſed ouer vnreforꝛmed: and theꝛefoꝛe put in a readineſſe our armie, as a due meane whereby we might atteine ſuch a peace, as foꝛ the ſafegard of our ſubiects we be bound to pꝛocure.

After which pꝛeparation made, and knowledge had thereof, the king of Scots ceaſſed not to vſe his accuſtomed meane of faire woꝛds, which in our naturall inclination wꝛought exſcuſes their accuſtomed effect, euermoꝛe deſirous to find in the king of Scots ſuch regard & reſpect to be declared in déeds, as the coꝛreſpondence of naturall loue in the nephue to ſuch an vncle, as we haue ſhewed our ſelfe toward him, doth require. Wherefoꝛe vpon new requeſt and ſute made vnto vs, we determined to ſtaie our armie

" mie at Yorke, appointing the duke of Norffolke our
" lieutenant, the Lord priuie ſeale, the biſhop of Dur" ham, and the maiſter of our horſſes, there to com-
" men, treat, and conclude with the ambaſſadors of " Scotland, for an amitie and peace, vpon ſuch condi" tions, as by reaſon and equitie were indifferent,
" whereby the warre might be eſchewed, being by ſun-
" drie inuaſions of the Scots then opened & manifeſt.
" In this communication betweene our and their " commiſſioners, after diuerſe degrées of commiſſion
" ſhewed by the Scots, and finallie one that was by " our commiſſioners allowed, matters were propo-
" ned for concluſion of amitie, nothing difficill or hard
" of our part, but ſo agréeable to reaſon, as the com-" miſſioners of Scotland ſaid they doubted not, but " if it might be brought to paſſe that the king of Scots
" our nephue might haue a méeting with vs, all mat" ters ſhould eaſilie be compounded and determined:
" whereupon they left ſpeaking of anie articles of a-
" mitie, and the ambaſſadors of Scotland made much " outward ioy in communication of meeting. They
" ſhewed themſelues in words, faſhion, and behauior
" much to delight in it, to reioiſe in it, and therewith
" thought it eaſie and facile to be concluded and ac" compliſhed, and for their part they toke it then for a " thing paſſed, a thing concluded, and moſt certeine to " take effect, and onelie deſired ſix daies to obteine an-
" ſwer from their maiſter, and our armie, from that " time to ſtaie and go no further: whereunto our com-
" miſſioners then agréed.
" After theſe ſix daies was ſent a commiſſion out " of Scotland, with power to conclude a méeting pre-
" ciſelie at ſuch a place, as they knew well we ſhould
" not, nor could not in winter obſerue & kéepe. Where-
" with when our commiſſioners were miſcontent,
" the ambaſſadors of Scotland to relieue that diſplea-
" ſure, and to temper the matter whereby to win more " time, ſhewed forth their inſtructions, wherein liber-
" tie was giuen to the ambaſſadours to exceed their " commiſſion in the appointment of the place, and to " conſent to anie other that by our commiſſioners
" ſhould be thought conuenient. Which maner of pro-
" céeding when our commiſſioners refuſed, alledging
" that they would not conclude a méeting with men
" hauing no commiſſion thereunto: the ambaſſadors
" of Scotland vpon pretenſe to ſend for a more am" ple and large commiſſion, agréeable to their inſtruc-
" tions for appointment of the place, obteined a de-
" laie of other ſix daies, to ſend for the ample commiſ-
" ſion without reſtraint of place.
" Now after theſe ſix daies they brought forth a " new commiſſion, made in a good forme, and without " exception: but therewith alſo they ſhewed new in-" ſtructions, conteining ſuch a reſtraint as the former " commiſſion did conteine, ſo as the libertie giuen to
" the commiſſioners in the commiſſion was now at
" the laſt removed and taken awaie by the inſtructi-
" ons, with addition of a ſpeciall charge to the ambaſ" ſadors, not to exceed the ſame. And thus, firſt the am-
" baſſadors of Scotland ſeemed to haue a will and de-
" ſire to conclude on a place ſeemelie and conuenient,
" which for want of commiſſion they might not do,
" and at the laſt might haue concluded a méeting by
" vertue of their commiſſion; and then for feare of the " commandement in their ſecond inſtructions they
" durſt not. And ſo they ſhewed their firſt inſtructions
" partlie to excuſe their king, who ſhould ſéeme ſecret-
" lie to will more than in the commiſſion he did open-
" lie profeſſe.
" Then with an ample commiſſion from the king,
" they ſhewed their ſecret inſtructions for defenſe of " themſelues, why they proceeded not according to " their commiſſion, not caring how much they char" ged therein the king, whoſe fault they diſcloſed to diſ-charge themſelues, truſting that by the benefit of the winter approching, and the time loſt in their com- " munication, their maiſter ſhould be defended a- " gainſt our power for this yéere, without doing for " their part that by honor, right, law, and leagues they "
be obliged and bound to do. And in this meane time our ſubiects being taken priſoners in Scotland, " could not be delinered vpon any ranſome, contrarie to all cuſtome and vſage of the borderers in the time " of peace and warre: and in this meane time ſtaied a " great part of out armie alreadie preſſed, and in our "
wages to go forward.
In this time ambaſſadors (as ye haue heard) aſ- " ſembled to talke of an amitie, but concluded none. "
The treating of amitie was put ouer by communi- " cation of a méeting. The communication of méeting " was ſo handled by alteration of commiſſion and in- " ſtructions on their behalfe, as it appeareth a plaine deuiſe onelie inuented for a delaie, which hath giuen " vs light, whervpon more certeinly to iudge the king " of Scots inward affection toward vs: whoſe deeds " and words well weied and conſidered, do vs plain- " lie to vnderſtand, how he hath continuallie labored to abuſe vs with ſweet and pleaſant words, and to ſa- " tiſfie the appetites of other at home and abroad with " his vnkind and diſpleaſant deeds. In his words he profeſſeth an indiſſoluble amitie, he allegeth kinred, " he acknowledgeth benefits; onlie the fault is, that he " ſpeaketh another language to all the world in deeds, " and thereby ſo toucheth vs in honor and denegation " of iuſtice, as we be inforced and compelled to vſe the ſword, which God hath put in our hands as an ex- " treme remedie, whereby to obteine both quietneſſe for our ſubiects, and alſo that is due to vs by right, pacts, and leagues. "
We haue patientlie ſuffered manie deluſions, " and notablie the laſt yéere, when we made prepara- " tion at Yorke for his repaire to vs. But ſhould we " ſuffer our people and ſubiects to be ſo oft ſpoiled " without remedie? This is done by the Scots, what- " ſoeuer their words be. Should we ſuffer our rebels to be deteined contrarie to the leagues without re- " medie? This is alſo done by them, whatſoeuer their " words be. Should we ſuffer our land to be vſurped contrarie to our moſt plaine euidence, onelie vpon a " will, pride and arrogancie of the other partie? This " is done by them whatſoeuer their words be. All theſe " be ouer preſumptuouſlie done againſt vs, and giue ſuch ſignification of their arrogancie, as it is neceſ- " ſarie for vs to oppreſſe it in the beginning, leaſt they " ſhould gather further courage, to the greater diſplea- " ſure of vs and our poſteritie hereafter. And yet in the intreating of this matter, if we had not euidentlie " perceiued the lacke of ſuch affection as proximitie of " bloud ſhould require; we would rather haue remit- " ted theſe iniuries in reſpect of proximitie of bloud, to our nephue, than we did tofore his fathers inuaſion. "
But weieng that we be ſo ſuerlie aſcerteined of "
the lacke thereof, and that our bloud is there frozen with the cold aire of Scotland, there was neuer " prince more violentlie compelled to war, than we be "
by the vnkind dealing, vniuſt behauior, & vnprince- " lie demeanor of him, that yet in nature is our nephue, & in his acts and deeds declareth himſelfe not to " be moued therwith, nor to haue ſuch earneſt regard " to the obſeruation of his pacts & leagues, nor ſuch re- " ſpect to the interteinment of the adminiſtration of iuſtice, as naturall equitie bindeth, & conſeruation of " equitie requireth. Which we much lament & be ſorie for, & vſe now our force and puiſſance againſt him, " not for reuengement of our priuate diſpleaſure (be- " ing ſo often deliuered as we haue béene) but for re- " couerie of our right, the preſeruation of our ſubiects " from iniuries, and the obſeruation of ſuch leagues " as

"as haue paſſed betweene vs, firmelie truſting, that
" almightie God, vnder whome we reigne, will aſſiſt
" & aid our iuſt proceedings herein, to the furtherance
" and aduancement of the right, which we doubt not
" ſhall euer preuaile againſt wrong, falſhod, deceipt,
" and diſſimulation.

Hitherto appeareth how this preſent warre hath " not proceeded of anie demand of our right of our ſu-
" perioritie, which the kings of Scots haue alwaies
" knowledged by homage and fealtie to our progeni" tors euen from the beginning: but this warre hath
" béene prouoked and occaſioned vpon preſent mat" ter of diſpleaſure, preſent iniurie, preſent wrong mi-
" niſtred by the nephue to the vncle moſt vnnatural-
" lie, and ſupported contrarie to the deſerts of our be" nefits moſt vnkindlie, if we had minded the poſſeſſi-
" on of Scotland, and by the motion of warre to at-
" teine the ſame, there was neuer king of this realme
" had more opportunitie in the minoritie of our ne-
" phue, nor in anie other realme a prince that hath
" more iuſt title, more euident title, more certeine
" title, to any realme that he can claime, than we haue
" to Scotland.

" This title is not deuiſed by pretenſe of mariage,
" nor imagined by couenant, nor contriued by inuen-
" tion of argument, but lineallie deſcended from the " beginning of that eſtate eſtabliſhed by our proge-
" tors, and recogniſed ſucceſſiuelie of the kings of " Scotland, by deeds, words, acts, and writings conti-
" nuallie almoſt without interruption, or at the leaſt
" intermiſſion, till the reigne of our progenitor king
" Henrie the firſt, in whoſe time the Scots abuſed the " ciuill warre of this realme, to their licence and bold-
" neſſe, in omitting of their dutie: which for the proxi" mitie of bloud betwene vs, we haue béene ſlacke to " require of them, being alſo of our ſelfe inclined to " peace, as we haue euer bæne alwaies glad, rather
" without preiudice to omit to demand our right if it " might conſerue peace, than by demanding thereof
" to be séene to moue warre, ſpeciallie againſt our " neighbour, againſt our nephue, againſt him whome
" we haue preſerued from danger, and in ſuch a time
" as it were expedient for all chriſtendome to be in v" nitie and peace, whereby to be more able to reſiſt the " common enimie the Turke.

" But for what conſiderations we haue omitted
" to ſpeake hitherto of the matter, it is neuertheleſſe
" true, that the kings of Scots haue alwaies acknow" ledged the kings of England ſuperior lords of the " realme of Scotland, & haue done homage and feal-
" tie for the ſame. This appereth firſt in hiſtories writ" ten by ſuch, as for confirmation of the truth in me-
" morie haue trulie noted and ſignified the ſame. Se-
" condlie, it appeareth by inſtruments of homage
" made by the kings of Scots, and diuerſe notable
" perſonages of Scotland, at diuerſe & ſundrie times
" ſealed with their ſeales, and remaining in our trea-
" ſurie. Thirdlie, it appeareth by regiſters and re" cords iudiciallie and autenticallie made, yet preſer-
" ued for confirmation of the ſame. So as the mat" ter of title béeing moſt plaine, is furniſhed alſo
" with all maner of euidences for declaration there-
" of.

" Firſt, as concerning hiſtories, which be called " witneſſes of times, the light of truth, and the life of " memorie, and finallie the conuenient way & meane
" whereby the things of antiquitie may be brought to
" mens knowledge, they ſhew as plainlie this matter
" as could be wiſhed or required, with ſuch a conſent
" of writers as could not ſo agree vpon an vntruth,
" conteining a declaration of ſuch matter as hath
" moſt euident probabilitie and apparance. For as it " is probable and likelie, that for the better adminiſtra-
" tion of iuſtice amongeſt rude people, two or more of one eſtate might be rulers in one countrie, vnited as this Ile is: ſo it is probable and likelie, that in " the beginning it was ordered for auoiding diſſen- " tion, that there ſhould be one ſuperiour, in right of "
whom the ſaid eſtates ſhould depend. "

According whereunto we read, how Brute, of " whome the realme then called Britaine toke firſt " that name (being before that time inhabited with gi- " ants, a people without order or ciuilitie) had three " ſonnes, Locrine, Albanact, and Camber, who deter- " mining to haue the whole Ile within the ocean ſea " to be after gouerned by them three, appointed Alba- " nact to rule that now is called Scotland, Camber " the parties of Wales, and Locrine that now is cal- " led England: vnto whom (as being the eldeſt ſonne) " the other two brethren ſhould doo homage, recogni- " ſing and knowledging him as their ſuperior. Now " conſider, if Brute conquered all this Iland, as the " hiſtorie ſaith he did, and then in his owne time made " this order of ſuperioritie as afore; how can there be a " title deuiſed of a more plaine beginning, a more iuſt " beginning, a more conuenient beginning, for the or- " der of this Iland, at that time ſpeciallie, when the " people were rude? Which cannot without continuall " ſtrife and variance conteine two or three rulers in "
all points equall without any maner of ſuperioritie, " the inward conſcience and remorſe of which ſuperio- " ritie ſhould in ſome part dull and diminiſh the per- " uerſe courage of reſiſtance and rebellion. "

The firſt diuiſion of this Ile, we find written after " this ſort, without cauſe of ſuſpicion why they ſhould " write amiſſe. And according hereunto we find alſo " in hiſtorie ſet forth by diuerſe, how for tranſgreſſion " againſt this ſuperioritie, our predeceſſors haue cha- " ſtiſed the kings of Scots, and ſome depoſed, and put "
other in their places. We will here omit to ſpeake " of the rudeneſſe of the antiquitie in particularitie, " which they cared not diſtinctlie to commit to writing. "
But ſome authors, as Antonius Sabellicus, amongſt " other, diligentlie ſearching what he might trulie " write of all Europe and the Ilands adioining, ouer " and beſides that which he writeth of the natures, ma- " ners, and conditions of the Scots, which who ſo liſt to " read, ſhall find to haue béene the verie ſame in times " paſt, that we find them now at this preſent: he cal- " leth Scotland, part of England, which is agréeable to " the diuiſion aforeſaid, being in déed as in the land " continuall without ſeparation of the ſea, ſo alſo by " homage and fealtie vnited vnto the ſame; as by par- " ticular declarations ſhall moſt manifeſtlie appére, " by the teſtimonie of ſuch as haue left writing for " proofe and confirmation thereof. "

In which matter, paſſing the death of king Hum- " ber, the acts of Dunwald king of this realme of "
England, the diuiſion of Beline and Bren two bre- " thren, the victories of king Arthur; we ſhall begin at " the yéere of our Lord, nine hundred, which is ſix hun- " dred fortie two yeeres paſt, a time of ſufficient anci- " entie, from which we ſhall make ſpeciall declaration " and euident proofe of the execution of our right and "
title of ſuperioritie euermore continued and preſer- " ued hitherto. Edward the firſt, before the conqueſt, " ſonne to Alured king of England, had vnder his do- " minion and obedience the king of Scots. And héere " is to be noted, that this matter was ſo notorious and " manifeſt, as Marian a Scot, writing that ſtorie in " thoſe daies, graunteth, confeſſeth, & teſtifieth the ſame: " and this dominion continued in that ſtate three and "
twentie yéeres. "

At which time Athelſtane ſucceéded in the crowne " of England, and hauing by battell conquered Scot- " land, he made one Conſtantine king of that partie, " to rule and gouerne the countrie of Scotland vnder " him, adding this princelie word, that it was more "

honorable to him to make a king, than to be a king. Twentie foure yéeres after that, which was the yéere of our Lord 947, king Edred our progenitor Athelſtanes brother, take homage of Iriſe then king of Scots. Thirtie yéeres after that, which was in the yéere of our Lord 977, king Edgar our predeceſſor take homage of Kinald king of Scots. Yeere was a little trouble in England by the death of ſaint Edward king and martyr, deſtroied by the deceit of his mother in law. But yet within memorie, fortie yéers after the homage doone by Kinald to king Edgar, that is to ſay, in the yéere of our Lord 1018, Malcolme king of Scots did homage to Knute our predeceſſor.

After this homage doone, the Scots vttered ſome péece of their naturall diſpoſition: whereupon, by warre made by our progenitor ſaint Edward the confeſſor, twentie nine yéeres after homage doone, that is to ſay, the yéere of our Lord 1056, Malcolme king of Scots was vanquiſhed, and the realme giuen to Malcolme his ſonne, by our ſaid progenitor ſaint Edward: to whome the ſaid Malcolme made homage and fealtie, within eleuen yeeres after that William Conqueror entered this realme, whereof he accounted no perfect conqueſt, vntill he had likewiſe ſubdued the Scots. And therefore in the ſaid yéere, which was in the yéere of our Lord 1068, the ſaid Malcolme king of Scots did homage to the ſaid William Conqueror, as his ſuperior by conqueſt king of England. Twentie fiue yéeres after that, which was in the yéere of our Lord 1092, the ſaid Malcolme did homage and fealtie to William Rufus, ſonne to the ſaid William Conqueror: and yet after that was for his offenſes and demerits depoſed, and his ſonne ſubſtitute in his place, who likewiſe failed of his dutie: and therefore was ordeined in that eſtate (by the ſaid William Rufus) Edgar, brother to the laſt Malcolme, and ſonne to the firſt, who did homage and fealtie accordinglie.

Seuen yéeres after, that was in the yéere of our Lord 1097, the ſaid Edgar K. of Scots did homage vnto Henrie the firſt our progenitor. Thirtie ſeauen yéeres after that, Dauid king of Scots did homage to Mathild the empreſſe, as daughter and heire to Henrie the firſt. Wherefore, being after required by Stephan, then obteining poſſeſſion of the realme, to make his homage; he refuſed ſo to do, becauſe he had before made it to the ſaid Mathild, and thereupon forbare. After which Dauids death, which inſued ſhortlie after, the ſonne of the ſaid Dauid made homage to the ſaid king Stephan. Fourteene yéeres after that, which was in the yéere of our Lord, a thouſand one hundred and fiftie, William king of Scots, and Dauid his brother, with all the nobles of Scotland, made homage to Henrie the ſeconds ſonne, with a reſeruation of their dutie to Henrie the ſecond his father. Twentie fiue yéeres after, which was in the yéere of our Lord 1175, William king of Scotland, after much rebellion & reſiſtance, according to their naturall inclination, king Henrie the ſecond then being in Normandie, William then king of Scots knowledged finallie his error, and made his peace and compoſition, confirmed with his great ſeale, and the ſeales of the nobilitie of Scotland, making therewith his homage and fealtie.

Within fifteene yeeres after that, which was the yeere of our Lord 1190, the ſaid William king of Scots came to our citie of Canturburie, and there did homage to our noble progenitor king Richard the firſt. Fourteene yeeres after that, the ſaid William did homage to our progenitor king Iohn, vpon a hill beſides Lincolne, making his oth vpon the croſſe of Hubert then archbiſhop of Canturburie, being there preſent, a marueilous multitude aſſembled for that purpoſe. Twentie ſix yéeres after that, which was in the yéere of our Lord 1216, Alexander king of Scots maried Margaret, the daughter of our progenitor Henrie the third, at our citie of Yorke, in the feaſt of Chriſtmaſſe, at which time the ſaid Alexander did his homage to our ſaid progenitor, who reigned in this realme fiftie ſix yéers. And therfore betweene the homage made by the ſaid Alexander king of Scots, and the homage doone by Alexander, ſonne to the ſaid king of Scots, to Edward the firſt at his coronation at Weſtminſter, there was about fiftie yéers: at which time the ſaid Alexander king of Scots repaired to the ſaid feaſt of coronation, and there did his dutie, as is aforeſaid. Within twentie eight yéeres after that, which was in the yéere of our Lord 1282, Iohn Baliol king of Scots made his homage and fealtie to the ſaid king Edward the firſt our progenitor.

After this began Robert Bruſe to vſurpe the crowne of Scotland, and to mooue ſedition therefore againſt them of the houſe of Baliol, which made for a ſeaſon ſome interruption in the ſaid homage; but yet no intermiſſion without the termes of memorie: for within fortie foure yéeres after, which was the yéere of our Lord 1326, Edward Baliol after a great victorie had in Scotland againſt the other faction, and inioieng the crowne of Scotland, made homage to our progenitor Edward the third. And twentie yéeres after that, which was in the yeere of our Lord 1346, Dauid Bruſe, who was euer in the contrarie faction, did neuertheleſſe in the title of the crowne of Scotland, whereof he was then in poſſeſſion, make homage to our ſaid progenitor Edward the third.

Within nine yeeres after this, Edward the third, to chaſtiſe the infidelitie of the Scots, made warre againſt them: when after great victories, Edward Baliol, hauing the iuſt and right title to the realme of Scotland, ſurrendred clearlie the ſame to our ſaid progenitor, at the towne of Roxburgh in Scotland, where our ſaid progenitor accepted the ſame, and then cauſed himſelfe to be crowned king of Scotland, and for a time interteined it, and inioied it, as verie proprietarie and owner of the realme: as on the one part by confiſcation acquited, and on the other part by free will ſurrendred vnto him. And then after the death of our ſaid progenitor Edward the third, began ſeditions and inſurrections in this our realme, in the time of our progenitor Richard the ſecond, which was augmented by the alteration of the ſtate of the ſaid Richard, and the reuolution of the ſame to Henrie the fourth: ſo as the Scots had ſome leaſure to plaie their pagines, and follow their accuſtomed manner. And yet Henrie the fift, for recouerie of his right in France, commanded the king of Scots to attend vpon him in that iourneie.

In this time, the realme of Scotland being deſcended to the houſe of the Stewards, of which our nephue directlie commeth: Iames Steward king of Scots, in the yéere of our Lord 1423, made homage to Henrie the ſixt at Windſore, which homage was diſtant from the time of the other homage made by Dauid Bruſe, three ſcore yéeres and more, but farre within the freſh memorie of man. All which homages and fealties as they appeare by ſtorie to haue beene made and doone at times and ſeaſons as afore, ſo do there remaine inſtruments made thereupon, and ſealed with the ſeales of the kings of Scotland, reſtifieng the ſame. And yet doth it appeare by ſtorie, how the Scots practiſed to ſteale out of our treaſurie diuerſe of theſe inſtruments, which neuertheleſſe were afterward recouered againe.

And to the intent ye may know of what forme and tenure the ſaid inſtruments be, heere is inſerted the

"the effect in word and ſentence as they be made,
"which we dow, to meet with the cauillation and contri-
"ued euaſion of the Scots, alleging the homage to
"haue bæne made for the earledome of Huntington,
"which is as true as the allegation of him that is
"burnt in the hand, to ſay he was cut with a ſickle.
"And therefore the tenure of the homage is this.

The forme of the homage.

"I John K. king of Scots ſhall be "true and faithfull vnto you lord
"Edward by the grace of God K.
"of England, the noble & ſuperiour
"lord of the kingdome of Scotland, as vn-
"to you I make my fidelitie of the ſame
"kingdome of Scotland, the which I hold &
"claime to hold of you. And I ſhall beare
"to you my faith and fidelitie of life and lim,
"and worldlie honor, againſt all men; and
"faithfullie I ſhall knowledge, and ſhall dow
"to you ſeruice due to you of the kingdome
"of Scotland afore ſaid: as God ſo helpe
"and theſe holie euangeliſts.

"Now for the third part, touching records and regi-
"ſters, we haue them ſo formall, ſo autenticall, ſo ſe-
"rioſlie handled, and with ſuch circumſtances decla"ring the matters, as they be and ought to be a great "corroboration of that hath bene in ſtories written "& reported in this matter. For among other things
"we haue the ſolemne act and iudiciall proceſſe of our
"progenitor Edward the firſt, in diſcuſſion of the title
"of Scotland, when the ſame was challenged by 12
"competitors (that is to ſaie) Florentius comes
"Holandie, Patricius de Dunbar comes de Mer-
"chia, Willielmus de Veſci, Willielmus de Roſſe, "Robertus de Pinkeni, Nicholaus de Soules, Pa-
"tricius Galightlie, Rogerus de Mundeuile, Joan-
"nes de Comin, D. Joannes de Haſtings, Joannes
"de Balliolo, Robertus de Bruſe, Ericius rex Norwe-
"gie.

"Finallie, after a great conſultation and ma"ture deliberation, with diſcuſſion of the allegations
"proponed on all parts, ſentence was giuen for the ti"tle of Balioll, according whereunto he inioied the "realme. But for confirmation of the dutie of the ho"mage before that time obſerued by the K. of Scots,
"it appeareth in thoſe records, how when thoſe compe"titors of the realme of Scotland repaired to our "progenitor, as to the chiefe lord for diſcuſſion of the
"ſame, inſomuch as the authoritie of the iudgement
"to be giuen depended thereupon; it was then or"dered that the whole parlement of Scotland, ſpirituall
"& temporall, & of all degrees aſſembled for that pur"poſe, and conſidering vpon what ground & founda"tion the kings of Scotland had in times paſt made
"the ſaid homages and recognition of ſuperioritie, the
"ſaid parlement finding the ſame good & true, ſhould
"(if they ſo deemed it) yéeld and giue place, and by ex-
"preſſe conſent recogniſe the ſame.

"At which parlement was alleged vnto them, as "appeareth in the ſame records, not onelie theſe acts
"of the princes before thoſe daies, and before rehear"ſed: but alſo beſides the teſtimonie of ſtories, the "writings and letters of forren princes at that time
"reciting and rehearſing the ſame. Whereupon the "ſaid parlement did there agree to this our ſuperiori-
"tie, and inſuing their determination did particular-
"lie and ſeuerallie make homage & fealtie with pro"clamation, that whoſoeuer withdrew himſelfe from "doing his duetie therein, ſhould be reputed as a re-
"bell. And ſo all made homage and fealtie to our pro"genitor Edward the firſt. And the realme of Scotland was in the time of the diſcuſſion of the title ruled by gardians deputed by him. All caſtels and holds were ſurrendred to him, as to the ſuperiour lord in the time of vacation. Benefices, offices, fées, promotions paſſed in that time from the méere gift of our ſaid progenitor, as in the right of this crowne of England. Shiriffes named and appointed, writs, and precepts made, obeied, and executed.

Finallie, all that we dow now in the duchie of Lancaſter, the ſame did our progenitor for the time of the contention for that title in the realme of Scotland, by the conſent of an agréement of all eſtates of the realme aſſembled and conſulted with for that purpoſe. At which time the biſhops of ſaint Andrews and Glaſcow were not (as they now be) archbiſhops;
but recogniſed the archbiſhop of Yorke, which extended ouer all that countrie. Now if the Scots will take exception to the homage of their princes as made in warre, and by force, which is not true; what will they ſay, or can they for ſhame allege againſt their owne parlement, not of ſome but of all confirmed, & teſtified by their writings and ſeales; whereunto nothing inforced them but right and reaſon, being paſſed in peace and quiet without armor & compulſion? If they ſay they did it not, they ſpeake like themſelues; if they ſay they did it, then dow they now like themſelues, to withdraw their dutie, not ſo much to be blamed, as to be amended.

Thus appeareth vnto you the beginning of the right of ſuperioritie, with a perpetuall continuance, without intermiſſion within memorie. Certeine omiſſions and forbearings vpon the grounds and oc-caſions before ſpecified we denie not, whereby they haue manie times ſought and taken their opportunities to withdraw the doing of their duetie in knowledge of our ſuperioritie ouer them; which to auoid, they haue not cared what they ſaid or alleged, though it were neuer ſo vntrue, lieng alwaies in wait when they might annoie this realme, not without their owne great danger & perill, & alſo extreame detriment. But as they detracted the doing of their du-tie, ſo God granted vnto this realme force to com-pell them thereunto within memorie, and notwithſtanding anie their interruption by reſiſtance, which vnto the time of our progenitor Henrie the firſt neuer endured ſo long as it made intermiſſion within time of mind, whereby the poſſeſſion might ſéeme to be empaired. From the time of Henrie the firſt, vnto the ſeuenth yeare of our reigne, our realme hath béene for a ſeaſon lacerat and torne by diuerſitie of titles, till our time; and ſince alſo by warre outward-lie vered and troubled. The ſtorie is ſo lamentable for ſome part therof, as were too tedious to rehearſe.

Since the death of our progenitor Henrie the firſt, our grandfather Edward the fourth reigned, who after great trauels to atteine quietnes in his realme, finallie in the time of preparation of warre againſt Scotland died. Richard the third, then vſurped for a ſmall time in yeares, whome the king our father by the ſtrength of Gods hand ouerthrew in battell, and moſt iuſtlie atteined the poſſeſſion of this relme, who neuertheleſſe, after the great tempeſtuous ſtormes, finding all matters not yet brought to perfect quiet and reſt, ceaſſed and forbare to require of the Scots to dow their dutie; thinking it policie rather for that time to aſſaie to tame their nature by pleaſant coniunction & conuerſation of affinitie, than to charge them with their fault, & require dutie of them, when opportunitie ſerued not by force & feare to conſtreine and compell them. And thus paſſed ouer the reigne of our father without demand of this homage. And being our reigne now foure and thirtie yeares, we were one and twentie yeares letted by our nephue his minoritie, being then more carefull how to bring him

him out of danger, to the place of a king, than to receiue of him homage, when he had full poſſeſſion of the ſame.

Wherefore being now paſſed, ſince the laſt homage made by the king of Scots, to our progenitor Henrie the firſt, 122 yeares, at which time the homage was done at Windſor by James Steward, then king of Scots, as before 56 of theſe yeares the crowne of this realme was in contention, the trouble wherof ingendred alſo ſome buſineſſe in the time of the king our father; which was three and thirtie yeares: and in our time one and twentie yeares hath paſſed in the minoritie of our nephue. So as finallie, the Scots reſorting to their onelie defenſe of diſcontinuance of poſſeſſion, can onelie allege iuſtlie but 13 yeares of ſilence in the time of our reigne, being all the other times ſince the homage done by James Steward, ſuch as the ſilence in them (had they béene neuer ſo long) could not haue ingendred preiudice to the loſſe of anie right that may yet be declared and proued due. For what can be imputed to king Edward for not demanding homage being in ſtrife for that eſtate, whereunto the homage was due? What ſhould Richard the third ſearch for homage in Scotland, that had neither right ne leaſure to haue homage done vnto him in England? Who can blame our father, knowing the Scots nature neuer to do their dutie but for feare; if he demanded not that of them, which they would eſchew if they might, ſéeing his realme not clearelie then purged from ill ſéed of ſedition, ſparkled and ſcattered in the cruell ciuill warres before.

Law and reaſon ſerueth, that the paſſing ouer of time not commodious, that the purpoſe is not allegeable in preſcription for the loſſe of anie right. And the minoritie of the king of Scots hath indured twentie one yéeres of our reigne, which being an impediment on their part, the whole preſcription of the Scots, if the matter were preſcriptible, is thus deduced euidentlie to thirteene yéere, which thirteene yéere without excuſe we haue ceaſſed and forborne to demand our dutie, like as the Scots haue likewiſe ceaſſed to offer and render the ſame: for which cauſe neuertheleſſe we do not enter this warre, ne minded to demand anie ſuch matter now, being rather deſirous to reioiſe and take comfort in the friendſhip of our nephue as our neighbour, than to moue matter vnto him of diſpleaſure, whereby to alienate ſuch naturall inclination of loue as he ſhould haue towards vs: but ſuch be the works of God ſuperior ouer all, to ſuffer occaſions to be miniſtred, whereby due ſuperioritie may be knowne, demanded, and required, to the intent that according thereunto all things gouerned in due order héere, we may to his pleaſure paſſe ouer this life to his honor and glorie, which he grant vs to do in ſuch reſt, peace, and tranquillitie, as ſhall be meet and conuenient for vs.

When therefore the king of England had ſet forth this declaration of the cauſes that moued him to make warre againſt Scotland, he prepared to proſecute the ſame both by ſea and land, and hauing rigged and furniſhed diuerſe ſhips of warre, he ſent the ſame forth to the ſea, that they might take ſuch Scotiſh ſhips as were to returne from their voiages made into France, Flanders, Denmarke, and other countries, whether they were gone for trade of merchandize, with which the Engliſh ſhips incountred, toke 28 of the principall ſhips of all Scotland, fraught with all kind of merchandize and rich wares, which they brought with them into the Engliſh ports.

Scotiſh ſhips taken.

The king of Scotland aduertiſed therof, ſent with all ſpéed an herald, deſiring reſtitution of his ſhips, as he thought ſtood with reaſon, ſéeing no war was proclamed: but the king of England thought it no reaſon to depart with them ſo ſone, till other articles of agréement might be concluded, and therefore refuſed not onelie to deliuer their ſhips, but alſo ſent ſir Robert Bowes with men to the borders, giuing him in charge to inuade Scotland, who according to his commiſſion, with thrée thouſand men rode into Scotland, and began to burne and to ſpoile certeine ſmall townes: whereupon the fraie being raiſed in the countrie, George Gordon the earle of Huntleie, who was appointed to remaine as lieutenant vpon the borders, for doubt of ſuch ſudden inuaſions, immediatlie gathered a number of borderers, and ſet vpon the Engliſhmen, and put them all to flight; ſir Robert Bowes, and his brother Richard Bowes, with diuers other, to the number of ſir hundred, were taken priſoners; and the ſaid ſir Robert Bowes and other the principall landed men were kept ſtill in Scotland till after the kings death. This victorie chanced to the Scots, at a place called Halden Rig in the Mers, vpon ſaint Bartholomewes day, which is the twentie fourth of Auguſt.

Sir Robert Bowes inuadeth the borders.

The earle of Huntleie giueth an ouerthrow to the Engliſhmen. 1542. Leſle.

After this, the king of England ſent the duke of Norffolke with the earles of Shrewesburie, Darbie, Cumberland, Surreie, Hertford, Angus, Rutland, and the lords of the north parts of England, with an armie of fortie thouſand men, as the Scots eſtéemed them, though they were not manie aboue twentie thouſand, who entered into Scotland the one and twentith of October, and burnt certeine townes vpon the ſide of the water of Twéed: but the earle of Huntleie, hauing with him ten thouſand of the borderers and other, ſo waited vpon them, giuing them now and then ſkirmiſhes and alarms, that they came not paſt two miles from the water of Twéed within the Scotiſh bounds at that ſeaſon.

In the meane time, the king of Scotland being aduertiſed héereof, gathered a great armie through all the parts of his realme, and came to Sowtrais hedge, where they muſtered, and were numbred to be thirtie ſix thouſand men, with the which he came to Falla Mure, and there incamped, determining to giue battell to the Engliſhmen, as he pretended: howbeit, if the duke had taried longer, as it was thought he would haue done, if the time of the yéere and prouiſion of vittels had ſerued, the Scots would yet haue béene better aduiſed, before they had ioined with him in a pight field. But true it is, that after the duke had remained there ſo long as vittels might be had and recouered from anie part, he retired with his armie backe into England, not without ſome loſſe of men, horſſes, and ſpoiles, which the Scots vnder the earle of Huntleie and others toke from the Engliſhmen in that their retire, ſpeciallie as they paſſed ouer the riuer of Twéed.

After the Engliſhmen were thus departed and withdrawne home forth of Scotland, king James being of an high and manlie courage, in reuenge of harmes done by the Engliſhmen within his countrie, thought good that his whole armie ſhould paſſe forward and inuade England, himſelfe to go therewith in proper perſon. And héerein he requeſted the conſent of his nobilitie, who after long reaſoning, and good aduiſement taken in the matter, gaue anſwer [by the earle of Murrey] to the king in this ſort, that they could not thinke it good that they ſhould paſſe within England, and to ſeeke battell, the king himſelfe being with them, conſidering that his two ſons were latelie deceaſſed, ſo that he had no ſucceſſion of his bodie: for in caſe that they loſt the field, as in chance of battell is moſt vncerteine, then the king of England hauing great ſubſtance, might therwith follow the victorie, and put the realme of Scotland in great hazard.

Therefore

Therefore they thought it ſufficient to defend their owne bounds, and to conſtreine the enimie for feare to leaue the inuaſion thereof, as preſentlie they had done; and declared that they were determined to haue giuen battell to their enimies, if they had continued within the realme, and doubted not by the helpe of God, they hauing ſo iuſt a cauſe, and being inuaded in their countrie, but that they ſhould haue obteined the victorie. The king hearing their determination, albeit his high courage preſſed him to inuade; yet the approued wit of his nobles and councellors cauſed him to follow their aduiſe, and ſo returned with his armie backe againe, the firſt of November, the armie of England being firſt diſcharged, and the duke of Norffolke in his returne towards London.

The king breaketh vp his armie.

Shortlie after, the king of Scotland went himſelfe in perſon to the weſt marches of his realme, where the lord Marwell was warden, whome togither with the earles of Caſſiles, and Glencarne [the lord Fleming] and certeine other lords there with him, the king appointed to inuade the Engliſh marches on that ſide, taking with them the power of the borders, and ſent alſo with them Oliuer Sincler [the brother of Roſſeline Comarch] and the reſidue of the gentlemen of his houſhold. Theſe earles and lords entering into England on ſaint Katharines euen, being the foure and twentith of November, began to burne certeine townes vpon the water of Eſke. But as ſone as the ſcrie was raiſed in the countrie, the lord Wharton warden of the weſt marches of England, ſuddenlie raiſed the power of the countrie, and came to a little hill, where they ſhewed themſelues in ſight vnto the Scotiſh armie.

Oliuer Sincler.

The lord wharton.

The Scotiſh lords perceiuing the Engliſhmen gathered, aſſembled themſelues togither, and inquired who was lieutenant generall there by the kings appointment; and incontinentlie Oliuer Sincler was holden vp on two mens ſhoulders, where he ſhewed forth the kings commiſſion, inſtituting him lieutenant to the king of that armie. But howſoeuer that was read, the earles and lords there preſent, thought themſelues imbaſed too much, to haue ſuch a meane gentleman aduanced in authoritie aboue them all, and therefore determined not to fight vnder ſuch a capteine, but willinglie ſuffered themſelues to be ouercome, and ſo were taken by the Engliſhmen, not ſhewing anie countenance of defenſe to the contrarie, and without ſlaughter of anie one perſon on either ſide.

The enuie of the lords againſt Oliuer Sincler.

The Scots diſcomfited by the Engliſhmen.

This rode was called Solowaie Moſſe, at the which were taken priſoners men of name, theſe perſons following: the earle of Caſſiles and Glencarne, the lord Marwell, the lord Fleming, the lord Someruile, the lord Olifant, Oliuer Sincler, the lord of Craggie, and ſundrie other gentlemen, the which were led priſoners to London, where they remained till after the king was dead. The king being in Carlauerocke vpon the borders not farre from Solowaie Moſſe, when this misfortune fell vpon his men: after he heard thereof, he was meruelouſlie amazed, the more, in calling to remembrance the refuſall made by his nobles, aſſembled with him in campe at Falla vpon his requeſt to inuade England. Herewith ſuch an impreſſion entered his mind, that he thought with himſelfe that all his whole nobilitie had conſpired againſt him, and therevpon toke ſuch a vehement and high diſpleaſure, increaſed with a melancholious thought, that he departed ſuddenlie from thence to Edenburgh, and after remoued to Falkeland, where he remained as a man deſolate of comfort, being ſore vexed in ſpirit and bodie, and would not permit anie manner of perſon to haue acceſſe to him, his ſecret & familiar ſeruants onelie excepted.

The griefe of the king for the ouerthrow of his men.

Now, as he was thus diſquieted, newes were brought him that the queene his wife was brought to bed of a faire yong princeſſe the ſeuenth day of December, the which newes he liked verie euill; and added the griefe thereof to his former diſpleaſantneſſe, inſomuch that he perceiued the end of his life to approch, and withall ſaid, that he foreſaw great trouble to come vpon the realme of Scotland, for the purſuit which the king of England was like to make therevpon againſt the ſame, to the end he might bring it vnder his ſubiection, either by mariage, or by ſome other meane. It was reported that he was diſquieted with ſome vnkindlie medicine: but howſoeuer the matter was, he yelded vp his ſpirit to almightie God, and departed this world the fourteenth of December, in the yere of our redemption, 1542, the thirtie three yere of his age, and thirtie two of his reigne.

The birth of the Scotiſh queene.

Shortlie after his departure, his bodie was conueied into Falkeland vnto Edenburgh in moſt honorable wiſe; the cardinall, the earles of Arrane, Argile, Rothes, Marſhall, and diuerſe other noblemen being preſent, and with all funerall pompe (as was requiſite) it was buried in the abbeie church of Holie rod houſe, beſide the bodie of queene Magdalen, daughter to the king of France, his firſt wife. There was great lamentation and mone made for his death throughout all parts of his realme, for he was verie well beloued among his ſubiects. * He was of ſweet countenance and courteous ſpech, graiſlie eied, hauing a diuine mind in all whatſoeuer, neither certeine in doubtfull things, nor doubtfull in things of certeintie, auoiding dangers with graue counſels, performing hard matters with great nobilitie of mind, and foreſeeing what might follow with an incredible iudgement: in ſuch ſort that hee was neuer vnprouided againſt the danger of anie thing, or was drawne from it by the difficultie thereof, or was hindered by the obſcuritie therein: whereby he might incurre the note either of a raſh, fearefull, or ſlow perſon.

Fr. Thin. Leſleus lib. 9. pag. 460.

All which ſingular commendations ſeemed to flow out of this ſpring, that he did not by heat of youth (raſhlie) but with great deliberation (ſoundlie) manage the whole affaires of the common-wealth. For as he did chieflie labor that his table might not exceed for gluttonie, nor be ouerſparing for miſerie: ſo if his apparell were decent, he eſteemed not the ſhew of womaniſh attire after the courtlie faſhion. He was ſo farre from pride, that he alwaies ſhewed himſelfe offended with the vſes thereof. He was an obſeruer of iuſtice, a defender of the law, and a ſharpe ſhield for the innocent and poore: for which cauſe he was of the nobilitie called the king of the commoners. For he ſet at libertie the poore oppreſſed with the tyrannie of the rich, and repreſſed the rich from ſpoiling of the poore: all which he did with a certeine ſeueritie, but yet ſuch, as in the ſame there appeared a wonderfull gentlenes of his naturall diſpoſition, bicauſe he ſeldome put anie of them to death, but did either by priſon or mulct puniſh the offenſe. For he was wont to ſay, that he would neuer take life from anie, but onelie to keepe the law ſound, and for the example of others: and to keepe downe the boldneſſe of ſuch as dwelt about the borders. With theſe conditions he left the realme plentifullie furniſhed with riches, and his owne treaſurie not emptie, but abundantly ſtored with gold, ſiluer and other furniture: for which cauſe it ſhould not ſeeme ſtrange, that his death was greatlie lamented of his ſubiects, to whom he was a perfect patrone, and a louing father.

Of whome alſo Buchanan lib. 14 writeth, that his vices did almoſt equall all his great vertues; but that they were rather to be imputed to the iniquitie of the time than the inclination of his nature, for the libertie of althings had then diſſolued the publike diſcipline, which could not be ſtaied but by great ſeueritie of correction. And this made him more couetous of monie, bicauſe that he was kept extreame hard when he was vnder the gouernment of others. Whereby, when he came to bée at libertie, he was anew to furniſh all his courts with houſhold ſtuffe, finding his houſes emptie, and all things conueied awaie: for his tutors had conſumed the kinglie patrimonie vpon thoſe whome he willinglie would not to haue receiued it. Beſides, for his exceſſe of women the fault grew by ſuch as were his tutors, who gaue him libertie therto, ſuppoſing therby to keepe him the longer in their danger. The nobilitie did not greatlie take his death grieuouſlie, bicauſe he had fined manie, impriſoned more, and cauſed no ſmall few (for auoiding his diſpleaſure) to flie into England, and rather to commit themſelues to the enimie than to his anger.)

The lord Leningſton.

Dauid Beton cardinall.

His forging of a will.

The proteſtants eſpied the cardinals craftie tugling.

1543 Leſle. Fr. Thin.

The eternall God calling to his mercie James king of Scotland, the fift of that name, Marie his onelie daughter and heire began hir reigne ouer the realme of Scotland, the eighteenth day of December, in the yéere of our Lord 1542, Francis the first of that name then reigning in France, & Henrie the eight ouer the Engliſhmen. She was not paſſing ſeuen daies old when hir father departing this life, left vnto hir his kingdome, hir mother lieng in childbed in the caſtell of Lithquo, of which place the lord Leuingſton being capteine, had the charge committed to him, both of the daughter & mother, with the mothers good agreement and frée conſent.

Moreouer, immediatlie after the kings death (bicauſe he deceaſſed without making anie will, or taking anie direction for the gouernement either of the realme, or cuſtodie of the yong queene his daughter) Dauid Beton, cardinall and archbiſhop of S. Andrews, the ſpeciall miniſter & factor of the French cauſes, to the aduancement and continuance thereof, inuented and forged [by Henrie Balfure] a will and teſtament of the late king now departed, in which (amongſt other things) he eſtabliſhed himſelfe chiefe regent, adioining with him the earles of Murrey, baſe brother to the king deceaſſed, Huntlete and Argile, not once mentioning the earle of Lennox then abſent in France, nor yet James Hamilton earle of Arrane his couſine, being there preſent in Scotland,

Thoſe that profeſſed the reformed religion, béeing then called proteſtants, to whome the ſaid cardinall was euer a cruell enimie and ſharpe ſcourge, eſpied forth his vniuſt dealing in this behalfe, and trufting by the gentle nature and good inclination of the ſaid earle of Arrane, to haue ſome libertie to imbrace the goſpell, ſet him againſt the cardinall: ſo that by the helpe of his owne and their friends, he remoued the cardinall and his adherents from the vſurped rome and authoritie, and therewith was the ſaid earle of Arrane proclamed gouernor and protector of the realme. [And therevpon ſhewing his authoritie, he entereth the kings palaces, as ſaith Leſleus lib. 10. pa. 464. and vſeth the kings treaſure, and calleth the officers of the treaſurie to account, whereof he reteineth ſome, and changeth others at his pleaſure.]

This earle of Arrane made a title to haue and inioie that office and rome, as next in bloud to the yong queene, as deſcended from a ſiſter of K. James the third, maried to his grandfather lord Hamilton, in the yere 1475, by reaſon of which mariage he was created earle of Arrane, as by act of parlement holden the ſame yeere at Edenburgh, it was agréed and ordeined. The king of England that noble prince Henrie the eight, aduertiſed of the death of the king of Scots, conſidered with good aduiſe, that now there was offered a moſt readie meane and iuſt occaſion, whereby the two realmes of England and Scotland might be brought into one entier monarchie, without warre or bloudſhed, by the mariage of his ſonne prince Edward, being then little paſt ſix yéeres of age, with the yong quéene of Scotland.

The king of England talketh with the lords of Scotland priſoners for a mariage betwixt his ſon and their queene.

He therefore being reſolued fullie to bring the ſame to paſſe, either by quiet meanes or by force, and ſending for the erles of Caſſiles, and Glencarne, the lords Marwell, and Fleming, and other priſoners that had bene taken at Soloway moſſe, cauſed them to be conueied vnto Hampton court, where the ſeuen and twentith of December they being right curteouſlie interteined, he made vnto them an ouerture of his purpoſe and whole intent, proponing the whole matter vnto them, requeſting them for their parts, to helpe (with their conſents) that a contract of mariage might be made betwéene his ſonne the prince, and their yong queene; promiſing to them libertie without ranſome, beſides other pleaſures and benefits, if they would dw their indeuor to perſuade the gouernor, and other the nobilitie of Scotland to be agréeable herevnto.

1543. Buch.

The Scotiſh earles and lords accepted the kings offer, and withall promiſed to dw their diligence to perſuade the reſt of the nobilitie in Scotland at their comming home: wherevpon they were licenced to depart, and ſo comming to Newcaſtell, remained there with the duke of Suffolke, then the kings lieutenant of the north parts, till he had receiued forth of Scotland certeine pledges of the chiefeſt of theſe lords, for performance of their promiſes. Likewiſe the king of England ſent with them the earle of Angus, and his brother ſir George Dowglas with his letters to the gouernor, requeſting effectuouſlie, that they might be reſtored to their rowmes, lands and poſſeſſions in that realme.

These lords arriuing at Edenburgh, about the midſt of Januarie, declared to the gouernor their meſſage and propoſition made by the king of England, with ſuch efficacie, that the gouernor being perſuaded thereto by their words, ſent for the lords and nobilitie of the realme to come to Edenburgh, to a conuention there, to be holden the ſeuen and twentith of that preſent moneth: where they concluded that a parlement ſhould be kept in March next inſuing. And doubting leſt the cardinall (being there preſent) ſhould go about to perſuade the nobilitie not to conſent to their deſires, they cauſed him to be put in ward within the caſtell of Dalketh: the lord Seton béeing appointed to haue the cuſtodie of him. About the ſame time, ſir Robert Bowes, and all other the Engliſhmen that were priſoners, and had béene taken at Halding rig on ſaint Bartholomews day (as before ye haue heard) were ſent home by the gouernor into England, and ſir Rafe Sadler was ſent ambaſſadour from king Henrie vnto the ſaid gouernor, and other the lords of Scotland, and came thither before the ſaid parlement, to perſuade the lords to agree vnto the king his maſters monitions, trauelling ſo diligentlie in the matters whereabout he was thus ſent, that it was concluded by act of parlement, to ſend ambaſſadors into England, for the better ſatisfaction of king Henries deſires.

In which meane time, ſuch couenants, contracts, and promiſes were had and concluded, paſſed and ſealed interchangeablie, as ſtood with the pleaſure and good liking of king Henrie, ſo as the mariage was fullie contracted, and a peace concluded for ten yeeres, by authoritie of the aforeſaid parlement. Herewith alſo the lord gouernor ſhewed himſelfe to imbrace the reformed religion, cauſing one frier Guilliam to preach againſt images, and fruitleſſe ceremonies, and gaue libertie that the bible called The new and old teſtament, ſhould be had in Engliſh, & vniuerſallie publiſht through the realme of Scotland.

Alſo he commanded not onelie the cardinall (as before ye haue heard) but alſo ordeined that the queene mother ſhould remaine in Lithgow with the yong queene hir daughter, vnder ſome manner of ſafe cuſtodie, and the cardinall to be remoued vnto his owne caſtell of ſaint Andrewes, with warders about him to ſee him ſafelie kept. * Not long after, the cardinall was reſtored to vnhoped libertie, and the earle of Angus, George Dowglaſſe, and the lord Glames, the heire of James Hamilton, with manie others, by the conſent of the three eſtates, were wholie reſtored to all their goods, and deliuered from the ſentence of baniſhment.

Fr. Thin. Leſleus. lib. 10. pag. 465.

John Hamilton abbat of Paſſelew, brother of the gouernor, returning out of France (where he had imploied himſelfe to ſtudie) did (with certeine learned men, as Dauid Paniter, and others, whom he had in his companie) viſit the king of England, of whome they were moſt courteouſlie interteined. After which this Hamilton returning into Scotland, was made treaſuror of the kingdome, which office he diſcharged with great commendation, ſo long as his brother kept the gouernement, whom he did not onelie helpe in counſell for ordering of the kingdome, but alſo ſhewed himſelfe a valiant and induſtrious man in the warres againſt the Engliſh, for defenſe of the kingdome of Scotland. About this time, the earle Bothwell, which was baniſhed, and had remained long at Venice, did returne into Scotland, whither he was honorablie welcommed, as a perſon much deſired of his friends and kinred.)

The French king miſliketh of the match with England. Matthew earle of Lennor.

The realme being thus brought in quiet, and vnder good gouernement, the French king ſore miſliking this new coniunction of the Scots with England, and doubting leaſt the old former bond of aliance betwixt France and Scotland might thereby be vtterlie diſſolued and ſhaken off, he ſent for Matthew Steward earle of Lennor, then abroad in his ſeruice in the wars of Italie, and vpon his comming backe from thence to the court, he declared to him the deceaſſe of the late king of Scots, the intruſion of Arrane, and the attempts in that realme begun, with all the circumſtances from point to point as he knew; and further diſcourſed with him what wrong he had to be ſet aſide, and diſplaced from his right of gouernement; and therefore exhorted him to repaire home to recouer the ſame, offering not onelie to aſſiſt him with men, monie, and munition, but alſo to ioine his friends in Scotland with him in aid to attaine the place of regiment, and to remoue Arrane and others from it.

Fr. Thin. Buchan. lib. 15.

The earle of Lennor herevpon with commiſſion and inſtructions deliuered to him by the French king, had alſo letters from him directed to the lords that were of the French faction, wherin the ſaid king requeſted them to remaine and continue in their former good meanings towards him, and to aſſiſt the earle of Lennor in all things, as ſhould be thought expedient. * Now, before the earle of Lennor returned out of France, the cardinall had vſed manie perſuaſions againſt the Engliſh, as well that the Scots ſet at libertie by the king, ſhould breake their faith with him, as alſo to draw them to the French faction, and rather to ſuffer their pledges to receiue what king Henrie would vſe vnto them, than by keeping promiſe to the Engliſh, to conueie the yong queene vnto them.

Wherevpon, when the greater part of thoſe nobles (whome the matter touched, could eaſilie find anie color for the excuſe of their fault) had conſented to the cardinals perſuaſion, onelie one amongeſt the reſt would not yeeld thereto, which was Gilbert Kennedie earle of Caſſiles, who could not be drawen from that conſtancie (in obſeruing his faith) either by bribes, flatteries, or threats. For he (hauing two brothers pledges for him in England) did openlie proteſt, that he would returne to priſon, and by no feare laid before him commit ſuch a fault, as that he would redeeme his life with the bloud of his two brothers: for which cauſe he went forthwith to London, although euerie man ſpake againſt it. Wherevpon, the king of England did ſingularlie commend the conſtancie of the yong man, and further (to the end that his vertue might be knowne to all men) did ſet him at libertie with his two brethren, and ſent him home honorablie rewarded.

Now the realme of Scotland being thus in great vproares by means of the queenes and cardinals factions, whereof the laſt drew all (ſuch as he could) to ſupport the French league, they ſent ambaſſadors into France, to requeſt the French king to ſend home Matthew Steward earle of Lennor, as one that was not onelie emulous againſt Hamilton, but alſo his deadlie enimie for the ſlaughter of his father at Linnucho: which yong Steward (beſide his beautie and comelineſſe of bodie, in the verie flower of his youth; the memorie, carefulneſſe, and dangers of his father, a verie popular man, and beloued of the people; the worthineſſe of that familie brought almoſt to an end, and that the ſame was of great power, and linked in mariage with manie nobles) did win and draw the minds of manie men, deſirous to helpe him, for the great fauor they bare vnto him.

To the which further procurement of the peoples loue alſo, there might be ioined, that he was next heire to the crowne by the kings appointment, if he died without iſſue male; the which king James, if he had liued, would haue eſtabliſhed by parlement: beſides which likewiſe, there wanted not flatterers, which did not onelie ſtirre vp his noble mind (now gaping after great things, and vndefended againſt deceits) to the hope of gouerning of the kingdome for theſe one and twentie yeeres and more, during the queenes minoritie, and to the rule and power ouer his enimies, whereby he might vſe reuenge vpon them: but alſo they promiſed him to marrie the queene Dowager: and in the meane time (if anie thing happened otherwiſe than well to the yong queene) that he ſhould obteine the crowne, whereby he ſhould both be king, and the next lawfull heire of James Hamilton latelie deceaſſed, ſince the gouernor was a baſtard, and could not onelie by law not looke or hope for the kingdome, but alſo not ſo much as hope to be heire to his owne familie. To all which were added the perſuaſions of the French before mentioned. Wherevpon, the yong man (whoſe mind was credulous, being tickled and intiſed with theſe hopes) determined to go into Scotland.)

The earle of Lennor paſſeth into Scotland.

The earle therefore fullie inſtructed by the French king, how to deale and proceed, toke his leaue, and with all ſpeed taking the ſea, directed his courſe into Scotland, where (after his arriuall) he came to Edenburgh, in which towne all the lords being aſſembled togither with the gouernor, he declared to them the effect of his commiſſion from the French king, his requeſt to them, & good affection to mainteine them againſt England, if in caſe they would continue the old league with him, and not ſeeke to make anie new aliance with the king of England.

But

But perceiuing that the gouernor and his friends were minded to ſatiſfie the king of Englands deſires, he would not tarrie for a reſolute anſwer, but by the counſell of the earle of Argile, William earle of Glencarne, and others of the French faction, he ſuddenlie departed forth of Edenburgh toward the weſt countrie, highlie diſpleaſed (as ſhould ſeeme) with the gouernor, and taking Lithgow in his way, he conferred with the quéene Dowager (as they termed hir) deuiſing how to aſſemble the noble men of the French ſide, to bring hir and hir daughter to libertie, out of the danger of the lord gouernor: becauſe it was ſuppoſed that he ment to conueie hir into England.

The earle of Lennox conferreth with the quéene Dowager.

About the ſame time, through practiſe of the abbat of Paſleie, brother to the gouernor, and others, the caſtell of Edenburgh was got out of the hands of ſir Peter Creichton, and the keeping thereof committed by the gouernors appointment vnto James Hamilton lard of Stanehouſe. But the erle of Lennor, with the aſſiſtance of the earles of Huntleie, Montroſſe, Mentiſe, Argile, and others of the French faction in Auguſt following, conueied the yong quéene with hir mother from Lithgew vnto Striueling. The cardinall alſo was there with them latelie before, hauing corrupted his kéepers, & gotten abroad at libertie. Héerewith was a day appointed and proclamed for the coronation of the yong quéene. The earle of Arrane then gouernor, with the earles of Angus, Caſſiles, the lords Parwell, Someruile, and diuerſe others, called the Engliſh lords, remaining ſtill at Edenburgh, aduertiſed the king of England of all the drifts of Lennor, and other of that faction, requiring his aduiſe and counſell how to deale for diſappointing of their purpoſes, that ſought to continue the amitie ſtill with France, to the préiudice of peace with England.

1543. Leſle.

The caſtell of Edenburgh recouered to the gouernors vſe.

The yong quéene conueied to Striueling.

The king of Englands aduertiſed héereof, as well thus from the gouernor, and other the Scotiſh lords, as alſo from ſir Rafe Sadler, his maieſties ambaſſador there, doubted greatlie leaſt theſe lords, in whoſe hands the quéene then was, in reſpect of the fauour which they bare to the French king, ſhould conueie hir ouer into France: wherevpon he requeſted the gouernor, and the other lords that fauoured his ſide, ſo to deale, that ſhe might be ſent into England, there to remaine, till the mariage might be conſummate betwixt hir and his ſonne prince Edward: hauing in the meane time ſuch lords of hir countrie about hir to attend vpon hir, and to ſée to hir bringing vp, as ſhould be thought expedient. To conclude, his maieſtie not onelie ſent his princelie comfort by waie of counſell and good aduiſe, but alſo according to their deſire, and as by the duke of Suffolke (his highnes lieutenant then in the north) it was thought expedient.

The king of Englands doubt.

Thomas lord Wharton, with two thouſand men from the weſt marches, and the lord Euers with other two thouſand from the eaſt borders, were appointed to enter Scotland, and to ioine themſelues with the gouernor, and his friends, to aſſiſt them againſt their aduerſaries. But as they were in a readineſſe to march, through the ſecret labor of the cardinall, wiſhing the aduancement of the earle of Arrane his kinſman (whome he thought he ſhould well inough frame to be at his appointment) rather than Lennor that was knowne to be of a greater ſtomach, the matter was ſo handled, what by the cardinall and the earle of Huntleie of the one part, and the quéene Dowager on the other, that the earle of Arrane reuolting from the king of England, came in to the Dowager, and ioined himſelfe with the cardinall, and other the lords of the French faction: by reaſon whereof, they all concluded to mainteine him in the eſtate of lord gouernor, and not to place Lennor, as their purpoſe was to haue done, if Arrane had continued faithfull to the king of England.

Shortlie after, the yong quéene was crowned at Striueling, the cardinall taking vpon him to order things as he thought good, appointing the gouernor to beare the crowne as chiefe perſon, & next in blood to the quéene, and the earle of Lennor to beare the ſcepter. After the coronation, a parlement was called and holden at Edenburgh, at the which, in preſence of the patriarch of Apuleia the popes agent, and of the French kings ambaſſadors, monſieur la Broſſe, and monſieur Menage, latelie before come into the realme, the earle of Arrane was newlie confirmed gouernor. And for the ſure preſeruation (as they pretended) of the yong queene, it was agréed by the gouernor and the eſtates, that ſhe ſhuld remaine with the old quéene hir mother in Sterling caſtell, during hir minoritie, and certeine rents of that ſeigniorie were aſſigned for maintenance of ſuch traine as was thought expedient to be attendant about hir: and further, the lords Leuingſton, Erſkin, and Fleming [or (as ſaith Buchanan) the lord Grams, John Areſkin, John Lindſeie, & William Leuiſton] were appointed to abide continuallie with hir, for the better ſafegard of hir perſon.

Thus was euerie thing ordered as ſéemed to ſtand with the pleaſure of the cardinall. Wherevpon the earle of Lennor, perceiuing how vncourteouſlie he was vſed, to haue his aduerſarie thus confirmed in authoritie by the French ſide, and himſelfe reiected, he firſt ſent to the French king, informing him thoroughlie of the iniuries to him done, putting him in remembrance of the promiſes made to him when he departed from him; alſo the conſtantneſſe of his ſeruice, the hazard he had put himſelfe in for his ſake: and notwithſtanding how he was yet vnkindlie dealt with, that through truſt of his promiſed aid and aſſiſtance, he was brought out of credit in his countrie, and ſubiected vnder the commandement and authoritie of his enimie, and wrongfullie diſappointed of his right, which he looked to haue recouered, and to haue béene mainteined therein by his ſupport.

The earle of Lennor his diſpleaſure.

In conſideration whereof, he renounced his ſeruice, willing him from thenceforth not to looke for the ſame anie more at his hands. Héerewith Lennor ioining himſelfe with the earles of Angus, Caſſiles, and Glencarne, the lords Parwell, and Someruile, the ſhiriffe of Aire, the lard of Drumlanrig, and other of that ſide, called the Engliſh lords, ſet himſelfe againſt the gouernor, the cardinall, and others of that faction, ſo that the reſidue of this yeere was ſpent in ciuill diſſention betweene them. And héere is to be noted, that a little before that the earle of Arrane reuolted to the French part, there was arriued in the mouth of the riuer of Cloide on the weſt coaſt, fiue ſhips, which the French king had ſent to the aid of his friends in Scotland, vnder the conduction of James Steward of Cardonold, and of the forenamed monſieur de la Broſſe, & monſieur Menage, the French kings ambaſſadors.

There came with them alſo the patriarch of Apuleia, of whome ye haue likewiſe heard before. They had brought aboord in theſe ſhips fiftie thouſand crownes, and munition to the value of ten thouſand crownes. The earle of Lennor therfore, when he firſt reſolued to turne to the Engliſh part, with the aduiſe of his confederats, ſeized vpon thoſe ſhips, got the fiftie thouſand crownes, and the moſt part of the munition into his hands, and brought it to the caſtell of Dunbreton, reteining it to his owne vſe, where it was ſent to haue béene imploid to the maintenance of the French faction, againſt the king of England, and the lords that leaned to his ſide.

The earle of Lennor ſeized vpon the French ſhips.

The earle of Lennox raiſeth an armie.

The earle of Lennox therefore, raiſing a power of men of warre with the aſſiſtance of the lords of his faction, came with them vnto Leith againſt the gouernor that was then in Edenburgh: but through the diligent trauell of the cardinall, the earles of Huntleie, Murrey, and Argile, the matter was taken vp, and an appointment accorded: ſo that ſir George Dowglaſſe was deliuered as a pledge for his brother the earle of Angus, the maiſter of Glencarne for his father the earle of Glencarne, the abbat Caſſaghole for his brother the earle of Caſſiles, to remaine in ſafe képing where it pleaſed the gouernor to appoint. The earle of Lennox came vnto Edenburgh to the gouernor, but within ſir daies after, they went both to Lithquho, from whence the earle of Lennox ſecretlie departed from the gouernor without bidding him farewell, and comming to Glaſcow, fortified the caſtell.

The earle of Lennox commeth to the gouernor. He departed from him againe. He fortifieth Glaſcow.

Fr. Thin. Leſleus lib. 10. pag. 468. 1543. Leſle.

✻ When the gouernor had receiued true intelligence that the earle had taken Glaſcow, he (aſſembling ſuch power as he could make, as well of his friends and followers, as of others, eſpeciallie of the lord Boid) went vnto Glaſcow, in which place the earle of Glencarne had before placed his armie, to the end there to trie the matter with his enimies. But before the battell, the earle of Lennox had withdrawen himſelfe vnto Dumbreton, to gather a greater aſſemblie, ſhortlie after to returne to Glaſcow. The earle of Glencarne, with Tilbarne, Houſtone, Buchanan, Macfarlane, Drumquhaſſile, and other barons and nobles of the Lennox, Kamfrie, and other places adioining, with the citizens, eccleſiaſticall perſons of all orders, and the other ſort of common people, departed out of the towne to the plaine thereof (being a mile from the towne) there to trie the euent of battell (before the comming of the earle of Lennox) more in haſte than good ſpéed. Wherevpon the gouernor (perceiuing himſelfe to be drawne forward to battell) commanded the trumpets to ſound to the alarmes. Wherevpon the battels ioined, the hoſts began to fight violentlie, and the conflict grew to be extreme on both parts: in which (with great ſlaughter) they long time fought with vncerteine victorie.

But in the end (what with the force of his armie, and the incouragement of the capteine) the full conqueſt fell to the gouernor, who put his enimies to flight. At what time, of the fauourers of the Lennox there were manie ſlaine, partlie of the nobles (as the ſonne of the earle of Glencarne, and Monnipennie capteine of the footmen) and partlie of the common ſort (as the citizens of Glaſcow, and manie eccleſiaſticall perſons.) Beſides all which, there had manie more periſhed, if the gouernor (through his naturall clemencie) had not (when the victorie began to leane towards him) giuen a ſigne of retreit, & with much ſpéed ſaued manie of them. On the gouernors part were few miſſing, except Cambuſkech (the head of that familie) and the baron of Argentine. The gouernor purſuing this victorie, entered the towne of Glaſcow, where he vſed (by the perſuaſion of the lord Boid) wonderfull fauour towards the citizens, (farre beyond their deſerts) although that he depriued ſome (of the chiefeſt condition amongeſt them) from all the vſe and benefit of their goods.

The earle of Lennox remaining at Dunbar, receiued into the caſtell the earle of Glencarne, and others, which had eſcaped the battell, who ſometime after did reſt (being feared with the ouerthrow) from anie further turmoiles or troubles. But in the end, they which fauoured the Lennox, do afreſh ſtirre him to take weapon againſt the gouernor: wherevpon he doth reſtrengthen the towne and ſteeple of Glaſcow, determining to gather a new ſupplie, and once more to caſt the dice of war. But the gouernor (minding to preuent all his indeuors by wiſe counſell) did (being accompanied with the cardinall) call to him about Glaſcow, all the nobilitie of the ſouth parts, and (bringing forth the hired ſouldiors) commanded the great péeces to be planted againſt the enimie. Wherevpon (entering the towne) he beſieged the caſtell and ſteeple of the church (in which place were both Scots and Frenchmen) and in the end (after a ſlaughter of ſome of them) inforced the other to yéeld their forts. After that the caſtell was thus come into the gouernors hands, he hanged eightéene of the chiefeſt and beſt loued vnto Lennox, and permitted the reſt to depart at libertie. The earle of Lennox (vnderſtanding that his affaires began to wauer, and to obteine ſuch euill ſucceſſe) doth ſend the earle of Angus and the lord Marwell to the gouernor, to intreat of peace betweéne him and the earle of Lennox, the which they laboured with great diligence, according to the truſt repoſed in them.]

But the gouernor cauſed them both to be ſecretlie conueied from the councell by the backeſide of the blacke friers of Glaſcow, vnto the caſtell of Hamilton, and from thence the earle was ſent to Blackeneſſe. The lord Marwell was kept ſtill in hold at Hamilton, and George Dowglas, and the maiſter of Glencarne in Edenburgh caſtell. Theſe perſons thus impriſoned ſtood in great doubt of their liues (as ſome ſuppoſed:) but as diuerſe other did ſuſpect, they were rather committed for a colour, than for anie euill that was meant towards them. Howſoeuer it was with them, the earle of Lennox by the aduiſe of his friends ſent the earle of Glencarne, and a gentleman called Thomas Biſhop, vnto the king of England with offer of his ſeruice, and requeſt to haue in mariage the ladie Margaret Dowglaſſe daughter to the Earle of Angus, and néece to the ſaid king.

The earle of Angus and the lord Marwell committed to ward.

The earle of Lennox ſendeth to the king of England.

✻ Herevnto the king granted. For the performance whereof (and the diſpatch of other things) he ſent the lord Wharton and diuerſe others. And on the earles part, the biſhop of Caithnes his brother and the earle of Glencarne were appointed, who met at Carleill to performe the agréement. The quéene, the cardinall, and the other of the French faction, did helpe the gouernor all they might, with counſell, power, and monie; becauſe they perceiued that he repented ſuch friendſhip with England as he had taken in hand by the counſell of Angus and of others. In the meane time there was a parlement aſſembled at Striueling, in which by common conſent, the earle of Lennox was condemned of treaſon; wherefore the ſentence of baniſhment was executed againſt him, and all his goods with his patrimonie were confiſcat to the quéene. Whileſt the French king was aſcerteined that Lennox had forſaken his faction, & committed himſelfe to the king of England, he ſuddenlie committed to priſon John Steward lord of Aubigne baron in France, brother to the earle of Lennox, and depriued the ſaid John Steward of all ſuch honors and offices as he poſſeſſed in France. For he was generall capteine of all the Scotiſh lands in France, being either ſuch as had gard of the kings bodie, or bowmen, or men at armes: for the king of France hath Scots in wages of all the orders.

Fr. Thin. Leſleus lib. 10. pag. 470.

But let vs now returne to the Patriarch, who was honorablie receiued by the cardinall and the biſhop of Scotland into the citie of Glaſcow: during whoſe abode there, great contention aroſe betwéene the cardinall and the archbiſhop of Glaſcow, who ſhould in that citie be of greateſt authoritie and honor. Which in th'end came to this iſſue, that both families fell togither by the eares, which of them ſhould go before foꝛe with his croſſe boꝛne vpꝛight. Foꝛ the cardinall archbiſhop of ſaint Andꝛews and pꝛimat of the kingdome, did affirme that the archbiſhop of Glaſcow ſhould not haue his croſſe boꝛne in his owne church, ſo long as the cardinall was pꝛeſent. Which the ſeruants of the archbiſhop of Glaſcow tooke in ſuch diſdaine, that they plucked downe the cardinals croſſe and thꝛew it to the ground. Whereupon, the gouernoꝛ (vnderſtanding the whole matter, and that it was now come from woꝛds to ſwoꝛds) made haſt to appeaſe this factious commotion, & cauſed the Patriarch therwith to be bꝛought to Edenburgh accompanied with the clergie, where he remained all the winter following. In which towne he was honoꝛablie enterteined and feaſted of the quéene, the gouernoꝛ, and other of the nobles, whome he requited with the like courteſie.

Amongeſt theſe of the nobilitie, the earle of Murrey had the Patriarch on a day to a banket, in which this Murrey did ſhew an honoꝛable thing not accuſtomed amongeſt others. Foꝛ where he abounded in ſtoꝛe of ſiluer veſſels, yet he commanded his ſeruants to furniſh a great cupboꝛd with chriſtall glaſſes bꝛought from Uenice, & that in the midſt of dinner he ſhould ouerturne the cupboꝛd as it were vnwillinglie. Which the ſeruant at the time appointed did perfoꝛme. The noiſe of bꝛeaking of which glaſſes did ſuddenlie fill the eares of all the companie: and the Patriarch ſeeing the hurt, was ſomewhat moued. But the earle making no account of this thing, commanded his man afreſh to furniſh the ſame cupboꝛd with as manie and fairer veſſels of glaſſe than the foꝛmer were, to the Patriarchs great admiration. Foꝛ the Patriarch affirmed that the glaſſes of Muranoe and Uenice did not anie way excell theſe. Truelie this earle of Murrey was honoꝛable, wiſe, iuſt, and famous amongeſt manie pꝛinces foꝛ his manifold vertues, & manie ambaſſages moſt happilie perfoꝛmed amongeſt them. Who ſhoꝛtlie after this, departing the court, died of the ſtone at his caſtle in Turnwaie.

This Patriarch ſhewed to the gouernoꝛ (beſides other pꝛiuileges that he had from the ſée of Rome) his great authoꝛitie, in that he was legat from the popes ſide, amongeſt the Scots, as long as he remained there. Which office, when he departed to Rome, he pꝛocured to be tranſferred to the cardinall; at what time the Patriarch alſo in the name of the pope, did pꝛomiſe much helpe, and monie to be ſent to Scotland againſt England. Foꝛ he ſtudied by all means he could, to hinder the mariage of thoſe two kingdoms: becauſe he ſuſpected thereby, that ſome alteration might be made in Scotland touching the religion; with the ouerthꝛow of churches and monaſteries. Now, after that the Patriarch had remained all the winter in Scotland, he departed from thence in March, who as he was honoꝛablie enterteined in all places, ſo he ſpared not to recount to the French king and other pꝛinces (whome he viſited in his iourneie) the humanitie he found in Scotland, which he alſo imparted to the biſhop of Rome, to the other cardinals, & to the ſenat of Uenice; not without ſingular pꝛaiſe and honoꝛ to the Scotiſh nation.]

They that were ſent, ſo ſolicited the earles cauſe, that in the end the king was perſuaded that Lennoꝛ ought of right to haue the gouernement of the realme of Scotland, and to be ſecond perſon in the ſame. And herewith, in conſideration how vniuſtlie not onelie his maieſtie had béene dealt with, but alſo how vnthankefullie and diſcourteouſlie Lennoꝛ had béene vſed, both at the hands of the French king, and alſo of his adherents in Scotland, by the cardinall & others: he both thankefullie receiued his gentle offer of ſeruice, & alſo pꝛomiſed to aid him in his title and all other lawfull cauſes: and herewith pꝛepared an armie to paſſe into Scotland by ſea, appointing the earle of Hertfoꝛd, and the loꝛd Liſle to haue the conduction of the ſame, who ſhipping at Tinmouth with their people, arriued in the Foꝛth vnder Werdie caſtell, a mile & a halfe aboue Leith the third of Maie, the whole naute conteining aboue the number of two hundꝛed ſhips. Here at Newhauen, a quarter of a mile from the ſaid caſtell, they landed their armie of ten thouſand men of warre, with gꝛeat artillerie, and all kind of munition.

The Engliſh armie landeth by Leith.

The loꝛd gouernoꝛ being at that pꝛeſent within the towne of Edenburgh, hearing of their arriuall, went foꝛth of the towne accompanied with the cardinall, the earles of Huntleie, Argile, Bothwell, and others, purpoſing to ſtop their landing: but perceiuing the puiſſance of the aduerſaries to be ſuch, as they could not reſiſt the ſame, they returned to Edenburgh againe, and ſent maiſter Adam Otten boꝛne pꝛouoſt of Edenburgh, and two of the baſtiks to the earle of Hertfoꝛd, to vnderſtand the cauſe of his comming; and withall offered, that if there were anie iniuries oꝛ wꝛongs done by anie of the Scots nation, he would appoint commiſſioners to talke with ſuch as by him ſhould be authoꝛiſed thereto, foꝛ the full anſwering thereof, & to that effect he would gladlie receiue them into the towne of Edenburgh.

The earle of Hertfoꝛd anſwered that he had no commiſſion to talke of anie ſuch matter; but rather to take reuenge of the vniuſt dealing and bꝛeach of pꝛomiſe on thoſe that had falſified their faith. And therefoꝛe minding to burne the towne of Edenburgh, as well as other within that realme, he willed the inhabitants and all all thoſe that were within the ſame to come foꝛth, and ſubmit themſelues befoꝛe him the kings lieutenant, to ſtand vnto the kings will and pleaſure, oꝛ elſe he would not faile to pꝛoceed in execution thereof. The pꝛouoſt anſwered that he would rather abide all extremities, than accompliſh his requeſt and deſire in that behalfe; and therevpon returned to the towne.

The earles anſwer.

After the gouernoꝛ had heard what anſwer was made to the pꝛouoſt, he cauſed the caſtell to be furniſhed with all things neceſſarie foꝛ defenſe, and departed ſtraightwaies to Striueling. The Engliſh armie lodging that night in Leith, marched the nert day toward Edenburgh, paſſing vp the Cannogat ſtréet to enter at the nether bow, where they found ſome reſiſtance made by the Scots, ſo that diuerſe were ſlaine on both parts. Towards night, the Engliſhmen, after they had continued long in ſkirmiſhing that day with the Scotiſhmen, retired to Leith. The nert day the whole armie with the great artillerie came foꝛward towards the towne, and bꝛeaking open the Cannogat, they entred the towne by the ſame, bꝛinging their oꝛdinance within ſight of the caſtell, purpoſing to plant the ſame in batteris againſt it; but the capteine of the caſtell cauſed the artillerie within to ſhot off at them in ſo great abundance, & ſo good meaſure, that they ſlue diuerſe Engliſhmen, and diſmounted one of their péeces, ſo that in the end they were conſtreined to dꝛaw backe their oꝛdinance & retired; but yet in the meane time they ſet fire on the towne, and burnt the moſt part of all the houſes in the ſame. They burnt alſo the Cannogat ſtreet, and the abbeie of Holie rood houſe. The gouernoꝛ at that pꝛeſent releaſed out of pꝛiſon the earle of Angus, the loꝛd Marwell, the maiſter of Glencarne, ſir Geoꝛge Dowglas, and others.

In this meane time alſo there came from the boꝛders by land foure thouſand of Engliſh hoꝛſemen, vnder the conduction of the loꝛd William Euers, and his ſonne ſir Rafe Euers; who ioining with the armie at Leith, ſcoꝛed the countrie on euerie rie side of Edenburgh. Finallie, after the English armie had lien in Leith a certeine space, they burnt that towne also, and sent their ships awaie fraught with pillage and spoiles (got as well in that towne, as in Edenburgh, and abroad in the countrie) backe towards England. And therwith the earle of Hertford, the lord admerall, and others, returned by land through the countrie vnto Berwike, as in the English historie more at large appeareth. Whilest the English armie was thus occupied in that part of Scotland, the erle of Lennor with an armie of men which he had raised, was readie to come on the backs of the gouernor and his adherents, if they had assembled their forces and come forward to haue giuen the Englishmen battell. For all this season the ciuill contentions still continued, and sundrie conflicts and skirmishes chanced betwixt the parties.

Fr. Thin. Lesleus lib. 10. pag. 474. 1544.

* The Scots which inhabit the mountains, and the Iles, did now in these turmoiles begin to shew some tokens of their inconstancie. For they (which paied yéerelie tribute in the time of James the fift, kept the peace, liued within the bounds of law, and well obeied the gouernor) did now (after they saw all things on a flame) begin againe to spoile and destroie their neighbors, in the same vttering the humor of their naturall disposition. Wherevpon the gouernor (to restreine their boldnesse) called vnto him George Gordon earle of Huntleie, and the earle of Argile, whereof he made the one gouernor of the north parts of Scotland, of the Orchades, and Shitland; and to the other, he committed the rule of Argile, and the Iles Hebrides. Wherevpon Huntleie with all spéed gathered an armie from the north parts, and determined to bridle the Glancamerons, the Gencronelles, the Mudiardes, & the Kindiardes, with force and authoritie. The capteins or heads of which families, were Ewin Allanson, Ronald Mackoneilglas, and John Mudiard, who did possesse the lands of the lords Grant, and Louet, hauing expelled them by force from the same.

But when they first vnderstood that Huntleie had incamped néere vnto them, they fled euerie one home to their owne possessions: which being defended partly by the west sea, and partly included about with the mounteins, stopped Huntleie, so that hée might not haue anie passage vnto them: by meanes whereof (these dissentors being banished) the lords Grant and Louet were restored to their right inheritance. But it fell out contrarilie for Louet, who going to take his owne into his hands, fell into danger of his enimies. For at that time both the companies were disposed into such order, that neither partie could absteine from fight. Wherevpon they first discharge their bodies one against another, and their arrowes spent, they after flie to their swords, with which they fought so egerlie, that the night cutting off the battell, it could not be well knowne to which part the victorie gaue place. In which there was so great slaughter on both parts, that till the next morning in viewing the dead bodies, the victors were not knowne. Amongest whome of the part of the Glencamerons and Mudiardes there were manie slaine.

But by reason of the death of the lord Louet, and of his sonne and heire (a youth of singular hope, and brought vp in France) with three hundred of the bloud and surname of the Fraisers (for Louet was the head and leader of that familie) the hurt séemed to be the greater on their part. For there was a rumor spred, that there was not one of the familie of the Fraisers left aliue that was of mans state. But it happened by the singular benefit of God, that they left their wiues with child when they went to the fight, by which meanes the familie was after raised and restored. Huntleie (greatlie grieuing that the Fraisers had receiued this grieuous wound) gathered a power togither, and with armes so pursued those factious people, that he tooke and beheaded Ewin Allanson, and Ronald, with diuerse others, and put the rest in prison. The earle of Argile discharged the office committed to him as well as Huntleie did and with more happie successe, for all the Iland men humblie submitted themselues vnto him, and deliuered pledges to liue quietlie hereafter.)

Buchanan. lib. 15.

Buchanan saith that this battell as it was beléeued, was procured by Huntleie to destroie the Fraisers.

About this time the earle of Lennor, accompanied with Alexander the maister of Glencarne, otherwise called lord of Kilmawse, Walter Graham brother to the earle of Montrosse, sir John Wogthwike knight, and sundrie other gentlemen, tooke the sea to passe into England, and arriued at Westchester about Midsummer: & passing from thence to the court, he was ioifullie receiued. And immediatlie therevpon was the mariage celebrated betwixt him and the ladie Margaret Dowglas, daughter & heire to the earle of Angus, and to Margaret his wife queene of Scots, sister to king Henrie the eight, at what time there was assured to him by way of inheritance, lands to the value of seuen hundred marks of yeerelie rent of assise, in consideration of this mariage with the kings néece, and in recompense of lands lost by him in France, to the which he was inheritor after the decease of Robert Steward lord Obenie, one of the foure marshals of France.

The earle of Lennox goeth into England

He marieth the ladie Margaret Dowglas.

Lord Obenie.

Moreouer, king Henrie being now vpon his iournie towards Bullongne, aswell for the auoiance of his highnesse enimies in Scotland, as for recouerie of the said earles right in that realme, appointed the said erle to enter Scotland in the moneth of August, accompanied with sir Rise Mansfield, sir Peter Mewtas knights, maister Thomas Audleie, maister Thomas Brookes, old maister Winter comptroller of the kings ships, and his sonne sir William Winter that now is, and sundrie other capteins, hauing vnder their charge two hundred hackbutters, two hundred archers with long bowes, and two hundred armed pikes, beside the mariners belonging to those ships that were appointed to go forth on this iournie, being in number about twelue or fourtéene saile, belonging to Bristow, and other of the west parts.

The earle of Lennox returneth into Scotland.

Upon their arriuall on the coast of Scotland, they burnt the Ile of Arrane, and raced the gouernors castell there to the ground. And afterwards arriuing at the Ile of Bute, they entered the same, and tooke the castell of Rosetc standing therein (from whence the Stewards kings of Scotland had their originall) the capteine they had awaie prisoner with them into England. Here also they tooke two French ships laden with wines, and this done they entered the Firth of Clide, thinking to find none but their friends in the castell of Dunbreton. But true it is, that in this meane time the earle of Glencarne with sundrie gentlemen being left in that castell, with the capteine thereof called Houlson, to kéepe it in the name and to the behoofe of the erle of Lennor, were in his absence perswaded thorough practise of the queene Dowager, not only to renounce their promised faith to him, in defrauding him of that castell; but also to intrap and wind him within their danger to take him prisoner.

The Ile of Bute taken.

For this purpose they so dissembled the matter, that they had got him on land onelie with three hundred men: and so farre forth they were growne in talke, that the erle of Lennor being entered into the castell with a few other with him, the monie was laid downe on the bord, to be paid to the capteine for his satisfaction. But in the meane time, the earle of Lennor, & such as were with him, perceiuing some treasonable treasonable practise in hand, got forth of the house againe vnto their companie below, leauing the monie behind them, and after made shift to get to their ships, and not before it was high time.

For if they had staied that night, they had béene intrapped by George Dowglas, who with foure thousand men was secretlie drawne thitherwards, and entered the towne of Dunbreton, shortlie after that the earle of Lennox was thus departed, and got to his ships lieng there at hand in the riuer of Clide, downe the which he retired to the sea, not without danger to haue lost the same ships, by reason of the narrowneſſe of the water: for the erle of Argile being gotten betwixt him and the sea with a great power of men, with banners displaied, hailsed the ships with shot of ordinance from the castell of Dinnune, annoieng the earls of Lennox his passage as much as he could. But he escaping with the English gentlemen, and the ships out of danger, toke aduise togither at the Ile of Bute what they were best to do.

The earle sore moued to haue béene thus repelled from Dunbreton, and stomaching the matter sore, to be so discountenanced by his enimie the earle of Argile, with the aduise of the English gentlemen, he returned with them, and with great shew of manhood toke land beside the castell and towne of Dinnune, where the earle of Argile with seuen hundred men was readie to incounter him, & to keepe him off from landing: but by the helpe of the shot out of the ships, and great store of botes, the Englishmen landed, slue foure score of the enimies, most part gentlemen, and put the residue to flight, with the losse of three men onelie on the English side.

The earle of Lennox landeth at Dinnune.

This done, the towne of Dinnune was burnt, and the church spoiled, that was full of goods and ornaments. When the night approched, by reason the Englishmen had no powder, nor other prouision on land, the earle with his people returned to shipbord in safetie, howbeit not without offer of skirmish made by the enimies though to their losse, namelie of those that aduanced themselues most forward. About foure or fiue daies after, the earle of Lennox with fiue hundred men landed in another part of Argile, and remaining on land a whole day togither, burnt, spoiled, and wasted the countrie: the earle of Argile with two thousand men giuing the looking on, and not once offering the skirmish, so that the earle of Lennox with his souldiers retired to his ships without incounter.

The towne of Dinnune burnt.

The earle of Lennox landeth againe in Argile.

After this they inuaded the Ile of Kinter, where James Mackonell dwelled, burnt manie places in that countrie, toke and caried awaie great booties of cattell and other goods. All the coasts of Kile, Carrike, & Coningham, and likewise of Galloway remained in continuall feare, so that oftentimes their beacons were fired, and manie of the noble men constrained to come to the earle of Lennox, suing to him for assurance. In these exploites the earle had with him Walter Macferlane of Tirbat, and seuen score men of the head of Lennox, that spake both Irish, English, & the Scotish tongs, light footmen, well armed in shirts of male, with bowes, and two handed swords, and being ioined with the English archers and shot, did much auailable seruice in the streicts, the marishes, and mountaine countries.

Kinter inuaded.

Fr. Thin. Buchan. li. 15.

* During these things, they which had gouernment of Scotish affairs (as the quéene Dowager, the cardinall, and the gouernor) called a councell, in which they decréed that all such of the nobilitie as had force and armor, should be readie to follow the gouernor whither soeuer he went, and there to remaine with him for the space of eight daies. Shortlie after there assembled eight thousand men, and in the sharpe winter battered the church of Coldingham, standing in armor a whole day and night to the great toile and wearinesse of the men and horsses. The nert day the gouernor, either to accuse his tendernesse susteined in the last daies labor of warre, or else fearing the inuasion of the enimie (for he was certified of an armie of men that should come from Berwike) suddenlie (vnknowne to the other nobilitie) did flie to Dunbar with a few of his owne traine. They which went about to excuse the defame of this flight, reported how he feared that he should haue béene betraied to the English by his host, for hatred which they had conceiued against him for manie of his offenses.

This departure of the gouernor brought great trouble to the armie, & so much the more, bicause the secreter it was (and the reason vnknowne) the more cause it gaue to the rest to feare some further euill. Wherefore the greater part remained in this obstinate mind, that euerie one should returne the nert way home, and leaue the artillerie at random. But others (who were more carefull, and would séeme lesse fearefull) do agrée to stuffe the péeces full of powder, and to breake them, rather than they should fall in the hands & helpe of the enimie. To the which deuise onelie Archembald Dowglas did resist, least he should ad a wicked déed to a wicked flight. Who when he could not staie any man, either by threat, intreatie, or authoritie, he exclamed with a lowd voice (for euerie one to heare him) that for his owne part he had rather die an honest death, than to haue a secure and rich life with such dishonor. Wherefore you my friends consider what you will do, for either I " will bring awaie this artillerie, or I will not returne " home with life; wherefore I meane to make this the " last end both of my life and glorie. When he had spoken this, a few (whose honor was deare vnto them) were moued therewith, but the rest (despairing by reason of the shamefull flight of the gouernor) did scatteringlie depart, wandring whither they thought good, without anie order. The Dowglasse with such companie as he had (placed in good order) followed the artillerie, and brought the same to Dunbar, the horssemen of his enimies in vaine hastening after them behind at their backes. This expedition by the gouernor rashlie begun, and shamefullie performed, brake the hearts of the Scots, and aduanced the minds of the English, who gloriouslie applied the dastardnesse of the gouernor to their owne glorie.)

To conclude, after the earle of Lennox and his companie had atchiued these enterprises afore mentioned, he returned towards England, and sent sir Peter Mewtas knight, & Thomas Bishop a Scotish gentleman, to aduertise the king of England of his procédings, who found him at the siege of Bullongne, where they declared to him the whole circumstance of euerie thing, as the same had passed in the earles iornie, which the king toke in verie good part. And vpon his returne into England, after the conquest of Bullongne, the earle of Lennox was also called home to the court by letters to him directed, he being then at Bristow.

Sir Peter Mewtas.

About the middest of Februarie, sir Rafe Eure commonlie called Euers, lord warden of the English middle marches, entred Scotland with a power of foure thousand Englishmen, Irishmen, and assured Scots; and comming first vnto Jedworth, lodged there that night. And therwithall vnderstanding that the gouernor and the earle of Angus were at the abbeie of Melros, about eight miles distant from thence, the nert morning he was got forth so earlie, that he was almost vpon the enimies in such wise on the sudden, that they fled out of their lodgings, and and left their beds and all their houſhold furniture which they had in ſtore there with them, not hauing time to conueie it awaie at their departure, their warning was ſo ſhort. Sir Rafe Euers at his comming thither, finding them fled and gone, ſpoiled the towne and abbeie, vtterlie defacing the tombes and monuments of the earles of Dowglas, greatlie to the diſpleaſure of the earle of Angus, and thoſe of his linage.

He defaceth the monuments of the Dowglaſſes.

✻After this (the comming of the Engliſh being looked for the next yéere) the minds of the borderers were greatlie troubled, becauſe they were hopeleſſe to atteine anie ſuccor from the gouernor, which vſed the aduiſe of the clergie, but chieflie of the cardinall. Whereupon Archembald Dowglas earle of Angus (greatlie moued partlie with his priuat loſſes, for he had great poſſeſſions in the marches, and in Tiuiot, and partlie to ſée his anceſtors monuments defaced) came to the gouernor, and fullie laid before him the greatneſſe of the danger wherein the realme did ſtand, perſuading him to incounter and reſiſt the ſame. At what time alſo (after the gouernour had opened vnto him, that he was forſaken of the nobilitie, and now left alone) the Dowglas ſhewed that the ſame happened vnto him by his owne fault, and not by the nobilitie, which would implote their liues, liuings, and goods, for the defenſe of the common-wealth. For he contemning their counſell, onlie leaned to the ſpiritualtie, who were cowards in warre, and ſeditious in peace.

Fr. Thin. Buch. lib. 15

Out of this founteine (ſaith he) a ſuſpicion (that

Whereupon the gouernor and the ſaid earle (ſore aggréeued to be thus foiled at the Engliſhmens hands) aſſembled togither [vnder the leading of Norman Leſle ſon of the earle of Rothſeie] all ſuch forces as they might recouer, ſo that they had quicklie got them about fiftéene hundred men, whereof eight hundred at the leaſt were gentlemen. Who hearing that the Engliſhmen were retiring towards Jedworth, they met them at a place called Pannier hugh, or Brunehouſe, where both the parties alighting on foot, ment to trie the quarell by plaine force of hand. But as they were redy to ioine, the aſſured Scots, to the number of ſeuen or eight hundred reuolted vnto the part of their countrimen, by reaſon whereof, after a right ſharpe and fierce conflict, the Engliſhmen in the end were conſtreined to flie, whome the Scots right egerlie purſued, ſlue ſir Rafe Euers, the lord Ogle, ſir Brian Leiton, and other gentlemen & ſouldiors to the number of eight hundred. They toke alſo about two thouſand priſoners, with certeine péeces of artillerie and other munition.

Sir Rafe Euers & others ſlaine.

This victorie fell to the Scots the ſeuentéenth day of February, the report whereof was right diſpleaſant to the Engliſh nation, but ſpeciallie the loſſe of that worthie gentleman ſir Rafe Euers was greatlie bemoned, and that euen of the king himſelfe, for the noble proweſſe and great lotaltie which at all times had béene found in him. His ſeruice had beene ſuch in theſe wars againſt Scotland, that he had brought the more part of the Scots within twentie miles ſpace of the Engliſh borders, vnto the obeiſance of the king of England, although at length they holpe to worke his confuſion, as before ye haue heard. ¶ Of this gentleman & his ſingular ſeruice in the field, I omit here to ſpeake, becauſe he was imploied otherwiſe, beſides Scotland: wherefore I remit the readers to the twentith yere of king Henrie the eight, where to his high commendation this gentleman is recorded.]

His ſeruice againſt the Scots.

Abr. Fl.

✻The occaſion of the Engliſh ouerthrow (as ſaith Leſleus) and the Scots victorie, were chieflie by theſe meanes. Firſt they fought vpon equall ground, and with vnequall helpes. For the Scots with the ſunne on their backs (being declined toward ſetting) came forth of a narrow & marith place, and ſet vpon the Engliſh (at the ſide of an hill which was betweene them) hauing the ſun in their faces, by which meanes they could neither well perceiue what number the Scots had, nor with their gunnes hurt anie of the Scots. But thoſe that fought in the firſt battell, whereunto was ioined (a feare not in vaine) which they had conceiued of the Scotiſh march-men, who in great number hauing red croſſes (the note of the Engliſh) ran vp and downe hither and thither to ſée the euent thereof.)

Fr. Thin. Buchan. lib. 10. pag. 478.

About the ſame time that the victorie before mentioned chanced to the Scots, Robert Cornore biſhop of Roſſe departed this life, to whome ſucceeded Dauid Pantane, ſecretarie to the gouernor and prior of ſaint Marie Ile. In April, William Steward biſhop of Aberden likewiſe deceaſſed, and maiſter William Gordon chancellor of Murrete, vncle to George erle of Huntleie, was by the cardinals ſute promoted to that ſée, greatlie to the diſpleaſure of the earle of Angus, that labored to haue preferred an other thereto. For this and other cauſes, the cardinall was greatlie in hatred of the Dowglaſſes.

Death of biſhops.

✻About that time, the king of England by praiſe & preies perſuaded the Flemings to take ſirteene of our ſhips harbored in the hauen, and to conuert the commodities (wherewith they were fraught, being verie coſtlie) to their owne commoditie. By means whereof at one time we had warres with two nations, England and Flanders. But ſith the Flemings did not the ſame maliciouſlie for hatred to the Scots, but carefullie for the loue vnto the Engliſh, as the Scots did certeinlie know, they ſhewed none other token of eninitie to the Flemings, but that they forbad them to fiſh on their coaſts, and did ſometime intercept their ſhips, without further iniurie done vnto them.)

Fr. Thin. Leſleus. lib. 10. pag. 479.

This yéere alſo, Montgomerie, otherwiſe called monſieur de Lorges, knight of the order of ſaint Michaell, was ſent by the French king with foure thouſand Frenchmen into Scotland to aſſiſt the Scots againſt England. He landed at Dunbreton, & came in good order to Edenburgh the thirteenth of May: he brought with him from the French king the order of ſaint Michaell, to inueſt therewith the lord gouernor, the earles of Angus, Huntleie, and Argile. Herwith alſo was an armie of Scots raiſed, and ioining with the Frenchmen, they approched the borders, where they laie for a ſeaſon: but the earle of Hertford lieutenant generall of the north parts comming downe, toke ſuch direction for the ſafe keeping of the Engliſh borders, that after the Scots had laine there in campe a certeine ſpace without atchiuing anie great enterpriſe, though ſome notable exploit was looked for to haue béene attempted by them at that preſent, they brake vp their armie & went home.

* This castell of Dunbreton was at that time so carefullie kept by the captein therof, that he determined neither to deliuer it to the gouernor, nor to anie Englishman, nor to anie Scot. Whereupon, the gouernor fearing least it should fall into the hands of the English, prepare to besiege the same; the newes wherof comming to Glencarne, he signified the same vnto Lennor, affirming, that if he would come thither, he should shortlie obteine the castell. The king of England reioising of that newes, prepareth two ships, and in the meane time sent the bishop of Cathnesse into Scotland, which should forthwith be receiued into the castell. Wherefore the gouernor making the more hast, commeth to Dunbreton togither with the cardinall, and the earles Huntleie, and Argile, laieng present siege to the same, which was stronglie done, and the castilains pressed to great extremitie by the slaughter of manie people. But at length by the policie of the earle Huntleie, it was so agreed, that the castell (which was by nature inexpugnable) should be deliuered. Which the gouernor receiued (with certeine conditions) and honorablie intreated the capteine for the singular discharge of the trust committed to him: and therewithall he restored the bishop of Cathnesse, brother to the earle of Lennor to his bishoprike, which before he had lost by his going into England.)

The sixtænth of September, three or foure hundred Scots, with Marwell, Lochinuart, and Johnstone, aided with the Frenchmen, attempted to enter into England on the east borders: but the Englishmen perceiuing where they were about to passe by a certeine streit, they set vpon them with their archers, discomfited them, sleaing, & taking to the number of seuen score of them. Among other that were taken, one of the sonnes to the lord Hume, with a French capteine, and George Elphinston archer of the corps to the French king, were accounted chiefe. Also on the west borders, Robert Marwell eldest son to the lord Marwell, was taken in a rode made by him and others, into the English confines on that side; although at an other time certeine Englishmen making a rode into Scotland were distressed, the more part of them being taken or slaine. At a parlement holden at Linlithquho, begun there the twentie eight of September, and continued till the first of October, Matthew earle of Lennor, and Thomas bishop of Atheltree, were forfalted, and all their lands and goods giuen awaie and annered to the crowne.

The lord Marwels son taken prisoner

In this meane time, the king of England desirous to haue the seruice of the Iles of Scotland for sundrie great causes and respects, moued the earle Lennor to deale with them to that end: which he did. And his trauell toke such effect, that the Iland men were contented to rest at the king of England his deuotion, partlie for that they were in a manner sworne enimies to the earle of Argile, and his familie; and partlie for that they doubted the king of Englands puissance, if he should attempt to inuade those parties: and againe, bearing an old speciall fauour to the earle of Lennor and his house, hauing an ancient bond of aliance and amitie with the same, they were the more readie to satisfie his motion. Heere vpon, they elected amongest them a lord of the Iles, the nert of bloud: a title long since verie odious to the state of Scotland, and by the inducement of the earle of Lennor, he was contented as the king of Englands pensioner, to receiue two thousand crownes of him yearelie, with certeine rich apparell of cloth of gold and siluer from the said earle.

The earle of Lennor procureth them of the Iles to serue the king of England.

The lord of the Iles elected, being one of the Maconeils.

The first proofe he attempted to shew of his seruice in the king of Englands behalfe, was this. Hauing instructions thereto from the earle of Lennor, vnder colour of conference for matters touching the estate of the countrie, he had suborned one of his aliance and seruants, called the clane Reginald, to intrappe the earles of Argile and Huntleie. And although they escaped verie narrowlie, the lord Louet an ancient baron, & great friend to those two earles, was slaine by the said clane, togither with seuen hundred of his kinsmen and friends: insomuch that there remained not but one yong boy of that linage to succeed in that lords lands [which is before more fullie handeled out of Lesleus.]

Clane Reginald sleeth the lord Louet.

After this, the lord of the Iles, with six thousand men imbarked in certeine vessels, passed ouer into Carrike, harried and burnt the lands of the earle of Cassiles, then a great enimie to the king of England. In this voiage he got great spoiles, and slue manie of the enimies. After which enterprise so atchiued, he came with his power by sea, and landed in Ireland, where the earles of Lennor and Ormond were, with twelue hundred Irishmen, appointed to ioine with him, that with their whole power they might inuade the earle of Argiles countries, & consequentlie the maine land of Scotland at the broad side. But before the preparation could be made readie for that iorneie, the new lord of the Iles deceassed, whose buriall in Ireland to honor the earle of Lennor, stood the king of England in foure hundred pounds sterling.

The lord of the Iles inuadeth Carrike.

He commeth into Ireland.

He departeth this life.

But now to returne vnto the doings on the borders betwixt England and Scotland in this season. We shall vnderstand, that after the armie of Scotland was broken vp, the earle of Hertford by vertue of his commission, raised an armie in the countries of the further side of Trent northwards; so that when the same was assembled togither, with such strangers as were then in the kings wages, they were in all of horsemen and footmen twelue thousand fighting men. With this armie garded with great store of artillerie, munition, and all manner of furniture necessarie, the earle of Hertford entered Scotland, and marching to Coldingham, past vp by the water of Tweed, and burnt a great part of the Mers, and Tiuidale, the abbeies of Kelso, Melrosse, Driborne, and Jedworth, with townes & villages, to the number of fiue score.

But eight thousand, as some say.

The earle of Hertford inuadeth Scotland.

Howbeit, he entered not farre within the said countrie beyond the said water, but kept alongest neere to the same, and returned backe without anie incounter: for after the Scotish armie was broken vp, it was not like they would assemble againe, and so the earle of Hertford taking the time that serued his purpose, sore indamaged the Scotish borders at that present. Manie other small inuasions were made, as well by the one part as the other, and some skirmishes fell out betwixt them, sometime to the losse of the Scotish, and sometime of the English, according to the course of warre.

* Much about this time, or rather before, Robert Marwell the sonne of Robert (a yong man of singular vertue) was taken by the English. Besides which there was nothing done worthie the memorie, but that in the beginning of the nert winter Montgomerie returned into France. After this, the cardinall leadeth the gouernor about the neere countries, vnder colour to reconcile such parts as were at dissention: then they came first to Perth, where foure men were punished for eating flesh on forbidden daies: from thence they went to Dundee called Toadune (to vse the name of the place, as Buchanan hath) to punish (as they said) such as vsed the late new testament of Luthers translation. Thither came also Patrike Greie (the head of a noble familie in those parts) accompanied with a good traine, togither with the erle of Rothseie, being before that commanded to be there by the gouernor, after the pacifieng of the other tumults. But the cardinall (ſuppoſing it ſmall ſafetie to receiue at one time two ſuch noble and factious perſons addicted to the reſtored religion, into the towne) wrought with the gouernor that he and they might go backe to Perth.

The next morning, when thoſe two noblemen (redie for the iourneie) vnderſtood that the gouernor was on his waie towards Perth, they preſentlie followed him. Who being come in ſight, did ſtrike ſuch feare into the cardinall, that the gouernor commanded them to ſunder themſelues, and ſeuerallie to enter the citie: which they did. Wherevpon the next day they were both committed to priſon. But Rothſeie being ſhortlie deliuered, Greie (whome they hated more, and feared moſt) was kept longer in that reſtraint. But before they parted thence, it ſéemed good to the cardinall to abate the ſtrength of Ruthwen capteine of the towne. For which cauſe, the gouernor taketh his office from him, and beſtoweth the ſame vpon Kinſane Comarch, neighbor and kinſman to Greie. For this Ruthwen was a great enimie to the cardinall, and much fauored the reſtored religion: as likewiſe was Greie, who after the ſame ſort did not beare a friendlie mind to the cardinall, nor to his religion.

By reaſon whereof, the cardinall ſuppoſed, that if he might ſet them (by this meanes) together by the eares (ſith manie of both parts would ioine for defenſe of the chiefe of their families) and that if anie ſide had the worſe (as both muſt be diminiſhed) that then he had by ſo much abated the power of one of his enimies. Vpon which occaſion the gouernement of Perth (which had by manie deſcents remained in the familie of the Ruthwens) might be thus tranſlated to Kinſane. Thus the new capteine was ſent with a power to ſubdue the citizens by force, if they would not willinglie obeie: as it ſéemed that they would not; becauſe they tooke it with ſome griefe, to haue (in this new capteine) the old libertie of voices (in chooſing of their gouernor) taken from them. The beſieging of the towne being therefore diuided into parts, Greie (which had wholie taken the matter on him) attempted the ouerthrow thereof, from the bridge of Taie. The other band (hauing laid their artillerie along by the riuer ouer againſt the towne) did inuade the open ſide of the ſaid Perth.

But becauſe the ſwelling of the ſea did not anſwer their deuiſe, they came not in time to doo anie thing therein. Greie aſſalting it by the bridge (which Ruthwen hauing receiued, and conueied the aid into the next houſes, would ſéeme to leaue vngarded) when he ſaw no armed men ſtirring, did (without all feare) enter further into the towne, where he was ſo ſharplie ſet vpon by Ruthwen, and his companie (ſuddenlie and vnlooked for breaking out of the houſes vpon them) that euerie one haſtened to ſpie ſome place by which he might flie awaie. But the multitude confuſed and driuen into a ſtreict, did let one an other thereof. For they behind, thinking to breake in amongeſt the other, did hinder the firſt that they could not flie: in which vnorderlie multitude, manie were troden vnder foot, and three ſcore were killed with the ſword.

The cardinall (although againſt his mind) hauing heard of the victorie of Ruthwen; yet he did not greatlie lament the ſlaughter made of his aduerſaries. After this, the cardinall hauing thus ſufficientlie progreſſed to Angus: he led the gouernor after the fouretéenth of December to ſaint Andrews, to the end (if it were poſſible) to bind the gouernor more firmelie vnto him. For although before he had the gouernors ſonne as pledge with him; yet (as often as he remembred the eagernelle of the Scotiſh nobilitie, the ſtrength of his enimies, and the inconſtancie of the gouernor) he greatlie feared, leaſt the ſaid gouernor ſhould with like lightneſſe be drawen to aſſiſt his enimies, as he had béene led to take his part.] During the time whileſt they were at S. Andrews, the cardinall cauſed in the Lent ſeaſon all the biſhops & prelats of the realme to aſſemble at the towne of ſaint Andrews, where a learned man, named maiſter George Wiſchart, that had béene in the ſchooles of Germanie, was accuſed of hereſie, which he had (as was alleged againſt him) publikelie preached, and priuatlie taught in Dundée, Brechin, and diuerſe other parts of Scotland, ſince his returne home. This matter was ſo vrged againſt him, that he was conuict, and burnt there in the towne of ſaint Andrews during the time of that conuention or aſſemblie. George Wiſchart a learned man burnt.

✻When theſe things were thus done, the cardinall, although he greatlie truſted to his riches; yet becauſe he was not ignorant what were the minds of men, & what ſpéeches the common people had of him) determined to increaſe his power with new deuiſes. Wherefore he goeth into Angus, and marieth his eldeſt daughter (as ſaith Buchanan) to the earle of Crawfords ſonne. Which mariage was ſolemnized with great preparation, almoſt anſwerable to kinglie magnificence. During which time, the cardinall vnderſtanding by his ſpies, that the Engliſh did prepare to inuade the Scotiſh borders on the ſea (and ſpeciallie did threaten thoſe of Fife therewith) returned to ſaint Andrews, and appointed a day to the nobilitie, and ſuch as dwelled about the ſea coaſts, to aſſemble togither to prouide in common for the defenſe thereof, and to prepare remedie for that haſtened euill. For the eaſier and better performance whereof, he had determined, togither with the lords of that countrie, to haue ſailed himſelfe about the coaſts, and to haue defended ſuch places as were moſt conuenient. Fr. Thin. Buchanan. lib. 15.

Amongeſt others that came vnto him, there was a noble yong gentleman called Norman Leſle, ſonne to the earle of Rothſeie, whereof we haue ſpoken before manie times. This man (after that he had manie times employed his valiant and faithfull diligence in the behalfe of the cardinall) grew to ſome contention with the ſaid cardinall for a priuat cauſe, which for a time did eſtrange both their minds the one from the other. This ſame contention did Norman (being thereto induced with manie faire promiſes) afterwards let fall. But certeine moneths following (when he returned to demand the performance of ſuch liberall promiſes) they began to grow from common ſpéech to brallings, and from thence to bitter tawnts & reproches, not fit to be vſed by anie of them both. Wherevpon they departed with the gréeued minds of euerie of them. For the cardinall being intreated more vnreuerentlie than he would or looked for; and the other threatning that being ouertaken by deceipt, he would reuenge it: they both returned diſcontented to their owne people. Wherevpon Norman, declaring to his partakers the intollerable arrogancie of the cardinall, they eaſilie agréed all to conſpire his death. Wherefore, to the end that the ſame might be leſſe ſuſpected, they departed in ſunder afterward. This Norman accompanied onelie with fiue of his owne traine, entred the towne of ſaint Andrews, and went into his accuſtomed Inne and lodging; truſting that by ſuch ſmall traine he might cunninglie diſſemble the determination of the cardinals death. But there were in that towne, ten of thoſe which had conſented to this conſpiracie; which cloſed in ſecret corners, ſome in one place, and ſome in an other, did onelie expect the ſigne which was to be giuen vn-

to them to execute this deuiſe. With which ſmall companie this Norman feared not to aduenture the death of the cardinall in the ſame towne, furniſhed in euerie place with the ſeruants and friends of the cardinall.]

Whereupon the thirtéenth of Maie, the cardinall being within his caſtell of ſaint Andrews, certeine of his owne friends (as he tooke them) that is to ſay, the ſaid Norman, lord Leſlete, William Kirkandie, the yong lord of Grange, and Kirkmichell with ſirtéene choſen men, entered the caſtell verie ſecretlie in the morning, tooke the porter, and all the cardinals ſeruants, thruſting them out of the place by a poſterne gate. And that done, paſſing to his chamber where he laie in bed, as he got vp, and was opening his chamber doore, they ſlue him, and ſeized vpon the artillerie and munition, wherewith that fortreſſe was plentifullie furniſhed, and likewiſe with rich hangings, houſhold ſtuffe of all ſorts, apparell, copes, iewels, ornaments of churches, great ſtore of gold and ſiluer plate, beſide no ſmall quantitie of treaſure in readie coine.

The cardinall of ſaint Andrews murthered.

Sir James Leirmouth, prouoſt of ſaint Andrews, aſſembled all the people of that towne for the reſcue of the cardinall, after he heard that the conſpirators were entred the caſtell; but they ſhewed the dead bodie of the cardinall ouer the wals, as a ſpectacle to the people, and ſo they made no further attempt, ſith they ſaw no meane how to remedie or reuenge the matter at that preſent. The cauſe that moued the conſpirators thus to kill the cardinall, was thought to be partlie in reuenge of the burning of maiſter George Wiſchart, fearing to be ſerued with the ſame ſawce, and in the end to be made to drinke of the ſame cup. Partlie it was thought they attempted it through counſell of ſome great men of the realme, that had conceiued ſome deadlie hatred againſt him.

Fr. Thin. Leſleus lib. 10 pag. 481.

✻ But Leſleus alſo, writing of the cauſes of his death ſaith, that they were diuerſe: as the ſeuerall tormentors ſeuerallie framed euerie one a part for his owne excuſe. For Norman & John did complaine, that they were wronged by him with no ſmall iniurie, becauſe that the cardinall had not recompenſed him for the loſſe he ſuſteined; when the cardinall had reſtored to Colwine lord thereof (before through the cardinals counſell baniſhed by the king) the caſtell and poſſeſſions of Eaſter wemes; which the king had after giuen to the ſaid Norman. The lord Grange affirmed that he reuenged himſelfe, becauſe he was remoued by the cardinals aduiſe from the office of the treaſurorſhip; which (being granted by the king to him) he had diſcharged with great profit to the realme, & honor to himſelfe. And Kirkmichell did alſo ſay that he was diſpoſſeſſed by the cardinall of ſome other (I cannot tell what) poſſeſſions. All which cauſes were but teſtes which they ſpread againſt the wind and report of ſo wicked and ſhamefull a deed. For vpon the fact, Norman being vexed with remorſe of conſcience, did not onelie labor to pacifie the anger of ſuch, that (either by bloud or benefit) were tied to the cardinall with all kind of duties: but did alſo, to ſhun the danger thereof, paſſe into France, and there by valour (in the ſeruice of Henrie the ſecond king of France) endeuored to wipe away that note of infamie, which he had caſt vpon his familie. All which notwithſtanding, both he and others (ſome after one ſort, and ſome after an other) were worthilie puniſhed for their wickednes.]

The ſame euening that the cardinall was ſlaine, the old lord of Grange, maiſter Henrie Balnauis, one of the councell of the realme, and ſundrie gentlemen of the ſurname of the Meluins, John Knocs and others, to the number of ſeuen ſcore perſons, entred the caſtell to their ſupport, taking vpon them to keepe it againſt the gouernor and his partakers. Not long after, the gouernor, conſidering that his deere couſine the cardinall was thus made awaie, aſſembled the great lords of the realme, as the earle of Angus, Huntleie, Argile, and others, by whoſe aduiſe he called a parlement, and forfalted them that had ſlaine the cardinall, and kept the caſtell of ſaint Andrews.

1546. The ſlaiers of the cardinall forfalted.

Herewith alſo he raiſed a power, and beſieged the ſame caſtell, planting diuerſe péeces of great artillerie againſt it. But it was ſo ſtronglie furniſhed with all maner of artillerie & munition by the cardinall in his life time, that they within cared little for all the inforcements that their aduerſaries without could aduance againſt them. Wherevpon, after that the ſiege had continued the ſpace of three moneths, the gouernor was glad to take an appointment with them within, to the end he might get out of their hands his eldeſt ſonne, who was remaining with the cardinall at the time when he was murthered, and ſo kept by them that did the murther, till now they agréed to deliuer him to his father, with condition that he ſhould raiſe his ſiege.

The caſtell of ſaint Andrews beſieged.

The ſiege raiſed.

They deliuered alſo the dead bodie of the cardinall, after it had laine buried in a dunghill within the caſtell, euer ſince the day in which they ſlue him. [The gouernor did name the abbat of Paſlew his brother to the biſhoprike of ſaint Andrews, and gaue the abbeie of Arbroth (being before granted to James Beton kinſman to the ſlaine cardinall) to George Dowglaſſe baſtard ſonne to the earle of Angus: which things were afterwards occaſions of great troubles in the realme.] In the yeare next inſuing, king Henrie the eight departed this life, after whome ſucceeded his ſonne Edward, the firſt of that name, king of England, France, and Ireland. Shortlie after, that is to ſay, the laſt of March, Francis the French king deceaſſed, and his ſonne Henrie, the ſecond of that name ſucceeded him; who at the deſire of the gouernor of Scotland, appointed Leone Strozze prior of Capoa, a knight of the order of Malta, with a nauie of 16 gallies, fraught with men of warre, and munition, to paſſe into Scotland, to helpe to win the caſtell of ſaint Andrews.

1547. The king of England deceaſſed.

The death of the French king.

The gouernor in the meane time with an armie paſſed to the weſt borders to beſiege the caſtell of Langham, the which was kept at that preſent by Michaell Wharton, hauing then with him but ſixteene Engliſhmen, who neuertheleſſe abid three or foure daies ſiege, and ſeuen canon ſhots, and ſo yéelded the houſe to the gouernor: and hereby was the peace broken, firſt by the Scots, euen as the Engliſhmen could haue wiſhed. Moreouer, at the ſame time, the erle of Rothous then returned out of Denmarke was acquit by an aſſiſe (as they call it) of earles and lords, of an accuſation wherewith he was charged, as confederat and partie with them that had murthered the cardinall.

Whileſt the gouernor was thus paſſed with his armie to the weſt borders, he was aduertiſed that the prior of Capoa was arriued, and [againſt the wils of ſuch as were againſt it] entred into the towne of ſaint Andrews: wherevpon the gouernor, with all the nobilitie that were then about him, haſted thither to aſſiſt the prior, and ſo the ſiege was ſtronglie laid about the caſtell there. The prior cauſed certeine péeces of artillerie to be drawen vp, and mounted on the top of a church, which was higher than the caſtell; ſo that thoſe péeces ſhot plump into the caſtell, that none durſt ſhew themſelues on the wals, or abroad in the yard within the caſtell. He cauſed alſo certeine canons to be drawen with engins, gins, néere to the verie wals of the caſtell, which battered the ſame in ſuch ſort, as the ditches were néere hand filled with the rubbiſh and ſtones of the wals that fell downe.

Moreouer, the gallies at an high water approched on the riuer ſide ſo nære to the caſtell, that with ſhot of canons and other artillerie, they ſore annoied them within, and ſlue diuerſe. The defendants perceiuing themſelues thus beſieged on all ſides, & not able long to hold out, put forth a token vpon a ſpeares point, to ſignifie that they deſired parlee, which was granted, and certeine of them comming forth, were admitted to talke with the gouernor, the quéene, and the prior of Capoa. They offered to render the caſtell, ſo they might depart, and haue their liues ſaued with bag and baggage.

The caſtell of S. Andrews yelded.

But this would not be granted, the gouernor vtterlie refuſing it; at length he was content to pardon them of their liues, if the French king ſhould thinke it good, elſe to ſtand to his pleaſure. The ſpoile of the caſtell was giuen to the Frenchmen, who vpon the ſurrender entring the ſame, left nothing behind him that might ſerue them to anie vſe in taking it away. All the principall men within it were led to the gallies, and conueied awaie into France priſoners at the French kings diſcretion. Diuerſe of them were committed to ſundrie priſons on the coaſt of Britaine, and others were appointed to row in the gallies till the yeare 1550, in which the priſoners we ſet at libertie, and the others that were in the gallies were redæmed by their friends for certeine ſummes of monie.

The prior of Capoa.

Thus was the caſtell of ſaint Andrews rendred the nine and twentith of Julie, fourtéene daies after the arriuall there of the prior of Capoa, whereby his great valiancie, well knowen afore that time, was ſo renewed, as his praiſe for his ſpéedie diſpatch and good ſucceſſe therein was much aduanced. Shortlie after, the duke of Summerſet, heretofore in this booke named earle of Hertford, vncle by the mother vnto the yong king of England, and admitted gouernor of his perſon, and protector of all his realms, dominions, and ſubiects, minding the aduancement of the yong king his nephue, thought good with all ſpéed to procure the conſummation of the mariage, betwixt him, and the yong quéene of Scots.

The duke of Summerſet protector of England.

But perceiuing that the ſame could not be brought to paſſe without force, he ſéemed loth to let paſſe the opportunitie of time then offered (as he tooke it) to ſerue his purpoſe; and therevpon by aduiſe of councell leuied an armie with all expedition, and came to Berwike, about the latter end of Auguſt, and in the beginning of September entred Scotland with the ſame armie, conteining ſeauentéene or eightéene thouſand men, which was diuided into three principall wards, the vant-gard led by the valiant earle of Warwike, the battell by the duke of Summerſet himſelfe, and the rere-ward by the lord Dacres of the north.

He entreth Scotland with an armie

The order of the Engliſh armie.

There were certeine wings and troopes of men of armes, demilances, and light horſſemen, and alſo of harquebuſiers, that attended vpon theſe three wards, garded with diuerſe péeces of great artillerie. The lord Greie of Wilton high marſhall of the armie had the generall conduction of the men of armes and demilances. Sir Francis Brian, lieutenant of the light horſſemen, with eight hundred of them was appointed to the vant-gard. Sir Peter Mewtas capteine of fiue hundred hagbutters, and ſir Francis Fleming maiſter of the ordinance, with a thouſand light horſſemen, were appointed to the battell. And ſir Richard Manners, with ſir hundred light horſſemen, attended vpon the rere-ward.

In this order marching through the Mers, and Louthian, they came at length vnto a place called Buckling Braies, nære to the Forth ſide, in which riuer the Engliſh fleet was arriued, and laie before the towne of Leith, but now by order giuen came backe from thence, and lay nérer to the armie. The gouernor of Scotland aduertiſed of the comming of this armie of England thus to inuade Scotland, with all diligence ſent abroad ſolemne ſummons for the leuieng of a new armie forth of all parts of the realme; ſuppoſing thereby to be ſufficientlie furniſhed and inabled for the incounter; happen when it ſhould; the contrarie part (no doubt) being likewiſe opinioned, and both hoping, or grædilie gaping after the glorie of victorie.

The Engliſh fleet.

The gouernor raiſeth an armie.

* For the gouernor did attempt at this time that which is accuſtomed to be vſed in the greateſt dangers of the countrie: which was, that he ſent out meſſengers through all the realme, who carieng a fierie croſſe in their hands, ſhould make ſigne (and declare) aſwell to the laitie, as to the churchmen; that all they which were aboue ſixtéene yeares old, and vnder ſixtie, ſhould preſentlie (with their armor) repaire to Muſſilborow, and there be readie to defend the libertie of the countrie; who accordinglie came to Muſſilborow (within leſſe than two miles of the place where the Engliſh armie came to incampe, lieng at Preſton) & placed themſelues at Innerneſſe ouer againſt their enimies.]

Fr. Thin. Leſleus lib. 10. pag. 485.

Here we haue to vnderſtand, that the Scots light horſſemen oftentimes would come pricking almoſt within their ſtaues length of the Engliſhmen as they marched, whooping and ſhouting, to the end they might traine them forth from their ſtrength, and with railing words would ſtill be in hand to prouoke them thereto. But the duke of Summerſet, doubting the goodneſſe of the Scotiſh prickers, gaue ſecret commandement, that no offer of ſkirmiſh by the Scotiſh horſmen ſhould be taken. But at length the lord Greie of Wilton, not able to beare ſuch bold preſumption in the Scots, aduenturing (as he tooke it) ouer raſhlie, and more than ſtood with their owne ſuertie, made ſute to the duke of Summerſet, that if they continued in ſuch brauerie, it might be lawfull for him to ſet them further off.

The goodneſs of the Scotiſh horſmen feared of the Engliſhmen. The lord Greie deſireth to incounter the Scotiſh horſſemen.

The duke at the firſt by no meanes would aſſent thereto, telling the lord Greie, that his deſire proceeded more of a lolitie of courage, than of anie knowledge of the enimie, and ſéemed to defend the goodneſſe of the Scotiſh horſſemen: but when the lord Greie perſiſted in his ſute, and the earle of Warwike aſſiſted his requeſt, the duke in the end yéelded thereto. Herevpon when the lord Hume with the Scots the next time (which was on the Fridaie the ninth of September) came forth to offer the ſkirmiſh after their wonted maner, the lord Greie taking with him certeine bands of horſſemen, both men of armes, demilances, and alſo light horſmen, diuided them in troopes, appointing the Spaniſh and Italian hagbutters on horſſebacke to kéepe on a wing, and to gard the hindermoſt troope of the Engliſh horſſemen.

He alſo gaue order to the leaders of euerie troope, that to which ſoeuer the enimie ſhould once offer, in anie wiſe, that no anſwer by ſkirmiſh were made them, but after they had drawne them to their accuſtomed plaie and proffer of charge, that troope that it was offered vnto, preſentlie vpon the enimies wheeling about ſhould throughlie giue it them; and that ſo giuen, the nert troope preſentlie to giue it in the face: and ſo (as occaſion required) both thoſe troopes wholie togither to helpe other without breaking. The Scots comming forward, pricking and whouping after their old wont, the Engliſhmen forbare a great while, till at the laſt, foure or fiue hundzed of them came ſcattered vpon the ſpurre, with a maruellous ſhout within a ſtones length of the fozmoſt troope.

Nicholas Gaineſfozd.

These thinking then to haue wheéled about, maiſter Nicholas Gaineſfozd, the leader of that troope, and lieutenant of the lozd Greies band of his men of armes of Bullongne, cried; A charge, which as ſpéedily on the Engliſh part as vnlooked foz of the Scots being giuen, from charging at that time in ſpoz, the Scots were dziuen to gallop awaie ſo faſt as their hozſes might beare them, loſing of their companies that were taken and ſlaine, to the number of eight hundzed and mozе (as ſome haue wzitten) [at what time the lozd Hume (as ſaith Leſleus lib. 10. pa. 486) falling from his hozſe, was grieuouſlie wounded, and caried to Edenburgh, and his eldeſt ſonne was taken pziſoner] but yet, as diuerſe of the Engliſhmen aduentured too farre in following the chaſe, they were diſtreſſed, and ſundzie of them taken pziſoners, among the which were ſome of their capteins, as ſir Rafe Bulmer, Thomas Golwer, & Robert Crouch, each of them hauing in charge the leading of ſeuerall bands of light hozſemen. ¶ Thus much foz this Fridaies ſkirmiſh, wherein the chiefeſt foze of the Scotiſh hozſemen was defeated, to the great diſcouragement of the reſt.

The Scots hozſlemen put to flight.

English capteins taken.

Fr. Thn. Buchan. lib. 15.

* The Engliſh armie remaining ſtill at Pzeſton, did from a hill behold the number of the Scots, who (ſuppoſing that they ſaw a greater number than in truth there was) aſſembled in the meane time to conſult of the eſtate of their affaires. And therevpon ſent letters to the Scots, deſiring that if they might obteine anie thing by iuſtice, that they ſhould rather end the warre with couenants than with canons. The effect of which letters tended to this end. That

"the Engliſh did greatlie intreat the Scots, firſt to "remember that both armies were chziſtian men, to "and of whome (vnleſſe they vtterlie forget their pzo"feſſion) there ſhould nothing be mozе welcome noz "deſired than peace & tranquillitie, and nothing mozе "deteſtable than warre and vniuſt foze. Beſides this, "that the cauſe of this pzeſent warre did not grow of "couetouſneſſe, hatred oz enuie, but from the deſire of "perpetuall peace, which could not be better oz mozе "firmelie eſtabliſhed by any means, but by the league "of matrimonie (being pzomiſed and confirmed by "the publike conſent and pledge of the nobilitie) with "thoſe conditions which were mozе beneficiall foz the "Scots than the Engliſh, being ſuch as did not call "them into ſeruitude, but into a feloweſhip and liberall "imparting of all their fozтunes each to other. Foz ſo "much mozе ſhould that mariage be commodious to "the Scots than to the Engliſh, by how much the "hope of pzofit, and the feare of iniuries ſhould bée "greater from the ſtronger to the weaker.

"Wherefoze they ſhould chiefliе conſider (and in "this kind) this to be their greateſt reaſon, that ſince "that their quéene was of neceſſitie to be giuen in ma"riage by the Scots, and that the ſame neceſſitie was "not to be auoided; and the modcration therein verie "hard: that the onelie power to chooſe hir a huſband "was left vnto the publike councell oz parlement. "And if they would chooſe (to their quéene) a huſband "foz the publike pzofit and dignitie: of whome could "they better take chooſe, than of a king their neigh"boz, bozne in the ſame Iland, néere of bloud, inſtruc"ted in the ſame lawes, bzought vp in the ſame ma"ners and language; not their ſuperioz onelie in ri"ches, but almoſt alſo in all commodities and oznа"ments of erternall things, and ſuch a perſon which "did bzing with him peace, concozd, amitie, and the foz"getting of all old iniuries? But if they call to them "anie other (differing from them in language, ma"ners, and lawes) to take the kingdome: let them thinke with themſelues, what and how manie diſcommodities will grow thereby, and to what euill counſels they ſhall indanger themſelues: the which they may learne by the example of other nations, being farre better to be taught it by the miſfoztunes of others, than to féele the ſmart thereof by their owne experience.

Wherefoze (as touching themſelues) if they ſhall not perceiue the Scotiſh nation to be eſtranged from this amitie and concozd, they would mitigate ſomwhat of their fozmer pzomiſes (which by law they might chalenge) and be contented that the maiden quæne ſhould be bzought vp amongſt them, and bée alwaies in their power, vntill the time that nature ſhould inable hir fit foz mariage, and vntill ſuch time as ſhe might chooſe hir a huſband by the aduiſe of the nobilitie. And that in the meane time (vntill the ſame might be perfozmed) that both the nations ſhould abſteine from warre: and that alſo the quéene (during that time) ſhould neither be conueied into anie ſtrange nation: noz that they ſhould conclude anie pact oz couenant with the French, oz anie other fozreine pzince touching hir mariage. The which if the Scots would moſt holilie and handfaſtlie pzomiſe, the Engliſh would fozthwith depart with a quiet armie. And further, that if the Engliſh had committed anie hurt oz ſpoile (ſince they came into the countrie) they would recompenſe the ſame by the iudgement of good men.

These letters thus ſent, the gouernoz did impart vnto a few, and of thoſe eſpeciallie to Iohn his bzother biſhop of ſaint Andzews (taken vnto him in place & authozitie of the ſlaine cardinall.) Theſe two aduanced with great hope of victozie, were the cauſe that theſe letters were ſuppzeſſed, bicauſe they feared that if the equall conditions of peace were knowns abzoad, the moſt part would willinglie incline to the ſame quiet aduiſe. Wherefoze they pzocured a falſe rumoz to be ſpzead thzough the hoſt, that the Engliſh men were come thither with determination to take awaie the quéene by foze, and by ſtrength of armes to bzing the whole kingdome into their ſubiection. Foz the gouernoz being faint ſpirited by nature, had choſen vnto him foure ſuch other councellozs (like vnto himſelfe) in the affairs of warre, by whoſe command & becke all things were perfozmed. Of which number were his thzee kinſmen, Iohn archbiſhop of ſaint Andzews, the abbat of Dunfermling, Geoзge Durie, with Archembald Beton; and the fourth was Hugh Rigs, a lawier, rather famous foz his groſſe bodie and fooliſh conditions, than anie knowledge in militarie affaires. Theſe foure had ſo puffed vp the gouernoz (inconſtant by his owne nature, and changing his counſell by the wind of euerie rumoz) that he would with ſtopped eares heare all other mens opinions. In the meane time, his friends hauing ſpzead a feined tale (thzough the Scotiſh hoſt) by him deuiſed, the Scots ran in all haſt to their weapons, whoſe vnaduiſed ſpéed was in the end the cauſe of their vnfoztunate pzocéedings, as after ſhall appeare.)

For being true (as the Scots haue repoзted) that the gouernoz, and the nobilitie of Scotland meant not to hazard battell within their owne realme, but rather to lie ſtill and defend their ground, if the Engliſhmen ſhould come fozward to giue them battell there. The Engliſhmen aduertiſed thereof, the mozrow after this great ſkirmiſh, raiſed their field verie earlie, purpoſing to take an hill called Pinkhill, where they might place their ordinance, and to ſhot into the Scotiſh campe, whereby they ſhould foзce the Scots to diſlodge from their ground of aduantage. The gouernoz and the Scotiſh lozds, beholding their enimies thus marching fozward, thought beſt

to ſtaie their enterpriſe, and therefore ſuddenlie, notwithſtanding their former determination, ruſhing forth of their campe, paſſed forward to incounter their enimies.

The ordering of the Scotiſh battels.

They were diuided into three battels; Archembald Dowglaſſe earle of Angus, with certeine lords with him, led the vant-gard; George Gordon earle of Huntleie, and his friends the rere-ward; and the gouernor accompanied with the earle of Argile and the reſt of the noble men, were in the maine battell. The Engliſhmen hauing got the hill, and perceiuing the Scots to come forwards with great haſt, ſtaied for their comming: but the Scots were ſo raſh and haſtie, paſſing firſt through the water in their armour, and ſo vp towards the hill, that continuing their march with ſuch ſpeed, as they ſeemed rather to trot, than to keepe anie ordinarie marching paſe, before they could come to ioine with the Engliſhmen, they were almoſt out of breath.

The Engliſh horſſemen beaten backe.

Howbeit, the earle of Angus, and the other in the vant-gard, boldlie abid the charge of all the Engliſh horſſemen, and ſo rigorouſlie reincountred them, that ſlaieng and beating downe no ſmall number both of men and horſſes, they put the reſt to flight; ſo that no ſmall part of them retired backe in ſuch diſorder, that they ran thorough the rankes of the footmen in the fore-ward, wherwith ſuch feare entered among the Engliſhmen, that (as hath béene reported) they had vndoubtedlie fled, if the manfull courage of the earle of Warwike had not béene ſhewed at that preſent, according to the wonted valure of his often approued proweſſe, whereby he cauſed them to ſtaie, and relie themſelues againe.

The valiantneſſe of the earle of warwike.

In the meane time, the battell and the rere-ward of the Scots aduanced forward with great courage. But there was a gallie & two pineſſes of the Engliſh fléet, which from the ſea ſhot ſo terriblie at the Scotiſh armie, that the ſame was not onelie ſore galled and indamaged thereby, but alſo ſtaied, that they could not come eaſilie forward. And héerewith the Engliſh vant-gard incouraged with the comfortable words and behauior of the earle of Warwike, and other the capteins, made towards the Scotiſh vant-gard againe: the which not able of it ſelfe to reſiſt, retired in good order to the great battell of Scotland. Whereupon, the multitude fearing, by reaſon they ſaw them in the fore-ward thus retire (albeit in good order) that all had béene loſt, gaue backe, and tooke them to flight; whome the Engliſhmen followed amaine, ſlaieng the Scotiſhmen downe on heaps in paſſing great numbers. Manie were alſo drowned in the water of Undereſke, through the which they tooke their flight.

The gallie and two pinneſſes.

The earle of Huntleie and the rere-gard ſtood ſtill with their enſignes and banners, till the chaſe was paſt by them: but at length were driuen to make awaie as well as the reſt, and the earle himſelfe in the retire being taken on foot, well clad in gilt armour inameled, was led priſoner to the lord protector. Diuerſe other men of name, barons, and knights, were taken priſoners. There were ſlaine no ſmall number of perſonages of good account. Among other, the lord Fleming, the maiſter of Erſkin, the maiſter of Graham, the maiſter of Meſſine, the maiſter of Ogiluie, the maiſter of Leuingſton, the maiſter of Roſſe [the maiſter of Argendale and Meſſane] the lard of Lochinwar, the lard of Glencarnocke, & others. [There were taken priſoners diuerſe noble men, the lord Zeſtrie, the earle of Huntleie chancellor of the realme, and others, as ſaith Leſleus lib. 10. pag. 487.]

The next day, the Engliſh armie remoued to Leith, where the priſoners were put into a church, diuerſe of them being ſore wounded. But the earle of Huntleie, entering bond for them that they ſhould well and truelie paie their ranſomes, agréed vpon betwixt them and their takers, or elſe to come and preſent themſelues priſoners in England by a certeine day, they were ſuffered to depart. * The calamitie of which bloudie day, there were not a few which did impute vnlikelie to happen to the Scots, becauſe they did arrogantlie reiect ſuch honorable and beneficiall peace, and did hope (if they obteined the victorie) to haue vſed more crueltie to their owne people than vnto the Engliſh, either becauſe they would (as I my ſelfe coniecture) reuenge old quarels, or elſe haue vſed extremitie againſt ſuch as ſecretlie miſliked this conflict with the Engliſh.)

The gouernor eſcaping from the battell, came to Striueling, where the quéene regent was, togither with hir daughter the yong quéene. Héere, by the counſell and aduiſe of the earle of Angus [Argile, Rotheſen, and Caſſiles] and diuerſe other lords that were alſo withdrawne thither after the battell, they were conueied to the countrie of Menteith, where they remained in the abbeie of Inch Mahome [deliuering the yong quéene to hir mother, Erſkine and Leuingſtone to be kept there] till the Engliſh armie was departed out of the realme, and then they remoued againe, and came to Striueling. [After that the gouernor had deliuered the earle out of priſon at Edenburgh] the Engliſh nanie wan the Ile of ſaint Colmes Inch [in the meane time] and did ſundrie other exploits by ſea, as in the Engliſh hiſtorie it may appéere.

Moreouer, the earle of Bothwell, whome the gouernor had before kept in priſon, and was the night after the battell ſet at libertie, repared to the duke of Summerſet, with diuerſe other lords and gentlemen of Louthian, whileſt he laie at Leith, offering themſelues to be at the king of Englands commandement, and ſo were aſſured from receiuing hurt or damage by the Engliſh power. The duke of Summerſet hauing remained at Leith eight daies, burnt a peece of it, and demanding the caſtell of Edenburgh, but could not obteine it, departed thence the eighteenth of December homewards the nert waie, ouer the mounteins of Soutreie, comming the third day before the caſtell of Hume, where they did ſo much by countenancing to win that fortreſſe, that within three or foure daies after their comming thither, it was ſurrendred.

Hume caſtell rendred to the Engliſhmen.

This caſtell being woone, & a garriſon left therein to kéepe it, they remoued to Rockeſburgh, where within the compaſſe of the ruinous wals of an old caſtell, they built a fort; & after returning into England, left a conuenient garriſon to kéepe it. They got alſo about the ſame time a ſtrong fortreſſe, called Faſt caſtell, ſtanding néere to the ſea ſide, and placed a garriſon within it. And moreouer, in this meane time, their fléet by ſea wan the caſtell of Broughtie crag, and put in like manner a garriſon within it to kéepe the ſame (as in the Engliſh hiſtorie it may further appéere) and in what ſort alſo all the chiefeſt lords and gentlemen of the Mers and Tiuidale came in, and ſubmitted themſelues to the duke of Summerſet, vpon aſſurance had and giuen.

Furthermore, whileſt the duke of Summerſet with his armie did thus inuade Scotland on the eaſt part, it was ordeined by the ſaid duke, and other of the councell to the king of England, that Matthew earle of Lennox, and Thomas lord Wharton, then warden of the weſt marches of England, ſhould with a power inuade Scotland on the weſt ſide, to the end that there ſhould not anie of the weſt borders nor countries come to aſſiſt the gouernor againſt the duke of Summerſets armie, but be driuen to remaine at home to defend their owne countrie. Herevpon, there was an armie lenied, to the number of fiue thouſand footmen, and eight hundred light horſſemen, with which power the earle of Lennox and the lord Wharton entering Scotland the eight of September, incamped the firſt night vpon the water of Elke, and marched the next day through the nether part of Annandale, till they came to the caſtell of Wilke, a fortreſſe of good ſtrength, the wals being foureteene foot thicke.

The caſtell of Wilke yelded

Captеine of this caſtell was one John Steward, brother to the lard thereof, who vpon the approch of the earle of Lennox, yelded the houſe to him, without anie ſhew of reſiſtance. Whereupon, Fergus Graham, brother to Richie Graham of Eriſke, was appointed with a garriſon of ſouldiors to keepe that caſtell to the vſe of the yoong king of England, and was afterwards confirmed captеine there with fiftie light horſſemen, by appointment of the duke of Summerſet, & the councell; ſo that during the warrs, he remained there to the great annoiance of the Scots, enimies to England, and preſeruation of the countrie thereabouts to the king of Englands vſe.

On the twentith of September, the earle of Lennox, and the lord Wharton, incamped neere to the towne of Annand, and on the morrow after approching nearer to the ſame, gaue ſummons vnto the captеine thereof, called Lion, of the houſe of Glams, who with an hundred Scots [whereof Warwell and Johnſtone, and Colſpull (as ſaith Leſleus lib. 10. pa. 489. being parcell] kept the church and ſteeple of Annand, being peeces of themſelues verie ſtrong and mightilie reinforced with earth: they within therefore refuſed to yeeld, and valiantlie defended themſelues. The greateſt peeces of artillerie, which the Engliſhmen had there at that time, were certеine double and ſingle falcons, wherewith they beat one lie the battlements, till they might with certеine engines approch hard to the wals, and vndermine the ſame, ſo as the roſe of the church was ſhaken downe, and a great number of them within the church ſlaine and cruſhed to death. Such as eſcaped fled into the ſteeple.

Fr. Thin.

The church of Annand vndermined.

Two of the Engliſhmen that wrought about the mines, were ſlaine: but at length, the captеine moued by perſuaſion of the earle of Lennox, to whome he claimed to be of kin, rendered the ſteeple to him, with himſelfe, and 96 Scots ſouldiors, with condition to haue their liues onelie ſaued, and the captеine to remaine priſoner, and to go into England. Immediatlie vpon their comming forth of the ſteeple, fire was giuen vnto the traines of powder in the mines, and ſo both the church & ſteeple were blowen vp into the aire, & raced downe to the ground. This done, they burnt the towne (after they had ſacked it) and left not one ſtone ſtanding vpon an other, for that the ſame towne had euer beene a verie noiſome neighbour to England.

The ſteeple yelded.

The church and ſteeple of Annand blowen vp with powder.

The Engliſhmen had conceiued ſuch ſpite towards this towne, that if they ſaw but a peece of timber remaining vnburnt, they would cut the ſame in peeces with their bils. The countrie herewith was ſtricken in ſuch feare, that the next day all the Bilpatrikes and the Jardeins, the lards of Kirkmichell, Applegirth, Cloſburne, Dalwomendes, Mubie, and the Jrewings, the Beis, the Rigs, the Purreies, and all the clanes and ſurnames of the nether part of Annerdale, came in, and receiued an oth of obeiſance, as ſubiects to the king of England, deliuering pledges for their aſſured loialtie. The reſidue that would not come in and ſubmit themſelues, had their houſes burnt, their goods and cattell fetched away by the Engliſh light horſſemen, that were ſent abroad into the countrie for that purpoſe.

The Scots that came to aſſure themſelues.

These things thus executed, the earle of Lennox, and the lord Wharton, returned backe into England with their priſoners, booties, and ſpoiles, receiuing great thanks and commendations by gentle letters on the fiue & twentith of September, from the duke of Summerſet, then lieng at Rockeſburgh, about fortifieng of that place. The gouernor perceiuing thus that without the aſſiſtance of France he ſhould not be able to reſiſt the Engliſhmen, hauing now got ſuch fot hold within the realme of Scotland, required the queene Dowager, and monſieur Doiſell, liger ambaſſador for the French king, to perſuade with him by letters, to ſend an armie into Scotland, to the aid of his friends there.

The gouernors ſute to the queene Dowager, and to the French ambaſſadors.

The queene and monſieur Doiſell, perceiuing a readie waie prepared to bring that to paſſe which they moſt deſired (which was, to haue the queene of Scotland ordered in all things by the French kings aduiſe) they vndertooke to procure an armie out of France, according to the gouernors deſire, if he with the ſtates of the realme would agree that the queene might be ſent into France, and a contract made for hir beſtowing in marriage, as ſtood with the French kings pleaſure. The gouernor condeſcending hereunto, aſſembled the ſtates, and by their aduiſes, paſſed certеine couenants to the effect aforeſaid, & ſent the ſame in writing by certеine meſſengers into France.

The queene Dowager promiſeth aid out of France with condition.

The French king gladlie accepting this meſſage, prepared a nauie of ſhips and gallies to tranſport an armie into Scotland the next ſummer. In the meane time, the gouernor laied ſiege to Wzoughtie crag, and the duke of Summerſet, as well for meanes to cauſe the Scots to retire that ſiege, as alſo for the annoiance of Clideſdale, apperteining to the gouernor and the earle of Angus, and other Scots that would not come in to the obeiſance of the king of England, appointed the earle of Lennox to make a new inuaſion into Scotland, and to vſe for triall of their fidelities the helpe of two thouſand Scottiſh light horſſemen, that were alreadie aſſured & ſworne to ſerue the king of England in all ſuch exploits in which they ſhould be imploied.

The gouernor ſendeth into France for aid.

Wzoughtie crag beſieged by the gouernor.

The earle of Lennox deſirous to aduance the king of Englands affaires, and hauing receiued letters from William earle of Glencarne, with promiſe of his aſſiſtance, and likewiſe of his father in law the earle of Angus, the lard of Dunlanrig, and thoſe lards and gentlemen of the countries of Kile, Cunningham, Kentren, and Lennox, entered Scotland about the twelfth of December, accompanied with Henrie Wharton, ſecond ſon to the lord Wharton, with two hundred light horſſemen, of the garriſons in Scotland, and comming firſt to Dunfreis, where the generall aſſemblie was appointed of the two thouſand aſſured Scottiſh light horſſemen, when the muſters ſhould be taken, he found ſcarſe three hundred, and thoſe for the more part of the broken countries of Annandale, Eſwidale, Eſdale, and Liddeſdale.

The earle of Lennox entereth into Scotland.

The earle of Glencarne came thither in deed, but vnder a counterfet ſhew of good meaning, where in truth he ment nothing but craft to diſcouer all the earle of Lennox his purpoſes: who perceiuing his double dealing, and finding no ſuch forces readie to aſſiſt him, as he looked for, and moreouer, miſtruſting the lewdnes of the maiſter of Warwell, & the gentlemen of Liddeſdale, meaning (as he tooke it) to intrap him, and deliuer him to the queene Dowager, and the lord gouernor, ſtood in ſome perplexitie what way ſhould be the beſt for him to follow, thinking it not to ſtand with his honor to returne, without atchiuing ſome enterpriſe.

onelie with Scotiſhmen, he would both ſerue him and honor him in the beſt wiſe he might: but if he brought thoſe Engliſhmen in his companie, he would not onelie refuſe to aid him, but alſo raiſe all the power he might make, either by his friends or otherwiſe, to reſiſt him, and proffer him a repulſe. The earle thus perceiuing that he was in danger to be betraied among them, and that there were all the deuiſes practiſed that might be to ſtaie thoſe that ſhould come to the deuotion of the king of England, diſſembled the matter with Glencarne, and other that were ſuborned to betraie him; pretending to them, that he would follow the courſe of their deuiſes.

1547. Buch. But in the meane time he got togither the Engliſh capteins that were appointed to attend him, and alſo ſuch Scotiſhmen as he knew he might truſt. And meaning to ſcourge Drumlanrig, & to cut him ſhort, for that he was the chiefe inſtrument to ſtaie all the Scotiſhmen in thoſe parties from entering friendſhip with the Engliſhmen: he gaue ſecret warning to all the capteins & leaders about nine of the clocke at night, that they ſhould be readie with their men to mount on horſbacke at the ſound of the trumpet, and keepe with them the earle of Glencarne, the maiſter of Marwell, the lards of Cloſburne, Kirkmichell, and others the gentlemen of Nideſdale and Annandale.

Horſſemen ſent forth to ſcourge Drumlanrig.

He ſent forth ſir hundred choſen horſſemen vpon ſound of the trumpet, at twelue of the clocke at night, vnder the leading of Henrie Wharton, and other the capteins of the garriſons, who in the dawning of the next morrow, arriued neere the place of Drumlanrig, where they appointed foure hundred of their horſſemen to paſſe to the forraie, who raiſed fire, and burnt two miles in length, both townes and villages on ech ſide, euen hard to the gates of Drumlanrig, ſpoiling the houſes of goods and riches, worth to the value of two thouſand marks, got three thouſand ſhéepe, two thouſand herd of great cattell, beſide nine ſcore horſſes and mares.

They harrie the countrie about Drumlanrig.

The Annandalers laden with ſpoile and cattell, being in number foure hundred men, departed with their preie homewards. The lard of Drumlanrig, lieng all this while in ambuſh with ſeuen hundred men, forbare to breake out to giue anie charge vpon his enimies, doubting leaſt the earle of Lennox had kept a ſtale behind: but now after he perceiued that the moſt part of the enimies were departed, and that the reſidue of the gentlemen & capteins of the Engliſh horſſemen were withdrawing towards Dunfreis, being not paſt ſix ſcore men, he fiercelie followed after them with his power, in hope not onelie to ouerthrow and diſtres them, but alſo to take the earle of Lennox at Dunfreis.

Drumlanrig purſueth the Engliſhmen.

Maiſter Henrie Wharton and thoſe ſix ſcore horſſemen, retiring beyond the water of Nith, and perceiuing that Drumlanrig and his men entered the water raſhlie to purſue them, returned, and gaue ſuch a deſperate charge vpon them, that Drumlanrig and his companie were ſcattered and put to flight: yet Drumlanrig himſelfe, although there were ſome ſpeares broken vpon him, through the goodneſſe of his horſſe eſcaped. Two gentlemen of his ſurname and traine, that were in no ſmall eſtimation with him, were ſlaine, and ſix ſcore priſoners taken, and led to Dunfreis. The terror of this ouerthrow, and the bruit of the earle of Lennox his entrie thus made into Scotland, cauſed the gouernor to leuie his ſiege from Broughtie crag, and with ſpeed to come from thence, the better to defend his countries of Clideſdale, and Dowglaſdale. Sir Andrew Dudleie, capteine of Broughtie crag, bare himſelfe verie valiantlie, in defending the caſtell during this ſiege, ſo that the Scots certes loſt diuerſe hardie perſonages: and among other, Galwen Hamilton, the gouernors kinſman, was ſlaine at the ſame ſiege.

He is put to flight.

The ſiege of Broughtie crag raiſed.

Moreouer, the prior of Whiterne by his letters and meſſengers, offered himſelfe to obeie the king of England: and the inhabitants of the burrough and hauen townes of Wigton and Kirkcowbre, the knights of Loghinwar and Garleis, the lard and tutor of Bombie, the lard of Cardines, & all the gentlemen of Annandale, Nideſdale, and Galloway, euen to Whiterne, being foure ſcore miles in length from Caerleill, through the inducement of the foreſaid prior, and of the knights of Loghinwar and Garleis, (for the fauour they bare to the earle of Lennox) within two daies after the diſcomfiture of Drumlanrig, came vnto Dunfreis, and there receiued an oth to be true to the king of England, and afterwards went with the earle to Caerleill, leauing the countrie in good quiet, and the king of England acknowledged for lord of Galloway, Nideſdale, and Annandale, by the inhabitants thereof.

The prior of whiterne.

And after that the forenamed perſons had remained for a ſpace at Caerleill, they deliuered pledges, but eſpeciallie for Iohn Marwell, & returned home to their countrie, as aſſured men & ſubiects to the K. of England. In this meane while, the gouernor hauing held ſiege before the caſtell of Broughtie crag, by the ſpace of thirtie daies, and now retiring from thence (as before ye haue heard) by the aduiſe of the principall lords about him, he cauſed maiſter James Haliburton, tutor of thoſe parties, to raiſe certeine companies of horſſemen, and appointed him with capteine Leirmouth (whome he left in Dundée with certeine footmen) to defend the countrie againſt the Engliſhmen, if they iſſued forth of Broughtie crag, to atchiue anie enterpriſe anie where néere thereabouts.

And further it was appointed alſo, that about the end of Februarie, the earle of Lennox and the lord Wharton, with ſeuen hundred Engliſh horſſemen, beſide the aſſured Scots horſſemen, and about foure or fiue thouſand Engliſh footmen, ſhould by the weſt borders inuade Scotland: they according to their commiſſion ſet forward, and the firſt night came to Louchmaben, and there lodged.

The next day they marched to Dunfreis, and whileſt they remained there, the earle of Angus being come to Drumlanrig, by meſſengers entred ſome talke with his ſonne in law the earle of Lennox. But ſith it was perceiued that this was done, rather to intrap the earle of Lennox, or rather at the leaſt wiſe to driue time, vpon conſultation had with the maiſter of Marwell, the lard of Cloeſborne, and others the gentlemen aſſured of Nideſdale and Annandale; it was concluded, that the townes of Morton, Duſdere, and others, néere adioining togither in thoſe parts, ſhould be burnt; to the end that the earle of Angus might ſo be drawen to the field, and caught by ſome one meane or other.

The diſſimulation of the earle of Angus.

About midnight therefore, the forraie being ſet forth, vnder the leading of maiſter Henrie Wharton, to the number of twelue hundred light horſſemen, the maiſter of Marwell, now lord Herries, and the reſidue of the aſſured men being amongeſt them kept forward, and in the morning the earle of Lennox, Maiſter Henrie wharton.

Lennor, and the lord Wharton marched forth with the footmen, till they came ten miles beyond Dunfreis. And where the earle of Angus was drawen to the caſtell of Drumlanrig, vnder pretenſe to commune with his ſonne the earle of Lennor (but meaning to intrap him) if it were poſſible, he was ſo inuironed by the Engliſh footmen yer he could haue ſufficient warning, that he was forced to flée onelie with flue perſons in his companie. But now the Engliſh horſſemen being come to Duſdere, eight & fortie miles within the realme of Scotland, hauing paſſed ſundrie great riuers, they ſet that towne on fire.

The earle of Angus put to flight.

Duſdere ſet on fire.

But the maiſter of Marwell, with the other Scotiſh gentlemen and light horſſemen borderers, to the number of foure hundred, being in companie of the Engliſh horſſemen (as before ye haue heard) had contriued the deſtruction of the Engliſhmen afore hand. And the better to worke their feat, they had procured (as ye haue heard) the earle of Angus to come vnto Drumlanrig with a choſen power of men for that purpoſe. There were alſo vpon euerie hill about, great numbers of Scotiſh footmen, with ſpeares and lanceſtaues to aſſiſt the earle of Angus and his complices againſt the Engliſhmen. The lard of Drumlanrig with a number of choſen horſſemen was aduanced forward in ſight of the Engliſhmen, as they were buſie in firing the towne of Duſdere.

The aſſured Scots therefore, thinking the enterpriſe to be ſuerlie inough conueid for their contriued purpoſe, openlie vpon the field neere to Duſdere, hoiſing vp a blacke penſill vpon a ſpeares point for a token, reuolted wholie, and ioined themſelues to the lard of Drumlanrig and other their countrie men, & thruſt in betwixt the Engliſh horſſemen & footmen, to the great perill of diſtreſſing aſwell the one as the other. For making toward the place where the earle of Lennor, and the lord Wharton were comming forward with their footmen, neere to the old caſtell of Dauſwinton, ſometime the houſe of the Cumins, they bruted it abroad, that the Engliſh horſſemen were quite ouerthrowen.

The reuolting of the aſſured Scots.

A falſe rumor ſpred.

The earle of Lennor, beholding the maner of his aduerſaries, lighted on foot from his horſſe, willing the lord Wharton to dow the like; for this day (ſaid he) I will die a true Engliſhman. At length the Engliſh horſſemen fetching a compaſſe in retiring backe from Duſdere, came neere to the place where the earle and the lord Wharton were ranged in order of battell: and thinking no leſſe but that their horſſemen had beene ouerthrowen, were readie to march backe towards Dunfreis. But their horſſemen thus comming in, and perceiuing how the matter ſtood, gaue a right valiant charge vpon the Scots, that ſtood countenancing the footmen, and readie to take the aduantage, if they might haue driuen them through ſhrinking backe into anie diſorder.

But ſuch was the violence of the ſhocke giuen at that inſtant, with great manhood (vndoubtedlie) by the Engliſh horſſemen, that the Scots were therewith put out of arraie, ſcattered, & quite put to flight; the lord of Drumlanrig being taken priſoner, corrupted his taker, and ſo got away. The maiſter of Marwell eſcaped in great danger of life, for he had ſundrie ſpeares broken on him in the chaſe as he fled awaie. There were yet taken that day of the Scots to the number of foure hundred, beſide ſundrie that were drowned in the water of Nith. Amongeſt the priſoners were theſe men of name; the abbat of new abbeie, Chriſtie Irrewing of Bonſhaw, a brother of the lord of Hempſfield, & manie other gentlemen of name. Dunfreis was rifled and ſpoiled, as the earle of Lennor and the Engliſhmen returned thither, and a martiall court appointed there for execution of pledges; but yet ſuſpended and ſtaied, till the councels pleaſure might be knowen in that behalfe.

The Scots put to flight.

Dunfreis ſpoiled.

There were at the firſt euill news ſpread abroad, and certified to the court of England of this iornie, how the earle of Lennor and the Engliſh armie was ouerthrowen, ſo that it was by order appointed, that the earle of Derbie, the Lord Scrope, and Coniers, with their powers ſhould repaire to the weſt borders to garniſh the ſame for defenſe againſt the enimies: but vpon the true report how the matter had paſſed, made by maiſter Henrie Wharton, and one Biſhop a Scotiſhman, ſent in poſt for that purpoſe, that appointment was ſtaied; and maiſter Wharton was at that time made knight, and the ſaid Biſhop richlie rewarded for bringing ſo good news. Herewith were letters directed downe from the councell to the lord Wharton, for the execution of certeine pledges, that is to ſaie, the maiſter of Marwels pledge, being one of his neereſt kinſmen of the houſe of the Herries, alſo the warden of the Greie friers in Dunfreis, the vicar of Carlauerocke, and diuerſe other which were executed at Carlill. In this meane time were the forts at Lawder and Hadington built, the caſtels of Peſter and Dawkith woone, all the mils burnt within foure miles of each hand of Edenburgh, and other exploits atchiued by the Engliſhmen, as in the hiſtorie of England is more at large expreſſed.

Pledges executed.

But now the French king, hauing prepared an armie readie to come into Scotland, cauſed the ſame to draw downe to Breſt in Britaine, where the ſhips and gallies were rigged and made readie to paſſe therewith into Scotland. The chiefe leaders of which armie were theſe, which had charge chieflie to command in the ſame: monſieur de Deſſe lieutenant generall, monſieur Dandelot coronell of the French footmen, the counte Reingraue coronell of the Almains, monſieur de Pallerate, monſieur Doiſell, Pietro Strozzie coronell of the Italians, monſieur Etauges capteine of the horſſemen, ſir Nicholas de Villegaignon a knight of the Rhodes (or rather Malta) capteine of the gallies, and monſieur Duno commiſſarie of the artillerie: with diuerſe other worthie perſonages, and men of approued valiancie. Theſe capteins with their powers being imbarked at Breſt, ſailed alongſt by the eaſt ſeas, and at length about the middeſt of June came into the rode before Leith, where they landed their people and ordinance. [A little before whoſe arriuall into France (as ſaith Leſleus. libro 10. pag. 491.) Chapelle Bironne landed in Scotland, accompanied with other nobilitie of France, to giue good counſell to the Scots anſwerable to the time, which was (to pleaſe their eares therwith) that there ſhould a greater armie ſhortlie come out of France, to ſuccor their extremities.]

Afterwards, with the aduiſe of the gouernor, and other of the Scotiſh lords, the French power went to beſiege Hadington, and comming thither, incamped themſelues in places of aduantage about the towne, caſt trenches, planted their ordinance, battered the rampires, and kept them within ſtreictlie beſieged on each hand, vſing all the waies they could deuiſe to conſtreine the Engliſhmen to yéeld. They forbare yet to giue a generall aſſault, becauſe they would not hazard (as they haue reported) the loſſe of ſo manie men as might haue béene ſlaine and maimed thereby, to the great weakening of their power there, hauing not meanes to ſupplie it when they would.

Hadington beſieged.

Why the Frenchmen forbare to giue an aſſault.

And yet they had a great armie of Scots with them for a ſeaſon, and had made the breaches ſo reaſonable, ſonable, that with ſmall paine they might haue entered by the ſame, if the force of the defendants had not ſufficed with handblowes to haue beaten them backe, as no doubt there was no want of good wils in them ſo to haue done, if the Frenchmen had put the matter in triall: yet during this ſiege, they within ſtood in great neceſſitie of things behouefull for the defenſe of the towne. Wherevpon ſir Henrie Wharton with a band of light horſſemen of the weſt borders, and others, came and put into the towne a certeine number of men with powder, and other neceſſaries, greatlie to the reliefe of the beſieged, & no leſſe diſpleaſure of the Frenchmen and Scots, that were not aware of this enterpriſe till it was done in the night ſeaſon, by the good and fortunate conduction of them that had the conueiance thereof.

But after this, there came a power of Engliſh horſſmen to the number of little leſſe than two thouſand demilances, light horſſmen, & harquebuſſiers on horſſbacke, vnder the leading of ſir Robert Bowes, ſir Thomas Palmer, ſir Henrie Wharton, capteine Gambo a Spaniard, and others; the which aduenturing ouer raſhlie within danger of the whole French power, were ouerthrowne and chaſed: ſir Robert Bowes, & ſir Thomas Palmer, with a great number of other capteins, gentlemen and ſouldiers being taken priſoners, beſides thoſe that were ſlaine. Yet after this ouerthrow of thoſe horſſemen, the French remoued their ſiege from the places where they had firſt planted it, and lodged further off from the towne, continuing there; till at length by an armie ſent forth of England vnder the conduct of the erle of Shrewſburie, the lord Greie, and others, they were conſtreined to retire from thence, as in the Engliſh hiſtorie ye may find more largelie expreſſed, to the which for the further report of the euents chancing during that ſiege, I referre the reader.

The Engliſh horſſemen ouerthrowne.

The earle of Shrewſburie remoueth the ſiege from Hadington.

But this is to be remembred, that whileſt the ſiege remained at Hadington, by a conuention or aſſemblie of the lords it was decreed, that the queene ſhuld be ſent into France. And therevpon monſieur de Villegaignon, with foure gallies departing from Leith, made ſemblance as though he would haue ſailed into France: but hauing paſſed the mouth of the Forth, he turned his courſe on the left hand to paſſe alongſt the ſhore northward by the Germane ſeas, that compaſſing the land on the eaſt ſide, hee might paſſe about by the Iles of Orkeneie, and ſo by the weſt Iles, till he came to Dunbreton where the yong queene laie. This iournie he fortunatelie atchiued, the ſame neuer before (to mans remembrance) being made or attempted with gallies.

At his arriuall & conuenient landing at Dunbreton, he found all things readie prouided, neceſſarie for the imbarking of the queene, that he might conuey hir into France, for the accompliſhment whereof he had taken that iournie in hand. Herevpon ſhe being brought aboord into the kings owne gallie, wherin monſieur de Brezze was alſo appointed to be aboord with hir, as he that had beene ſent with expreſſe commandement to ſee hir conueied into France, [with the lords (as ſaith Leſleus lib. 10. 494) of Areſkine, and Leuingſton, the ladie Fleming, with certeine noble maidens named after the yong queene, as Marie Leuingſton, Marie Fleming, Marie Seton, and Marie Beton] who togither with Villegaignon ſhewed ſuch diligence in atchiuing that enterpriſe, that finallie they arriued with proſperous wind and weather in the hauen of Breſt in Britaine with that yong queene, being as then betwixt fiue and ſix yeeres of age.

* From thence being accompanied with the nobilitie of that prouince, ſhe kept hir right courſe to the kings palace of S. Germins in the towne of Lai-on, where ſhe was receiued with great preparation, & there taried the comming thither of the king, at that time pacifieng the ſeditions and turmoiles in the inward parts of France. When the king was come, hee gladded all men with his preſence, and prouided that there was a large houſhold, as well of the noble men and women of Scotland, as of others appointed to the yong queene, which he ſtill increaſed (as the queene grew more in yeeres) vntill ſuch time as ſhe might be maried.)

But now to returne to the doings in Scotland concerning the warres there. After that the ſiege of Hadington was raiſed by the Engliſh armie (as before ye haue heard) the Frenchmen therevpon retired themſelues vnto Muſkelburgh; and chooſing forth a plot of ground for their aduantage, kept themſelues within the ſame. And herewith there came to them fifteene thouſand Scotiſhmen to aſſiſt them, ſo that when the Engliſhmen came forwards to aſſaile them, they found them ſo ſtronglie imbattelled, that (whether their commiſſion did not ſo farre extend, or whether they had no liking of the match) they forbare to ſet vpon them in that ground of ſo great diſaduantage for the aſſailants, and ſo returned backe to Hadington, and after homewards, hauing furniſhed the towne with new ſupplies of men, munition, and vittels ſufficient.

See more hereof in England.

Here is to be noted, that the Engliſh fleet entering into the Forth, was readie to haue aided the armie by land, as occaſions might haue beene offered. But the lord admerall perceiuing no likelihood of battell by land, tooke vpon him to atchiue ſome other enterpriſes, and firſt comming to Brent Iland, ſet certeine ſhips on fire there, of the chiefeſt in the riuer; and ſaluting the towne of Leith as he paſſed by with canon ſhot, he determined to land ſome of his men on the north ſide of the Forth, to make ſome ſpoile within the countrie of Fife. But Iohn Erſkin lard of Dun, as then ſomewhat diſeaſed, and returned home from the campe, cauſed ſuch dailie and nightlie watch and ward to be kept, that this enterpriſe could not be ſo ſecretlie conueied by the Engliſhmen, but that the ſame was perceiued, and ſo preuented, that vpon their landing they were forced to retire with loſſe: and happie was he that might firſt get againe to ſhipboord.

The Engliſh men repelled at ſaint Menets.

* For Iames Steward, brother to the queene (hearing of this tumult) came thither in haſt with the common people of ſaint Andrews, and ſome other few citizens which were remaining in the towne, to whome the neighbors about did alſo ioine themſelues, vnderſtanding the cauſe of that aſſemblie. The Engliſh being now come on land, about twelue hundred, ſtood in warlike ſort readie for the battell, and with the feare of the artillerie (which they diſcharged out of their ſhips) did eaſilie cauſe the rude multitude to flie awaie. But this Iames Steward (by litle and litle ſuppreſſing the feare of ſuch as fled) did (with ſuch violence) ruſh vpon his enimies, that forthwith he ouerthrew them, put them to flight, compelled them to returne to the ſea with great ſlaughter, when alſo manie of them (as they fled to their ſhips) were drowned, beſides three hundred that were ſlaine, and one hundred taken.)

Fr. Thin. Buchan. lib. 15.

The earle of Shrewſburie being come backe from Hadington vnto Dunglas, order was giuen for the building of a fort there, as in the Engliſh hiſtorie further may appeare. And in the meane time monſieur de Deſſe, remaining in campe at Muſkelburgh, hearing that the Engliſh armie was remoued homewards, & how diuerſe new bands of horſſmen and footmen being left in Hadington, were readie to come forth to ſkirmiſh abroad vpon ſight of the enimie; he tooke aduiſe, to trie if he might draw them forth to their losse, and thereupon was monſieur Dandelot, and the Reingraue appointed to chose forth a thousand of their lustiest footmen, the which with three hundred horsemen were conueied and laid close in ambush, behind a little hill not farre from the towne.

This done, a few horsemen were drawne forth to draw the Englishmen out of the towne to skirmish with them. The Englishmen were no sooner aduised that the enimies were there at hand in the field, but that all their horsemen issued out of the towne backe with certeine footmen, and streight had the French in chase; who retiring, mainteined the skirmish, of purpose to make the Englishmen more earnest to come forward. But immediatlie as monsieur de Desse saw his time, he gaue signe by sound of trumpet to the footmen to breake forth, who togither with the horsemen gaue so fierce an onset vpon the enimies, that they were incontinentlie discomfited: and fleeing toward the towne, were followed by the French euen hard to the walles; diuers were slaine, and aboue an hundred taken prisoners.

The Englishmen put to the worsse at a skirmish neere to Hadington.

After this, monsieur de Desse raised from Muskelburgh, and comming to Leith set in hand to fortifie that towne. The marshall Strozzi, and monsieur Dandelot, with diuerse other capteins imbarking themselues in the gallie that yet remained, toke their course to returne to France. One of the same gallies (they being eight in number, beside a foist and a brigandine) was taken by an English ship called the falcon, as she passed through the narrow seas at a place named the Southfurlong, she being alone, and (as it chanced) hindermost of all the companie.

Leith fortified.

A gallie taken

After the departure of monsieur Dandelot, monsieur de la Chapelle de Biron remained coronell of the French footmen in Scotland. As for the furniture on the water, there remained now but foure gallies vnder the guiding of one capteine Bach an Italian, a man of great experience and approued skill. For ye must vnderstand, that before the arriuall of the English naule & armie to the succors of them in Hadington, monsieur de Wallerie vice admerall of France returned home with the fleet of ships that had brought the French armie into Scotland. In what sort the lord Greie of Wilton afflicted the countries of Tindale and Liddesdale, after the returne of the earle of Shrewsburie, is partlie touched in the historie of England.

Capteine Bach.

Monsieur de Wallerie vice admerall of France.

About the same time, there chanced a mutinie to rise betwixt the Scots and the Frenchmen in Edenburgh, by reason that a French souldier fell a quarelling with two or three Scotishmen; and falling togither by the eares, diuerse Scots that came to depart the fraie, would haue had the Frenchman to prison; but other Frenchmen being there also present, would not suffer the Scots to take him awaie. Whereupon arose a great tumult and stirre among them, insomuch that there were diuerse slaine on both parts, namelie James Hamilton lard of Stanhouse, knight, capteine of the castell, and prouost of the towne of Edenburgh, with his sonne; and maister William Steward one of the queens seruants, besides sundrie other. For the Frenchmen doubting some contrined commotion against them, assembled togither in order of battell in the streets; so that before the matter might be appeased by the capteins that shewed their diligent endeuors therin, they had inough to bring it to passe as they wished.

A fraie betwixt the French souldiers, and the townesmen of Edenburgh.

The beginner of this businesse was hanged the same day in the market place of Edenburgh, where he began first to pike the quarell. Monsieur de Desse, to shew that this variance had not proceeded so farre as the brute thereof gaue forth (for it was rather increased ye may be sure than diminished) vndertooke an enterprise in hand to win the towne of Hadington by a camisado, but in what sort they missed their purpose, and how they were well beaten backe, and sent away by the valiant manhood of the English capteins and souldiers then within the towne, yee may read further thereof in the English historie. There were seuen score (some say three hundred) slaine in the base court.

The Frenchmen giue a camisado to Hadington, & are beaten backe.

But now, forsomuch as I haue said nothing of Broughtie crag, sithence the lord gouernor raised his siege from thence, ye shall vnderstand, that (as some haue written) shortlie after the earle of Argile came thither with an armie of his Irish Scots, and besieged it. But when he saw he could not preuaile, he toke truce with them within for a time, and before the same was expired, there came new succors to the Englishmen: so that the earle of Argile (by reason his people had remained there the full terme of their bounden & ordinarie seruice) was constreined to leaue his siege, and suffer the Englishmen to become maisters of a little hill, where afterwards they builded a fort. And now in the latter end of this yeare, they purposed also to haue fortified Dundee, and to haue kept the same with a garrison of souldiers; but hearing that monsieur de Desse with his Frenchmen was comming thitherwards, they auoided the towne of their owne accord, hauing first spoiled the houses, and after set them on fire.

The Reingraue with two bands of his Almains, and monsieur de Etanges with his companie of horsemen were sent before, who comming to Dundee, and finding the Englishmen gone, incamped there, staieng till monsieur de Desse was come, that followed at hand with the French footmen. Within two daies after, they going forth to view the fort, were in danger to haue beene caught yer they could get backe againe. For the Englishmen and Lanceknights that were there with them (part of Conrad Phennings bands) issued forth, and drone them to retire, not without danger to haue beene distressed, if the Reingraue had not vsed the greater policie in retiring the troope. To be short, monsieur de Desse, to stop the Englishmen from entering anie further into the countrie on that side, left seuen ensignes of Frenchmen, & two ensignes of Scots within Dundee, with artillerie and pioners to fortifie the towne, & to keepe it in safetie from the Englishmen. This done, he returned to Edenburgh, and sent the residue of his people abroad into the countrie, to lodge in townes and villages here & there, as was thought most expedient, for the better refreshing of them after their long trauell.

* While these things were in doing, the gouernor of Scotland sent the lord Carneigeie knight (and senator) ambassador to the protector of England, which should for ransome (as the custome is) demand deliuerie of the earle of Huntleie being prisoner: which if he could not obteine, that then he should request this libertie, that his wife and children might come vnto him into England. Whereunto the protector answered, that he would not set the earle free, vntill the warres were ended: but for the companie of his wife, he was content to grant it for certeine daies; with this prouiso, that he should not withdraw himselfe by anie means from the custodie of Rafe Wane (corruptlie by Lesleus called Wane) who had taken him in the warres. Wherefore, when the ambassador was returned into Scotland, Huntleie was committed to certeine keepers, who should carie him from London to Morthet, distant twentie and foure miles from the borders of Scotland. Now whilest the earle doth there looke for his wiues comming to him, he thinketh vpon escape, and to come to hir. For he

he had agréed with George Kar, that he ſhould one night priuilie bring to him thither, two of the ſwifteſt horſſes that he could get to flie awaie vpon them. According wherevnto Kar was readie out of the borders of Scotland with ſuch horſes as he knew would ſerue the turne, whereof one was for the earle, and the other was for his man.

The erle prepareth a ſupper for his kéepers, wherevnto they were ſolemnelie inuited, and to plaie at cards with him to paſſe awaie the tedíouſnes of the night. At length (as though he had plaied inough at cards) he left off, but earneſtlie deſired his kéepers that they ſhould continue on their game. During which, the earle (going vnto the windowe, and looking out) did by a ſecret ſigne (for he could not well diſcerne anie thing, it was ſo extreame darke quer all the element) eaſilie vnderſtand that all things were readie for his iournie. The earle then doubtfull (being ſometime in good hope, and ſometime in feare) thought vpon manie things, which he muttered to himſelfe: and at length vnaduiſedlie (as doubtfull men are wont to do) burſt out in theſe ſpæches; Oh ſorrow, all theſe things be a hinderance vnto me, the ſharpeneſſe of the winter night, the doubt of my weake force and helpe, the let of an vnknowne way, and the want of a faithfull guide: God proſper the iourneie. His kéepers hearing him ſpeake to himſelfe, aſked him what thoſe ſecret ſpæches might ſignifie: to whom the earle (knowing that he was guiltie of his fault) anſwered, that thoſe words were vſed as a prouerbe amongſt the Scots: and firſt had their beginning by the old earle Morton, vttering the ſame in the middle of the night when he lay in dieng. Wherevpon (to the end that his kéepers ſhould not haue anie ſuſpicion of his determined flight) he ſitteth downe againe to cards.

After which ſuddenlie he roſe from them, as vrged by lowſeneſſe of his bellie to vnburden nature, by which occaſion he forthwith (accompanied onelie with his ſeruant) leapeth forth, found the horſſes readie furniſhed for himſelfe and his man, got on them, & with ſpæedie iournie did flie to the borders of Scotland. When he was paſſed ouer the riuer of Tweed, and had a little refreſhed himſelfe from the labor of his iournie in the houſe of Kar, he went the ſame night (being Chriſtmas éeue) to Edenburgh, where he was ioifullie & honorablie receiued of the quéene, the gouernor, his wife, and his other friends, with an vniuerſall gladneſſe of the whole multitude of the towne. As ſoone as his kéepers perceiued that he was gone, they ſpéedilie run to horſſe, and (doubtfull which way to follow) they ſéeke him here, and there, and euerie where, but all in vaine, for the diligence of the erle put them out of all doubt for obteining him. Whoſe flight was not onelie a fréedome to himſelfe, but alſo to manie other noble priſoners, who (vpon the aſſurance of his faith and word) were permitted to depart into Scotland. The gouernor therefore, to congratulate with the earle for his returne, reſtored vnto him the chancellorſhip, and the rule of manie other prouinces which he had before his captiuitie. For which cauſe when he had remained a while at Edenburgh, he returned to the north parts of Scotland, where ſpéedilie and eaſilie he appeaſed all the tumults of thoſe people.)

Hume caſtell recouered by the Scots.

On ſaint Stephans day at night, the caſtell of Hume was ſcaled, and woone out of the Engliſhmens hands. One of the ſurname of the Humes, a man of threeſcore yeers of age, was the firſt that entered on the wall, ſleieng one of the watchmen that kept his walke on that ſide. * Not long after, when the capteine of Falkecaſtell had commanded the husbandmen adioining, to bring thither (at a certeine day) great ſtore of vittels, the yoong men there about having that occaſion, aſſembled thither at the day appointed, who taking their burdens from the horſes, and laieng them on their ſhoulders, were receiued (after they had paſſed the bridge, which was made ouer two high rocks) into the caſtle, where (laieng downe that which they brought) they ſuddenlie (by a ſigne giuen) ſet vpon the kéepers of the gates, ſlue them, and (before the other Engliſhmen could be aſſembled) poſſeſſed the other places, weapons, and artillerie of the caſtell, and then receiuing the reſt of their companie into the ſame (through the great and open gate) they wholie kept and inioied the caſtell for their countrimen.)

About the ſame time, the Reinſgraue returned into France, leauing his fiue enſignes of Almains behind him, vnder the charge of capteine Retonze, a good man of warre and of great experience. Also monſieur de Etauges was taken in a ſkirmiſh at Broughtie crag, as I haue noted in the Engliſh hiſtorie: & about the ſame time, there landed at Dunbreton foure bands of ſouldiers, Prouancois and Gaſcoignes, bringing monie with them to paie the ſouldiers their wages, behind as then for the ſpace of three moneths. Sir James Wilford alſo was taken about the ſame time by the Frenchmen, in a ſkirmiſh at Dunbar (as I haue alſo noted in the hiſtorie of England.) Not long after, monſieur de Deſſe was appointed by the quæne Dowager, to go vnto Jedworth, to preuent that the Engliſhmen ſhould not fortifie there, whereof ſhe ſtood in ſome doubt.

1546. The Reinſgraue returneth into France. Monſieur de Etauges taken priſoner by the Engliſhmen. Sir James Wilford taken Immediatlie vpon his comming thither, the lard of Fernihurſt requeſted him to helpe to recouer his caſtell of Fernihurſt out of the Engliſhmens hands, which they had taken from him and kept, greatlie to the annoiance of all the countrie thereabouts. Monſieur de Deſſe taking with him monſieur de Diſell, and monſieur de la Chapelle de Biton, haſted thither with the chiefeſt part of his armie, ſending before certeine capteins with their bands to ſurueie the houſe; who at their comming thither, vſed ſuch diligence in following the offered occaſion, that they both repelled their enimies that came forth to giue them the ſkirmiſh; and purſuing them with great rigor, wan the lims of the houſe vpon them, forcing the capteine and ſouldiers to retire within the dungeon, and kept them ſo ſhort therein, that they had opportunitie to mine an hole through the wall, of ſuch largenes, as a man might eaſilie enter by the ſame.

The caſtell of Fernihurſt woone by the Frenchmen.

Herewith a great number of Scots hauing broken open the gate of the baſe court, where the Frenchmen were buſie to aſſault the dungeon, burſt in on heapes, vpon deſire to be reuenged vpon the Engliſhmen, and namelie of their capteine, who (as they ſaid) had done them manie great diſpleaſures. The capteine perceiuing this, and doubting if he fell into the Scotiſhmens hands he ſhould die for it, he preſented himſelfe at the hole which the Frenchmen had made, and yeelded himſelfe to monſieur de Duſſac, and la Mouthe Rouge, who minding to vſe him as became men of warre, would haue led him out of the preſe: but ſuddenlie a Scot comming behind him, whoſe wife (as was reported) he had rauiſhed, ſmote off his head ſo iuſt from the ſhoulders, that it leapt foure or fiue yards quite from the bodie. Manie other cruell parts the Scots ſéemed to ſhew againſt other Engliſhmen, taken héere at Fernihurſt: but they excuſed the matter by the euill dealings of the Engliſhmen towards them before that time.

The crueltie of the Scots.

Monſieur de Deſſe returning to Jedworth, aided by the furtherance and counſell of the Scots, ceaſſed not in occaſions of aduantage to attempt new enterpriſes againſt the Engliſhmen, as time and opportunitie ſerued: and among other exploits, the caſtell of Cornewall (an old houſe built after the ancient maner of fortifieng) was taken by the Frenchmen, and ſpoiled of all things worth the bearing awaie.

Capteine Cobios. Alſo capteine Cobios a Frenchman, hauing a band of fiftie light horſſemen Scots ſeruing vnder him, on a night had a faire hand againſt a number of Engliſh horſſemen, whome he charged ſo on the ſudden, as he ſaw them out of order, that he eaſilie diſcomfited them, and toke more priſoners (whome he brought to Jedworth) than he had perſons in his companie to aſſaile them.

A road made by monſieur de la Chapelle de Biron. Monſieur de la Chapelle de Biron, was ſent forth by monſieur de Deſſe, with the companie of horſſemen that belonged to monſieur de Etauges then priſoner, and flue hundred footmen beſide Scots, to make a road into England: which enterprize he atchiued in burning townes and villages, and returned without anie great loſſe ſuſteined at that time.

Another made by monſieur de Deſſe. Within two daies after his returne to Jedworth, monſieur de Deſſe diſlodged from thence, & taking with him foure field péces, and all his men of war, entered into England, toke the caſtell of Fourd and burnt it, with ten ſmall villages in the countrie thereabouts, ſituat within halfe a mile ech of other.

Fourd caſtell woone. There was one tower yet parcell of that caſtell of Fourd, which was kept by Thomas Kar, ſo that the Frenchmen could not win it, for they had no time to ſtaie long about it, remouing that night ouer the water, & incamped there within the Scotiſh ground.

As the Scots and Frenchmen executed theſe enterprizes, they were coaſted by certeine light horſſemen; but neuertheleſſe the Frenchmen returned in ſafetie to Jedworth, hauing ſore indamaged the Engliſh borderers by that road: inſomuch as it was thought, the Scots (which were with them at that road) gained at that time, by pillage and booties to the value of nine thouſand crownes. The Engliſhmen ſore greéued, that the Frenchmen lieng thus in Jedworth, ſhould in ſuch wiſe addreſſe one enterprize after an other againſt them, ſo greatlie to their annoiance, aſſembled a power togither at Rorburgh, purpoſing to haue aſſailed the Frenchmen in their campe at Jedworth.

Monſieur de Deſſe fléeth out of Jedworth for feare of the Engliſhmen. But monſieur de Deſſe hauing warning thereof, departed from thence firſt to Melroſſe, and after further off within the countrie, fearing to be conſtreined to giue battell. Which he could not haue done without manifeſt loſſe of his féeble armie, hauing not paſt fifteéne hundred footmen, and flue hundred horſſemen able to haue done ſeruice: for ſuch was the miſerie, which they had in manner continuallie ſuſteined through want of victels, and other neceſſarie helps during the time of their incamping at Jedworth, that what through ſickneſſe and hurts receiued in aſſaults and ſkirmiſhes, no ſmall number of them were dead, and manie other ſo féeble, that they were not able to aid themſelues; inſomuch that now being got out of danger, they thought themſelues haplie eſcaped.

The miſerable ſtate of the Frenchmen in Scotland.

Shortlie after, in the beginning of the ſummer, the Engliſhmen armed flue and twentie ſaile of men of warre, the which arriuing at the Baſſe, néere to the mouth of the Forth, aſſailed by faire and pleaſant words to haue perſuaded the kéepers of the caſtell, there ſtanding on the height of a great rocke, to haue yéelded the place into their hands. But perceiuing their perſuaſions would not be regarded, they toke their courſe vp into the Forth, and finding in their waie foure ſhips of Frenchmen and Scots, ſeized vpon them as a wiſhed preie: and the morrow next inſuing, at the verie breake of day, they came before Leith, and ſaluting the towne with canon ſhot, remained there at anchor ten or twelue daies, in which meane while they landed their people at Inſkith, and began to fortifie with all diligence. But before the place could be put in anie ſtrength, the ſhips departed from thence backe towards the ſea, and left in the Iland foure enſignes of Engliſhmen, and one enſigne of Italians, to defend the pioners and the Iland againſt the Scots and Frenchmen, if they ſhould attempt to aſſaile them.

Inſkith fortified by the Engliſhmen.

After the Engliſh nauie was thus departed, monſieur de Deſſe, and the queene mother being at Edenburgh, determined with all diligence to imploie all ſuch forces as they might make about the recouering of the Ile, before the fortifications begun by the Engliſhmen ſhould be brought to anie perfection. Herevpon, monſieur de la Chapelle de Biron, imbarked in the gallie of monſieur de Villegaignon, rowed forth to view the maner of the Engliſhmens dealing within the Ile, which he did in ſuch effectuall wiſe, that approching within harquebuſe ſhot, he brought knowledge with him not onelie of the ſtate and whole circumſtances of their buildings, but alſo of the perfect number of their enſignes, and the qualitie of the men of warre that ſerued vnder the ſame.

La Chapelle de Biron.

At that preſent alſo, monſieur de Thermes latelie before arriued at Dunbreton with an hundred men of armes, and two hundred light horſſemen after the manner of France, and one thouſand footmen, was come to the queéne, buſie now to further this enterprize. She had got togither within Leith hauen all the botes that belonged to all the créekes & hauens of the Forth: ſo that on thurſdaie after Trinitie ſundaie, euerie thing being prepared readie for the purpoſe, in the morning by the breake of day the queéne was come to Leith, to ſée the imbarking of the men of warre appointed that day to trie what ſucceſſe fortune would ſend them. There was no diligence wanting, neither among the Scots nor Frenchmen, to beſtow themſelues abroad, & the comfortable words of the queéne greatlie incouraged them thereto, beholding them, and deuiſing with monſieur de Deſſe and the other capteins, till they were all ſet forward.

The diligence of the Scotiſh queéne.

The forward neſſe of the ſouldiers.

Villegaignon with his gallies paſſed on before to kéepe the Engliſhmen occupied, ſo as they ſhould not perceiue the Frenchmens meaning: but they diſcouering the veſſels at their ſetting forth, conceiued ſtreightwaies what was intended: and thereupon prepared to kéepe the enimies off from landing, ſo that vpon the Frenchmens approch, they ſaluted them with arrowes and harquebuſe ſhot verie hotlie: yet at length by fine force the Scots and Frenchmen got on land, and droue the Engliſhmen and Italians backe from the ſea ſtrond vp to the higher ground, where they ſtood at defenſe on a plumpe togither, doing their beſt to defend the place againſt the aſſailants.

Inſkith aſſaulted by the Frenchmen.

But finallie, their generall named Cotton, being ſlaine with George Applebie eſquire, a capteine of an enſigne of footmen ſent forth of Derbiſhire, and one Gaſpar Pizoni, that was capteine of the Italians, beſide diuers other gentlemen, and the moſt principall men of warre and ſouldiers among them: the reſidue were conſtreined to retire vnto a corner or point of the Iland, where they were taken without further reſiſtance, although before they had made verie ſtout defenſe, hurt and ſlaine diuerſe Scots and Frenchmen, both at their landing, and alſo after they were entered on land. Among other, monſieur de la Chapelle de Biron was ſtriken through the hand with an harquebuſe ſhot, and his burguenet beaten ſo into his head, that his friends that were about him, were faine to conueie him into one of the gallies to be dreſſed of his hurts by a ſurgian. Alſo a gentleman named Deſbories, which bare the ſaid monſieur de la Chapelle his coronell enſigne, was ſlaine with a pike by the hands of the forenamed Cotton the Engliſh generall.

Thus

Inſkith recouered by the Frenchmen.

Thus was Inſkith recouered out of the Engliſhmens hands, after it had beene in their poſſeſſion by the ſpace of ſixteene daies, the more to the high contentation of monſieur de Deſſe, for that at the ſame time he ſtood vpon his diſcharge and returne into France, being appointed to ſurrender vp his place to monſieur de Thermes, latelie before arriued (as ye haue heard) with commiſſion to receiue the ſame. So that monſieur de Deſſe, to end his charge with the glorie of this atchiued enterprize, eſteemed it much to ſtand with his honor: and no doubt with the ſwelling humor of the glorie thence redounding he was blowen vp; as in caſes of victorie it commeth to paſſe in them that make a good hand: whereas the vanquiſhed (God wot) are contrarilie qualified.

Monſieur de Deſſe returneth into France.

Shortlie after, he returned into France with the gallies, and monſieur de Thermes ſucceeded in his place for the generall conduct of the French armie in Scotland. Who by the aduiſe of the gouernor, and other of the Scotiſh lords, determined with a ſiege volant to keepe the Engliſhmen in Hadington from vittels and all other reliefe. Firſt therefore, after that Deſſe was departed towards France, monſieur de Thermes with his Frenchmen and ſome Scots incamped at Aberladie, where they began the foundation of a fort, ſo to impeach the Engliſhmen from ſetting on land anie vittels there, to be conueid from thence to Hadington, as before they had done.

Monſieur de Thermes ſucceedeth in his place.

A fort builded at Aberladie.

In this meane time, the Engliſhmen had increaſed their numbers of Almaines, and other ſtrangers, and not onelie furniſhed their forts with new ſupplies of men; but alſo had an armie in the fields which lay moſt an end at Dunglas, and one while beſieged Hume caſtell. But after they ſaw themſelues diſappointed of the meane, whereby they ſuppoſed to haue recouered it, they raiſed from thence, and ſpoiled the moſt part of Tiuidale and other the marches thereabout; in reuenge (as they alleged) of the diſlotaltie and breach of promiſe proued in the aſſured Scots. Generall of this armie was the earle of Rutland, lieutenant at that preſent of the north parts, a noble man, right valiant, wiſe, well aduiſed, and ſtaied in his dealings, verie honorable and courteous in all his demeanor.

The earle of Rutland.

He was accompanied with capteins of good eſtimation and approued proweſſe, as ſir Richard Paners, ſir Francis Leake, ſir John Sauage, ſir Thomas Holcroft, ſir Oſwald Wulſtrop, & others. He ſo behaued himſelfe in that dangerous time of the vprores and rebellions of the commons, through the more part of the realme of England; that although the appointed forces againſt Scotland were ſtaied, and turned to the ſuppreſſion of the rebels, to the incouragement (no doubt) both of Scots and Frenchmen in Scotland, yet they were ſo fronted and kept in aw by that armie vnder the earle of Rutland, that they rather loſt than gained in this ſeaſon at the Engliſhmens hands.

At one time the ſame armie, vnder the conduct of the ſaid earle, paſſing forth with a conueie of vittels vnto Hadington, came ſo ſuddenlie vpon the Frenchmen where they late in campe, that whether through default of their ſcouts, or other negligence vſed by them, or through the great diligence and prouident forwardneſſe ſhewed by the Engliſhmen, the Frenchmen were in ſuch hazard to haue béene vtterlie diſtreſſed, that if the Engliſhmen had not doubted more, than by anie was thought néedfull, they might haue ouerthrowen, taken, & ſlaine the Frenchmen handſmooth (as was ſuppoſed) at their pleaſure. But the Engliſhmen euen at their firſt comming in ſight of them (as it ſtood with the reaſon of warre, ſith by the aduenturing raſhlie oftentimes in ſuch caſes too late repentance eaſilie inſueth) ſtaied, the better to conceiue of that which they had to do. Whereby the Frenchmen had leaſure to march their waies a maine paſe, till they were got out of danger: for after they once beheld all the troops of the Engliſh horſſemen almoſt at their elbowes, and herewith the battell of the Almaines ſuddenlie appearing on the hill top readie to come downe vpon them, it was no need to bid them packe awaie.

The Frenchmen in danger to haue béene diſtreſſed.

The Frenchmen retire.

The Scotiſh light horſſemen comming on the backe of the Engliſh armie, perceiued where the Almaines (to make them readie to giue battell) had throwen off their clokes, and left the ſame (with all their baggage and ſtuffe which they had about them) in kéeping of none but of their women and boies: whereupon thoſe Scotiſh horſſemen, not minding to ſuffer ſuch a preie to eſcape their hands, came galloping in, and toke all the beſt ſtuffe they could lay hold vpon, and returned in ſafetie, before anie enimie could come backe to the reſcue. The Almains were in no ſmall chafe for the loſſe of their garments and other neceſſaries; but there was no helpe then to ſéeke remedie in that behalfe: for the Scots were withdrawen and got quite out of danger.

The baggage of the Engliſh Lanſquenets ſpoiled by the Scotiſh horſſemen.

The Engliſh armie, after that the Frenchmen were thus fled and gone, paſſed forth to Hadington, with their cariages laden with vittels, to the great comfort of them within that fortreſſe, ſtanding in great neceſſitie before this conueie came. This ſummer alſo, and a little before the vittelling thus of Hadington, vpon knowledge had that Julian Romero with his band of Spaniards, whereof he was capteine, ſeruing the king of England, was lodged in Coldingham, ſix miles diſtant from Berwike: certeine bands of Almains and Frenchmen came thither vpon the ſudden, and ſurpriſing the Spaniards before they were aware of their approch, ſet vpon them in their lodgings, toke, and ſlue in manet the whole number of them.

Hadington victualled.

Julian Romero diſtreſſed.

Things paſſing in this wiſe in Scotland in the ſummer of this yeare 1549, the Engliſhmen were not onelie in the meane time ſore troubled with commotions raiſed by the commons of that realme; but alſo with the warres which the French king made againſt them, within the countrie of Bullognois, ſo that they had not meanes to imploie their forces againſt Scotland as they had determined to haue done; as partlie before, and more largelie in the hiſtorie of England is mentioned. By reaſon whereof, anon after Michaelmas they gaue ouer the kéeping of Hadington, and raiſing their fortifications there, they returned into England to the great reioiſing of Louthian, to whome that towne had giuen occaſion of great troubles and calamities. Vpon the giuing ouer thus of Hadington, the gouernor and the quéene Dowager were aduanced, in hope to recouer againe all that the Engliſhmen held within the bounds of Scotland.

Hadington raced and left by the Engliſhmen.

But firſt it was thought good to aſſaie the winning of Wroughtie crag; for it ſounded (as was thought) greatlie to the diminiſhing of the eſtimation, aſwell of the Scots as Frenchmen, that the Engliſh ſhould keepe foot ſo far within the realme, in deſpight of their whole puiſſance. Herevpon monſieur de Thermes about Candlemaſſe, hauing all things in a readineſſe for the ſiege, came thither, and did ſo much, what with ſhot of canon to make batterie, and other meanes of inforcements, that giuing the aſſault both with Scots and Frenchmen, they entred the fort the twentith of February by fine force, ſo that all thoſe within were either taken or ſlaine. Wherevpon thoſe Engliſh alſo that kept the caſtell, rendred vp the ſame without further reſiſtance, amongeſt other priſoners: ſir John Lutterell the capteine was one.

Wroughtie crag won by the Frenchmen.

In this meane time there were certeine commiſſioners appointed betwixt the two kings of England and France to commune of a peace: but becauſe they continued long in their treatie yer they could agrée, the Scots and Frenchmen ſurceaſſed not in occaſions of aduantage to purſue the warre, ſo that comming before Lowder they beſieged that fortreſſe, & skirmiſhing with the Engliſhmen that iſſued forth, to incounter them, droue them in at the gates with ſome loſſe on either part. And this done, the French held them within ſo ſtreictlie beſieged, that if peace had not béene the ſoner concluded, ſir Hugh Willoughbie capteine of that fort muſt néeds haue yelded through lacke of ſhot, & other neceſſarie things ſeruing for defenſe; which were ſpent, ſo that they were conſtreined to vſe their pewter veſſell in ſtead of bullets. But as it fortuned, a peace was accorded, paſſed, and confirmed, that verie ſelfe time betwixt the two kings of England and France, through the diligent and orderlie trauell of the commiſſioners appointed to deale therein, whoſe names inſue.

For the French king were appointed Francis de Montmorance, lord of Rochpot, knight of the order of ſaint Michaell, and lieutenant for the ſame king of Picardie, in abſence of monſieur de Vandoſme; Gaſper de Colignie, lord of Chaſtillon, knight alſo of the order, and capteine generall of the footmen of France, and the ſaid kings lieutenant generall in the countie of Bullogne; Andrew Guillard lord Mortier, knight alſo of the order, and one of the ſame kings priuie councell; and Guillaume Bouchettell lord of Saſſie, knight likewiſe of the order, & ſecretarie of the eſtate of the finances. The articles of the peace.

Among other articles compriſed in this peace, it was couenanted, that all ſuch forts, caſtels, and places as the Engliſhmen held in anie part within the Scotiſh dominions, ſhould be deliuered and reſtored to the Scots; and that the forts of Dunglas, Roxburgh, and Aimouth, which the Engliſhmen had built and raiſed out of the ground, ſhould be raced and throwen downe, to auoid all occaſions of new controuerſies that might grow by reaſon of kéeping or defending the ſame: ſo as the peace now concluded, might in all points be firmelie and truelie kept and obſerued, aſwell betwixt England and Scotland, as England and France, and betwixt all and euerie the ſubiects of the ſame realmes, both by ſea and land. Monſieur de Mourret was ſent into Scotland with the copie of this peace, by whoſe meanes it was proclamed anon after Eaſter about the beginning of Aprill, and euerie thing vſed and ordered according to the articles of the agréement concluded.

Monſieur de Mourret.

The Frenchmen returne home.

In Maie the Frenchmen and Almaines were imbarked at Leith in ſixteene French ſhips, and certeine Scotiſh ſhips, and departed from thence into France. A few there were, as Nigropellice and Saint Falciſe, capteins of light horſſemen, with others that paſſed through England, and ſo home into their countrie. Moreouer the marqueſſe de Maine, after duke Daumals comming ouer into England about the ſame time for an hoſtage, paſſed afterwards through the realme into Scotland, to viſit his ſiſter queene Dowager, and ſhortlie after returned. They mourned both for the death of their father Claud de Lorraine, the firſt duke of Guiſe, who deceaſſed the eighteenth of Aprill this preſent yeare 1550.

The marqueſſe de Maine.

The death of the firſt duke of Guiſe.

*Now when the French departed out of Scotland, there were manie Scots appointed vnto them; partlie, to defend them from pirats, if they ſhould offer them anie iniurie in the ſtreict of the Britiſh ſea, and partlie for honors cauſe to bring them on their iournie into France. By whoſe departure Scotland was freelie deliuered from all forren ſouldiers, except certeine Frenchmen, who remained ſtill in the countrie; becauſe they had the Ile of Inſketh and the caſtell of Dunbar committed to their charge, which afterwards they did moſt faithfullie diſcharge. Monſieur de Thermes, Chappellie, and diuerſe other capteins of France, remained alſo in Scotland (after that the others were imbarked to be gone into France) for pleaſures cauſe, and to ſée the countrie; who (trauelling ouer Scotland, and beholding the cities, ſearching the caſtels, and marking the bulwarks of defenſe) did conſtantlie affirme, that in the whole world they neuer ſaw forts and townes more pleaſantlie placed, or more naturallie defended. In ſéeing whereof they conſumed the time with great pleaſure, vntill the moneth of December, in which they all went into France with the quéene Dowager.

Fr. Thin. Leſleus lib. 10. pag. 507.

Thus, as there was peace (by the departing of the French) with forren nations, which continued three yeares: ſo was there within the wals and kingdome warre and diſſention amongeſt the Scots; which was moſt perillous and troubleſome. For they which were the chiefe rulers (as the gouernor and his brother the archbiſhop of ſaint Andrews and others) did vſe all things with extreame crueltie & couetouſneſſe. For the archbiſhop, being giuen to all libertie, followed by law his pleaſures in all things, as though it had béene permitted vnto him. For firſt, as a preſage of his following tyrannie, he permitted the ſlaughter of William Threichton to go vnpuniſhed, the ſame William being ſlaine in the gouernors houſe (if not within his owne ſight) by Robert Semple: next followed the death of John Maluill an old man of Fife; who next vnto the gouernor was moſt accounted of by him, as chiefeſt of his familiars. This John had his letters (which he wrote to an Engliſhman, to whome he did commend a capteine his friend) intercepted. In which, although there were not anie ſuſpicion of anie fault, yet was the author of them puniſhed with the loſſe of his head. Whoſe patrimonie made his death ſeeme the more vile; becauſe the ſame was giuen to the yonger ſonne of the gouernor. The hurts of theſe wicked parts did perteine to few, the enimie thereof to manie, and the example vniuerſallie to all. For by reaſon of this vnskilfull gouernement of the kingdome, and the ſlouth of his life, which offended the common people; the gouernor began to be had in contempt almoſt of all men.]

Buchanan lib. 15.

In September following, the quéene Dowager accompanied with the earls of Huntlete, Caſſils, Marſhall, Southerland, and diuerſe other of the Scotiſh nobilitie tooke the ſea, and ſailing to France landed at Diepe: ſhe was conueied thither by the prior of Capoa, & Leon Strozzie, ſent and appointed with ſix gallies to haue the conduction of hir. From Diepe ſhe remoued to Rone, where the king then late, of whome ſhe was right courteouſlie receiued, and had ſuch attendance and ſeruice done vnto hir, during the time of hir tariance there, as ſtood with the dignitie of hir perſon, and was anſwerable to the minds and expectations of hir traine; to the high praiſe likewiſe of the king and his court in that behalfe.

The cauſes of the quéene Dowagers going into France

Buchanan. lib.15. Lesleus lib.10 pag.508.

France were, that now hauing disposed all things at home in Scotland, she might renew the old league in France, she might see hir daughter and hir other friends; and procure the gouernement of the realme to hir selfe. For the ambitious and subtill woman did thinke in hir mind, that the gouernor by his euill demeanor would sone be put out of his office, and that she might easilie find means to be substituted in his place. But before hir shipping into France, and whilest they were preparing, the earle of Huntleie commanded William Makintosche (chiefe of the familie of the Glenchattens, and his followers) to be apprehended (for a conspiracie secretlie begun against him, whilest he was the kings deputie in those north parts) and from thence (being first depriued of all his goods) caried him to Strachbolgie, where he was beheaded. Which fact (greatlie offending the minds of the earle of Cassils, and others that fauored the Makintosche) did so stir them against Huntleie, that a commotion and tumult had béene raised by them, vnlesse the wisedome of the quéene had appeased the furie of their minds.

For although the quéene certeine yeares after, had vndone the sentence of proscription for the goods of Makintosche (restoring the same with the possessions and inheritances vnto the sonne of Makintosche) and thereby had seemed to cut awaie the cause of dissention betwéene Huntleie and them: yet the kindred and friends of the Glenchattens (not suffering so great an iniurie to their familie to go vnreuenged) did secretlie (but eagerlie) pursue the same with great contention of mind. Wherefore entring the castell of Pet by deceipt, they apprehended Lanchlane Makintosche, and (condemning all his followers to banishment) did cruellie kill him (as the betraior of the head of his owne familie) because they supposed, that he ministred and blew the cole that fired Huntleie, to make the said William Makintosche out of the waie.

Lanchlane Makintosche apprehended.

Lesleus lib.10. pag.509.

A little before which, the maister of Ereskine, and Henrie Senclere deane of Glascow were sent into England; who at London did anew confirme the peace concluded before with the English; from whence they passed into Flanders, to make the like league with the low countries, which they did renew, to the great reioising of both nations; although in the beginning of the treatie there grew great and contentious questions for the restitution of the ships of Flanders and Holland (whereof the Scots had taken manie in the warres) notwithstanding that the Scots had alleged, that they did not offer ante violence to those of the low countries, before that they (by the persuasion of the English) had offered wrong to the Scots, in deteining their ships and merchandize

Thus much digressed from the quéene Dowagers going into France, whereunto afresh to direct our pen, we say; that being at Rone, the king did there openlie make shew of hir welcome vnto him by diuerse arguments. Amongst which, this was not the least: that (besides other shews, honorable triumphs, & manie courtesies shewed to the Scots) calling a chapter of the knights of the order of saint Michaell, he admitted the earle of Huntleie and other chiefe lords of Scotland deere to the quéene and fauored by him, into the said order. Which honors and pleasures seemed the more augmented, in that the yoong quéene of Scots was there present, adorned with such singular beautie, as was not easilie to be spoken, by the iudgement of Lesleus. After that they had thus spent some time in delights of courtesie, to feed the mind and eie, the king of France, the two quéens of Scotland, and the other nobles, departed from thence to Paris; where they were with great triumph of the citizens most ioifullie receiued. At what time againe, the French king shewed such humanitie to Huntleie, and the other Scots; that he seemed for euer most firmelie to bind them vnto him. After that they spent some daies there at Paris, the king with that companie remoued to Blesies; where he remained all the winter.

Lesleus. lib.10. pag.510.

Now the quéene Dowager, thinking the time and place fit for the executing of the cause of hir coming into France, and vsing therein the aduise of the duke of Guise, and the cardinall of Loreine (hir brethren) openeth the same vnto the French king, shewing that amongest others, the chiefest cause to take that iournie, was to require his opinion, touching the gouernement of the kingdome of Scotland: and to know, if it pleased him that the helme of the same kingdome should be committed to hir rule. Which if he misliked, or deemed the contrarie; that yet she would wholie rest on his determination. The which matter pleased well the king, but yet with this promise; if the gouernor without anie tumult or raising of quarrels would giue it ouer.

Buchanan. lib. 16. Lesleus. lib.10. pag.410.

Wherevpon the quéene, to bring euerie thing about as she desired, did persuade the king to confirme the dukedome of Chatelerault in France, vnto the gouernor, before granted to him and to his heires, & to make his eldest son erle of Arraine chiefe capteine of the bands of Scots in France. And further, to giue the earledome of Murreie to the earle of Huntleie (kinsman to the gouernor) and to his heires; the earledome of Rothseie to his sonne, which had maried the kinsman of the said gouernor; the whole earledome of Angus, to the earle thereof; and the erledome of Morton, to the sonne of George Dowglasse. All which he should procure likewise to be confirmed by such, as should be gouernors of the yoong quéene. These things now done, the French king carefullie receiued the yoong quéene of Scots into his protection; vntill she should come vnto more sufficient yeers, able to confirme all these gifts; the which if she refused then to do, the French king wold then bestow as large possessions on them in France.

In the meane time the gouernor had sent Carnegie knight and senator into France, who should in the name of the Scots giue great thanks to the king for the aid which they receiued out of France, against the Englishmen. After this the French king did liberallie open the determination of the quéene mother of Scotland to the bishop of Rosse (then ambassador for the Scots in France) to Robert Carnegie, and to Gawin Hamilton (to whom, as was said, the abbeie of Kiluinin was giuen in commendam) to the end that the same which was at the first secretlie consulted betwéene the king of France & the quéene Dowager, might now openlie be considered among the Scots which were in France: declaring further, that he desired nothing more, than that the quéene mother should sustéine the parts and place of the quéene hir daughter, in the administration and gouernement of Scotland, sith the same mostlie stood with reason and equitie; and that he (the better to win the gouernor to yéeld thereunto) had giuen the gouernor the dukedome of Chatelerault, to his sonne the capteinship of all the Scots in France, and manie other liberall benefits to manie other of his kinsmen.

And to the end that no deceipt might be supposed to be hidden vnder this liberalitie, the French king willed the ambassadour to take possession of all these things in the dukes name. Robert Carnegie hauing his errand, returned into Scotland; & shortlie after, the bishop of Rosse was appointed ambassador, who at length with much adoo did wring from the gouernor a consent to part from his authoritie, and to aplie himſelfe to the will of the French king: which thus in the end obteined, the biſhop of Roſſe goeth againe into France, to aduertiſe the king what he had done. Wherevpon the king conſidering his painfull & faithfull ſeruice, did reward him with the abbeie of Labſeie in France.

Leſleus. lib.10. pag.511.

Whileſt theſe things were in doing, Edward the firſt, king of England, did ſend the marqueſſe of Northampton, & other of the nobler ſort of ambaſſadors to Henrie the ſecond, king of France, then ſo- Blois.
iourning at Bleſies, to moue him to giue his daughter in mariage to the king of England. At what time there were manie martiall games and paſtimes ſhewed before the king, in which the Engliſh ioining the Scots with them as companions of their ſports, did beare a part, and wan the garland (from the others) to their ſingular commendation. The ſummer next following, the French king accompanied with the quéene mother of Scotland and other of the nobilitie, did with great pompe enter Turon, Aniow, Nants, and other cities of Britaine, which he had not before ſeene ſince he atteined the crowne. After certeine moneths conſumed in thoſe iournies, he returned to Founteinblew.

Leſleus lib. 10. pag. 512.

But the quéene Dowager of Scotland, taking hir courteous leaue and farwell of the French king, hir daughter, & of other the nobilitie, departed from the court, and with eaſie iournies came to Jamieſſie: where remaining a certeine time, ſhe had the pleaſant companie of hir mother the duches of Guiſe, and hir other friends to their great ioy: but that ſhe ſhewed a certeine griefe (for hir father latelie deceaſed) which ſomewhat diminiſhed the ſweet pleaſure of that méeting. Now when the quéene Dowager had remained almoſt 12 moneths or more in France, honorablie interteined, bountifullie feaſted, louingli ſaluted by hir friends and kinred, and hauing obteined a willing grant of the effects of hir requeſt, the Scots do vrge hir to haſten hir returne into Scotland, preparing at Paris all things neceſſarie therevnto.

Leſleus lib. 10. pag. 512.

Wherefore departing thence, and comming againe to Rone, the quene mother moued and perſuaded the nobilitie about the taking of hir iournie through England into Scotland. By occaſion whereof, loſing their ſhips from Newport, they paſſe the ſeas, and happilie landed at Portesmouth, a famous port of England. The knowledge of which arriuall comming to king Edward the firſt, he preſentlie ſent thither the earle of Southampton, and the lord William Howard to interteine hir: who receiued hir with ſingular ioy and courteſie, and conueied hir through Hampſhire, Suſſex, and Surreie (three prouinces of England) to Hampton court, where the king as then remained; from whence (after that ſhe had béene there moſt honorablie receiued) ſhe came along the riuer of Thames to London, and landed at Poules wharfe in the after noone, and from thence rode to the biſhop of Londons palace by Poules, and there lodged.

Hir receiuing at the court.

The fourth of Nouember, ſhe rode in hir chariot to the kings palace of the Whitehall, accompanied with the ladie margaret Dowglas, the three dutcheſſes, of Suffolke, Richmund, and Northumberland, and diuerſe other great ladies and gentlewomen, both Scotiſh and Engliſh. At the court gate the dukes of Northumberland, and Suffolke, and the lord treaſuror were readie to receiue hir. And at hir entering into the hall, the king ſtood in the vpper end thereof, and the erle of Warwike holding the ſword before him. She at hir approching to him, knéeled downe, and he courteouſlie toke hir vp, and kiſſed hir; and taking hir by the hand, led hir vp into his owne chamber of preſence, & after into the quéenes chamber of preſence, where he kiſſed all the ladies of Scotland, and ſo departed for a while.

She dined on the quéenes ſide that day with the king, his ſeruice and hirs comming both togither; the kings being placed on the right hand of the table, and hirs on the left. What plentie of all maner of coſtlie meates and drinks there was, and what rich furniture of plate and all other things was ſhewed to ſet forth the feaſt, it were ſuperfluous to write. All the ladies both of England and Scotland dined in the quéenes great chamber. After dinner the king ſhewed hir his gallerie and gardens, with all other commodities of the place. And about foure of the clocke, he brought hir downe againe by the hand into the hall, where he firſt receiued hir, and there kiſſing hir, ſhe toke hir leaue, & returned to the biſhops palace from whence ſhe came.

* And here I muſt not forget what Leſleus hath ſet downe in this place for the defenſe of his people, in not deliuering the yong quéene of Scots to the Engliſh, to haue entered the mariage bed of king Edward the firſt. Whoſe reaſons although they may (the firſt ground of the warre conſidered, with the conſent of the Scots parlement to that mariage, and the willingneſſe of the Engliſh to haue cauſed them to performe their promiſe without battell) be well anſwered, as matters that not verie greatlie defend the cauſe: yet I will not anie way ſay anie thing of him (being a man eſtranged from vs in religion, but learned, wiſe, of great experience, a faithfull ſeruant to his miſtreſſe, and a graue biſhop of Roſſe) but ſet them downe plainelie as he writeth them, leauing the ſame to the iudgement of others, ſith I meane not in anie thing to derogate from them, or arrogate vnto our ſelues more than is due. Thus therefore he writeth.

Leſleus lib. 10. pag. 113.

When the quéene (ſaith he) of Scots was come to London, the king of England ſheweth vnto hir his treaſurie, openeth the monuments, lateth abroad the antiquities of the kingdome, and laboured by manie other ſuch kind of means, that he might prepare himſelfe a paſſage (with the open notes of courteſie) to obteine the good will of the quæne. For he after perſuaded hir with manie ſpéeches, that ſhe ſhuld giue hir daughter vnto him, as it was before decréed by the Scotiſh nobilitie: which he proueth by manie arguments to be moſt beneficiall vnto both nations. When on the contrarie part (if ſhe were giuen vnto the French kings ſonne) it ſhould not be profitable either to the Scots, which ſhould giue; or the French, which ſhould receiue hir to wife. Herewithall adding this vnto it, that there ſhould alwais be continuall hatred, and deadlie enimitie betwéene him and that perſon which ſhould marrie hir.

Wherevnto the queene both preſentlie and wiſelie anſwered, that the cauſe of hir daughters mariage to be ſolemnized with the French, was onlie by reaſon of the protector of England, which ſo bitterlie purſued the Scots with ſuch earneſt warre as then was made againſt them. For it was vnaduiſedlie done of him, to ſéeke to compell by force of battell a woman, which is to be allured to the mariage bed with faire promiſes and flattering ſpéeches. Wherevnto ſhe ioined, that the Scots were ſo vehementlie preſſed by him, that they were inforced to craue aid from the French: for the more ſpeedie & eaſie obteining whereof, they were vrged to leaue the yong quéene of Scots in France for a pledge. Wherefore ſhe greatly grieued that the matter was ſo faſt knit vp by the neceſſitie of time, otherwiſe than the Engliſhmen would haue had it. But yet, ſhe would labor the French king by hir letters and meſſengers, with all the diligence that ſhe might, to ſée if hir trauell and furtherance could do anie thing with him therein.

therein. Thus much Leſleus, and ſo againe to the matter.)

The firſt of Nouember, the queene Dowager departed from London toward Scotland, riding from Poules through the citie, paſſing forth at Biſhops gate. The duke of Northumberland, the erle of Penbroke, and the lord treaſuror brought hir to Shordich church, and there toke their leaue of hir. The duke of Northumberland had an hundred men after him with iauelins, whereof fourtie were gentlemen clad in blacke veluet cotes garded with white, & hats of blacke veluet with white feathers, and chains of gold about their necks. The earle of Penbroke had fiue ſcore men well appointed alſo, with blacke iauelins and hats with feathers, and the lord treaſuror had an hundred gentlemen and yeomen with iauelins in like maner, well apparelled: which three companies of horſmen furniſhed the ſtréets on either ſide, from the croſſe in Cheape, to Birchen lane end, as ſhe paſſed that waie.

The ſhiriffes of London had the conduction of hir to Waltam towne end, where ſhe lodged that night: and in euerie ſhire through which ſhe paſſed, the ſhiriffe, with the gentlemen of the ſame ſhire, receiued hir, and gaue their attendance on hir, till ſhe came to enter into the next ſhire, where the ſhiriffe and gentlemen there receiued hir: and that order was obſerued till ſhe came to the borders of Scotland, and all hir charges for meat and drinks, aſwell for hir ſelfe, and whole traine, as alſo the prouiſion for their horſſes, was borne and allowed by the king. [Beſides which, (as ſaith the ſame Leſleus) Richard Shelleie, now maiſter of the knights of Malta in England, and Edward Dudleie baron, were appointed to attend on hir all the waie through England, from London to Edenburgh, where ſhe was honorablie receiued by the earle Bothwell, and the lord Hume.] The earle of Huntleie, and diuerſe other of the Scotiſh lords returned home by ſea, the ſaid earle landing at Montroſſe, about the latter end of December.

Fr. Thin. Leſleus lib. 10. pag. 513.

* After that the queene was arriued in Scotland, ſhe labored euerie waie to ſtop all occaſion of diſſention; and that theſe braules which were riſen amongeſt the nobilitie in the time of the warres, and were not yet fullie quenched, might grow no further, to bring the common wealth (alreadie much impaired) into new troubles. Wherefore, by the aduiſe of the gouernor, of the earles of Huntleie, Angus, and Argile, and by the queenes trauell, the controuerſies moued about the archbiſhoprikes of ſaint Andrews and Glaſcow, the biſhoprikes of Dunkeld and Brechine, the abbeies of Aberbrothie, Inchechaſtrie, and other benefices, were ended: by beſtowing ſome of them vpon noble mens children, and ſome vpon ſuch perſons as worthilie deſerued them.)

The archbiſhop of Armachane.

Doctor Wanſhop, whome Leſleus lib. 10. pag. 514. calleth Robert Warhope, a Scotiſhman borne, archbiſhop of Armachane, ſo nominated by pope Paule the third, and after created Legatus à latere by Julius the third, deceaſſed this yeere in Paris, the tenth of Nouember. This man was blind from his infancie, but yet gaue himſelfe ſo to ſtudie, that he was firſt made doctor of diuinitie in the vniuerſitie of Paris, and after atteined to ſuch eſtimation in the court of Rome, that he was by the foreſaid popes aduanced (as before ye haue heard.) So that it is to be preſumed, that the ſufficiencie of his learning, (whereto he muſt néeds aſpire altogither by the eare) (ſith he was quite depriued of the benefit of ſight) coupled with other good qualities of mind, were means to preferre him firſt into the popes fauour, and then to promotion of his beſtowing.

This yeere in the moneth of June, the queene Dowager, and the gouernor, went into the north parts of Scotland; and at Innernes, Elgin, Bamf, Aberden, and Perth, the gouernor ſat in iuſtice for redreſſe of wrongs, and adminiſtration of righteous lawes and orders. And afterwards they repaired to the weſt parts, and ſat likewiſe in iuſtice at Dunfreis, Glaſcow, Lanricke, and in other places of that countrie, where diuerſe were put to their fines for tranſgreſſing the lawes, but few or none touched by corporall puniſhment. Which was but a ſlender courſe taken in reforming enormities, and little better than impunitie; though in leuieng of the fines (perhaps) a proportion were vſed: for by that meanes manie an offenſe was redéemed by monie, and iuſtice was little better than bought and ſold, as at a publike mart.

wrongs done are by iuſtice redreſſed.

* After this, they returned to Edenburgh, where all things requiſite for the eſtabliſhing of iuſtice were confirmed by the counſell of the nobilitie, and of the wiſe ſenators. Whereupon, when nothing ſéemed to want for the ſetling of a perfect peace through all the realme, but this, that certeine of the inhabitants of the eaſt limits (accuſtomed to ſpoiles) did by driuing bowties of cattell from the borders of England, ſéeme to offer new occaſion of warre. At this time, the gouernor goeth to Jedworth, and remoued ſuch magiſtrats as had negligentlie gouerned their owne prouince, or diſpatched the generall affaires of the kingdome: where taking pledges of euerie familie, he made them after that time in better quiet. Whereupon a long time following, there was a mutuall peace betweene England and Scotland. About which time alſo, the proteſtants religion making breach into the doctrine of the Romans, there was a prouinciall councell kept at Bithquoe, where the Caluiniſts with their doctrine were condemned and accurſſed; and all things decréed in the councell of Trent vnder Paule the third, were eſtabliſhed, with manie other néedfull lawes made to purge the corrupt manners of the clergie.

Fr. Thin. Leſleus lib. 10. pag. 515.

In which meane time, Dauid Panter or Painter (for I find both written) being a man of great learning, and famous by great experience, hauing faithfullie conſumed ſeuen yeares in France, in the ſeruice of an ambaſſador legier, came out of France to Jedworth: where, when he had declared to the gouernor (in the aſſemblie of the nobilitie) the reaſon, order, and meane which he vſed in accomplithing of his office; he was greatlie commended of all men. And for that he had ſo diligentlie, wiſelie, & truſtilie performed that great charge, he was with great ſolemnitie conſecrated biſhop of Roſſe, in the preſence of that aſſemblie. At which time alſo, the gouernor did dub into the order of knighthod certeine borderers, who had deſerued well of the common-wealth, to the end that their vertue adorned with ſuch honorable recompenſe, might be more inlarged toward the care of their countrie. Amongeſt which perſons ſo aduanced, theſe were the chiefe: Ceſkurd and Fernihurſt, Andrew Kar of Littleden, Couldinknols, Greinherdie, Balclenche, with manie other valiant men.)

Leſleus lib. 10. pag. 516.

In this torneie (wherein the gouernor was thus the iuſtice) the queene ſecretlie trauelled with the lords, both ſpirituall and temporall, to haue their conſents to be regent of Scotland, immediatlie after hir daughter the queene came to ſufficient yeeres, and that the time of hir tutorſhip were accompliſhed, or ſooner; if the lawes of the realme would ſo permit. And to aſſure hir ſelfe of their good wils in this behalfe, ſhe contracted ſundrie priuie bands with them, making large promiſes of great rewards vnto euerie of them. To conclude, this matter was ſo handeled by hir and others, to whome ſhe committed the doings therein, that in the yeere following, the gouernor agréed to ſurrender vp the gouernance into hir hir hands, hir daughter the yoong queene being not yet full twelue yeeres of age.

The gouernor was promiſed not onelie a full diſcharge and a Quietus eſt of all his doings, as well for receipt of monie, iewels, & other things, during the time of his gouernement, but alſo a confirmation of the heritable gift of the dukedome of Chatelerault: likewiſe an other confirmation of all gifts and reſtitutions by him made, during the time he had exerciſed the office of gouernor. And forthwith the queene Dowager ſent into France, to get all theſe things diſpatched, with ſuch aſſurances of writings vnder hands and ſeales, as was expedient, and to be ſent home into Scotland for his ſecuritie in all things.

Fr. Thin. Leſleus lib. 10. pag. 517.

✻ But before the gouernor had conſented to the queenes demand, there was great contention about the matter: for ſhe well vnderſtood that he would not depart with his office, before the time that the yoong quéene had atteined to the age preſcribed for hir full yeeres. For it is ordeined by the law of the kingdome, that the king ſhall not remaine anie longer vnder tutors, than to the age of foureteene; & the quéene (as it is in other women) at the yeeres of 12, at which times they may appoint procurators, which ſhall haue the gouernement of the kingdome vntill their full age. For which cauſe, the yoong quéene choſe amongſt other (as after ſhall more appeere) the queene Dowager to be one: whereupon, the quéene Dowager challenged the gouernement vnto hir ſelfe, for that hir daughter was certeine moneths aboue thoſe yeeres of twelue. Againſt which the gouernor did ſtiflie contend, conſtantlie affirming that the yoong quéene did not exceed the age of eleuen yeeres.

Whereupon the quéene, to take from the gouernor all ſtarting-holes and other ſhifts, doth vrge the cuſtome of that kingdome, and the obſeruation of thoſe lawes to be, that they muſt reckon the yeere in which the Scotiſh king or quéene is yet vnborne in their mothers bellie, to be part of that number of twelue or foureteene; in which they may appoint gouernors to rule vnder them. Which the gouernor perhaps did ſeeme to confeſſe for the king, but that the ſame was true for a quéene it did not appeere; ſith it ſéemeth to be wrought by Gods high prouidence, that the kingdome of Scotland was alwaies heeretofore by manie ages gouerned by kings, and that a woman did neuer before this time (eſpeciallie one within age) challenge that kingdome vnto them, although the male line (as appeered from the Bruſes to the Stewards) deſcended from the women, haue ſometime poſſeſſed the ſterne of Scotland.

But in the end, ſaie or do what he could, the gouernor did ſurrender his place (as after ſhall more plainelie appeere) vntill which time we will purſue the orderlie courſe of things done in this place: which is, that whileſt the gouernor & the queene mother were in this diſcord for the regentſhip of the realme, manie ſeditious perſons (taking occaſion thereby with hope to ſcape vnpuniſhed) did renew the memorie of old iniuries. For hereupon it happened, that manie of the familie of the Kars did (at Edenburgh) with great boldneſſe vtterlie ſlaie Balcleuche the knight. Beſides which, the yonger ſonne of the lord Ruthwen or Rewen, did publikelie thruſt through and ſlea John Chartruſſe a noble and a valiant yoong man, for deadlie hatred (as was thought) betweene thoſe two families. Yet it was ſpred abroad, that the chiefeſt cauſe why Ruthwen did kill Chartruſſe, was for that Ruthwen (being called into ſute of law by the other) diſtruſting his cauſe, and ſuppoſing that it would paſſe againſt him by iudgement, had none other remedie to relieue the matter, than that verie day to kill Chartruſſe. Which matter was the occaſion of making this law, that whoſoeuer with force or armes did either purſue or abate, recouer or loſe in anie action, ſhould not onelie be puniſhed for the raſhneſſe of the fact, but alſo ſhould haue the matter forthwith (euen in that mouent of time) iudged againſt him.]

This yeere, the firſt of Julie, Edward the firſt of that name, king of England, departed this life, after whom ſucceeded his ſiſter Marie, eldeſt daughter to K. Henrie the eight. [Touching whoſe regiments, Abr. Fl. ſith this hiſtorie requireth matter appropriate vnto it ſelfe, we will ſaie little in this place, remitting the readers to the conuenient courſe of time wherein they flouriſhed and vaded. Onelie this is worthie the noting, that the realme of England was not ſo much in hir time afflicted with exquiſite troubles of barbarous perſecutors, to the diminiſhing of Gods ſeruants, and the increaſing of ſatans ſynagog, as it was like to haue triumphed vnder the glorious title of the victorious goſpell, if God had not (for the vnworthineſſe of the Engliſh people) taken the yoong king awaie. For the proſperous beginning of his gouernement foretold an happie proceeding, and a bleſſed ending. But to returne to Scotland.]

✻ About this time, Norman Leſle, who (as you heard before) had fled for the death of the cardinall Beton biſhop of ſaint Andrews into France (where he then was impriſoned) being now ſet at libertie, did priuilie conueie himſelfe into Scotland. Which vnderſtood of the gouernor, he fined all thoſe that had receiued him into their houſe, & compelled Norman to flée to Denmarke, for feare that (if he were taken) he ſhould ſuffer extreme puniſhment. But when he knew that there was no place of ſafetie for him in that countrie, wandering ouer manie prouinces, he came at laſt into England, in the reigne of Edward the firſt; of whome, with the reſt of his companions, he was moſt courteouſlie receiued, with yeerelie penſions out of the exchekor or common treſurie aſſigned vnto them for their maintenance, according to their eſtates.

But after that king Edward was departed the world, they all were alſo commanded to depart the realme, to whome (earneſtlie vrging that their penſions might be paied to them in an other place where they ſhould remaine) the duke of Norffolke did publikelie ſay in the councell, that it ſéemed not iuſtice, that a catholike prince ſhould paie anie penſions to ſuch as had murthered a catholike cardinall. With which anſwer the ſaid Norman was almoſt ſtroken dead, and being then wearied with the griefe of his exile, went againe into France, and there by king Henrie (by the meanes of the baron Brunſtone, whom this Leſle had ſent before to requeſt the ſame) he was made capteine of the Scotiſh light horſſemen in France. This man did ſo valiantlie, worthilie, and honorablie behaue himſelfe in warres, which the French king had (with Charles the fift then emperor) on the borders of Flanders, that he was alwaies formoſt in the front of the battell, to aſſault the enimie; hoping by that meanes to wipe awaie the blot of the cardinals ſlaughter, and more firmelie to bind the French king vnto him.

But after certeine light ſkirmiſhes (which he happilie performed againſt the enimie) following the battell at Renton (a towne in Picardie) moſt hotlie, and drawing néere within danger of the enimie, he was ſo wounded with a ſhot, that he could hardlie returne to his companie: but being relieued by his owne ſouldiers from the hands of the enimie, he was caried to Montrulle, where he ſhortlie after died, greatlie repenting him of his former wicked fact, and greatlie abhorring the other authors thereof, as furtherers of him therein. Towards whom (after his death) the French king was yet ſo loning (for the

A parlement. Edenburgh caſtell deliuered to the lord Erſkin to kæpe.

In lent all the lords of the realme of Scotland aſſembled at Striueling, where all the couenants and articles of agreement betwixt the quæne and the gouernor, were perfectlie and fullie concluded, and thervpon a parlement appointed to be holden in Edenburgh, the tenth of Aprill nert inſuing: and in the meane time the gouernor deliuered the caſtell of Edenburgh vnto the lord Erſkin to kæpe, as it were by waie of aſſurance for his part, that all things at that parlement ſhould be accompliſhed, according to the points of the agræment made by full conſent. The lords then aſſembling in parlement at Edenburgh, on the ſaid twelfth day of Aprill, all the couenants of agræment had & made betwixt the quæne Dowager and the gouernor were preſented & read, touching the dimiſſion and giuing ouer of the gouernors authoritie, confirmed by the quæne hir ſelfe in France, with conſent of the king of France hir huſband, the duke of Guiſe, and the cardinall of Lorrain hir curators, with a gift of the dukedome of Chaſtelerault vnto the gouernor, vnder the great ſeales of France, and others, to whome it apperteined.

The quæne made gouernor by parlement.

The gouernor made duke.

After this, there was read a confirmation of the three eſtates of Scotland, touching the premiſſes, in which they bound themſelues to warrant the quænes diſcharge made to him, & to eſtabliſh him as ſecond perſon of the realme [& to haue the gouernement of the caſtell of Dunbreton (as ſaith Buchanan) with other things conteined in the contract: to the which there in open parlement all the eſtates ſubſcribed, and put thervnto their ſeales. Which done, the gouernor gaue vp his office of tutorſhip, in preſence of the ſaid eſtates, the quæne mother, & monſieur Doſſell being there preſent, who receiued the ſame in the quænes name, at that time remaining in France. And herewith preſentlie was a commiſſion ſhewed, giuen by the quæne of Scotland in France, with conſent of hir curators, making the quæne Dowager hir mother, regent of hir realme: which office ſhe tooke vpon hir, and was thereto admitted by the eſtates of the realme. Then was the parlement newlie authoriſed in the quænes name, with conſent of hir curators, and in name of the quæne regent.

* Where is to be noted, that as at the firſt they which had the adminiſtration of the common-wealth vnder the king of Scotland in his minoritie, were firſt called gardians, and then gouernors: ſo now began they to haue a new title for the ſame, to be called regents of Scotland, not before accuſtomed among the Scots, which name hath euer ſince remained to all ſuch as execute that place (euen in our age) during the minoritie of Charles James the firſt, now ruling the ſcepter of Scotland. In which declination of things (as before you heard) to the gouernement of the French, the Scots could neuer be perſuaded that the caſtell of Edenburgh ſhould be deliuered to the rule of ſtrangers: fearing that if the quæne ſhould die without iſſue, that then the French would there by tyrannie ſettle themſelues. Wherefore the ſame was committed to the defenſe of John Areſkine, which he ſhould not deliuer to anie, but to one of the order, and of the nobilitie and parlement.

Buch. lib. 16.

About this time, the quæne regent ſent George Gordon earle of Huntleie to apprehend John Mudiard (or Mederac, as ſaith Buchanan) chiefe of the familie of the Reginaldins, a notable theefe, & one that was fraught with moſt wicked deeds: which iournie it is ſuppoſed that Gordon did not verie faithfullie diſcharge. Wherefore, when he returned without the diſpatch thereof, in not taking of that man, he was committed to priſon vntill the day appointed, wherein he ſhould anſwer the cauſe. Whoſe friends in the meane time (to mitigate the enuie againſt him for the ſame) did ſpred falſe rumors thereof, laieng all the fault in the familie of the Cathans: for they ſaid that the ſame was hindered by them for the malice that they bare vnto the Gordons: which ſpeeches did onelie riſe almoſt vpon this occaſion.

Lesleus lib. 10. pag. 522. Buchan. lib. 16.

Whileſt the quæne prepared for hir iournie into Scotland, Gordon did caſt into priſon William (the head of the familie of the Cathans) a yong man liberallie brought vp with the earle of Murreie for kinreds ſake, being ſiſters ſon to the ſaid earle; for none other cauſe but for that he would not yeld himſelfe to the protection of him. Gordon therefore grieued at this man, did not thinke it ſafetie to leaue him free and at libertie behind him, when he ſhould go into France with the quæne, although he could find no fault to laie to his charge worthie anie puniſhment. Wherefore (by his friends) he perſuaded the yong man (ignorant of all deceit) that he ſhould yeeld himſelfe into his protection and tutorſhip: for ſo by that one meanes, both the fame of the one and ſafetie of the other might be prouided for, which the yong man did accordinglie.

Wherefore Gordon being now lord ouer the life and death of this William, did (diſſembling his hatred to him) breake with his owne wife to execute the yong and giltleſſe man in his abſence, ſuppoſing thereby to tranſferre all the malice which ſhould riſe thereof vnto the fact of his wife, as not done by his conſent. Which fell out quite contrarie: for when euerie one knew the ſubtill wit of Gordon the earle of Huntleie, and that his wife (a choſen and rare woman) had paſſed all the reſt of hir life within the bounds of womanlie modeſtie; they were all eaſilie perſuaded, that he alone was author vnto hir of that wicked counſell. Whervpon, Gordon being now caſt in priſon for that fact, there was (in a councell holden by the regent) great contention and varietie of opinions, touching the puniſhment which he ſhould haue. For ſome would haue him baniſhed into France for certeine yeares, & ſome would onelie haue an exceſſiue mulct to be laied vpon him.

Both which opinions were reiected by the chiefe of his enimies, Gilbert earle of Caſſiles. For he, perceiuing by the preſent ſtate of things, that peace would not long continue betweene Scotland and France; did vtterlie withſtand his baniſhment into that countrie. For he would not haue that man (being ſo ſubtilie and vnconſtantlie witted, proud, and deſirous of reuenge, of and vpon ſuch as were emulous, or backbiters againſt him) to be a firebrand and capteine to thoſe French, who (he was aſſured, for their inſolent pride) would haue warre with the Scots. For although he thought, that of right he ought to be puniſhed, yet he did not iudge, that anie domeſticall euill was ſo much, or the puniſhment thereof ſhould be thought ſo great, that they ſhould accuſtome the French to ſhed the Scotiſh bloud. Wherefore at length his puniſhment was agreed vpon (as after ſhall appeare) in renouncing of all his right to the earldome of Murreie, & other things.

The quæne hauing the diſpoſition of all things, did at hir pleaſure change all the officers, and made the earle of Caſſils treaſuror, & Oeilmot a Frenchman controller; alſo an other Frenchman called monſieur Rubie, kæper of the great ſeale, as vicegerent in place of the earle of Huntleie, who was chancellor and then in ward; [and James Machill regiſter, and the abbat of Couper kæpet of the priuie ſeale, as ſaith Leſleus. lib. 10. pag. 521. sieur Dotsels she vsed principallie in all things. The earle of Huntleie being to be deliuered out of ward, did for his punishment renounce his title to the earldome of Murreie; whereof he had a gift in heritage. Also he renounced his interest vnto the farmes of Orkenetie and Sheatland, and to the earledome of Mar, and of the quéenes lands of Straits Die: and further was contented to go ouer into France, there to remaine for the space of fiue yeares. But yet afterwards the quéene was contented, that he should still remaine within the realme, for the which he gaue to hir fiue thousand pounds in monie.

The earle of Huntleie renounced manie things.

* About the same time Marie the quéene of England, and the regent of Scotland, thought good to haue a peace betweene both nations, and that their commissioners should méet to determine all controuersies. At what time for the Scots, were Robert of Kinwardie, and John Bellenden of Achnowle knights: and for the English, were Thomas Cornwallesse, and Robert Bowes knights. At what time there were lawes made touching fishing, aswell in the sea, as in certeine other limited riuers; by which all occasions of contention was taken awaie from both nations. Richard Morton, a man of great counsell in prosperitie, and of great stomach in aduersitie, being capteine of Norham castell in England, was at that time cause of the making of this law for the commons; That if anie Englishman from a Scot, or a Scot from an Englishman, did by force take away anie fish that was taken; that he should paie the mulct of twentie shillings for the same: beside other punishments of the common law.

Couenants for seamen.

Further it was agreed, that whosoeuer by force of tempest, or for anie other cause, were driuen into Scotland or England, he should not by anie pretense be staied; but he might frélie by land or sea, either on horssebacke or on foot returne home. Prouided, that he had the testimonie of the nert maister of the port, or of the next towne, to witnes the cause of his arriuall; and that during the time of his abode in such a countrie, he attempted nothing against the lawes of the kingdome. Not manie daies after this, Henrie Sinclere deane of Glascow, senator, and vicepresident of the high court, did returne into Scotland out of France; being a man greatlie familiar with James the fift, aswell for the singularitie of his wit, as the excellencie of his learning.

Lesleus lib. 10. pag. 523.

But in the time of the gouernor, the courtiers (not greatlie estéeming such wisedome & learning) made no account of him, although the quéene Dowager, and diuerse of the nobilitie held him in great honor; aswell for his deepe studie in the best arts, as for his rare knowledge of the publike lawes and antiquities of Scotland. This man, vpon his first returne, was forthwith both author and persuader to and of the bishop of the Orchades chiefe president, and to the other senators; that there should be new lawes made for the short ending of sutes in law; for the obseruation of a right course of iudgments, and for the taking awaie of all euill customs. In the making & tempering whereof, he was of so great iustice; that such things as were set downe in the law, were more holilie and perfectlie brought to their ancient forme than they had bæne before.

The reason is readie; to wit, aswell for that in equall deliuering law to all men: as in pleading, there was by his meanes more diligence vsed by the magistrats, aduocats, scribes, and officers; in cutting awaie vaine and superfluous formes and orders: which ministred occasion, that their sutes did long hang in court, before they could be determined. At this time also the marquesse of Paine (being after made duke of Almaine) who in the meane time with manie other nobles of France, had remained pledges in England, did (hauing licence thereunto) come into Scotland to sée his sister, accompanied with sir Thomas Stewkleie of England now knight; who after he had remained some daies with his sister in pleasure & delight, discharged his faith, and returned againe into England.]

Lesleus. lib. 10. pag. 524.

In Julie was a parlement held at Edenburgh, in the which manie acts and statutes were made, right profitable (as was then thought) for the common-weale of the realme. Amongest which, to passe ouer the rest, these séeme worthie to remaine chronicled to posteritie. First, that none of the citizens (in the feasts of Whitsuntide, or anie such times, in which their hirelings are accustomed to go forth) should assemble armed, to cast forth the husbandmen after the old maner. Secondlie, that the inhabitants méeting togither, should no more assemble vnder a certeine colour of gaine, which for exercise of the bodie (as it was supposed) was holden after the example of one (I can not tell who) Robert Hood a wild or vplandish man. Thirdlie, that there should be no priuat leagues contracted betweene subiects. Which lawes did after bring great peace, ease, and quiet to the publike state.

1555. A parlement.

Fr. Thin. Lesleus. lib. 10. pag. 524.

In the verie same yeare 1555, in the eight kalends of August, fell the mariage of Marie queene of England with Philip king of Spaine in the citie of Winchester. Wherefore ambassadors were sent from the quéene regent to Philip and Marie, to congratulat their mariage. Besides which, these ambassadors did require a renewing of the league, and that commissioners should be appointed to méet the nert summer in the borders, to end all controuersies. In the meane time, whilest the quéene regent did administer the affaires of south Scotland, John Steward earle of Atholl was sent into the north parts with a chosen companie, to breake the force of John Mudiard or Muderace. At what time this earle vsed such courtesie and counsell in pacifieng, and such celeritie and wisedome in executing of things; that he brought the seditious Mudiard (impatient to haue anie gouernor) to the quéene, to whome the said Mudiard did willinglie yéeld himselfe, his children, and his kindred.

Lesleus. lib. 10. pag. 525. Buchanan. lib. 16.

To which man, the queene (in respect of singular clemencie, and pietie to all men, according to the disposition of hir nature) did wholie remit all his offenses, with this condition; that he should faithfullie remaine prisoner in the castell of Neffens, and in the towne of Perth. But as the for (as the prouerbe is amongest vs) cannot liue without his starting holes; so this Mudiard and his companions, imbued with more than forlike conditions, did (deceiuing their keepers) returne to their owne canes, and afresh trouble all the north Scotland with their raised seditions and spoiles. Which things inforced the quéene, that she did go into those parts, to hold iustice of oires: in which she might bridle the euils of wicked men, and purge those prouinces from all the rots of sedition.

Wherevpon, in the moneth of Julie, the quéene accompanied with the earles of Huntleie, Argile, Rothes, Cathils, and Marshall; the bishop of Aberden and Rosse, M. Dotsell, Rubie, and others, went to the towne of Inuernesse, in which citie (the faults known by publike accusation) there was iust punishment taken vpon the offendors. And because there were manie hidden in the higher and mounteine countries, which by their absence fled the punishment; she commanded the heads of the mounteine families, that they should bring their guiltie countrimen and kindred to iudgement, according to the law established by James the fift; with a great paine paine ſet vpon the chiefe of thoſe families; if the o-ther did ſtiflie reſiſt, & would not come into iudge-ment.

Wherevpon it followed, that ſundrie of diuerſe families, that were by contempt departed awaie, did come to publike iudgement. Where manie, and thoſe not of the meaneſt ſort, paied the puniſhment for troubling the peace; amongeſt which, one Grant a baron being commanded to bring James Grant and diuerſe other wicked perſons before the iudges, did prouide to bring their dead heads, when they could not take their liue bodies. The earle of Cathnes alſo, becauſe that being warned thervnto, he did not bring his people before the iudges; was firſt committed to priſon in Inuerneſſe, then at Aberden, and laſtlie at Edenburgh, from whence he purchaſed his libertie with a great maſſe of monie.

Mackeie in like ſort, head and chiefe of the tribe of Strathnauerne & of Glencone, being called to iudgement (for that he had often waſted the countrie of Southerland next adioining) did contemne the precept. Wherevpon the quéene prouided a great armie, which vnder the erle of Southerland brake into Strathnauerne, where he poſſeſſed all the places of doubt, leaſt anie hole might be left for the théeues to paſſe awaie from thence. Wherevpon Mackeie, when he ſaw himſelfe ſo beſet (as that no place of flight was left him) yelded himſelfe to Hugh Kenedie, who led him to the quéene, by whom he was committed to priſon at Edenburgh a long time, but they of Glencone put in pledges, & (being committed to ſafe and ſtrong priſons) were reſerued to the iudgement of the quéenes pleaſure.

Leſleus lib. 10. pag. 528.

After this, the quæne leauing Inuerneſſe, and progreſſing the prouince of Roſſe, ſhe came to Elgine, Bamf, Aberden, and the chiefe places thereabouts, diligentlie to inquire of the miſdemeanor of thoſe people. At what time ſhe did temper the rigor of law with ſuch courteſie, that ſhe puniſhed the offendors by fine, and not by death. From thence ſhé came to Dundée, and to ſaint Johns towne, obſerving the ſame cauſe and courſe of hir comming. When ſhe had thus paſſed ouer the ſummer in bringing the mounteine people to their dutie, ſhe ſent the earle of Huntleie to ioine with the biſhop of Roſſe and Orkeneie, and to Hugh Kenedie; to whom ſhe did ſubſtitute a better and more commodious forme of diſpatch of their affaires by others: who ſhould receiue the libels and accuſations of priuate perſons, and diligentlie to inquire of them, in the townes of Inuerneſſe, Elgine, and other places. By whoſe diligence it came to paſſe, that all thoſe countries (being reduced to the rule of iuſtice) were made the more quiet.

Here I will not (ſaith Leſleus) now declare how honourablie & ſumptuouſlie the quæne in all hir progreſſe was receiued (without anie charge to hir) of the péeres, biſhops, and other nobles and gentlemen of Scotland, ſith the Frenchmen (which were then preſent with hir) haue opened to other nations as well as to their own people (with ſingular commendations to the Scots) the gorgious ſhew of this Scotland, being a moſt worthie ſigne of the fauour they bare to the quæne.] In the meane time there were ſent commiſſioners to the borders, as the biſhop of Dunblane, the lard of Lethington, & maiſter James Macgill: where doctor Tunſtall biſhop of Durham, & certeine others for England met them at Duns, and remained there till the quænes comming backe forth of the north in September next following.

A parlement.

Gentlemen reſtored.

This yéere was a parlement holden, in which the lards Brimſton, Ormiſton, and Grange, with maiſter Henrie Balnaues, and others, which were forfalted in the gouernors time, were reſtored. At the ſame time the quæne, by the counſell of monſieur Doiſell, and Rubie, and certeine of the nobilitie of Scotland, requeſted that a new order might bee made, whereby euerie mans ſubſtance ſhould be put in an inuentarie, and according to the rate thereof to paie a yéerelie taxation, to be put and kept in the treaſure-houſe till warres began, and that then men of warre might be waged, therewith to lie vpon the borders, and none in that caſe to be charged to come from their owne houſes, but when anie great armie came forth of England to inuade Scotland.

A yéerelie tax to be leuied is proponed.

This taxation is not granted.

1556.

Diuerſe of the great lords were agreed to this ordinance: but the moſt part of the barons hearing thereof, aſſembled togither in Edenburgh, to the number of two hundred & aboue, and ſent the lards James Sandlandie of Calder in Louthian, and John of Wemis in Fife, to the quæne and lords, beſeeching them not to ſet ſuch new taxations vpon them, for they could not beare ſuch burdens; but would defend the realme, as before time their elders had done, not meaning to put their goods in inuentarie, as if they ſhould alreadie make their laſt will and teſtaments: and be paſt all hope of inioieng their temporall goods, as perſons not to liue longer in the world, but to take their farewell, and giue ouer all that they had by law of fatall neceſſitie not to be auoided. * Adding further, that their elders did not onelie defend themſelues, and their goods againſt the Engliſh, when they were of farre greater power than they now be; but did alſo manie times make further inuaſion vpon them into their owne countrie. For which cauſe, they being not anie iot now ſo degenerat from their anceſtors, that they wold not, when need required, beſtow their ſubſtance and life in defenſe of their countrie.

Ft. Thin. Buchan. li. 16.

And as touching the hired ſouldiers, it was a thing full of danger, to commit the ſtate of Scotland to men without ſubſtance, or without hope of aduancement, and to ſuch as for monie will dare to do anie thing, being a thing apt to kindle their déepe couetouſneſſe, and to miniſter occaſion to them to attempt other matters. But to the end all other things may the better be loked vnto, let them more remember the déerenes of their countrie, than their owne eſtate or condition. For will anie man beléeue, that hired ſouldiers will more valiantlie fight for ſtrangers, than the owners will fight for the defenſe of their owne? That a little hire or wages readie to be abated in peace, will greatlier incenſe the minds of the common people; than goods, children, wiues, and temples, will moue the hearts of the nobilitie?

Wherevnto may be ioined, that this matter perteineth to the higheſt good of the kingdome of Scotland, and that the ſame is of farre more importance than that it ſhould be communed of at this time, and in the tender age of our yong quæne. Beſides which the greater part of men do ſuſpect and feare, that the ſame new order for warre is vnprofitable, and ſuch as cannot be performed without ſome commotion of the Scotiſh nation, eſpeciallie ſith ſo great ſums of monie can hardlie be wrong out by tribute impoſed on the ſame Scots, as may ſuffice to nouriſh a hired armie to defend the borders. Wherefore it is to be feared, leaſt the end of perſuaſion grow to this point, that it do not rather open a gap to let in the enimie, than to be a barre to kéepe them backe. For if the Engliſh, after this example, being a farre richer nation, ſhall gather a much greater ſumme: who doubteth, but that they may with leſſe trouble to the cómon people, ſuſteine an armie twiſe as great as that of the Scots, & ſuch as ſhall not onelie enter the borders, but ruſh euen into the verie bowels of the king-kingdome of Scotland?

For the other part of the oration, I cannot tell whether it be better to ſuppreſſe it in ſilence, or to deliuer it (ſaith Buchanan) to common eies & eares. For I doo heare (writeth he) manie which doo murmur and aſke who ſhall gather this monie? How much thereof ſhall be neceſſarie to and for the hired ſouldiors, and how much to be left in the hands of the treaſuror? There be manie things which put vs in great hope, that no ſuch thing ſhall be eſtabliſhed for the eſpeciall goodneſſe and temperancie of that worthie princeſſe (in whoſe hand the whole gouernment now reſteth) doth incourage vs, that we ſhall not bee ſo tared. But yet when we remember the outward deeds of others, and our owne at home, which haue beſore time beene done; we cannot ſo gouerne our ſelues, but that we muſt feare the ſame hereafter to fall vpon vs, which we haue alreadie felt.

But letting theſe things paſſe, which perchance we vainlie feare, let vs come to thoſe things in which our anceſtors did place their chiefe helpe (for maintenance of their libertie) againſt the weapons of their aduerſaries. Robert the firſt of that name (in compariſon of whome none of the Scotiſh kings were counted more wiſe, and without all doubt none more valiant, as we all confeſſe) did not onelie profit his ſubiects whileſt he liued, but alſo after his death: for when he laid at point to ſurrender his life, he gaue this admonition, that we ſhould neuer make continuall peace, nor long truce with the Engliſh. For that man (by nature and by vſe of long time exerciſed in both fortunes) did well perceiue, that ſuch as liued in idleneſſe and ſlouth, had their ſtomachs and minds abated, and their bodies weakened with delights of pleaſures, and that couetouſneſſe and lecherie did ſpring vp as it were in vntilled ground, when ſcuere diſcipline and ſparing was quenched, which made them alſo to be vnpatient of labor, and to hate battell, whereby their ſtrength being diminiſhed, they ſhould eaſilie giue place to their enimies.

After that theſe two noble men had ſaid thus much, the regent fearing tumultuous inſurrections if ſhe perſeuered in this eraction, left off anie further to purſue this tar, and is (in often acknowleging hir error) ſaid to haue vſed this ſpeech; That ſome of the beſt of the Scots, and not ſhe, were authors and workers of the ſame. By which words manie ſuppoſed that ſhe ment the earle Huntleie, a man of a ſharpe wit, latelie deliuered out of priſon, and rather readie to reuenge the iniurie receiued by reſtreint of his libertie, than mindfull of anie benefit ſhewed vnto him in his deliuerance. Wherfore when he ſaw the regent bent to this one thing to inure the Scots with tares and paiments of monie: and fearing leaſt hir power being ouermuch increaſed, that ſhe would abate the ſtrength of the nobilitie, diminiſh their authoritie, and call the whole gouernment of Scotland into the hands of hir people, it was ſuppoſed that he gaue hir counſell anſwerable to hir diſpoſition for the gathering of monie which ſhe had then in hand, being in deed the part of an enimie to hir, becauſe he knew that the Scots would not paie anie tribut, nor be ſo obedient vnto hir as they had beene before. There were alſo ſome that ſuppoſed this deuiſe to grow from Dauid Painter biſhop of Roſſe; for he being a man of rare wit, and no leſſe learning, was with manie benefits tied to the Hamiltons, and was not anie waie eſtranged from their counſels and kinreds.

1557. In this yeere, an ambaſſador of Muſcouie going into England with a great ſhip, & another bote, was caſt on land by ſudden tempeſt of the ſea in the coaſt of Buchquane, a prouince in the north part of Scotland; who hauing loſt all his goods by ſhipwracke, was ſaued himſelfe, and ſome of his companie, becauſe they lighted on a rocke, where he & they might ſaue their liues. The inhabitants did liberallie interteine this ſtrange man, and brought him to Edenburgh to the queene, who would not permit this new gheſt to want anie thing ſo long as he remained with hir: and further, commanded and procured, that his goods loſt by ſea, and come into the hands of the people, ſhould be faithfullie reſtored to him againe, appointing moreouer the lord Hume for honors ſake to accompanie him to Berwike.

Lesleus.lib.10. pag.529.

This yeere alſo in the moneth of Julie was Hoter Traberne ſent ambaſſador (from Anna duke of Oldenberge, and Delmenſore, and earle of Emden) out of eaſt Friſia into Scotland, to require that the ancient couenant of an hundred yeeres made betweene the Scots and the people of Emden (which by courſe of ſome yeeres paſt, was now of no force) might now againe be renewed. Which being granted & ſolemnelie eſtabliſhed, both thoſe nations from that day did liue togither in mutuall & perfect friendſhip. After this, warres ariſing betweene England and France, queene Marie of England, fearing leaſt the Scots would be ſtirred at the motion of the French to attempt ſomething againſt England, ſent ambaſſadors to the regent, to require that ſome of the Scots might with hir people meet on the borders, to treat of matters belonging vnto them both.

Lesleus.lib.10. pag.529.

Whereupon in the moneth of Julie, the procurators for both the kingdomes met at Caerleill, whither for the Scots came Robert Reid biſhop of Orkneie, Henrie Seintclere deane of Glaſcow, Robert Carnegie knight, ſenators; and the lord Harries, at that time preſident of the weſt borders. For the Engliſh did come Tunſtall biſhop of Durham, the lords Dacres, and Wharton; amongſt whome there was talke for peace, and recompenſe of ſuch iniuries as were committed by both the nations. In the meane time a certeine Frenchman landed at the weſt part on Scotland, and declared to the queene the warres betweene England and France, deſiring hir to make warre vpon the Engliſh. Whereupon the queene ſent for the lords to commune with them at Newbottell, where ſhe opened to them diuerſe wrongs done on the borders by Engliſhmen, and how no redreſſe could be got: wherfore ſhe required that warres might be moued againſt England in reuenge of thoſe iniuries, although the biſhop of Orkeneie was the ſame time at Caerleill in talke with Cutbert Tunſtall biſhop of Durham and others, commiſſioners for England. The principall cauſe that moued the queene regent to ſeeke to make war againſt England, was for that the Engliſhmen aided the Emperor in fauor of his ſonne king Philip againſt the French king, becauſe their queene had taken to huſband the ſame king Philip, and ſent the earle of Penbroke ouer with an armie to ioine with king Philips power.

1557. The queene regent deſired warres.

An aſſemblie at Caerleill.

The occaſion why the quéen regent deſired to haue war.

It was thought therefore, that if the Scots inuaded the Engliſh borders, it might cauſe them to call backe their power forth of France to defend their owne countrie. But the Scotiſh lords would not conſent in anie wiſe to begin anie warres: which their dealing when monſieur Doiſell perceiued, hee ſpeedily went to Haimouth beſide Berwike, and fortified the ſame with all diligence, making inuaſions into England. Whereupon the Scotiſhmen in their owne defenſe were conſtreined to make warre, and the erle of Huntleie was made lieutenant vpon the borders, who came thither; and remaining there by the aſſiſtance of the Frenchmen, made ſundrie inuaſions and rodes into England, burnt diuers townes and villages, and caſt downe manie ſtone houſes, piles pſles and ſtrengths.

In this meane while were the Scotiſh commiſſioners at Caerleill; and the maiſter of Warwell warden of the weſt borders, being there with them, with much adoo got away and came home into Scotland. The quéene aſſembled a great armie out of all parts of the realme, the which came forward to Kelſo in the moneth of October, where the quéene & Frenchmen perſuaded them to enter by inuaſion into England. But they mening to take further aduiſe, paſſed ouer Tweed to Warwell hugh, where they incamped, and afterward approched the caſtell of Warke, inuironing the ſame with a ſiege for the ſpace of two or thrée dais. Capteine Read at that preſent had charge of that caſtell, with thrée or foure hundred footmen, and one hundred horſſemen, ſéeming to care little for the Scotiſhmens forces.

The earle of Weſtmerland, being then lieutenant of the north parts, gathered ſuch power togither as he might make, and came to Lowike, accompanied with the lord Talbot, ſir James Croſts, and others, to ſuccor where moſt néed ſhould appeare. The Scotiſh armie, perceiuing the Engliſhmen thus in a readineſſe to reſiſt their attempts, tooke aduiſe togither, and concluded that it was not for the weale of the realme, at that time to hazard battell forth of the bounds of their owne land, their princeſſe being abſent, and as yet in hir minoritie; conſidering alſo that the war was not taken in hand for their owne quarell, but for the pleaſure of France. Theſe and other the like reaſons, being alleged by the earles of Arrane, Huntleie, Argile, Caſſils, and others, to the quéene and French capteins, they were nothing ſatiſfied therewith; but the Scotiſh lords would attempt no further, but retired backe and ſcaled their armie.

The earle of weſtmerland gathereth an armie to reſiſt the Scots.

The Scots breake vp their armie.

In remouing from Warke, they were purſued by certeine bands of the borderers, and others, which were repelled, and ſtood in danger to haue béene diſtreſſed, if capteine Read had not with noble corage iſſued forth, and in time relieued them that were retiring: whereby they ſtaied and gaue a new charge, inſomuch as the Scots were beaten backe againe, and chaſed ouer the water to their maine armie that was alreadie paſſed ouer. The quéene and monſieur Doiſell, perceiuing that they could not get the Scotiſh lords to make anie further exploit at that preſent, ſhe retired home; but Doiſell with his Frenchmen were appointed to remaine ſtill in Haimouth, to countergarriſon the Engliſhmen within Berwike.

There were diuerſe ſoot bands of Scots waged by the French king, which were appointed to lie in places about the borders, as at Kelſo, Rockeſburgh, and ſuch like for defenſe of the countrie, and the annoiance of the Engliſhmen, as occaſions might ſerue. After this, ſir Andrew Kar, and diuerſe other entered England with a power of men about Martinmaſſe. Neuertheleſſe, the earle of Northumberland, being then lieutenant of the north parts of England, and lieng on the borders, aſſembled his forces togither, & comming to incounter the Scots on the very borders ſide nére to Cheuiot, at the firſt the Engliſhmen were put to the worſſe, but yet at length the Scots were ouerthrowne and chaſed: ſir Andrew Kar, and manie other being taken priſoners.

The Scots diſcomfited by the earle of Northumberland.

Sir Iohn Foſter bare himſelfe verie valiantlie at this incounter, ſo that his ſeruice might not well haue béene ſpared. He was thruſt through the mouth into the necke, and alſo through the thigh; moreouer, his horſſe was ſlaine vnder him. The conflict was ſharpe, for both the horſſemen and footmen came to make proſe of their forces. The warre thus being begun and followed, the Scots kept their quarterage, and euerie noble man (as he was appointed) laie on the borders with a thouſand horſſemen, during his ordinarie tearme. And on the other ſide, the Engliſh borders were furniſhed with new ſupplies of men of warre, ſo that there were datlie rodes and incurſions made by the parties, to the great damage and ſpoile of the townes and villages ſituate nére to the confines of both the realmes.

Sir Iohn Foſter.

Quarterage kept by the Scots for defenſe of their borders.

In December the quéene aſſembled a parlement at Edenburgh, where ſhée (highlie fauouring the French) ſhewed forth the letters of Henrie king of France, to be read by the whole aſſemblie, touching the ſolemnization of the mariage betwene the yong quéene of Scots, and the French kings ſonne, which I haue here ſet downe.

A parlement.

The ſubſtance of the letter of the French king, concerning the mariage of his ſonne to the queene of Scots.

Leſleus lib. 10. pag. 533.

Henrie by the grace of God, king of the French, to his worthie coſines & princes of Scotland, and to the reſt of the orders, being our déere friends, gréeting. It is moſt plainlie knowen to all nations, how faſt a bond hath alwaies hitherto remained betwéene Scotland & France. Neither can it be hidden what theſe ſigns of amitie were, being for number manie, for greatneſſe large, and for dutie of friendſhip mutuall ech to other; by which the kings our anceſtors haue ſéemed to confirme, and as it were to increaſe this amitie, to the end it might remaine whole and ſound for euer: yea and ſo farre the ſhew thereof hath appéered, that all the benefits of either realme haue ſéemed to be common to ech other. Which bond of friendſhip we alſo haue (for the time in which we firſt receiued the enſignes of our kingdome) labored firmelie to reteine, to the end the ſame ſhould not anie waie be decaied or broken. The which in like ſort we well vnderſtand, that you haue likewiſe abundantlie performed vnto vs.

Wherefore (more ſtronglie to knit the ſame) we will not ſuffer this opportunitie (which the diuine goodneſſe hath laied before vs, as we verelie ſuppoſe) of mariage to be ſolemnized betwéene our ſon the Dolphin, and your quéene our déere and ſwéet ſiſter and daughter. Which thing (after that it began to be intreated) was ſo vrged by all parts, as the yong quéene was vpon that condition left with vs, when ſhe was caried into France, by the conſent of our ſiſter the Dowager, and the gouernor of Scotland, to the great reioiſing of all you that yéelded therevnto; where now ſhe hath atteined ſuch beautie and number of vertues, partlie by the liberalitie of nature (which ſhe receiued from the kinglie bloud of hir parents) and partlie by the inſtruction of my wife, that I can hardlie anie longer ſuffer (in reſpect of the age of my ſonne) that this mariage (which we haue ſo much deſired) ſhould anie longer be deferred. And ſith at Chriſtmaſſe next my ſon ſhall come to thoſe yéeres, in which he may promiſe all things that ſhall be neceſſarie for the knitting vp of the mariage; and ſith alſo we haue determined (if it ſo ſéeme good to the quéene hir mother, and to the reſt of the parlement of Scotland, which we earneſtlie requeſt at your hands) that the mariage ſhall publikelie at Paris (on the day conſecrated to the thrée kings) with ſuch ceremonies as is requiſite, be fullie conſummate with the ſpeech of my ſonne and of your quéene:

We do by theſe letters requeſt you, that by common conſent you forthwith ſend ſome of your chiefe nobilitie, that maie honor the mariage with their preſence, and that (hauing publike authoritie therefore) may freelie and according to law, diſpoſe of thoſe things which are accuſtomed to fall in ſuch matters and affaires.

The which if you ſhall doo, I promiſe that hereafter they ſhall liberallie vnderſtand how acceptable they ſhall be to me: and how that you ſhall receiue all the fruit and benefit which ſhall ariſe of my ſons mariage (for the performance whereof, by reaſon of his ſufficient age, we will ſhortlie prouide) which ſaid cõmoditie ſhall not onelie now remaine to you that be preſent, but alſo moſt abundantlie with great pleaſure ſhall continue to your poſteritie. For ſith both our and your people of France and Scotland ſhall be ſo firmelie conioined (as we hope) by this mutuall knot of mariage, and our affaires with yours, and yours with ours, ſhall hang the one vpon the other, as it were by a certeine mutuall linke and knot, that both we (being out of the danger of ſuch as would diminiſh and ouerthrow our ſtates) maie for euer inioy ſuch quiet as we did neuer hope to doo before this. From our caſtell of ſaint Germans, the fourth kalends of Nouember. 1557.

Subſcription, By the king, Henrie:
A little below: De Laubeſpine.

Upon the reading of which letters in the parlement, by the conſent of the whole eſtates, there were elected and choſen James Beton archbiſhop of Glaſcow, Robert Read biſhop of Orkeneie, George Leſle earle of Rothes, Gilbert Kennedie earle of Caſſiles, James Steward prior of ſaint Andrewes [the quœnes baſtard brother] George lord Seton [captein of Edenburgh] James Fleming, and John Erſkine lard of Dun [gouernor of Montroſſe] ambaſſadors and commiſſioners to go into France, and there to contract mariage betwixt Marie quéene of Scotland, and Francis Dolphin of France, and to ſolemnize the ſame mariage. Whereupon, ſufficient commiſſions and inſtruments were made to them by the eſtates of the parlement, and they accepting the ſame, made preparation for that iournie, and departed in the moneth of Februarie forth of the rode of Leith, and with great winds & boiſterous ſtormes came into France, loſing in their iournie one of their ſhips, with men and horſſes before ſaint Ebbes head, in the Forth of Scotland, and an other with great riches & manie gentlemen, with the captein called Waterton in the rode of Bullongne.

Ambaſſadors ſent into France to conſummate the mariage betwixt the quéene of Scotland and the Dolphin of France. 1558.

Two ſhips loſt.

The ambaſſadors themſelues neuertheleſſe eſcaped, and comming ſafe vnto the French court in the moneth of March, were honorablie receiued of the king at Paris, where the contract of mariage was made, and three ſcore thouſand franks aſſigned in dowrie to the quéene of Scotland, & thirtie thouſand franks of yerelie penſion, with manie rich iewels. There was alſo a perpetuall bond of league concluded betwixt France and Scotland, and great preparation made for the mariage, which was ſolemnized in Paris with great triumph and aſſiſtance of all the cardinals, dukes, earles, barons, lords, and biſhops of the realme, in the church of Noſtre dame, the 24 of Aprill in that preſent yere, 1558.

The aſſignement of the Scots quéens dowrie.

Fr. Thin. Buchan. lib. 16.

* After the ſolemnitie of this mariage, the legats of Scotland were called into the councell-houſe of the French king: at what time the chancellor of France delt with them, that they ſhould repreſent the crowne and ſcepter, and other ornaments of the kingdome, to th'end the huſband of the yong quœne might be crowned king alſo of Scotland. Whereunto the ambaſſadors did ſhortlie make anſwer, that they had no ſuch thing giuen in charge to them. After which, the cardinall ſaid; We deſire nothing more at your hands at this time, but that which lieth in your power to performe; which is, here now to confirme by writing that you will hereafter, forward, approue & worke that this honor (which now we iuſtlie demand) maie be granted to the Dolphin, when the ſame ſhall be talked of in the parlement of Scotland. Which requeſt (when it ſéemed full of impudencie) they ſuppoſed beſt more conſtantlie and ſharpelie to reiect.

Wherefore they anſwered, that their ambaſſage was reſtreined within certeine bounds, which they neither could nor would exceed. But and if they had bœne ſent with frée libertie of their ambaſſage, that yet it were not the part of faithfull friends (as the French profeſſed to be) to require that which could not be granted without certeine and aſſured danger and infamie of treaſon, though danger of life were abſent from it. All which notwithſtanding, in all honeſt things which might well be granted they would yéeld vnto the French, ioined vnto them by ſo manie neceſſarie occaſions. Wherefore they requeſted the French that they would not in their demands exceed the limits of modeſtie.

Wher vpon the ambaſſadors being diſmiſſed from the court, foure of the chiefe of them (before they departed home) which were theſe, Gilbert Kennedie, George Leſle, Robert Read, and alſo James Fleming, all men of ſingular vertue and loue to their countrie, beſides manie other of the companie, died there, not without miſtruſt of poiſon. It was alſo beléeued, that James the quœnes brother had receiued the ſame draught: for (although he were of a better compoſition of bodie, ſtronger conſtitution of complexion, and of more youthfull ſtrength, whereby he eſcaped death) he had alwaies after a continuall and dangerous infirmitie of his bellie whileſt he liued, of the death of all which ſhall be ſomewhat more ſaid héereafter. Thus leauing the Scotiſh lords ambaſſadors there in France for a time, we will returne to ſhew what happened betwixt the Scots and Engliſhmen at home, where the warres were purſued, to the loſſe or little gaine of both parts.]

About Whitſuntide, ſir Henrie Perſie with diuerſe bands of the countrie garriſons, & ſir George Bowes then marſhall of Berwike, with ſundrie bands of the garriſon of that towne, paſſed forth into Scotland, they being in all about ſeuen or eight hundred horſſemen, and two thouſand footmen. They burnt the townes of Duns and Langton; and hauing got togither a great number of cattell, returned homewards. The Scots that laie in Kelſo, and other places, kéeping their quarterage on their borders (for the realme, as ye haue heard, was quartered, euerie part kéeping their turne, as the manner is) aſſembled togither to the number of two thouſand horſſemen (or few leſſe) and three bands of footmen, haſting forth to defend the countrie. And perceiuing where the Engliſhmen were, followed and coaſted them as they returned with their bootie, till they came to Swinton, where they ouertooke them, and ſkirmiſhed with them ſharplie as they were paſſing through the towne.

A rode into Scotland.

Duns and Langton burnt.

The Scots aſſaile the Engliſhmen at Swinton.

The Scotiſh footmen beat backe part of the Engliſhmens ſhot into their battell, and preaſſed verie forward in hope to be aſſiſted by their horſſemen, the which (as ye haue heard) ouermatched greatlie the Engliſh horſſemen in number: but the fight grew ſomewhat hot, and the more vnto the diſaduantage of the Engliſhmen, forſomuch as their ſhot & powder began to faile them, by reaſon the miſtie morning had made much of their powder dankiſh, ſo that they could haue no vſe thereof. But héerewith ſir Henrie Lée, captein Read, and others, being in the battell, behaued themſelues verie ſtoutlie, cauſing the the ſoutmen to ſtaie, and boldlie to abide the enimie: & hærewith procured the horſſemen to giue a charge in ſuch conuenient time, as if the ſame had béene protracted, it might haue turned verie euill to the Engliſh ſide.

The Scots horſſemen flée.

But now as well the horſſemen as ſoutmen plaieng their parts, the Scotiſh horſſemen abiding without the towne in troope (while their ſoutmen were in ſkirmiſh) fled awaie, leauing their ſoutmen to be ſlaine and ſpoiled of the Engliſhmen, and yet thoſe ſoutmem fought it out right manfullie: ſo that if the Scots horſſemen had done their parts ſo well as the ſoutmen, it was like to haue gone harder on the Engliſh ſide than it did. But now the Scotiſh horſſemen not entring the fight, their ſoutmen were incloſed by the Engliſhmen: for thoſe that were in the fore-ward, and were paſſed by, returned, and comming behind their enimies, holpe to beat them downe, ſo that few or none of the Scots or Frenchmen (whereof there were ſome few amongeſt them) eſcaped, but were either taken or ſlaine.

The Scots ſoutmen ſlaine.

The lord of Keith with others taken priſoners.

Amongeſt others, capteine Cullane, and capteine Kenedie, two chiefe leaders of the ſoutmen were taken: diuerſe of their horſſemen alſo in the retire were taken, amongeſt whome William lord Keith, ſonne to the earle Marſhall of Scotland was the chiefeſt. But this victorie was not atchiued without loſſe of diuerſe Engliſhmen. Amongeſt other one Pell, enſigne-bearer to ſir John Markhams band of ſoutmen was ſlaine. Alſo maſter Edrington a capteine of light horſſemen was taken priſoner by the lard of Edmonſton, at the firſt charge giuen vpon the Scotiſh horſſemen, and led awaie without reſcue. Beſide the manfull proweſſe of ſir Henrie Perſie, and the other Engliſh capteins before mentioned, the forward valiancie ſhewed that day of ſir William Bꝛereton, and Thomas Markham, that led his father ſir John Markehams band of ſoutmen, alſo of Kaſe Ellerkar a capteine of horſſemen, are not to be forgotten, who with diuerſe other capteins & ſouldiers behaued themſelues in ſuch wiſe at that preſent ſeruice, as their dealings therein deſerue ſpeciall memorie.

M. Edrington taken.

Sir William Bꝛereton.

Moreouer, at an other time the Scots & Frenchmen entring into England, the Scotiſh horſſemen, to the number of a thouſand or thereabouts, paſſed forth to burne and forraie the countrie: but the earle of Northumberland, & his brother ſir Henrie Perſie, aſſembled togither a power of horſſemen: and ſir Henrie Perſie méeting with them at Grendon, ſet vpon the Scots and chaſed them ouer the water of Twiſell, vnto the fot battell of the Frenchmen: who retiring to the riuer of Twéed, paſſed ouer the ſame at Chapell Fourd, where they were aſſailed both by certeine fot bands of the garriſon of Berwike, that were come forth to aid the earle, and alſo by the horſſemen: ſo as diuerſe were drowned in the riuer before they could get ouer.

The Scots put to flight at Grendon.

But after they were once got to the further ſide, they put themſelues in order of battell againe, and retired in a ſquadron verie ſtronglie, ſuſteining little or no hurt at all, notwithſtanding that the erle of Northumberland (being then come) and his brother ſir Henrie Perſie, with the reſt of the capteins and gentlemen of the countrie, purſued them ouer the water for the ſpace of two miles, ſkirmiſhing with them ſtill as they marched awaie, but could doo them no harme, becauſe they kept themſelues in ſo good order, & the Engliſh ſoutmen were not able to reach them. Whereupon the Engliſh horſſemen ſuffering the Frenchmen to depart, left them, and paſſing into the countrie, burnt long Ednam, and diuerſe other hamlets and villages, and ſo returned. Diuerſe Scots that day at the ouerthrow and chaſe of their horſſemen were taken priſoners, as the lord Grete, and others.

The good order of the Frenchmen in their retire.

Long Ednam burnt.

The lord Grete of Scotland taken priſoner.

And after this, the Engliſhmen wan the ſtrong pile of Cawmils, wherein were ſixtéene Frenchmen that defended it for the time verie ſtoutlie, ſo that it coſt the liues of diuerſe Engliſhmen, before they could take it. Shortlie after, there was a fore ſkirmiſh at Halidon hill. For whereas the moſt part of ſummer it was ordeined, that euerie daie certeine bands of ſouldiers ſhould ward on the ſame hill, to giue libertie to the inhabitants of Berwike, to mow and carie in their haie; they continued for a time without anie trouble offered by the Scots or French, ſo that the warders ſtanding in no doubt of the enimies, vſed out of their armor to ſhoot, bowle, quait, & exerciſe ſuch like games of pleaſure. Whereof the Scots & Frenchmen being aduertiſed, came one day from Aimouth in ſo ſecret wiſe, that they were drawen verie néere to the Engliſhmen, yer they had anie warning of their approch.

A fore ſkirmiſh vpon Halidon hill.

This approch as it was priuie, ſo was it likewiſe ſudden, inſomuch that before they could be got into order, the Scots and Frenchmen were almoſt at their elbowes; and falling in ſkirmiſh with them, handled them verie roughlie: although ſir William Bꝛereton, ſir John Markeham, maiſter William Dꝛewꝛie, Cutbert Vaughan, and other the capteins of the Engliſhmen did behaue themſelues right manfullie, bringing their men in order, incouraging them, and doing what apperteined vnto hardie and ſkilfull warriors. But yet three times that day the Scots and Frenchmen put them from the higth of the hill, till at length ſir James Croſt comming from Berwike, vſed ſuch diligence and policie in the matter, that the Scots and Frenchmen were repelled and conſtreined to retire, withdrawing backe into Aimouth, after they had continued in ſkirmiſh from one of the clocke till it was paſt foure with no ſmall loſſe on both parts.

The earle of Bothwell.

After this, the earle of Bothwell, lieng on the borders as lieutenant, according to the order for the time of his quarterage, entred on a day into England, and ſent his forraie to burne Fenton towne, kéeping himſelfe in ambuſh at Haltwell Sweire. Sir Henrie Perſie aduertiſed that the Scots were thus entred, got togither a thouſand horſſe, and making forth to defend the countrie, ſet vpon the earle at the aforeſaid place of Haltwell Sweire; but ſome feare entring into the hearts of the Engliſhmen, by reaſon of certeine ſhot which the Scots had there with them, fled, and were purſued by the Scots ouer the water of Till. There were taken aboue ſir ſcore Engliſhmen, amongſt whom capteine Erington, and capteine Bar, that had the leading of light horſſemen, were two: beſide diuerſe other men of good account in ſeruice, as one Vaughan a gentleman and ſuch like.

Haltwell Sweire.

The Engliſhmen put to flight.

About this time, whileſt the lord Eure commonlie called Euers, remained capteine of Berwike, one Kirkaudie couſine to ſir William Kirkaudie lard of Grange, chanced to be taken priſoner into Berwike; and afterwards being ranſomed, at his comming home to Aimouth, he made report that he had béene too ſtreictlie vſed, during the time that he remained priſoner, at the hands of the ſaid lord Eure. By reaſon wherof, vpon chalenge made by Grange to fight a combat with the lord Eure, the matter grew to this iſſue; that where their degrées were not equall, Kaſe Eure brother to the lord Eure vndertooke (in his brothers behalfe) to breake a ſtaffe with the lard of Grange vpon the ſide of Halidon hill at a day appointed: where they met, either of them bringing twelue gentlemen with them, to ſée the triall of this chalenge performed.

The lard of Grange chalẽgeth the lord Eure.

But when they came to haue their armor & weapons viewed, the truth is ſo, that Orange was armed in a cote of plate, and a curace aloft vpon it: wherewith ſome fault was found, becauſe maiſter Eure was clad onelie in a ſingle cote of plate, without anie other peeces of armor for defenſe of his bodie. But yet ſuch was the great courage of the ſaid maiſter Eure, that he would not refuſe the chalenge, notwithſtanding his aduerſaries aduantage of armor. Wherevpon they ran togither, and brake both their ſtaues; and as it fortuned maiſter Eure was hurt in the ſlanke. The warre being thus purſued betwixt England and Scotland, beſide the incounters and roads which are before mentioned, there were two great roads made into Scotland; the one by the earle of Weſtmerland, and the other by the earle of Northumberland: the lord Talbot being there, & hauing the leading of certeine bendmanes.

The lord of Orange and maiſter Wake Eure ran one againſt another.

Moreouer, it was thought good by the Engliſhmen, not onelie to annoie the Scots by land, but alſo by ſea. Wherevpon ſir John Clere with certeine ſhips of warre ſailed forth alongeſt the coaſt, till at length he arriued at the Iles of Orkeneie; where going on land about an enterpriſe, & ſtaieng longer than was requiſit, he was incountred by his aduerſaries, and ſlaine with manie of his people, which were there on land with him. But though the Scots had good ſucceſſe in that part, they ſuſtreined great damage on the weſt ſide of the realme, by a iournie which the erle of Suſſex then lord deputie of Ireland attempted againſt them. For the better vnderſtanding whereof ye ſhall note, that after the lord Clinton high admerall of England had burnt the towne of Conqueſt in Britaine, there were ſeuen ſhips of warre appointed to paſſe into Ireland, as the Marie Willoughbie, the Dolphin barke, the Sacret, the Gerfalcon, and three other that were merchants, and appointed that peace to ſerue the queene of England in hir warres.

Sir Iohn Clere ſlaine in the Ile of Orkeneie.

There were alſo beſide theſe ſeuen ſhips of warr, two victuellers appointed to attend vpon them. Sir Thomas Cotton was ordeined their admerall, and one Southwoke of Douer was aſſigned to be their viceadmerall. Now vpon their arriuall in Ireland, the earle of Suſſex hauing alſo prepared three other ſhips, with ſufficient and neceſſarie proviſion for his iourneie, imbarked with ſo manie ſouldiers as conuenientlie might be beſtowed aboord in that fleet, conteining twelue ſaile in the whole; and departing toward the weſt of Scotland, landed in a part of the countrie called Kentire, with as manie ſouldiers and mariners as might be ſpared out of the ſhips, leauing them furniſhed with competent numbers for their ſafegard; and being got to land, he paſſed forth into the countrie, & burnt two houſes that belonged to Iames Maconell chiefe gouernor of thoſe parts, & a great enimie to the Engliſhmen.

The iourniе of the erle of Suſſex into the weſt parts of Scotland.

Kentire.

Iames Maconell.

He burnt alſo diuerſe townes, villages, and hamlets belonging vnto the ſaid Maconell, with great ſtore of coorne and other things which came in their waie. The Scots oftentimes ſkirmiſhed with the Engliſhmen, but durſt not aduenture to ioine with them in battell, they kept ſo good order by the earle of Suſſex his politike and valiant conduction. There were a ſort of Scots gotten into a boate meaning to haue fled, but being apprehended by the Engliſhmen, they were executed. Finallie, after the earle had remained there on land, in burning and ſpoiling the countrie for the ſpace of three daies, he returned to his ſhips, and in ſafetie went aboord againe with his men: and making ſaile to the Ile of Arrane, entred the hauen called Amalaiche, and landing at that place, burnt the countrie, and after went to Cumber, where he likewiſe burnt and harried that Ile.

The erle of Suſſex burnt the Ile of Arrane.

This done, he meant to haue gone into two other Ilands, Ila and Iurrie: but the winds grew ſo terrible with tempeſts and foule weather, that they loſt one of their ſhips; and ſome of the reſt were ſo rent & ſpoiled of their tackle and furniture, as they eſcaped in great hazard of being caſt awaie alſo. There were ſix and twentie mariners drowned, the which perceiuing the ſhip to be in danger of ſinking, fled into the boate, and ſo periſhed: the other that remained in the ſhip were ſaued, as maiſter Francis Randoll, and others. By reaſon therefore of ſuch foule weather, the earle of Suſſex was conſtreined to returne into Ireland, arriuing in Cragfergus, where he landed with his ſouldiers: and appointing the ſhips to returne into England, he paſſed by land vnto Dublin, ſpoiling the enimies countries by the waie, and taking from them a great preie and bootie of cattell; notwithſtanding the painfull paſſage that he had to make through the cumberſome waies, bogs, and woods, without reliefe of all neceſſarie things in that ſo troubleſome a iourniе.

Foule weather.

The erle of Suſſex returneth into Ireland.

Thus far for thoſe peares warre in the daies of Marie queene of England, betwixt the Engliſhmen and Scots: whereof ſith I haue found none that hath written anie thing at all, I haue yet ſet downe theſe od notes, as I haue learned the ſame of ſuch as had good cauſe to know the truth thereof, being eie-witneſſes themſelues of ſuch enterpriſes and exploits as chanced in the ſame warres; namelie captеine Read, captеine Wood, captеine Errington, captеine Gurlеie, and captеine Markham; with others, which of their courteſie haue willinglie imparted to me the report of diuerſe ſuch things, as I wiſht to be reſolued in. Which accordinglie (ſo far as my remembrance hath ſerued) I haue here deliuered, to the end the ſame maie giue occaſion to others (that maie happilie light vpon more full inſtructions) to impart to poſteritie a more perfect diſcourſe, where otherwiſe the matter might peradventure wholie paſſe in forgetfulneſſe.

And now to returne vnto the Scotiſh ambaſſadors that were ſent into France, for the concluſion of the mariage betwixt their queene & the Dolphin. After that the ſame mariage was conſummat, and euerie thing ordered and brought to paſſe according to the effect of their commiſſion; in the moneth of Auguſt they take their leaue of the French king, the queene, and nobilitie there, to returne homewards into Scotland: albeit few of them came home, for the biſhop of Orkeneie departed this tranſitorie life in Diepe, the fifteenth of September; the earle of Rothes deceaſſed there the ninth of November; the earle of Caſſils lord treaſurer departed in the ſame place the fourteenth of November; and the lord Fleming deceaſſed in Paris the eighteenth of December. And ſo onelie the archbiſhop of Glaſcow, the prior of ſaint Andrews, and the lard of Dun returned into Scotland in October. After whoſe comming, there was a parlement ſummoned by the queene, to be holden in December next.

[In Auguſt Archembald Campbell erle of Argile, whoſe wit was ſingular in diſpatch of the affaires aſwell of peace as of warre, was made high iuſtice of Scotland; and in France was aduanced to the title of a knight of the order of ſaint Michaell. Few daies betweene theſe things departed this life the biſhop of Dachin, and Andrew Durie biſhop of Whitechurch. To the one did ſucceed the abbat of Couper, in place of the other came Alexander Gordon archbiſhop of Athens by the queenes benefit. ſacher vnto him) had made abbat of Melroſſe and Kelſo died alſo this yeare. Whoſe monaſteries the quéene did forthwith giue vnto the cardinall Guiſe; long after which followed alſo the death of the abbat of Bamforinoch. At this verie time manie prodigious ſights (which I will not here recite, being touched by Leſleus) did appeare by a marker of ſuch ominous things, whereof theſe verſes were made:

Portentum eſt miſeræ gentis, quæ numine læſo
Diuiſis ſacris diuidet imperium.

Leſleus lib. 10. pag. 542.

In September there was a parlement holden at Edenburgh, in which the acts of the former legats in France (about the mariage of the quæne of Scots to the Dolphin) were confirmed. At what time the Dolphin of France by his ambaſſadors did vehementlie requeſt, that the crowne (which they terme matrimoniall) ſhould be giuen vnto him by the decrée of the ſtates, whereby he might be called king of Scotland as long as the quéene liued. The quéene alſo iudging it a point of honor, to heape all title of glorie which ſhe could vpon hir huſband, as one that by a certeine inclination of mind did vertuouſlie fauor him; gaue in charge alſo to the ambaſſadors, that they ſhould earneſtlie follow the ſame cauſe amongeſt the Scots. And to the end to draw them the more eaſilie into hir opinion; ſhe drew the matter into certeine articles, deliuered to the ambaſſadors with more ample inſtructions touching the ſame: the ſumme of all which was this.

First, diligentlie to beat into the Scots with what diſpoſition of mind the Dolphin was affected toward them, as well as his father, who held the Scots in that account as he did his owne people, and ſo alwaies would haue them: which good mind of the French towards the Scots to be plaine without anie diſſimulation, it maie well appeere as well by the couenants eſtabliſhed for the mariage, as alſo by the benefits which he hath not onelie beſtowed vpon the Scots and Scotland in generalitie, but alſo in particularitie vpon certeine eſpeciall Scots, of his owne frée will, almoſt without the requeſt of anie bodie. And that they ſhould alſo further laie abroad, what helpe the quéene and Scots haue had of the worthie cardinall of Lorraine, & the duke of Guiſe the quéenes vncle. All which the ambaſſadors themſelues (as they haue fullie proued) did well vnderſtand.

Secondlie, where the quéene doth thinke that ſhe is greatlie benefited with manie honors by ſo great a king, but eſpeciallie in this, that ſo mightie a prince hath taken hir into the fellowſhip of the holie bed, by which there can not anie other commoditie grow to the king than the reuenues of the kingdome which he hath purchaſed with his great charge and labor: and that the quéene conſidering all this (with great griefe of mind) doth ſéeke by what meanes ſhe might at leaſt erpreſſe ſome ſmall token of a thankefull mind for ſo manie benefits (becauſe if ſhe ſhould not do ſome thing, no ſmall blot would ſéeme to be imputed to the quæne and the Scots) it came into hir mind to thinke by what meanes ſhe could requite ſome part therof, which ſhe could do (as ſhe thought) if at the leaſt ſhe did but honor hir huſband with the kinglie title, & giue vnto him the mariage crowne of Scotland.

This thing therefore the quéene hir ſelfe doth earneſtlie deſire, and doth courteouſlie requeſt all the eſtates of Scotland, that the ſame maie be eſtabliſhed by the voices of the full parlement, and that they will command ſome thrée or foure of the chiefeſt nobilitie honorablie to carie the enſignes of the kingdome to him, that at the leaſt by this token of loue, the king & the beſt of the court maie well perceiue, with what reuerence and with what dutie they fauour the king hir huſband.

And to the end that this requeſt of the quéene, for the rareneſſe of the example, ſhould not breed anie doubt in the mind of the nobilitie, and to hold them as it were in ſuſpenſe, it was giuen in charge alſo to the ambaſſadors, that they ſhould in manner point with their finger, that manie ages paſt, the quéene of Naples did not onelie for loue ſhe did beare vnto him, adorne the duke of Anion hir huſband, with the bare name of a king; but did alſo by the conſent of the nobilitie, giue him rule and gouernement ouer the ſame kingdome. The like whereof was alſo done in our memorie by the quæne of Spaine to hir huſband the archduke of Auſtrich, & by the quæne of Nauarre to the duke of Vandoſme.

But if that the Scots be moued by the example of the Engliſh, who haue excluded Philip king of Spaine, that then the ambaſſadors ſhould eaſilie wipe awaie that doubt, if they admoniſh the Scots that the Engliſh are not tied to the Spaniards with that firme and néedfull band as the Scots are to the French, both which nations haue one priuilege, magiſtrats to gouerne, and one fellowſhip and participation of the adminiſtration of all the things in either kingdome. Whervnto they muſt further adde that it was ſo far off, that the Engliſh ſhould reape anie fruit or commoditie by the Spaniards, that the king of Spaine himſelfe did (as it were) wring from the Engliſh all the commoditie he could, to performe his affaires out of the realme. And further, that the Engliſh being out of all hope for their quæne to haue anie iſſue by the ſame mariage, they would not grant vnto it, when there is a certeine and full hope left to the Scots, that iſſue may come of this marriage.

Beſides all this, let it be opened vnto the Scots, what great benefit maie redound vnto them by this ſigne of a thankefull mind. For it maie ſo happen, that if the king Dolphin ſhall féele himſelfe increaſed with this title of honor by the Scots, as a note of their good fauour to him, that he maie raiſe vp his father the king of France, that he will not by anie meanes permit the quéene of Scots his wife to be excluded from the kingdome of England, after the death of quéene Marie, who was not like to liue long being ſore troubled with the dropſie.

Well fiſhed to catch a frog.

Not ſo likelie as that lies drop out of your pen.

Theſe things and manie others were giuen in charge to the ambaſſadors (comen out of France) to declare to the parlement of Scotland. Which being thus declared to the ſtates and the quéene regent, with might and maine ſéeking the furthering thereof; at length it was granted that he ſhould be king during the life of the quéene. For which cauſe Gilleſper Campbell earle of Argile, and James Steward, baſtard brother to the yong quéene, being prior of S. Andrews, were named to execute their conſent vnto the Dolphin, to declare him king, and to inueſt him with the ornaments thereto belonging, and further to ſhew the readie minds of the Scots toward him, not onlie in this but in all other things: by which anie honor or profit might anie waie riſe vnto him.

But whileſt theſe men do prepare all things for ſuch a iournie, certeine factious perſons did beat into their eares, how heauie a iournie that would bee vnto them. For it would happen, that whileſt they were buſie in prouiding for ſmall things abrode, they ſhould by delaie corrupt, or by abſence cleane ouerturne matters of greater importance at home. For they did know how the ſubtill wit of James, and the great power and ſtrength of the earle of Argile would be milling in thoſe new things which were in hand amongſt theſe of the religion: for which they neuer left off intreating and perſuading, vntill they had wholie staied them from that iournie.

Buch.lib.10. During these affaires, Marie quéene of England died, and that worthie ladie Elizabeth succéeded in hir place. Immediatlie whereupon, the yoong quéene of Scots bare hir selfe as heire to that kingdome, and caused all hir hangings, bedding, vessels, and other houshold stuffe to be stamped and marked with the title and armes of the kings of England. And although France were then miserablie afflicted in chalenging the dominion and gouernment of Pillane, Naples, and Flanders; yet they would nædes heape euill vpon euill, and adde thereunto the title of England, as being vnto them a verie scorne and mockerie (as Buchanan tearmeth it.) Neither did the wiser sort of the French looke into that matter: for the Guises, who at that time gouerned all things, did consent to this error of the Scotish quéene, bicause they would thereby séeme to haue gotten to themselues a singular honor in adding the title of England to the French name.

The regent hauing now gotten a consent (as before you haue heard) of the matrimoniall crowne to be bestowed vpon the husband of the yoong quéene of Scots, began after a sort to put on a new mind: for by little and little she conuerted that old and accepted courtesie, into commanding arrogancie; and the gentle answers wherewith she was wont to appease all parts, were turned contrarie. Which before she durst not do by reason of the present state, which then was such, as she feared not to promise what she would not haue to be performed, bicause she had not then obteind the grant of the matrimoniall crowne: but now hauing all things after hir owne mind, she vsed other conditions, and other spæches. There was also a parlement appointed at Striueling in the first Ides of Maie.

And bicause she was heard oftentimes to saie, that she would not suffer the maiestie of the chiefe gouernement to be cast downe from the seat thereof, but wold restore it to the former place. By which saiengs manie were admonished of some troublesome tempest to follow. Whereupon diuerse came to intreat hir for the protestants, amongest which for the dignitie of his name, to make the matter to be more easilie obteined, there were sent Alexander Cunigame earle of Glencarne, and Hugh Campbell shiriffe of Aire, a worthie knight, before whom the regent could not refraine hirselfe, but burst forth into these words.

"These men (saith shæ) sith they haue preached not verie sincerelie, shall be banished, though you and your ministers resist against it. And when they replied, beséeching hir that she would remember what she had often promised: she answered, that the performance of promise is to bæ chalenged of princes, so farre as it séemeth commodious for them to performe it. Whereunto they replied, that they therefore renounced all dutie and obedience vnto hir, and did further forewarne hir of the great mischiefes that would flow out of this founteine: with which answer shée being stroken more than shée loked for, said in the end, that she would both thinke on it and them.)

In assemblie of the clergie. Fr.Thin. In Julie and August, there was a conuention of all the prelats and cleargie holden at Edenburgh, in the which certeine men & women of Edenburgh were accused of heresie, and abiured at the towne crosse with faggots on their backes: [whereupon (as saith Lesleus lib.10.pa.538.) were great tumults raised at Edenburgh, for the appeasing whereof, the lord Seiton was made gouernor there.] In this assemblie it was required, that the common praiers might be read in the Scotish toong in churches, with certeine other articles of reformation, whereof the answer was deferred till March, in which moneth a prouinciall councell was appointed to be holden at Edenburgh. The second of March, the said prouinciall councell of all the prelats and clergie of Scotland began, wherein diuerse articles were proponed by the temporaltie; as to haue the praiers and administration of the sacraments in the Scotish language, the election of bishops and all beneficed men to passe by the voices of the temporall lords & people of their dioceses and parishes, with diuerse other reformations: all the which the bishops refused to grant, where through there arose shortlie after great trouble in Scotland.

1559. The quéene regent caused summons to be giuen to John Knor, John Wullocke, John Dowglas, and Paule Peffane, to appeare at Striueling the tenth day of Maie: and for lacke of appearance they were denounced rebels, and put to the horne. Whervpon the said John Knor being in Perth, persuaded the maister of Lindsei, the lards of Tulibardin, Dun, Pettarrow, and diuerse other being there assembled, with the burgesses of the townes of saint Johns towne and Dundæ, to pull downe the images and altars in all churches, and to suppresse the houses of friers, & other religious places. Who after a sermon made by him to that effect, the same tenth of Maie they began in saint Johns towne, and cast downe the abbeie of the Charterhouse, the Blacke and Carmelite friers, called the Tullelum [and so cleane, that (as saith Buchanan) within two daies there was left no signe thereof almost to be séene] and reformed all other churches thereabouts, breaking downe the images and altars in Fife, Angus, Pernis, and other parts there nert adioining.

The quéene regent being aduertised thereof, sent for the duke of Chatelerault, and diuerse other of the nobilitie, as the earles of Atholl, Argile, Marshall, and others, who came with hir to Perth, otherwise called saint Johns towne, hauing with them two thousand Frenchmen [to whome also repaired (as saith Lesleus lib.10.pag.548) the archbishop of saint Andrew and Glascow, the bishops of Dunkeld, and Dunblane, James prior of saint Andrews, the abbat of Cowper and Dunfermeling, with manie other chiefe of the cleargie] who entered the towne vpon appointment of the lord Ruthen capteine thereof, and so receiuing it, gaue it in kæping to capteine James Steward, and capteine Cullane, with their bands of men of warre. In the meane time the erle of Argile, and the prior of saint Andrews, left the quéene in Perth, and went to saint Andrews, ioining themselues with the other, and made reformation of the churches, casting downe altars, images, houses of friers, and abbeies in that towne, and in Cowper, and other places thereabout: and assembling a great companie of countrie men, came to Londros, Balmeare, & Cowper, to make resistance against the Frenchmen that were in Falkeland with the quéene [come thither from Perth, after that she had left in Perth fiue hundred men vnder the charge of James Steward cardinall, & James Cullane.] But when they should haue met on Cowper moore in battell, the duke of Chatelerault, the earle Marshall, and others, laboured betwixt them, so that the battell was staied, & the quéene with the Frenchmen returned vnto Edenburgh.

1 FIrſt, that all the ſouldiers of the religion, and ſuch as did belong to them, ſhould depart from Edenburgh, and leaue the ſame to the gouernement of the queene: with this prouiſo, that the citizens ſhould either remaine, or depart at their pleaſure.

2 Item, that thoſe of the religion ſhould reſtore vnto the magiſtrats wholie and trulie all ſuch ſums of monie, or other pretious things, which they had either priuatlie taken, or by open force ſpoiled from the magiſtrats.

3 Thirdlie, that the quéenes palace, which they of the religion did poſſeſſe, with all the furniture and ornaments thereof, ſhould be deliuered vp againe to ſuch as ſhould be appointed therefore.

4 Fourthlie, that they of the religion ſhould not depart, before they had committed the lord Ruthwen and Pettarrow (whome they promiſed to put in pledges for their credit and good dealing) to the keeping of ſuch as were on the quéenes part.

5 Fiftlie, that all men ſhould acknowledge the gouernement of the king and the quéene to be lawfull, which before they had gainſaid by the pretenſe of religion: and that they ſhould faithfullie obeie the regent, and the old lawes of the kingdome, except ſuch decrees as perteined not to religion.

7 Seuenthlie, that they ſhould not from henceforth violate or deface churches, religious houſes, or anie other holie places.

9 Ninthlie, that the quéene regent ſhould faithfullie prouide, that the preachers of the reformed religion ſhould not be moleſted or hurt, either by hir, or by anie of the catholike gouernors. Both parties being thus ſatisfied with theſe conditions, the French entered Leith.]

Shortlie after this, the duke of Chatelerault, partlie through perſuaſion of the earle of Argile his ſiſters ſonne, and the Weſtland lords, and partlie becauſe he vnderſtood that his ſon the earle of Arrane was fled forth of France to Geneua for the religion, he toke part with the lords from that time forth againſt the aduiſe of the biſhop of ſaint Andrews, and diuerſe other his friends. This yeere in June, Henrie the king of France, at the triumph of the mariages betwixt the king of Spaine and his daughter, and duke of Sauoie and his ſiſter, was wounded in iuſts at the tourneillis in Paris by the count Montgomerie, and died of the hurts the tenth of Julie next inſuing, being the eleuenth day after he was wounded. * In the moneth of September, Croke a noble man of France was ſent to the regent, to comfort hir in the kings name; declaring vnto hir that an armie was preparing to come into Scotland, vnder the leading of the marqueſſe of Albuſe or Elbuſe (as ſaith Buchanan) and that in the meane time with all ſpéed ſome troopes of men ſhould ſhortlie be there with monie, and other defenſes of warre. And to the end that nothing ſhould want to further hir, the king would ſhortlie ſend certeine noble men into Scotland, which ſhould counſell hir in theſe troubleſome affaires. Beſides which, he brought letters out of France from the king and the quéene, to the prior of ſaint Andrewes, in which they rather ſought to incline his mind by courteſie to obedience, before that they would inforce him thereunto by warre. Which letters being by Leſleus turned out of French into Latine, are by me thus deliuered in Engliſh, with the anſwer of the prior to the ſame.

Francis king of France to Iames prior of the monaſterie of ſaint Andrewes.

Leſleus lib. 11. pag. 554.

AFter that I vnderſtood by certeine letters, & by the common report of all (my couſine) that Scotland did flame in euerie part with tumults and ſeditions, it is ſtrange to ſée how greatlie I was aſtonied thereat. But when I heard that you (to whome my dead father, my déere wife, and my ſelfe, haue giuen ſo manie large benefits) ſhould be forgetfull of them all liberallie beſtowed, and become the author, head, and nouriſher of this fire of contention and brawles; I could not be perſuaded that you would ſo farre digreſſe from that office and dutie of pietie, which you haue alwaies made ſhew to beare vnto the quéene.

But if the thing were ſo, as the common fame doth report of you, I did verelie thinke that the promiſes and flattering words of others had intiſed you to this deceipt, onelie to take the fault vpon you; for whoſe whoſe cauſe (when they had diſcharged themſelues thereof) the offenſe would ſéeme to be either none, or verie ſmall, after that you had taken it vpon you. Which my opinion of you, if it be true, it ſhall be as toiſull to me, as that which ſhould be moſt toiſull: for by this meanes I wiſh that ſome part of my diſpleaſure (into which I would haue you thinke that you are worthilie fallen) were quenched, in that you haue (as I heare) but onelie deceiued the good hope which we conceiued of your pietie towards God, and your faithfull ſeruice towards me.

Wherefore, ſith nothing is more déere or acceptable vnto me, than that (controuerſies appeaſed) all things without anie tumult maie be knit togither by the law of good order: and ſith the ſame (as it ſéemeth to me) maie beſt be done by your trauell, I do admoniſh you by theſe letters, and (for the good will I beare you) do earneſtlie requeſt you, that you will returne to your owne profit and fidelitie, from which you haue moſt ſhamefullie fallen, to the end that I maie by the ſame more plainlie vnderſtand that you carie an other mind than that which I can gather out of your foliſh doings, the which ſhall then fullie appéere to me, if at length you ſo bend all your force, that all things diſordered in thoſe parts, maie by your diligence be called backe to the commonwealths ancient, ſound, and holie forme of obedience, which you know is due to God and me.

Otherwiſe I would haue you be perſuaded that I will ſhortlie ſubdue you, and all thoſe which ſhall cleaue or miniſter helpe vnto you, in taking iuſt puniſhment vpon you, which I will bitterlie execute. The charge of declaration whereof, and the further large expreſſing of my mind, I haue committed to this bearer, whome I would haue you credit as much as my ſelfe. I praie God (couſine) to kéepe you in health. Paris the ſirtéenth kalends of Auguſt.

I can not ſée why Leſleus ſhould call hir Dowager, ſith by hir letter it appéereth hir huſband was yet liuing, in that ſhe talketh of hirs and hir huſbands diſpleaſure.

Marie queene of Scots, and Dowager of France, to James the prior of the monaſterie of ſaint Andrewes.

I Can not (couſine) but greatlie wonder, that you which are not onelie néereſt to vs by bloud, but are alſo (as you know) greatlie benefited by vs with manie liberalities, ſhould be either of that malice or boldnes, that you would with one fault ouerthrow the maieſtie of God, and violate the authoritie of me and the king my huſband. For it is a thing worthie of great admiration, to conſider how it might happen that you who being preſent, did open to me the names of the duke of Chatelerault, and of manie others, which ſeemed to you to diminiſh my authoritie, ſhould now being abſent (as a leader and head of all other ſeditious perſons) hurt my dignitie, and that in matters of greateſt weight, in which the honor of God is leſſened, and my authoritie clearelie taken awaie: all which I ſhould more eaſilie haue beléeued of anie other my ſubiects, than of you.

Trulie moſt grieuouſlie (as I ought) I beare this, that you haue falſified that faith to me, which had a ſpeciall hope of your fidelitie: though as yet I can ſcarſe be perſuaded to thinke you to be ſo farre from truth and reaſon, that you would be caried awaie into ſuch blind errors. All which I deſire to fall out to be as true, as true maie be, requeſting alſo of God ſo to giue to you his light, that returning into the right waie, you maie ſhew your ſelfe a good man, and obedient to our lawes, by doing contrarie things to that which you haue alreadie performed. Wherefore, by theſe letters I admoniſh, and with intreatie as earneſtlie as I can, deſire you to recompenſe your former euill with following good deeds, and that the anger (which I and the king my huſband haue bitterlie conceiued againſt you) maie by that meanes be pacified. Otherwiſe trulie I would haue you vnderſtand, we will execute ſuch puniſhment vpon you, that you ſhall for euer be mindfull thereof. The which doubtleſſe if you compell vs by your déedes to performe, it ſhall be to you a moſt gréeuous thing. I praie God kéepe you from all danger. Paris the 9 kalends of Auguſt.

Subſcription: Your good couſine Marie.

James Steward the prior of ſaint Andrewes (whome proſperous ſucceſſes had before aduanced) did in reading theſe letters of the king and quéene ſo frie in anger and hatred, that he could not forbeare but muſt néedes returne anſwer, expreſſing the ſame (after confirmed by his deedes) though now ſomewhat ſmothed with good words. The effect of which letters were in this ſort: That he was grieued in his mind as much as he might, becauſe he was ſo farre fallen into the miſlike and diſpleaſure of thoſe princes, whome he reuerenced with great dutie, that they ſhould bitterlie obiect vnto him in their letters that he was a ſeditious perſon, noted of ingratitude, fraught with malice, and defiled with hereſie.

Touching which notes of theſe wickednes, ſith they were imputed to him by the nobilitie of Scotland (meaning ſuch as ſtood againſt the reformed religion) he with faire ſpéeches requeſted the princes, that they would not attribute more to the malice of his enimies in accuſing him, than to his vprightnes in purging himſelfe: and that they ſhould not thinke anie thing to be ſpoken by his enimies, but that which ſauoured of malice, enuie, and hatred, eſpecialie ſith they did not onelie go about to diminiſh his fame abroad amongeſt the princes, but alſo at home did openlie laie wait for his life and liuing.

But he would ſo labor, that all men ſhould well perceiue his good mind (towards the princes) fullie laied abroad without anie veile of diſſimulation, whereby his aduerſaries ſhould be aſhamed to haue laied ſuch open reproch againſt him, and the king & quéene ſhould miſlike that they had ſo eaſilie credited his enimies. Wherefore he deſired that hereafter they ſhould rather beléeue anie thing of him, than that he would be noted for an vnthankefull man, as they had obiected vnto him. From the deteſtable ſpot whereof (being of all the verie worſt, ſith nature abhorreth the ſame) he would kéepe himſelfe, and rather die by anie kind of torment, than to ſuffer the leaſt ſpot of ſuch a vice to dwell in his name, eſpecialie in the affaires of that king and quéene, whereof he had found the firſt moſt courteous, and the ſecond moſt bountifull.

And therefore, as he had with all dutie hitherto proſecuted their fauour, ſo he (would during his life) contend, that his trauell, diligence, and faith, ſhould neuer want in performing or defending their affaires, ſo that they would not burthen him with that which might be a detriment to the cauſe of God and religion: for if either of them were in hand, neither the fraudulent counſels of his ſtriuing aduerſaries, neither the bitter words of the ſharpe threats of the king or quéene, ſhould make him leaue off, or repreſſe the

" their worthie force in taking vpon him the defense

Croſkes had ſcarſe performed his ambaſſage for which he came (as before you haue heard) in deliuering theſe letters: but forthwith alanded at Leith Dcauian a Frenchman, with foure troops of ſouldiers, with a great maſſe of monie, & other furniture needfull for the warres: whome after a few daies the regent ſent backe againe into France, to require of the king, that foure other companies of ſouldiers might be ſent ouer, which might with thoſe (alreadie now in Scotland) ſupplie the number of twentie enſignes: to whome alſo it were expedient to ioine a hundred horſmen, which number ſhe affirmed would ſuffice to pacifie all the tumults in Scotland, ſo that foure ſhips well appointed might alwaies lie in the hauen of Leith, to watch the port. Of all which if the Scots were prouided (by the benefit of the king) and that the comming of hir brother the marqueſſe of Albuſe were haſtened, ſhe promiſed then to bring all things to an end.

Beſides which, ſhe did alſo ſignifie vnto the king, that the Scots of the reformed religion, for the increaſe of their faction, had ſecretlie growen in league with ſome of the nobilitie of France, who did dailie ſend letters and meſſengers to the Scots, to incourage them not to leaue off from their attempts; promiſing alſo vnto them that they would hinder (by all the meanes they could) that no great armie ſhould be made out of France againſt them: and moreouer, in that the Scots had ſent ambaſſadors to Germanie, and into Denmarke, for religions cauſe, to require aid from thence, but their chiefeſt and principall hope did reſt (as ſaith Leſleus) in England.]

1559. During theſe things, the duke of Chatelerault and the lords of the congregation ſent to the quéene (whereof we will ſpeake more hereafter) beſeeching hir to leaue off from making of forts within the realme. But ſhe would not grant ſo to do: wherefore they aſſembled their whole forces in Edenburgh, and

In the time of this ſiege, the yong lard of Lethington, ſecretarie to the quéene, being with hir in Leith, left the towne, & ſecretlie departing, got him to the lords, and holpe greatlie afterwards to obteine aid out of England. After this, the quéene and

The quéene came to Edenburgh. Frenchmen came to Edenburgh, which was peaceablie rendred to them, where they remained all that winter. About the ſame time, Nicholas Pelue the

New men ſent into Scotland. biſhop of Amiens, monſieur de la Broſſe, & two doctors of diuinitie, came to Scotland in September, and la Broſſe was made lieutenant of the French armie, monſieur Martigues coronell of the footmen. And with them came a great companie of French ſouldiers vnto the quéene regent, ſo that then the French power was thirtie fiue hundred good men of warre, beſides two bands of Scotiſh ſouldiers, vnder the leading of captaine Anthonie Kenedie, and James Steward of Cardonald.

* The Frenchmen being thus entered France, twelue of the chiefeſt of the nobilitie were aſſembled at Edenburgh, of whome there was a day required of hearing to be giuen to la Broſſe, and to the biſhop, affirming that they were ſent thither as ambaſſadors. To whome it was anſwered, that they did not ſéeke peace (as they did diſſemble) but threaten war: for otherwiſe to what end were it to bring armed ſoldiers to diſpute thereof? For the Scots were not ſo ignorant of the ſtate of things, that they would commit them ſelues to that deciding of matters, in which they might be compelled to accept conditions anſwerable to the mind of the aduerſarie. But if amongeſt weapons it pleaſed them to make peace, they would alſo prouide, that they would not rather ſéeme to be drawne thereunto by compulſion, than quietlie led by reaſon. For if they did truelie & from their heart require that in déed which they ſéeme in words, they would diſcharge thoſe ſtrange ſouldiers, and méet (as they haue often done in other places) vnarmed, as to a thing that by words and reaſon is to be decided, and not by ſwords the ſtrength to be compaſſed. And thus much for the ambaſſadors. Fr. Thin. Buchanan. lib. 16.

Now you haue heard before of the battell of Leith, the beſieging and the regaining of Edenburgh; touching which, becauſe it is omitted before in the reciting of the things done in thoſe places, I thinke it not amiſſe (though it come a little out of courſe) to ſet it downe (as Buchanan hath placed the ſame) next after the ſpéeches vſed to thoſe ambaſſadors. Thus therefore he writeth touching the defenſe of Leith. Buchan. lib. 16.

" Theſe noble men (meaning thoſe at Edenburgh) did " write to the quéene much after this maner; That " they did greatlie maruell, that the regent prouoked
" with no iniuries, did ſo ſone depart from the former " couenants; and expelling the ancient inhabitants of " Leith, and placing there a colonie of ſtrangers, ſhe
" would in that place build a caſtle to the deſtruction
" of the lawes and libertes of the realme, and to the " danger of the liues of them all. Wherefore they did " earneſtlie intreat hir, that ſhe would deſiſt from
" this thing raſhlie attempted (againſt the faith of hir
" promiſe, the publike commoditie, and the laws and li" berties of the kingdome) leaſt ſhe inforce them by
" neceſſitie to praie in aid of the whole people.

" Beſides which alſo, they which were aſſembled at " Edenburgh, did write to the ſame effect, about a " moneth after that they had diſpatched the other let" ters, adding theſe petitions to the ſame laſt letters;
" That ouerthrowing the new fortreſſes, ſhe would " command all the ſtrangers and hired people to de" part out of the towne, to the end that it might be " free for all men (according to iuſtice) there to traffike
" and vſe their mutuall trade of buieng & ſelling one " with an other. The which if ſhe refuſed to do, they " would take it for a ſure token, that ſhe ment to bring " this kingdome into ſeruitude; againſt which euill
" they would prouide all whatſoeuer remedie that they " could. Within three daies after, the quéene ſent Ro" bert Forman chiefe herald to anſwer the matter,
" with inſtructions and commandements deliuered
" to him in theſe words.

" Firſt of all, you ſhall ſhew vnto them, that no" thing could happen vnto vs more contrarie to our " opinion, than that there ſhould be anie other hauing
" authoritie here, beſides my daughter and hir huſ-
" band my ſonne in law, vpon whome all our authori-
" tie doth depend; that the former acts of the nobili-
" tie,

" tie, and this preſent requeſt, or rather commande-
" ment doth well declare, that they acknowledge no
" other ſuperioritie; and that their demands (or rather " threatnings) with what ſhew of words ſoeuer they be " cloked, are ſufficientlie enough knowen vnto vs, as " no new things. Againe, you ſhall require of the duke " of Chaſtelerault, that he call to mind what he hath " promiſed to vs by his words, and to the king by his " letters. Which was, that he would not onelie hear-
" ken to the kings commandement; but alſo worke,
" that his ſonne the earle of Arrane ſhould not at all
" ioine with thoſe tumults of the countrie, and whether " the things which he now doth, are the performance " of his promiſes.

" To their letters alſo you ſhall anſwer; that we
" haue openlie ſhewed our indeuor to bring things to " quiet; that we will grant to anie thing, which maie
" not reſiſt the pietie due to God, and doth not fight " with their duetie towards their king and quéene, and " that I did neuer ſo much as once thinke of the ouer-
" throw of their lawes and libertie; and much leſſe, ſo-
" much as dreame of conquering the kingdome by " violence. For to whome, or for whome ſhould I ſéeke
" the kingdome, when my daughter doth alreadie
" poſſeſſe it? Touching the defenſe and fortifieng of " Leith, you ſhall aſke them this; whether that we at " anie time haue attempted anie thing that waie, be" fore that they with manie aſſemblies, and at length
" with conſpiracie among themſelues, did openlie
" ſhew that they would ſhake off the lawfull gouerne-
" ment, and before that they at their pleaſure troubled
" the whole publike ſtate (vnknowledge to vs, who " held the place and authoritie of the chiefeſt gouernor)
" ſtrengthened their factions with ſtrong cities, and " made league and couenants with our ancient ene" mies?

" And to omit other things, what cauſe can they (in
" the end) bring forth, whie it was lawfull for them to
" reteine an armie at Edenburgh, to inuade the go-
" uernors of thoſe affaires? And that it is not lawfull
" for vs at Leith for our owne defenſe and ſafetie, to
" haue anie other gard about vs? Truelie they ſéeke
" this therin, that we ſhould labor to ſhun their furie
" (as hitherto we haue done) by continuall and dailie " change of places. Is there anie thing in their let" ters that mentioned their dutie to the right magi-
" ſtrate? Doth there lie open anie waie for the reſto-
" ring of concord? Or do they ſhew anie token that " they would haue theſe ſeditions pacified, and that " they would all things ſhould be reduced to their for" mer ſtate?

" Let them cloke this with what colour they will of " publike commoditie; yet it is manifeſt that they " thinke and ſeeke nothing leſſe. For if they had one-
" lie ſtaied vpon a concord, we haue often ſhewed
" them a waie therevnto. Neither are they ignorant " that theſe French had (by the commandement of " their king) béene long before diſpatched out of Scot" land, vnleſſe their doings had béene the cauſe of " their ſtate. Wherefore, if they will yet now offer
" anie honeſt conditions which may induce vs to hope;
" and that (the maieſtie of the gouernement alwaies
" ſaued ſound) maie declare that they will modeſtlie
" and obedientlie obeie their ſuperiors: we will re-
" fuſe no means to reſtore a concord & quiet amongeſt
" them and vs, nor omit anie thing that maie tend to
" the publike commoditie.

" Neither are we alone ſo affected towards them,
" but alſo their king and quéene; who hath ſent vnto
" them a worthie knight of the order of the ſcallop
" ſhell, and one of the chiefe of the eccleſiaſticall order,
" with letters and commandements touching the " ſame: whome they did ſo contemne, as that they " would not vouchſafe them anſwer, no not ſo much as hearing. Wherefore, you ſhall demand, and command the duke, the nobilitie, and all others of what condition ſoeuer, that they depart in ſunder;
or otherwiſe, that they ſhall not be kept togither, vnleſſe it be by ſtrength of armes. To all this the next day, which was the thrée and twentith of October, the nobilitie anſwered after this order.

We eaſilie vnderſtand by your letters and com-mandements ſent by the herald, how obſtinatlie you be euillie minded againſt pietie towards God, the publike commoditie of the realme, and the common libertie of vs all: all which things we muſt & do defend, as of right we ought. Wherefore, from henceforth we do ſuſpend and forbid your gouerne-ment, in the name of the king and quéene, or by what other name or title you do vſurpe the publike adminiſtration of the kingdome; as perſons certeinlie knowing, that thoſe things which are now done by you, do with the mind of thoſe princes fight againſt the publike ſafetie of this realme.

And as you do not eſtéeme vs lawfull ſubiects of thoſe princes & of this kingdome, to make a publike ſenate or councell: ſo we do not acknowledge you for a regent to execute ſupreme authoritie; ſpeciallie ſith the gouernement (if you haue anie ſuch committed vnto you by the princes) is for moſt iuſt & weigh-tie cauſes forbidden you: and that in the name of the ſame princes, whoſe councellors we are borne to be, chiefelie in matters which perteine to the ſafetie of all the people. And although we haue determined not to flée anie danger, in deliuering of that towne, in which you haue placed ſtrange and hired ſouldiers againſt vs: yet for the reuerence which we beare vnto you, as vnto our quéene mother; we earneſtlie with all faithfull intreatie beſéech you, that you depart from thence; whileſt the cauſe of publike commoditie doth inforce vs to recouer that towne by weapons

Beſides which, we further requeſt, that you will leade them out of the towne with you, within foure and twentie houres; if there be anie which do challenge vnto themſelues the names of ambaſſadors, either to decide controuerſies, or to gouerne the affaires. For it is but equitie that we prouide for the ſafetie, and willinglie ſpare the bloud of all thoſe hired ſouldiers, aſwell for the ancient amitie which hath béene betwéene the French and the Scots, as for the mariage of our quéene with their king:
which friendſhip we would rather ſhould be increaſed than diminiſhed. The ſame day alſo, the ſaid herald declared at his returne to the regent, that the day before it was perſuaded in an aſſembled coun-cell of the nobles and the other commons; that all the déeds and ſaiengs of the regent did onelie tend to verie tyrannie.

Herevpon, there was a decrée made to take the gouernement from hir: ſo that the whole com-panie ſubſcribed, as to a moſt iuſt matter: and that there they did forbid anie ambaſſage, giuen or ſent to hir by hir ſonne in law and hir daughter:
further, commanding hir to execute no gouerne-ment, vntill the generall aſſemblie of a parlement to be appointed by them in ſuch place as they ſhould thinke conuenient. The fiue and twentith date, the lords of the religion ſent an herald to Leith, to will all the Scots to depart the towne within foure and twentie houres, and to ſeparat themſelues from the ſubuerters of publike libertie. Thus much Buchanan of this done about the ſtate of Leith, before the nobilitie beſieged the ſame (as is before ſet downe.)
And ſo againe to the order of the hiſtorie.]

The lords of Scotland, perceiuing the Frenchmen increſed, ſo that they by their owne forces onlie were not able to reſiſt them, ſent William Petellan to Elizabeth the quéene of England for aſſiſtance, to expell the Frenchmen. Which the queene of England granted, not onelie for to ſerue the Scotiſhmens turne; but ſpeciallie for the ſuertie of hir owne realme and ſtate, which as then was thought to ſtand in danger of trouble, in caſe the Frenchmen were ſuffered to remaine in Scotland: conſidering the euill dealing of the French king and his councell in ſome points alreadie ſhewed. The queene of England therefore ſent the duke of Norffolke to Berwike, whither came to him the earle of Argile, the prior of ſaint Andrews, Harris the maiſter of Yarwell, Robert Carnegie, and the yong lord of Lethington, ſecretarie, & made agréement to haue aid of England, to the effect aforeſaid.

They had their requeſt granted them. 1560. Buch. 1559. Leſle.

And for ſure kéeping hereof, the Scotiſh lords deliuered pledges into England, there to remaine during the life of the king of France, and one yéere after his deceaſſe. The pledges were theſe: Dauid Hamilton, ſonne to the duke of Chatelerault; an other called Colme Campbell, couſine to the earle of Argile; Robert Dowglas, brother to the prior of S. Andrews; and the lard of Lochleuin, and a ſonne of the lord Ruthwen. About the ſame time, James Hamilton earle of Arrane, eldeſt ſonne to the duke of Chatelerault, and capteine of the Scotiſh companie of men of armes and archers in France, being fled for religion ſecretlie to Geneua, from thence came by the conuoie of maiſter Randall Engliſhman into England: which at his comming into Scotland he performed, and ioined himſelfe with the earle of Argile, and other lords in the cauſe aforeſaid.

The duke of Chatelerault, the earles of Argile, Arrane, and others, came to the towne of Glaſcow, and cauſed the images & altars to be taken downe, ſeizing the biſhops liuing into their hands, and tooke the caſtell of Glaſcow perteining to the biſhop, and put certeine gentlemen into it to kéepe it. Whereof the Frenchmen being aduertiſed, marched forward to Glaſcow, to the number of fiue thouſand men: the biſhop of Glaſcow, the lords Sempill, Seiton, Ros, and diuerſe others with them, tooke the caſtell againe, and ſtaieng one night of the towne, returned on the next morrow to Kirkintulloch, and from thence to Lithquo and Edenburgh.

The towne of Glaſcow is taken.

After their returne from Glaſcow, a certeine number of Frenchmen went to Striueling, and paſſing by the bridge ouer the water of Firth, came into Fife, in purpoſe to haue gone vnto ſaint Andrews, and to haue fortified the towne. But they being in Kingcorne, there aſſembled togither in Fife the earles of Arrane, and Rothes, the prior of ſaint Andrews, the lord Ruthwen, the maſter of Lindſie, and diuerſe other, hauing with them no great number: but yet they dailie ſkirmiſhed with the Frenchmen, and would not ſuffer them to come from the ſea ſide; where diuerſe Frenchmen were ſlaine, and one of their capteins, with thirtie of his ſouldiors, and few Scotiſhmen, or in maner none: except that the earle of Southerland, who chanced to be with them at the pricking, was ſore hurt and maimed in the arme with the dredge of a caléeuer ſhot.

1560. Leſle. As the Frenchmen were in their progreſſe, at the mouth of the water of Leuin in Fife, there arriued in their ſight a nauie of ſhips: which at the firſt kenning they tooke to be French ſhips, but ſhortlie after perceiuing them to be the Engliſh nauie, they returned with great diligence to Burnt Iland, where they paſſed the ferrie of Kingcorne in botes and craiers to Leith, and inſtantlie began to fortifie that towne, caſting great trenches about it, and making great blockehouſes for their defenſe, as preuenting ſuch perils as otherwiſe might haue befallen them, and

* In the meane time, whileſt thoſe of the religion had almoſt deſtroied all monaſteries, certeine barons of Perne, partlie for hatred to the catholike religion (as the Romiſh cleargie tearmeth it) and partlie blinded with deſire of preie (as in all aſſemblies of battell there will be ſome) ouerthrew the monaſterie of the Carmelite friers in Aberden. Who going about alſo to haue ſpoiled the monaſteries of the Trinitie, and of the friers Minors, were hindered thereof by the lord Leſle, and the baron of Buchquhane, at the commandement of the earle of Huntleie. Notwithſtanding which, they could not be ſo ſufficientlie repreſſed, but that they went to old Aberden (for ſo they call that place in that towne, which is beautified with the biſhops palace, the canonrie, and the vniuerſitie) and would haue aſſaulted the magnificent and ſtatelie church thereof. But to kéepe them from the ſame, the biſhop, & John Leſle (the officiall of that place, the one by counſell, the other by preaching, and both by the aid of the earle of Huntleie) did their indeuor, at what time the Leſlées put them beſides their purpoſe.]

Leſleus lib. 10. pag. 563. 1560. Fr. Thin.

This Leſle is now called biſhop of Ros and compiled an hiſtorie of Scotland in Latine, printed at Rome.

The quéene regent hearing of the arriuall of the Engliſh, ſent vnto the viceadmerall of that fléet, named maiſter Winter, requiring to know of him, for what cauſe he was come into thoſe waters. This gentleman addreſſing himſelfe to accompliſh the commandement impoſed and laid vpon him, came face to face to the ſaid viceadmerall, and with countenance, wherein appeared tokens of inward courage, put forth his demand as he was inioined. The viceadmerall anſwered, that he had beene abroad on the ſeas ſéeking after pirats, and in caſe ante of them came thither, he was arriued there in the Forth to wait on them: where as the principall cauſe indéed was to impeach, that no Frenchman ſhould land there, in caſe anie came forth of France, and alſo to kéepe them that laie in Inſkith from vittels, and that no Frenchman ſhould paſſe by ſea forth of Leith.

* Whereupon the quéene regent did ſend Monalle the king of Frances orator in that realme, to requeſt the queene of England, that ſhe would call hir ſhips home againe, and that ſhe would not ſend aiding ſouldiers to the lords of the religion (whome Leſleus neuer tearmeth by anie other name than ſectaries and ſeditious perſons) whereby the peace might be broken with the French, and ſo occaſion of warre giuen. Whereunto hir maieſtie anſwered (with no leſſe care of hir kingdome than became the maieſtie of ſo good a mother to haue of hir children) that ſhe had no ſuch mind as to make warre. But becauſe that ſhe certeinlie vnderſtood, that great troops of Frenchmen did dailie land and increaſe in Scotland, for what cauſe ſhe knew not: ſhe could do no leſſe than place ſouldiers in diuerſe forts and hauens, which might defend the Engliſh from the malice or hurt of ſuch ſtrangers, if they ſhould attempt anie thing. Neither would ſhe ſuffer that hir people ſhould ſet foot in Scotland, vnleſſe that they were prouoked thereunto by iniuries offered them.]

Leſleus lib. 10. pag. 564. Fr. Thin.

About the ſame time, the quéene regent, hearing that the duke of Norffolke was come to Newcaſtle as generall lieutenant of the north, ſent an herald with a letter to him, in which letter it was ſignified that the herald had credit to declare further matter than was contained in the ſame letter. But when hée was demanded what he had to ſay, he denied to haue anie credit at all. Wherfore William Flower, then Cheſter herald, and now Norreis king of armes, was was ſent vnto the quæne, who comming to Holie rod houſe néere to Edenburgh, was receiued by ſundrie heralds, & ſo was had to one of their houſes, and there kept for that night. The nert day after hæ had dined, he was brought to the court, and at his entering within the gates, there were a number of harquebuſiers readie with their pæces that diſcharged and ſhot off the ſame.

At his comming to the preſence of the quéene, he with dutifull obeiſance deliuered his letters, and after the ſame had béene read, he was demanded what credit he had to vtter. Wherevpon he declared, that the duke of Norffolke, being the quéenes maieſties lieutenant in the north parts of England, maruelled greatlie that ſhe would ſend an herald with letters, and write therein how ſhe had giuen credit to him; and yet when he was demanded to vtter his credit, he ſhould confeſſe that he had none. The quéene herewith called for the herald, to vnderſtand whether he had credit or not: who denied to haue anie at all. Wherwith the quæne ſéemed to be ſomwhat abaſhed, but neuerthelesſe ſhe brake forth and ſaid, that ſhe maruelled greatlie that the quæne of England ſhould ſend hir ſhips into hir riuer, without giuing hir knowledge afore hand.

Cheſter anſwered thereto, that where it was certeinlie knowne, that the French king had prepared to ſend a power of men of warre into Scotland, without aduertiſing hir thereof; ſhe could not but thinke that dealing verie ſtrange, and therefore had in verie déed ſent certeine of hir ſhips, with vittels for prouiſion to be laid within hir townes and caſtels on the frontiers. Which ſhips by tempeſt being diſperſed, might happilie be driuen into the riuer there, albeit he had not ſpoke with anie of them ſince there comming forth. But yet (as he had heard by others) they had béene verie vncourteouſlie vſed: for comming in after that maner for ſuccor, the canon had béene bent againſt them. Herewithall the count Martigues ſtanding by, began to ſpeake verie ſtout words vnto Cheſter, alleging that where it was perceiued well inough, that the quæne of England ment to make war againſt his maiſter the French king, he truſted ſhe ſhould gaine as little thereby, as his ſiſter had done in breaking with hir father Henrie the late French king. Cheſter hereunto anſwered, that he thought to haue found but one regent in Scotland, to whome he ſhould need to make anſwer: wherevpon Martigues was commanded to ſilence.

Martigues a forward capteine, but an vntrue prophet.

All this while the quéene had talked with Cheſter in the Scotiſh tong. And bicauſe he did not ſo well vnderſtand hir, he began to ſpeake in the French language: whereat the quéene ſéemed greatlie to reioiſe, & ſo began againe to diſcourſe with him of hir griefs; and he on the other part made hir anſwer as fell beſt to purpoſe. And at length, when he was demanded what further credit he had; he declared, that where ſhe had requeſted a ſafe conduct for monſieur le Broſſe to paſſe through England into France, if ſhe would ſée him ſafelie conueied to Berwike, he durſt aſſure hir of a ſufficient ſafe conduct for his ſafe paſſage through the quéene his miſtreſſe realme: but at length, there was another gentleman commended to him, in lieu for la Broſſe, that was his couſine. And now when Cheſter ſhuld take his leaue, he declared that he had not bæne courteouſlie dealt with: for ſince his comming thither, he could not be ſuffered to paſſe anie where abroad out of his chamber, but at meale times. And therefore if anie of hir meſſengers ſhould come into the quéene his miſtreſſe dominions, he would procure (if he might) that they ſhould taſt of the like interteinment. But the quæne ſæmed not to vnderſtand that he had bin in anie wiſe ſo hardlie dealt with, ſhewing that ſhée was not well contented therewith; and ſo Cheſter toke his leaue, and returned backe into England, without anie reward for his paines taken in that iournie, at the hands of the Scotiſh quéene: how ſo euer ſhe liked of his meſſage.

An Engliſh armie. Leſleus lib. 10. pag. 565.

In the meane time, there was an armie prepared in England, of ſeuen or eight thouſand men, who were ſent into Scotland; the lord Greie of England being appointed generall, who came to the linkes, beſide the towne of Leith, on ſaturday the firſt of Aprill. Before they pitcht downe their field on the ſaid linkes, monſieur Martigues, coronell of the French armie, iſſued forth of Leith with nine hundred harquebuſiers of Frenchmen, to a little knoll called the Halke hill, where a ſore, continuall, and hot ſkirmiſh was begun betwixt the Engliſhmen and Frenchmen, with hagbuts, caléeuers, and piſtolets, which ſkirmiſh continued fiue or ſix houres, in the which there were manie ſlaine on both parties, and diuerſe hurt. At length Martigues was forced with his companie to retire backe to the towne of Leith, and the Engliſhmen pitched downe their campe, and planted their ordinance beſide the ſaid hill.

They were backed with 500 pikes which kept alowe.

The lord Greie ſent vnto the quéene.

The lord Greie being in Muſkelburgh, ſent to the quéene regent, that laie as then in the caſtell at Edenburgh, deſiring an abſtinence of warre for foure and twentie hours, that in the meane time he might ſend ſome of his councell to declare to hir the cauſe of his comming with that armie, and to commune of ſuch things as might ſtanch the ſhedding of bloud. The quæne granted hereunto, and ſent an herald to Leith, to cauſe the ſaid aſſurance to be taken: but yer he came to the towne, the ſkirmiſh aforeſaid was begun with forwardneſſe inough of both ſides.

Men are ſent to ſpeake with the quæne mother.

In this meane time, the lord Greie ſent ſir George Howard, and ſir James Croſts to the caſtell of Edenburgh, to ſpeake with the quéene to that effect: who had long conference with hir vpon the blockehouſe at the vtter gate of the caſtell, during the time of the ſkirmiſh; where they declared, that the occaſion of the comming of the armie, was for the cauſe aboue mentioned, deſiring the quæne to procure the Frenchmen to depart the realme of Scotland: and they promiſed in that caſe to returne againe into their owne realme, and neither to diſquiet Frenchmen nor Scots. Wherupon the quéene toke time to be aduiſed till the nert day, that ſhe might conſult with the principall perſonages within the towne of Leith, requiring that it might be lawfull for hir to ſend to them to that effect, which was granted.

The French men to depart the realme.

The nert day ſhe ſent one Drummond a trumpetter, or herald (as ſaith Leſleus) with a letter to monſieur de la Broſſe, to the effect aforeſaid, directing him to paſſe to the Engliſh campe, and to get a guide with him to go to the towne of Leith, as was agreed: and there was one appointed to go with him. But immediatly after his departing from the Engliſh campe, he was ſuddenlie called backe againe, and his letters taken from him, was commanded to repaire to the caſtell of Edenburgh to the quæne, and to declare to hir that they would not haue anie talke, but would be reuenged on the Frenchmen, for the ſlaughter of their men the night before. Thus the parlée ceaſſing, the ſiege was inforced with right ſharpe purſute, and ſtrong defending on either part.

The Engliſh are deſirous to reuenge the iniuries done vnto them.

The Engliſhmen caſt trenches vpon the ſouth-eaſt ſide of the towne, and raiſed a litle mount which they called mount Pellam after the capteins name, and placed their ordinance aloft thereon: but bicauſe it was ſo farre from the towne, they did not ſo much ſcath thereto as they intended. The lord Greie, lieutenant of the Engliſh armie, lodged (during this ſiege) ſiege) within the towne of Leſtalrike, in the deanes houſe, and the moſt part of their demilances and other horſſemen laie in the ſame towne. The footmen with their capteins lodged in hales, tents, and paulions, vpon the ſouth and ſoutheaſt ſide of the towne of Leith, and diuerſe Scotiſh lords incamped with them in the fields, as the earles of Argile, Arrane, Morton, and Glencarne; the lords Boid, Ogiltree, the prior of ſaint Andrews, the maiſter of Marwell, and others. The duke of Chatelerault, and diuerſe with him remained in Holie rod houſe: and with the queene in the caſtell, the biſhop of S. Andrews, the biſhop of Dunkeld, the earle Marſhall, the lord Erſkin capteine of the caſtell, maiſter James Macgill clearke of the regiſter, the prouoſt of Dunglas, called maiſter Abraham Creichton, and diuerſe others.

On Eaſter éeuen, capteine Wood, and capteine Dethicke, ſeruing on the ſea vnder maiſter Winter the Engliſh admerall there, were appointed by him to paſſe vp the riuer to Blackeneſſe, who with their bands going aboord into a barke prepared for that purpoſe, ſailed forward: and on Eaſter day in the morning, preſenting themſelues before the caſtell, it was yéelded to them by certeine Frenchmen that were within, and therevpon it was deliuered to the keeping of James Hamilton, an ancient gentleman; and capteine Wood, being ſet on ſhore, came to the campe before Leith by land. On blacke Monday, the Frenchmen, iſſuing forth of Leith, ſet vpon the Engliſhmen in their trenches, and did much harme: as in the Engliſh hiſtorie it further appeareth. During the ſiege thus afore Leith, the quéene regent was ſore vexed with ſickeneſſe, but neuertheleſſe, ſhe continued to labor for agréement, not ceaſſing to ſend to the lords for to haue the matter taken vp. And for the better accompliſhing of hir deſire, ſhe procured the earle of Huntleie to come forth of the north, who toke vp his lodging in Edenburgh, and toke great paines to treat betwixt the quéene and lords for ſome agréement: but when he perceiued his trauell to be in vaine, hée returned into the north againe, and left the ſiege lieng ſtill as hée found it.

In this meane while, the Engliſhmen, lodging on the ſouthſide of the towne beſide mount Pellam, battered with their great artillerie at the pariſh church of Leith, and at ſaint Anthonies ſteeple, in which the Frenchmen had laid certeine péeces of artillerie, and at length beat it downe: but perceiuing they could not do anie great hurt to the walles on that ſide, they caſt new trenches vpon the ſouth and ſouthweſt ſide of the towne, and raiſed a mount there, naming it mount Summerſet, & placed thereon certeine péeces in batterie, and ſo beat the wals, that a great part thereof was ouerthrowne, and a breach made. Wherevpon the Engliſhmen & Scots on a morning came with their ladders, and preſenting themſelues to the aſſault, found the breach nothing reaſonable; ſo that although they egerlie preaſſed forward to enter the towne, yet they were fiercelie beaten backe with great ſlaughter and bloudſhed on both parts, but namelie of the aſſailants.

The Engliſhmen, perceiuing that they were too raſh in aſſaulting the towne, being not aſſaultable, deuiſed other ſhifts to obteine their purpoſe, raiſing an other mount of earth on the weſt ſide of the water of Leith, and named it mount Falcon. Aloft on this mount, when it was brought vp vnto a great heigth, they planted their great artillerie, which continuallie beat into the towne, ſore annoieng them within, but ſpeciallie beating the houſes and places by the ſhore ſide, ſo that none might go vp nor downe the towne on that part, without danger to be ſlaine with ſhot from that mount. The Frenchmen, during the time of the ſiege, manie times iſſued forth towards the ſands, and ſometimes towards the trenches, ſo that ſundrie ſore ſkirmiſhes chanced betwixt the Engliſhmen and them, with the ſlaughter of diuerſe, both of the one part and the other. Amongeſt other of them within, there were ſlaine two Scotiſh men of name, to wit, capteine Kenedie, and yoong Henrie Drummond: and of them without, there was ſlaine a Scotiſh gentleman, called the lard of Cleiſch.

The Engliſh armie was throughlie furniſhed with vittels forth of all parts of the realme, and that vpon reaſonable prices: but the French within the towne could get none, more than they had prouided before the comming of the Engliſh armie, which when it began to faile them, they were conſtreined to eat their owne horſſes, whoſe flеſh ſeemed to them in that neceſſitie more delicious, than before that time anie maner of deniſon. Thoſe within Inſkeith alſo were in great neceſſitie of vittels: but yet neither they within the one place, nor they within the other, would render their ſtrength, looking ſtill for aid forth of France. ¶ Whileſt theſe things were done in Scotland, the French king, to ſhew how he fauoured the pope, and how farre he maligned the reformed lords of Scotland, ſent his ambaſſadors John Babone a Burdeleie knight, and that eloquent man Anthonie Muret of France to pope Pius the fourth of that name, to yéeld all the dominions of France & Scotland at the popes commandement.

In the meane time, the quéene regent, perceiuing hir ſickneſſe ſo to increaſe, that ſhe looked for preſent death, ſent for the duke of Chatelerault, and all the lords of Scotland that were in the towne of Edenburgh, and in the campe: who came vnto hir altogither into the caſtell of Edenburgh, where ſhe made vnto them a graue and pithie exhortation, perſuading them to vnitie and concord with their ancient friends of France; and now more ſtedfaſt to them than at anie time before, by reaſon of the mariage of the quéene their good ſouereigne, with the king of France. And hereuith ſhe brake out into certeine words, to diſſuade them from the amitie contracted with the Engliſhmen, declaring that the Engliſhmen aided them not for anie other reſpect, than for their owne turne and commoditie. Moreouer, for hir owne part ſhe ſaid, that ſhe fauoured the weale of the realme of Scotland, as much as France; conſidering ſhe had the honor to be queene and regent thereof, and hir daughter heritable quéene of the ſame.

Furthermore ſhe ſaid, that if ſhe had attempted anie thing that ſeemed or appéered to the noble men contrarie thereunto; the ſame came to paſſe rather for lacke of wiſedome and iudgement, than for want of anie good will: and if it pleaſed God to prolong hir daies, ſhe would be glad to amend that had bene done amiſſe: and if he called hir to his mercie, ſhe praied them moſt hartilie to acknowledge their dutie vnto the quéene their ſouereigne, and to maintеine their ancient amitie with the king and realme of France, & to make ſome good accord with the French that were within the towne of Leith, who would gladlie accept the ſame, to the end that as well they as the Engliſhmen ſhould depart this realme. For ſhe feared greatlie (as ſhe ſaid) leaſt if the Frenchmen departed, the Engliſhmen would ſtill remaine, and ſubdue the land to their obedience: and therefore ſhe beſought all good Scotiſhmen to haue reſpect to the libertie and weale of their countrie.

After ſhe had talked thus a good while with manie teares, ſhe deſired the lords to forgiue hir in anie thing wherein ſhe had offended anie of them, during the time of hir being in Scotland, which they gladlie ſeemed to do: and on the other part, ſhe forgaue them with all hir hart (as it appéered) all offenſes which they had committed againſt hir: and thus diuerſe of them wéeping, ſhe toke euerie of them by the hand, and ſo they taking leaue of hir, departed, and returned into Edenburgh, and to their campe. Whileſt the ſiege thus laie before the towne of Leith, diuerſe great troubles roſe in ſundrie parts of the realme, and ſpeciallie betwixt the earle of Huntleie, and the earle of Atholl, ſo that there was taking of priſoners, and ouerthrowing of houſes on either part, and great preparation made, and armies put in a readineſſe to inuade either others countries.

At the ſame time, one maiſter Donald Fraſher, archdeacon of Roſſe, toke the biſhops caſtell of the canonrie of Roſſe, and kept the ſame againſt maiſter Henrie Sincler, then biſhop there, and the chiefeſt men of authoritie in that dioceſſe, as Mackenzée, Balnagoun, Foulis, and the ſhiriffe Tramercie, who aſſembled about the ſame, and beſieged the caſtell, where great force was vſed, both by them without to win it, and of them within to defend it. The biſhop being then reſident in Cromercie caſtell, hearing that the houſe wold not be gotten without great ſlaughter, thought it againſt his conſcience, his profit, and honor, to win it in that manner: and therefore ſending for maiſter John Leſle, officiall of Aberden, and maiſter Alexander Dunbar, ſubchantor of Murreie, by their labour and diligent treating in the matter, the biſhop by reaſonable appointment recouered his caſtell of them that held it againſt him.

The French king, vnderſtanding in what diſtreſſe his men remained that were beſieged within Leith, and perceiuing himſelfe not able to ſend an armie to ſuccour them within the time that their neceſſitie required, thought good to trie if the matter might be taken vp: and to that effect ſent two ambaſſadors, the earle of Randon, and monſieur Monluc biſhop of Valence, who declared to the quéenes maieſtie of England, the cauſe of their comming; which was, to deſire hir to retire hir armie forth of Scotland, vpon ſome ſuch reaſonable conditions as might be agréed vpon. And heerewith they declared that they were ſent to the quéene, and not vnto the ſubiects of Scotland: for it was not méet that the king ſhould ſend to his owne ſubiects (as they were by the mariage of their quéene) to require peace, or to condition with them for agreement.

Whileſt they were yet vpon their iournie, the quéene regent (whome they thought to haue found aliue, and to haue vſed hir helpe as an inſtrument to haue furthered the treatie to ſome good end) conſumed partlie through melancholie, thought, and grieuous diſpleaſure, and partlie with long and incurable ſickneſſe, departed this life in the caſtell of Edenburgh the tenth of June, in the yéere of our Lord 1560. * Hir bodie was firſt conueied into France, to the monaſterie of Feſchampe, which is in Normandie, from whence it was caried to the abbeie of S. Peter at Rhemes in Champaignie (whereof hir ſiſter was then abbeſſe) in which it was after moſt honorablie buried.] She was a wiſe and verie prudent princeſſe, and in hir time had learned good experience of the nature and inclination of the nobilitie and people of Scotland.

During the time that ſhe was regent, ſhe kept good iuſtice, and was well obeied in all parts of the realme in Orkeneie, and the weſterne Iles. And if ſhe had to hir owne experience ioined the councell of the nobles and wiſe men of the realme of Scotland, without following the aduiſe of ſtrangers, there had béene neuer queſtion nor debate betwixt hir and the nobilitie, as ſome deemed. But becauſe that others, and namelie, monſieur Doiſell, and Rubée, were adioined to hir by the eſtates of Scotland, who dailie preſſed hir to deuiſe new alterations of lawes, impoſitions, tarations, and ſuch things as were not in vſe in Scotland: therefore the eſtates and people of the land did grudge, although not for anie miſliking they had of hir, who ſuerlie deceaſſed, to the great griefe and lamentation of the whole number of the eſtates and people of the realme.

The death of that noble princeſſe made the French men within Leith, and alſo the ambaſſadors more diſcouraged than otherwiſe they would haue béene. But neuertheleſſe theſe foure ambaſſadors of England and France comming to Edenburgh, entered in conference among themſelues, vpon articles propoſed as well for reliefe of the Scotiſhmen, as for the weale and ſuertie of the quéene of England and hir ſubiects. Wherevpon certeine lords of Scotland were admitted to talke with them alſo: and after long treatie, a peace was concluded the tenth of Julie, in the yéere of God 1560, with certeine articles touching as well Scots and French, as Engliſhmen. Leſleus. lib. 10. pag. 574.

A parlement was holden in Auguſt, and the act of oblivion ratified by the ſtates, & a confeſſion of faith publiſhed in the ſame: it was concluded alſo to ſend ambaſſadors into England, which was done. And ſhortlie after, the lords ſummoned the principall learned men of the realme forth of the vniuerſities of ſaint Andrews, Aberden, Glaſcow, and other parts, to giue a reaſon of their faith.

And amongeſt other of Aberden that toke vpon them to diſpute with John Knor, John Wullocke, and maiſter Gwdman [were John Leſle (doctor of both lawes, chiefe iudge of the dioceſſe of Aberden called officiall; who ſhortlie after was ſenator of the high court, and of councell to the quéene of Scots, and laſtlie made biſhop of Roſſe) Patrike Mirton the treaſuror, James Straquhine canon, and Alexander Anderſon a verie graue diuine. At that time theſe Roman prelats behaued themſelues ſo well, that they were commanded not to depart the towne; but to be preſent at the ſermons of the miniſters.]

Livings beſtowed.

In the winter, the lords of the councell gaue faculties of benefices to diuerſe of their friends, who put forth the prelats, and receiued the fruits. The earle of Argile diſpoſed Dunkeild and Dunblan. The earle of Arran had the ordering of the biſhoprikes of ſaint Andrews, alſo of the abbaſies of Dunfermling, and Melroſſe, and other ſmall benefices. The like was vſed by other noble men, through all parts of the realme. Shortlie after, Francis the French king, huſband to the quéene of Scotland, departed this life in December, and Charles his brother was crowned in his place. The quéene being then widow, and Dowager of France, departed from Or-leance (where the court lay when hir huſband deceaſſed) and went to the towne of Reimes in Champaigne, where ſhe remained till the fiftéenth daie of Aprill following.

The Scotiſh quéene went into Lorraine.

And then purpoſing to returne into Scotland, ſhe toke hir iournie towards Januille, and ſo into Lorraine, there to take leaue of hir kinſfolke by hir mothers ſide. The biſhop of Glaſcow, and the ab-bat of Dunfermling Scotiſhmen, were ſtill attendant on hir in this iournie. There were with hir alſo the cardinals of Lorraine and Guiſe, the duke Daumale, and the marqueſſe Dalbeuf hir vncles.

Fr. Thin.

Buch. lib. 17.

Amongſt whom there had béene great diſputation touching the quéene of Scotlands returning into hir owne realme, whereunto hir vncles were verie willing; although ſome did ſéeme to ſtaie the iournie, whoſe ſpéeches tended to this effect as followeth.

"That the iournie was dangerous, eſpeciallie be-
"cauſe the quéene of England did not greatlie fauor
"it; then that ſhe ſhould come to men by nature bar"barous & ſeditious, which would not eaſilie obeie the gouernement of a man. Whereof ſhe had freſh examples before hir eies, of hir father, and of hir mother, whome (when they either could not or durſt not openlie oppreſſe) they forced to a deſperation of things with their manie deuiſes, ſith they dailie liued by them in danger of honor or of life.

On the contrarie part, they which would haue the Dowager of France returne to hir naturall countrie, and were skilfull of the affaires of Scotland, did allege that thoſe ſeditions were rather occaſioned by the default of the kings & gouernors, than of the ſubiects; whilſt they ſtriued to reduce that kingdome (which from the beginning had alwaies béene frée) to infinit bondage, and to the frée power of the lawes: which that nation (being more warlike than welthie) could not indure. When contrarilie, they did not onelie defend all their gouernors (which did not attempt the ouerthrow of their liberties) from the outward enimie, and from the inward tumults of the people: but they alſo made them (through loue and dutie towards their kings) inuincible ouer their enimies, and famous amongeſt ſtrange nations.

And that the chiefeſt meane at this time to pacifie all thoſe troubles in Scotland, was not to make alteration of anie thing in Scotland, from the ſtate wherein euen now it ſtandeth. Whereupon ſhe reſolued to come ſpéedilie into Scotland, whereof more ſhall be ſaid hereafter; vntill which, we will intreat of other matters done in Scotland. The quéene of Scots hauing hir mind ſtill ſetled vpon hir returne into Scotland; Noalius a ſenator of Burdeaux landed before this in Scotland (whither he was ſent) a little after the end of the publike parlement, for which cauſe he was ſtaied and turned ouer to the next aſſemblie of parlement, which was appointed the twelfe kalends of June.

But when at that time alſo the nobilitie aſſembled did not ſit in councell, becauſe they were yet vncerteine of the quéenes mind; in the meane time James Steward returned out of France, and brought with him a commiſſion, which gaue them authoritie to hold a parlement, therein to treat and conclude of matters touching the common-wealth. Whereupon in the end there was audience giuen to the ambaſſador, the effect of whoſe legacie was, to renew the old league with France, to vndoo the league with England, and that prieſts ſhould be reſtored to their liuings, out of which they had béene thruſt by violence.

To theſe things it was anſwered, that concerning the league of France, they were not anie waie guiltie of the breach thereof; and contrarilie that the French had manifoldlie neglected the ſame; but ſpeciallie of late, in ſéeking the authoritie of their publike libertie, in that they would haue brought the people (their friends and giltles of anie euill) vnto miſerable ſeruitude. For the league with England, they could not by anie meanes diſſolue that, except they ſhould be counted moſt vnthankefull, recompenſe ſo great a benefit with great wickednes, & conſpire againſt the defendors of their liberties. And as touching reſtitution for ſuch as they called prieſts, they did acknowlege that they had not anie office, vſe, or authoritie in the church.

In this councell alſo it was decréed, to ouerthrow all the monaſteries of monks, for which cauſe diuerſe were ſent out into all places of the realme to execute the ſame. By occaſion whereof, the quéene being in France, and deſirous to haue peacefull landing in Scotland; would not for this preſent meddle with religion, but diſſembled the ſame: although Dureus abbat of Ferline, and John Sinclere latelie appointed biſhop of Brechine, did vehementlie perſuade and labor hir to the contrarie.

Fr.Thin. 1560. Abbridged out of the printed booke thereof.

In this yeare also on the ninth of March, was the election of superintendents at Edenburgh, which was published to serue for the election of all other ministers in this forme following (John Knox being the minister thereof.) First was made a sermon, in which these parts were intreated; principallie the necessitie of ministers and superintendents. Secondlie the crimes & vices that might vnable them of the ministerie. Thirdlie the vertues required in them. Fourthlie & lastlie, whether such as by publike consent of the church were called to such office, might refuse the same.

The sermon finished, it was declared by the same minister John Knox (the maker of that speech or sermon) that the lords of the secret councell had giuen charge and power to the churches of Louthian, to chose maister John Spotswod superintendent, & that sufficient warning was made by publike edict to the churches of Edenburgh, Luithithgue, Striueling, Treuent, Hadington, & Dunbar, as also to earles, lords, barons, gentlemen and others, which haue or might claime to haue voice in the election to be present that daie at the same houre. And therefore inquisition was made, who were present, and who were absent.

After this was called the said maister John Spotswod, who answering to his name, the minister Knox demanded, if anie man knew anie crimes or offenses of the said Spotswod, that might disable him to be called to that office. Which thing thrise demanded, there was after question moued to the whole multitude; if there were anie other whome they would put in election with the said Spotswod. Then the people were asked whether (if they admitted the said Spotswod for their superintendent) they would honor and obeie him as Christes minister in euerie thing perteining to his charge.

Euerie nation is to haue his peculiar gouernement in religion, as is best liking to the godlie disposers of the religion of that countrie, sith vulgus monstris multorum capitum.

Whereunto the people answered that they would, which thus granted, there were further questions and matters touching the articles of the apostles creed, and concerning the state of religion propounded to the superintendent, intended to be created. Whereunto, when he had answered affirmatiuelie, the people were againe demanded for his allowance; which they easilie granted with the consent of the nobilitie. These things thus performed, and a certeine praier (to obteine the spirit of God to be powred into this new elect vessell) finished, the rest of the ministers (if there be anie) and elders of the church present, in signe of their full consent, shall take the elected by the hand.

And so the chiefe minister giuing an especiall benediction (the forme whereof is there set downe, with the exhortation which they must also vse to the elected) this election is wholie finished (without anie imposition of hands on his head) and he sufficientlie created a superintendent minister; of whose election of elders, deacons, excommunications, and other ecclesiasticall regiment, I meane not to speake anie more (as matter impertinent to my discourse, though not to the nature of an ecclesiasticall historie) sith I haue onelie here in hand the politicall and temporall gouernement, and not the discourse of religion and essentiall forme thereof.]

Ambassadors sent into England.

Before this, in the beginning of the winter this yeare, the lords sent the earle of Morton and Glencarne, and the yong lard of Ledington secretarie, ambassadors into England; to giue thanks to the queens maiestie of England, for the aid which they had receiued of hir, to expell the Frenchmen. The earle of Murreie passed through England into France. He departed from Edenburgh the eighteenth of March, and in Aprill came to Vitrie, as hereafter shall appeare; where he found the queene, meaning to submit himselfe. But the day before he came, maister John Lesle officiall of Aberden was come thither, who was sent from the earle of Huntleie, and other the lords spirituall and temporall of the north parts; he tooke ship in the rode of Aberden, and landing at Brule in Holand, passed through the lowe countries in post till he came to Paris, and from thence vnto Vitrie aforesaid [the eighteenth kalends of March] where he found the queene, whom he most dutifullie saluted. Fr.Thin.

1561.

After which (being most courteoulie receiued of hir) he opened vnto hir the effect of his ambassage, which consisted speciallie vpon these parts; to admonish the queene that she should not suffer hir selfe to be blinded or deceiued with the flattering words of James the prior of saint Andrews (hir bastard brother) for his onelie drift was, that he (hauing no French aid with him into Scotland) might obteine of the queene the whole gouernement of the kingdome, vnder the colour whereof he might more easilie teare & cleane ouerthrow the catholike religion; which he did assault by all meanes possible. This is he which before is called the earle of Murreie that went into France but not rightlie, for he was not earle vntill long after this time.

Wherefore Lesle did with all the firmest aduise and counsell which he might, vrge the queene not to yeeld to his cloked words. For the obteining of which demand from the queene, he did fitlie ad to his persuasions, that James did rather aspire to the kingdome, than that he fired his mind and eie vpon the ouerthrow of religion. Wherefore, if she had anie care of hir owne and the realms affaires; she must prouide that this James should remaine in France, vntill she were arriued in Scotland, & had pacified all the tumults there.

But if she would not doo so, that yet at least she should take order, that she with hir navie should land in the north parts of Scotland, & first go to Aberden: for by that meanes she might prouide, that the setled lords of the religion might soone be pacified, and the rest which were yet wauering, might more freelie and willinglie be brought againe to the catholike religion. For there was an other order to be vsed in Scotland, than that which the French obserued, whilest they gouerned there; at which time vndoubtedlie the Scots were hopelesse euer to haue inioied the presence of the queene.

But now, sith that the Scots doo vnderstand, that their queene (contrarie to their hope) will returne vnto them, hir presence will (like the rising sun) so cause the clouds of all tumults to vanish out of the minds of all hir subiects, that they will easilie incline to the mind of the queene, whatsoeuer she shall thinke, attempt, set downe, or decree, in restoring of religion. For the Scots are of that mind towards their princes, as they will in all things obeie their vpright gouernors; and are accustomed with no lesse mind to resist tyrants, if they vsurpe vpon them in eraction of authoritie.

Wherefore Lesleus did earnestlie perswade the queene in the name of the earle of Huntleie, and the other nobilitie, that she should not giue hir selfe (as vanquished) into the hands of the enimies, and especiallie of James Steward hir brother, from whome (as from a fountaine) all their seditions haue had beginning. For James Cullen (kinsman to the erle of Huntleie, an expert seruitor in the warres by sea and land) was sent forth with Lesle (as capteine of that iournie) to bring hir safe to Aberden. For all the nobles of the north prouinces will soone be readie with twentie thousand men to gard hir to Edenburgh, and to defend hir against all the counsels, deceipts, and forces of all men.

Which message being thus ended from the mouth of Lesle, the queene commanded him not to depart from hir, vntill she returned into Scotland; and further furſher gaue in charge, that letters ſhould be written to the péeres and nobilitie of Scotland, to let them vnderſtand of hir comming into Scotland, & to be a witneſſe of hir good will vnto them. The nert day after came to the quéene at Uitrie, in Champaigne, Iames Steward (which is touched a little befoꝛe) the pꝛioꝛ of S. Andꝛews. Who after he had in re-uerence done his dutie, bound himſelfe with all fi-delitie, trauell, and diligence, moſt religiouſlie vnto hir; faithfullie further pꝛomiſing, that he would pꝛouide that the Scots ſhould willinglie obeie hir, without anie foꝛren powers to be bꝛought by hir in-

to Scotland.

Foꝛ it was thought that he went into France foꝛ that purpoſe, to diſſuade the quéene that ſhe ſhould not bꝛing any power of the French with hir. But in the end, vttering his mind moꝛe fullie, and putting awaie all ſuſpicion of deceit, he did with moꝛe fami-liaritie requeſt the quéene to honoꝛ him with the erldome of Murreie. Wherevnto the queene did courteouſlie anſwer, that ſhe would ſatiſfie his requeſt when ſhe came into Scotland. Wheꝛefoꝛe, when this Iames pꝛeceiued that the quæne was ſomewhat well bent towards him, and that ſhe credited his woꝛds, he attended on hir vnto Jancuille, and there remaining with hir a certeine ſpace, did after go into Scotland (as is befoꝛe ſaid) to pꝛepare the minds of the people, that they might receiue the quéene comming into the realme, with good conſent and du-tifull honoꝛ; who paſſing thꝛough England, came into Scotland in the kalends of Maie.]

The duke of Chatelerault, the earles of Hunt-leie, Atholl, Marſhall, and all other the noble men of the realme, aduertiſed of the quéens comming, aſſembled at Edenburgh with all poſſible diligence.
In the meane time, whilſt the quéene was pꝛeparing to take hir iournie, and to come into Scotland, the queene of England ſet foꝛth ſome of hir great ſhips to the ſeas, to watch & gard the coaſts of hir realme.

leaſed, and ſent home into Scotland.

Monſieur Doiſell,

The quéene alſo, by the aduiſe of the K. of France, ſent monſieur Doiſell into England, to paſſe thꝛough the ſame into Scotland befoꝛe hir cõming, there to haue receiued the foꝛts of Dunbar and Inſkeith, of monſieur Charlebois, and to haue kept the ſame till hir comming. But he was ſtaied, and paſ-ſed no further than to London: foꝛ it was thought that his going into Scotland would turne to no great benefit of that realme: becauſe that he & mon-ſieur Rubeie were the pꝛincipall authoꝛs of all the troubles in Scotland, betwixt the quæne regent, and the nobilitie there. She was attended on from Paris vnto Calis with manie noble men; namelie hir ſir vncles, the dukes of Guiſe, and Daumall, the cardinall of Loꝛraine and Guiſe, the grand pꝛioꝛ, and the marqueſſe Dalbeuf, alſo the duke de Ne-meurs, and other of hir friends and kinſmen.

The quæne was conueied into Calis.

She taketh hir iournie into Scotland.

There were two gallies pꝛepared, and certeine other ſhips to go with hir into Scotland, and there went with hir thꝛee of hir ſaid vncles, the duke Dau-parts of the realme, as it were to a common ſpec-tacle.

This did they, partlie to congratulat hir returne, & partlie to ſhew the dutie which they alwaies bare vnto hir (when ſhe was abſent) either to haue thanks therefoꝛe, oꝛ to pꝛeuent the ſlanders of their enimies; whereof not a few by theſe beginnings of hir reigne did geſſe what would follow; although in thoſe ſo variable motions of the minds of the people, euerie one was verie deſirous to ſée their queene offred vnto them (vnlooked foꝛ) after ſo manie haps of both foꝛtunes as had fallen vnto hir. Foꝛ when ſhe was but ſix daies old, ſhe loſt hir father among the cruell tempeſts of battell, and was by great diligence bꝛought vp by hir mother (being a choſen and woꝛ-thie perſon) but yet left as a pꝛeie to others, by reaſon of ciuill ſeditions in Scotland, and of outward warres with other nations, being further laid abꝛoad to all the dangers of frowning foꝛtune, befoꝛe ſhe could know what euill did meane.

Foꝛ leauing hir owne countrie, ſhe was nouriſhed as a baniſhed perſon, and hardlie pꝛeſerued in life from the weapons of hir enimies, & violence of the ſeas. After which, foꝛtune began to flatter hir, in that ſhe honoꝛed hir with a woꝛthie mariage, which in truth was to this quéene rather a ſhadow of ioie, than anie comfoꝛt at all. Foꝛ ſhoꝛtlie after the ſame, all things were turned to ſoꝛrow, by the death of hir new yong huſband, and of hir old and gréeued mother; by loſſe of hir new kingdome, and by the doubt-full poſſeſſion of hir old inheritable realme. But as foꝛ theſe things ſhe was both pitied and pꝛaiſed; ſo was ſhe alſo foꝛ gifts of nature as much loued and fauoꝛed; in that, beneficiall nature (oꝛ rather god God) had indued hir with a beautifull face, a well compoſed bodie, an excellent wit, a mild nature, and good behauioꝛ; which ſhe had artificiallie furthered by courtlie education and affable demeanoꝛ.
Whereby at the firſt ſight, ſhe wan vnto hir the hearts of moſt people, and confirmed the loue of hir faithfull ſubiects.]

Coſtlie iewels

Being thus come out of France, ſhe bꝛought into Scotland manie rich and coſtlie iewels of gold woꝛke, pꝛetious ſtones, oꝛient pearls, & ſuch like, as excellent and faire as were to be found within Europe, with rich furniture of houſhold, as hangings, carpets, counterpoints, and all other neceſſaries foꝛ the furniſhing of hir pꝛincelie houſes. The chiefeſt part of the hangings and other furniture of houſehold, was ſhipped at Rone, and arriued at Leith in the moneth of October nert following. After the quéene of Scots had remained the ſpace of foure oꝛ fiue daies at Holie rod houſe, the duke of Chatelerault, the earle of Argile, and diuerſe other of the nobilitie being pꝛeſent, there was an act made by the loꝛds of the councell [in which none of the cleargie (as ſaith Leſleus lib. 10. pa. 580) were pꝛeſent] with con-ſent of the quæne, that to remoue all cauſes of trouble in time to come foꝛ the matter of religion, it was oꝛdeined, that no alteration of the eſtate of religion publikelie ſtanding within the realme, at hir arriuall in the ſame, ſhould be made; & that nothing ſhould be attempted, either publikelie oꝛ pꝛiuatlie to the contrarie, vpon great paine, which was put foꝛth and publiſhed thꝛough all parts of the realme with great diligence.

After this, there were eleuen tempoꝛall loꝛds, and by whose aduise she should rule and gouerne things, six of them to remaine continuallie with hir in roome of officers, as the secretarie, comptroller, and others. The lords of the priuie councell were these, the duke of Chatelerault, the earle of Huntlie chancellor, the earle of Argile, the earle of Atholl, the earle Marshall, the earle of Glencarne, the earle of Morton, the earle of Montrosse, the earle of Errol, maister Henrie Sinclar bishop of Rosse, and the lord Erskin, with the prior of S. Andrew. * But among these reioisings of the queenes interteinment into hir kingdome, there happened a light fault, but such as did deepelie enter into the minds of both the factions, of the catholikes (forsooth) and of the reformed religion.

Fr. Thin. Buchanan. lib. 16.

For where it was agreed by the queene and the nobilitie, that no alteration should be had of religion in the publike state, yet was masse permitted to hir and to hir familie priuilie to be sed. For the preparation wherof whilest the vestments and other things were caried through the hall into the chappell, one of the companie snatched awaie the wax candels and brake them: by occasion whereof (if some of the household had not come betweene to helpe in that action, and ended the same) all the other furniture had béene throwne downe. Which matter was taken of people diuerslie, some blaming it as a most sawcie part; others interpreting it, that it was onelie done to trie the patience of the priest; and some iudged and said that the priest was worthie to be punished with that paine which the scripture appointeth to idolaters.

Which matter in the verie beginning was appeased by James the queenes bastard brother, not yet created, but in expectation earle of Murreie. For which cause he would not offend the queene, as I suppose, though afterward he not onelie offended hir, but deposed hir, and set vp hir sonne; as more plainlie shall hereafter appeare. At the quieting of this matter (saith Buchanan) George Gordon was greatlie grieued, being a man bent to all occasions of troubles, who thinking now to win fauor to him thereby, did say to the queenes vncles that were present, that he would reduce the countrie beyond Calidon vnto the old religion. The which being indeed suspected of manie, and feared by such as had heard manie other things of his wit; they caried the same to the queenes brother, by meanes whereof this little sparke in the beginning was the occasion of all the long ciuill dissention in Scotland, as I am led to iudge by manie reasons.

Lesleus lib. 10. pag. 587.

But now although the gouernment (as before is touched) was appointed to twelue before named, or at lest to six, which by turnes should be assistant to the queene: yet the whole deed of ruling did in effect depend vpon hir bastard brother James, by reason of the fauor that the queene especiallie did beare vnto him. Wherefore this James, using the queenes authoritie at his pleasure, did bestow manie liberall gifts vpon his fellowes. Which the nobles so much misliked, that in the end manie of them began egerlie to beare his authoritie, as hereafter shall be more touched.]

Daumal went with the two gallies into France. The rest went through England into France.

The duke Daumall, after he had remained with the queene a certeine time, toke his leaue of hir, and with the gallies returned into France. The grand prior and monsieur Dannille taried somewhat longer, and passed through England into France. The marquesse Daulbeuf taried in Scotland all the nert winter, till the spring of the yeere, and then returned into France through England. The towne of Edenburgh prepared great and costlie triumphs for the queenes entering, which shée made into that towne in the moneth of September. After this, she passed vnto Striueling, and from thence to Perth, and then to Dundee, and also to saint Andrews, into which townes she was receiued with great honor and triumph. From saint Andrews she returned vnto Edenburgh, where she remained all the nert winter. In December there was a great assemblie of all the principall lords, spirituall and temporall of the realme; where it was demanded of the prelats, to grant the third part of the fruits of their benefices to the queene, towards the bearing of hir charges for the maintenance of hir traine, and to susteine the ministers, till some order were taken to mainteine hir household, and a gard to tend on hir, by the aduise of the estates.

The queene visited the townes.

In assemblie of the lords.

The third part of the spirituall liuings demanded.

The prelats agreed for the queenes pleasure to support hir with the fourth part of the fruits of their benefices, for one yeeres space onelie, to helpe to beare hir charges, and to susteine hir gard; and in the meane time order might be taken by the aduise of the whole estates for the same. But notwithstanding the refusall of the prelates to paie the third part, the lords of the priuie councell made an act, and set forth letters, that all the prelats and beneficed men should be charged to paie yeerelie to the queenes comptroller and his collector, the whole thirds of all fruits of their benefices: and that it should be lawfull to the comptroller and his deputies, to take the third of what part of euerie benefice where he best pleased, and to deale therewith at his pleasure: also to haue to doo with the rents of brotherhods of common churches, and such like. This order hath béene obserued euer since, not without great grudge of the prelats, and other beneficed men of the realme, and their friends, as well those that professed the reformed religion, as others.

An act for the clergie.

* Whilest these things were in doing, William Pettellan the yonger was sent ambassador into England, to salute the queene of that realme (as the maner is) & to declare the good mind that the queene of Scots bare vnto hir, & the desire that his mistresse had to haue peace and vnitie preserued betweene them. Besides all which, and manie other demands touching Scotland (which I suppresse for manie reasons, because (as Salomon saith) Cor regis inscrutabile, & the mysteries of princes gouernment are not to be laid open to common eies and eares) this ambassador deliuered letters to the queene of England from the nobilitie of Scotland. In which there was a courteous remembrance of hir former fauor and of their good will. Requesting further that the queene of England would shew a publike and priuat liking and friendship to their queene, to the end that the queene of Scots prouoked by hir benefits, might not onelie remaine stedfast in the amitie alreadie begun: but might also (if it were possible) be dailie more and more fast bound vnto hir: and they for their parts would not omit anie occasion with all good will and diligence to continue this amitie.

Fr. Thin. Buchan. lib. 17.

To which ambassador the queene of England made no lesse honorable than wise answer: the effect whereof, because it concerneth matter of great importance, & is long and largelie alreadie set downe by Buchanan, in hir maiesties singular commendation to the whole world in the Latine tong, I thinke it not necessarie héere to repeat: and therefore I doo purposelie omit the same, least I might seeme by flatterie to intrude my pen into the eloquent spéech of hir maiestie: and not being able to deliuer it with such grace as both she spake it, and Buchanan penneth it, I might dishonor hir, & ouerthrow my selfe, like vnto Phaeton. For as he, taking vpon him to rule the chariot of the sunne, was by his insufficiencie therefore consumed with the heat and glorie thereof; so should I in presuming with vnskill to pen the tale of ſuch a woꝛthie pꝛince, conſume my credit, in miſoꝛdering oꝛ defacing the maieſtie, grauitie, wiſedome, and life of hir ſingular wit and eloquence. Foꝛ which cauſe, leauing the ſame, we dꝛo in this ſoꝛt bꝛing backe our pen to the continuance of the hiſtoꝛie of Scotland.

Buchan. li. 17. The quéene of Scots had a bꝛother called John, a man deſirous of authoꝛitie, but yet not ſo ſeuere in mind as was James the other bꝛother. This John eaſilie perſuading himſelfe to obeie the quéene in all things, was the moꝛe déere vnto hir, and moſt fit foꝛ hir, deſirous (as ſaith Buchanan, but howꝛ trulie I know not) to confound all things. With this John (in abſence of the other bꝛother James) ſhe did conſult to hier a companie of ſouldiers to be about hir, the cauſe whereof was this. In the night there was a tumult oꝛ ſtur, as though the earle of Arran would, in the abſence of the nobilitie, ſecretlie ſet vpon the quéene, and by ſtrength haue laboꝛed to carie hir to his caſtell, which was foureténe miles from thence. All which ſéemeth likelie to be but a tale, either foꝛ the quéenes mind that was eſtranged from him, oꝛ foꝛ the immoderat loue which he bare vnto hir: both which were ſufficientlie knowen to the common people. Which tumult being ſpꝛed abꝛoad, theſe ſouldiers after they had all night ſcowꝛed the fields, ꝛiding vp and downe hither & thither, they ſhewed themſelues the nexꝛt day beforꝛe the court gates, to the offenſe of ſome, and the ieſt of others.]

1562. The ſunday beforꝛe Shꝛouetueſdaie, being the eight day of Febꝛuarie (as ſome wꝛite) James Steward then pꝛioꝛ of ſaint Andꝛewes, and earle of Mar, baſe bꝛother to the quéene, was made earle of Murreie, [in place (as ſaith Buchanan) of the earledome of Mar, which belonged to John Areſkin] by the quéens ſpeciall gift, and was maꝛied the ſame day vnto Agnis Keith, daughter to the erle Marſhall, with great feaſts and triumphs, laſting thꝛée daies. ✻ In which mariage he did ſo much exceed, that he greatlie offended the minds of his friends, and miniſtred matter to his enimies to ſpeake euill of him; and that the moꝛe vehementlie, becauſe he had beforꝛe time in all his life behaued himſelfe far moꝛe temperatlie than he did at this time.]

James Steward made earle of Murreie. Fr. Thin.

The quéene of England deſirous to haue a méeting betwixt hir and the quéene of Scots hir cowſine, ſent diuerſe meſſengers with letters, deſiring hir moſt inſtantlie to come to Yoꝛke, where ſhe would méet hir, to talke with hir of diuerſe matters, that might make to the confirmation of the amitie and friendſhip which nature had knit betwéene them, by continuation and affinitie of bloud. And after conſultation had with hir councell, the quéene of Scots agréed thereto: and ſo they were appointed to méet at Yoꝛke in the moneth of Julie nexꝛt following. But when things were pꝛepared and put in a readineſſe foꝛ the iournie, the quéene of England ſent woꝛd to the quéene of Scots, that ſhe could not keepe the appointment made foꝛ their méeting, deſiring hir to haue hir excuſed foꝛ that time. Which meſſage was accepted, and ſo the iournie ſtaied.

The quéene of England deſirous to ſpeake with the quéene of Scotland.

The méeting time was diſappointed.

Fr. Thin. Buchan. li. 17. ✻ Much about this time, oꝛ rather ſomewhat beforꝛe, as in truth I ſuppoſe it was, James Hamilton being duke of Chatelerault, and father to the earle of Arran, firſt wꝛote to the quéene, then after went he vnto hir to ſaint Andꝛewes, and with manie pꝛaiers requeſted hir that ſhe would vpon ſufficient pledges deliuer to him the earle Bothwell, and Gawen Hamilton, but he could not obteine anie thing therein at hir hands. At what time alſo the quéene went to Dunbꝛeton (which Hamilton held ſince the time that he was gouernoꝛ) to demand the deliuerie of the ſame into hir hands, which was accoꝛdinglie deliuered vnto hir.] Shoꝛtlie after, the quéene of Scots toke hir iournie towards the noꝛth parts of Scotland, and ſet from Striueling in the moneth of Auguſt.

The quéene made hir pꝛogreſſe into the noꝛth parts of Scotland.

About this time it chanced that the loꝛd Ogiluie, and John Goꝛdon of Finnater, ſonne to the earle of Huntleie, met on the calſeie of Edenburgh & fought, where (after manie blowes and ſtripes giuen and taken) the loꝛd Ogiluie and his companie were hurt. Wheꝛefoꝛe John Goꝛdon was taken, & put in ward at the tolbuith of Edenburgh, out of which he eſcaped, after he had remained pꝛiſoner therein about twentie daies, and toke his waie noꝛthward: whereupon followed great trouble ſhoꝛtlie after to the houſe of Huntleie. The quéene accompanied with the earles of Argile, Murreie, and Moꝛton, the loꝛd Erſkin, and others, paſſed foꝛwards in hir iournie towards the noꝛth part, and cauſed John Goꝛdon of Finnater to be ſummoned to appéere and anſwer the law at Aberden, foꝛ bꝛeaking pꝛiſon, and hurting the loꝛd Ogiluie. The quéene comming to the towne of Aberden, was honoꝛablie receiued with diuerſe oꝛations, and Latine enterludes, beforꝛe the grammar ſchoole and college.

Loꝛd Ogiluie and John Goꝛdon fight togither.

Fr. Thin. Buchanan lib. 17. ✻ Theſe things thus done at Aberden, as the quéene determined to go further, ſhe was intreated by John Leſle a noble man, and follower of the Goꝛdons, to vouchſafe his houſe in hir waie, being 12 miles from the towne: to which ſhe granted, & went vnto the ſame. This place, becauſe it was no common place of reſoꝛt, was thought verie conuenient foꝛ the execution of the earle of Murreie, whoſe death was conſpired (as after ſhall appéere.) Wheꝛevpon Leſle, who was not ignoꝛant of this ſecret counſell, beſought the quéene that ſhe would not laie ſuch a note of infamie vpon him and his familie, that he ſhould ſéeme to haue betraied the chiefeſt bꝛother of the quéene, no euill man, and one that was not his enimie, whereby he might come vnto his death at his houſe. Wheꝛevpon it then ceaſſed, and the nexꝛt night was alſo quietlie paſſed ouer at Kothimie, a towne of the Abernethians, becauſe the nexꝛt day the quéene was determined to go to Strabogie.]

Wheꝛevpon the earle of Huntleie, hauing beforꝛe heard that his ſonne was thus ſummoned, aſſembled the pꝛincipall earles, loꝛds, barons, and gentlemen of the noꝛth, who came with him to Aberden, to helpe his ſon at the law day appointed foꝛ his appéerance, which was in September. The earle came vnto the quéene himſelfe, and at length it was agreed, that his ſonne the ſaid John Gordon ſhould returne to pꝛiſon againe in Striueling caſtell, there to remaine during the quéenes pleaſure. But he following the euill counſell of ſome yong heads that were with him, neither fulfilled the quéenes pleaſure, noꝛ his fathers appointment, but attempted to reuenge his extreme handling (as he toke it) vpon the earle of Murreie, whome he put moſt in blame foꝛ the rigoꝛ ſhewed againſt him, but his enterpꝛiſe toke not effect. Now the quéene aduertiſed of his diſobedience, went not to Strabogie, notwithſtanding there was great pꝛeparation made foꝛ hir in that place, foꝛ the receiuing of hir and hir traine: but ſhe went vnto Balwanie, the earle of Athols place, and from thence to Kinlos, to Tarnewaie, and ſo came to Inuernelle, and there lodged.

Goꝛdon is commanded to Striueling caſtell.

He diſobeied.

In this meane while, the earle of Huntleie, purpoſing to attend on the quéene at Inuernelle, cauſed pꝛouiſion to be made in the caſtell foꝛ his lodging. The quéene ſuſpecting his dealing, leaſt this ſhould be done vpon ſome policie, commanded the kéepers of the caſtell to render the ſame to one of hir heralds: but it was not deliuered till the nexꝛt day, and theꝛefoꝛe the capteine of that caſtell called Alexander Goꝛdon, foꝛ refuſing to deliuer it, was hanged vpon the towne towne bridge. The lord Gordon & his brother Iohn Gordon of Finnater came that night within a little ſpace diſtant from the towne of Inuernelle, which cauſed great feare in the towne, ſo that there was a diligent watch all that night. The earle of Huntleie being come to Kinloſſe, and hearing that the caſtell of Inuernelle was commanded to be giuen vp into the hands of an herald, ſent with all diligence to the keepers, that they ſhould deliuer it, & returned himſelfe to Strabogie.

The quéene remained in Inuernelle the ſpace of foure or fiue daies, where the principall capteine of the clanes of the countrie came to hir, and with a great companie [of the ancient Scots (as hath Buchanan) whereof the chiefe were the Fraiſers and Murreies, valiant families in thoſe parts] conueied hir to Spine, where ſhe was informed that the earle of Huntleie had gathered an armie to come againſt hir, and made their aſſemble at Spaie. Hérevpon, they tooke with them all the artillerie ouer Spine, and caried the ſame in carts, and all other kind of munition, and paſſed forward to Bamf that night. The earle of Huntleie all this while came not forth of Strabogie. The quéene as ſhe paſſed forward, rode to the place of Finnater, and there in hir owne preſence, cauſed the keepers thereof to be charged to deliuer it, which they refuſed to dow. From Bamf the quéene rode to the lard of Geichtis place, called Geicht, and the next day there was great preparation for hir entrie into the new towne of Aberden. She lodged one night in the biſhops palace, and the next day ſhe was honorablie receiued, and lodged in the pronoſts houſe of the towne, where ſhe remained all the time of hir abode in Aberden.

Fr. Thin.

She came to Aberden.

After this, the lord Iohn prior of Coldingham, with diuerſe gentlemen, was ſent againſt the earle of Huntleie to Strabogie, but he was eſcaped before they approched. The ladie Huntleie receiued them verie courteouſlie, and gaue them good interteinement, and ſo they returned. There was charge giuen to Louthian, Fife, Angus, Stratherne, the Merns, and to the ſhire of Aberden, to come to Aberden quarterlie, euerie countrie to remaine there fiftéene daies; and ſo they did, during the time of hir abiding there. The earle of Huntleie ſent his wife in meſſage to the quéene and councell, but ſhe was not admitted to come within a mile of them, but commanded to returne. After this, he ſent a meſſenger, offering to enter in ward till his cauſe might be tried by the whole nobilitie: but this was refuſed. In the meane time all the principall of the Gordons that were landed men, were charged to enter into ward. About the ſame time James Hepborne earle of Bothwell, who (vpon diſpleaſure conceiued againſt him about a quarell betwixt him and the earle of Arrane, had béene committed to priſon in Eaſter weéke laſt before paſt) eſcaped out of Dauids tower in Edenburgh at a windowe.

The earle of Huntleie is ſent for.

*The earle of Huntleie, vnderſtanding by his friends at the court how things paſſed, determined to flie to the mounteins: but after (truſting to the promiſes of his friends) he determined to abide battell in a place of ſome ſtrength. Wherevpon in October he came with his armie to Cornethie in Mar. By reaſon whereof the earle of Murreie, who at the firſt had ſcarſe a hundred horſſemen with him, began with James Dowglaſſe earle of Morton, and Patrike Lindſeie, to lead an armie againſt his enimies, and gathered a greater number of eight hundred people of the regions adioining. Wherefore he firſt placed ſouldiers about the water paſſages, to keépe all thoſe places, that Huntleie ſhould not eſcape, and with the reſt went forward on a ſoft paſe, to méet his enimie: whoſe comming Huntleie did abide, with thrée hundred men, kéeping their places, although not a few of that companie were fled from the Gordons the night before.

Fr. Thin. Buchan. lib. 17.

When the earle of Murreie was come to the ſide of a hill, from whence he might ſée all the mariſhes about him, he incamped there in a ſlender order of battell. At length the armies met, at what time manie on the earle of Murreie his ſide did flée awaie, hauing before giuen a ſigne to the enimie. But the earle Murreie, which ſaw there was no ſuccour in fléeing, ſtood to it valiantlie, called his men togither, ſet vpon the enimie, cauſed them (which before followed his men fleeing awaie) now to flie as faſt backe as they came forward. Which change of fortune when the traitors that before fled did perceiue, they came afreſh and purſued the Huntleies, and (to cleare them from the firſt fault) committed all the ſlaughter that was done that daie.

There was killed of the part of Huntleie a hundred and twentie, and a hundred taken: but on the other ſide not one. Amongſt ſuch as were taken, was the earle Huntleie himſelfe, and his two ſons, Iohn and Adam. But the father being old and ſhort breathed by reaſon of his groſſenes, was ſlaine betweene the hands of ſuch as tooke him, and the reſt were late in the night brought to Aberden.] The quéene ſéemed ſorie for the earles death. But in Nouember Iohn Gordon was beheaded in Aberden, and ſhortlie after the quéene returned ſouthwards, leauing foure commiſſioners in Aberden, the treaſuror, maiſter James Macgill, maiſter Iohn Spens of Cundie, and the lard of Pettarrow, to compound for the eſchets of them that were in the field with the earle of Huntleie. Upon which bad ſpeech, the earles of Murreie and of Glencarne (which well vnderſtood that the Ha-their owne priuat riches as perſons that were nert whom of late they had felt to be both cruell and cone-

The lords went vnto Dunfreis.

The quéene hearing thereof, by aduise of hir councell assembled forth of all the parts of the whole realme an armie, appointing the same to be at Beggar, in the beginning of October, to pursue the rebels. In the meane time, she hearing that the towns of saint Andrews, Dundée, and saint Johns towne, had helped the lords to raise men of warre for their support, passed thither hirselfe, and toke inquisition thereof, giuing order in those townes, that no such thing should afterwards be put in practise. But there were none that suffered death for that matter; but diuerse were committed to prison in the north parts of the realme, as the prouost and baillzeis of saint Andrews: also certeine of the towne of Dundée, and saint Johns towne, and other were banished; and diuerse barons, as Lundie, Lango, and Balward, were sent to Aberden, and to other parts, where they remained the winter following.

Certeine townes are punished.

About this time, the quéene toke the castell of Tantallon from the earle of Morton, because he was suspected to fauor the rebels. The keeping thereof was giuen to the earle of Atholl. The quéene returning to Edenburgh in September, prepared all things necessarie for the armie, and departing from Edenburgh, came to Beggar, where all the nobilmen with their retinues were assembled the eight of October. From thence they passed forward to Dunfreis. In the meane time, the duke of Chatelerault, the earles of Murreie, Glencarne, Roths, the lord Ochiltre, the abbat of Kilwinning, the lards of Grange, Cuningham, Herdie, Pettarrow, maister James Haliburton tutor of Petcur, and others, hearing of the quéens comming with an armie, fled into England & came to Caerleill, where they were receiued, the earle of Bedford at that time being lord lieutenant of the north.

A great armie

The lords fled into England.

The lord Heris then maister of Harwell conueied them to the water of Sulweie, and afterward returned to Dunfreis to the quéene, where (of hir clemencie) he got pardon of his offense; and the lards of Lochinwar and Drunlanrig likewise. After the armie had taried certeine daies, putting direction for obseruing of good order in the countrie, the quéen returned to Edenburgh, where she remained all the nert winter. The quæne sent the maister Dauid Chalmer chancellor of Rosse into France to the the king, with letters for his assistance against hir rebels. And shortlie after, the French king sent a gentleman called monsieur Paluoiser into Scotland, with verie friendlie letters vnto the quéene, promising his helpe & assistance against the rebels; which message was most thankefullie receiued, and the said Paluoiser honorablie at his departure rewarded.

Their conuoiers got their pardon.

The quéene returned againe into Edenburgh.

The quéene sent into France for aid.

The duke of Chatelerault, and the other lords with him departed from Caerleill to Newcastell vpon Tine, and from thence sent the earle of Murreie, and the abbat of Kilwinning to the quæne of England, making sute to hir grace for aid to be restored to their countrie againe. The quéens maiestie promised them, that she would send a gentleman to the quéene hir sister, and moue hir in their fauors, as she did; and so they returned to Newcastell, where the duke of Chatelerault, perceiuing no other helpe appearing, sent the abbat of Kilwinning into Scotland to the quéene with letters, submitting himselfe to hir graces will, and so he obteined pardon for him and his friends, with licence to passe into France, there to remaine the space of fiue yeares, and shortlie after he passed through England, and so ouer into France, according to his appointment.

The lords send to the quéene of England.

The quéene of England sent to the quéene of Scots.

The king passed the most part of that winter in the countries of Fife, Stratherne, Striuelingshire, & Louthian, spending his time in hawking. The quæne remained at Edenburgh with the nobilitie, and because she was conceiued with child, trauelled little abroad. ✻ About this time was a new order taken for placing the king and quéens name in all their writings and patents. For where, vntill this time, the kings name was set before the quæns: now quite contrarie, the name of the quéene was written before the kings: besides which, afterward the quéene hir selfe would onelie set hir name to the writings in place of hirs and his; and Dauid the secretarie was appointed in his place to haue a stampe of the kings name, to vse when need required.]

The king went a hawking.

Bucha. lib. 17.

In the meane time a parlement was called, to be holden in the moneth of March nert insuing, and summons decréed against the earle of Murreie, and the other lords that remained in England, and also against the earle of Argile, lieng then in his countrie of Argile to heare them forfalted. The French king sent monsieur Rambeueullet into Scotland, as ambassador from him to the quéene, with commission, to make the king hir husband knight of the order of S. Michaell. Which with great solemnitie and reuerence was accomplished in the chappell of Holie rod house the tenth of Februarie, being sunday: after the which, the said Rambeuellet returned into France, being highlie rewarded.

A parlement.

The lords that were exiled are summoned.

The king receiued the order of saint Michaell.

1566.

From that time that the parlement was proclamed, and the summons also published, the earle of Murreis friends being in Scotland, neuer ceassed to séeke all the waies and means they could deuise to staie the same: in so much that the earle of Morton, the lord Ruthwen, and the lord Lindsete, secretlie persuaded the king to staie the parlement, and also to consent to the restoring of the erle of Murreie and his complices, making to him faithfull promise, that if he would follow their counsell, he should be made & crowned king of Scotland absolutelie, and the quéene so to haue lesse to do with the gouernement afterwards, where through he agréed to them.

They persuade with the king.

The king soone persuaded.

And so after the parlement was assembled, the lords of the articles being chosen the seuenth day of March, they perceiuing the forfalture like to proceed, and iudgement thereof to be giuen, the eleuenth of March nert following, the king with the assistance of the said earle of Morton, the lords Ruthwen, and Lindsete, entred into the quæns priuie chamber about eight of the clocke in the night, being saturday, and the ninth of March; where being arriued in warlike manner, the lord Ruthwen declared vnto the quæne, that they would not suffer hir anie longer to haue the gouernement of the realme, to abuse the same by the counsell of strangers, as she had done; and therefore pulled violentlie out of hir chamber Dauid Richeo an Italian, that was one of hir secretaries, crieng pitiouslie, Iustitia, Iustitia: and in hir vtter chamber they suddenlie slue him with great crueltie. The king himselfe was also present, and his dagger was likewise found sticking in the dead bodie.

The king is entred into the quæns priuie chamber.

The quéene was shut vp within hir chamber, and certeine appointed to attend hir, and to keepe all the doores and gates about the palace. The earles of Huntleie and Bothwell escaped by a backe window forth in their chamber, wherof the king and his companie were right sorie. The erle of Atholl and others being with him, departed in the night season by a ferrie ouer the Forth, called the quéenes ferrie, and went to S. Johns towne. On the morow being sunday (the quéene being secretlie kept) proclamation was made, that all the lords that had voice in parlement ment, ſhuld depart out of the towne of Edenburgh: and after none the ſame day, the earles of Murreie and Rothes, with other of their companies that came forth from Newcaſtell the ſaturday before, came to the abbeie of Holie rod houſe about ſix of the clocke in the after none, where they were thankfullie receiued by the king and his companie. They ſpake alſo with the queene, who had no great comfort of their comming.

They made their proteſtation.

The morrow following, being monday, the earle of Murreie, and the other that were ſummoned, paſſed to the tolbuith of Edenburgh, & made their proteſtation there, that they were readie to anſwer in parlement, and none appeared to accuſe them. After this, it was concluded to keepe the queene in ſtreict ward. But by hir politike demeanor, their purpoſe in that behalfe was broken: for by ſecret conference with the king, ſhe perſuaded him to thinke, that hee had ioined himſelfe with thoſe that would be his deſtruction, if it happened with hir otherwiſe than well; as was no leſſe to be doubted, by reaſon of the high diſpleaſure that ſhe had taken being quicke with child: through the which perſuaſion, and other miſliking of things, he departed ſecretlie with hir in the night ſeaſon, accompanied onlie with two men, and firſt came vnto Seiton, and afterward from thence to Dunbar.

The queene had coference with the king.

The king was ſone perſuaded.

Huntleie and Bothwell.

Thither the earles of Huntleie and Bothwell haſtilie repaired, by whoſe counſell and others then with hir, ſhe cauſed proclamation to be made in diuerſe parts of the realme, charging all manner of men in feats of warre, to come vnto hir to Dunbar, & to paſſe from thence vnto Edenburgh within ſix daies after. She alſo ſent letters to the ſame effect vnto diuerſe noble men of the realme, who prepared themſelues with great diligence to meet hir. The earle of Murreie and the reſt of the lords being with him, hearing the preparation that was made againſt them, and perceiuing themſelues not able to reſiſt, thought good euerie of them to ſeeke ſome particular meane to obteine remiſſion at the queens hands. Which they obteined all of them, except the earle of Morton, the lords Ruthwen, Lindſeie, and ſuch other as were with them at the murther of Dauid Richeo. Whereupon they deſparing of pardon, fled into England; where the lord Ruthwen died at Newcaſtell ſhortlie after; as in place ye ſhall heare.

Proclamation made.

Pardon is craued and obteined.

The murtherers are excepted.

The earle of Lennor, being partaker with them, came to Dunbar, and got pardon: the earle of Glencarne and the lard of Cunningham head came thither alſo, and were pardoned. Likewiſe the earle of Rothes purchaſed his pardon at the ſame time. The earles of Argile and Murreie, and the lord Boid, being at Lithquo, ſent to the queene for their pardon, and obteined it, being commanded neuertheleſſe to paſſe into Argile, and to remaine there during hir graces pleaſure, which commandement they obeied.

Manie pardoned.

The eighteenth of March, the queene well accompanied came to Hadington towards night: and on the nintéenth day, the biſhop of ſaint Andrews, and the Hamiltons met hir at Muſkelburgh, and ſo likewiſe did the lords Leuingſton, Fleming, Hume, Borthwike, and manie other noble men, and conueied hir vnto Edenburgh.

The queene commeth to Edenburgh.

She lodged in the biſhop of Dunkelds lodging, and taried there a certeine ſpace, hauing with hir the erls of Huntleie, Atholl, Bothwell, Crawford, Marſhall, Southerland, Cathnes, the biſhops of ſaint Andrews and Roſſe; the lords Leuingſton, Fleming, and diuerſe other noble men, by whoſe counſell order was taken for redreſſing of the ſtate of the realme, whereby the ſame was ſhortlie brought to great quietneſſe. After this, the queene perceiuing hirſelfe to draw neere the time of hir deliuerance, went to the caſtell of Edenburgh, there to remaine till ſhee were deliuered of hir birth. In the moneth of Maie, Thomas Scot ſhiriffe, deputie of Perth, & a prieſt called ſir Henrie Pair, ſeruant to the lord Ruthwen, were apprehended for being doers in the ſlaughter of Dauid, and were hanged and quartered. Their heads were ſet aloft, the one on the tower in the abbeie, and the other on the nether bow.

Execution done vpon the murtherers.

In the moneth of Aprill this yeere, the biſhop of Brechin preſident of the ſeſſion, deceaſſed, and in his rome ſucceeded to that biſhoprike, a friend and couſine to the earle of Argile, called Campbell. In the end of Aprill, the queene, willing to haue the earles of Argile and Murreie ioined with the reſt of the councell, ſent for them to come to the caſtell of Edenburgh, where all griefs and controuerſies that reſted betwixt them on the one ſide, and the earles of Huntleie, Atholl, & Bothwell on the other ſide, were referred to the queene, who agreed them, and they all remained with hir the reſidue of the ſummer. The queene hearing that the earle of Morton, the lord Ruthwen, and the other their aſſiſtants were receiued in England, and remained at Newcaſtell; ſhee ſent maiſter James Thornton chantor of Murreie, with letters to the queene of England, and alſo to the king of France, and other hir friends there; declaring by the tenor of the ſame letters the abuſe and preſumptuous attempts of certeine hir ſubiects againſt hir, deſiring them not to receiue them within their realmes or dominions.

The queene agréeth all the lords.

The queene made ſute to the queene of Eglnand.

Shortlie after, the queene of England ſent a gentleman called Henrie Killigrew into Scotland, with letters and meſſage to the queene, promiſing to cauſe them to depart forth of hir realme of England: and withall ſent vnto them warning to depart betwixt that preſent time, and midſummer then next inſuing. But in the meane time the lord Ruthwen departed this life at Newcaſtell, with great repentance of his former life: giuing God thanks, for that he had lent him time to call to him for mercie and forgiuenelle, whereof he did aſſure himſelfe. And from thenceforth the earle of Morton, and the maiſter of Ruthwen, remained ſecretlie neere to Anwike, and other places of the borders, till they obteined pardon, and were reſtored. About this time there came from the king of France a wiſe aged gentleman, named monſieur la Crocke, as his ambaſſador, and remained in Scotland all the winter following.

The queene of England hir anſwer.

The lord Ruthwen repented.

An ambaſſage from the king of France.

In the moneth of June, the queene perceiuing the time of hir deliuerance to approch, wrote vnto all the principall noble men of hir realme, to come and remaine within the towne of Edenburgh, during the time of hir deliuerance, where they aſſembled: and the king hir huſband, with the earles of Argile, Murreie, Atholl, and Mar, remained with hir in the caſtell; and the earle of Huntleie, Bothwell, and the remnant of the lords lodged in the towne. And vpon the nintéenth day of the ſame moneth of June, betwixt 10 and 11 of the clocke before none, hir grace was deliuered of a goodlie man-child, to the great comfort of hir highneſſe, and all hir ſubiects, whereof the nobilitie did greatlie reioiſe. And incontinentlie all the artillerie in the caſtell was ſhot off, and all the lords and people came togither in the church of ſaint Giles, to giue thanks to almightie God for his great and beneficiall goodnes ſhewed to them, in giuing to them a prince, and withall made their humble praiers vnto his diuine maieſtie, to indue him with the feare of God, with vertue and knowledge to gouerne the realme and ſubiects thereof, when ſoeuer the ſame ſhould fall into his hands.

A prince borne.

The ſame night at éeuen, there were great fires for ioy made in the towne of Edenburgh, and in all the the countrie about, and likewise through all the whole realme, as by aduertisements were certified therof. The queene remained still in the castell of Edenburgh all the moneth of Julie following, till shée had recouered hir health and strength. In the beginning of August, she passed vp the water of Forth to Allowais, where she remained certeine daies, the earles of Murreie and Mar being of companie with hir, and there the king hir husband came to visit hir. The same time monsieur Maluoisir came into Scotland from the king of France, bringing letters to the quéene, who was conueied by the bishop of Rosse to Allowaie, where he was ioifullie receiued, courteoustie interteined, and highly rewarded. The queene of England sent maister Henrie Killegrew to the quéene with the like message, reioising for hir safe and happie deliuerance, who likewise was receiued in most thankefull maner, and well rewarded.

The earle of Bothwell.

The earle of Bothwell was euen at the first vehementlie suspected to be the principall offendor in this most heinous and detestable murther. But the matter was so handled, that he was not onelie acquit by an assise, as they call it; but also shortlie after maried the quéene. By reason wherof, the suspicion that men had alreadie conceiued, that she should be also priuie to the murther, was nothing diminished. But as I haue not to deale in that matter, so yet it is manifest, that some of the Scotish nobilitie, sore repining and maligning at such the spéedie aduancement of Bothwell, who (as euerie man persuaded himselfe, was the principall author of the murther) got them to armes on the sudden, before the quéene or Bothwell were aduertised of their meaning, they being then at Borthwike castell, eight miles distant from Edenburgh.

The lords get them to armes.

* Thus leauing the lords awhile at Edenburgh, we will say somewhat out of Buchanan, of things done by Bothwell & the quéene, before that she was taken by these noble men of the congregation, hauing at that time taken armes against hir. After the death of hir husband, whome she had caused to be buried not farre from Dauid Richeo hir secretarie, slaine (as was thought) by the meanes of the king of Scots: the queene (I say) after that, and also after the clearing of Bothwell from the murther of hir husband, was forceablie taken (as she was on hir iournie) by the earle Bothwell, and carted to his castell, where she remained not long, but yet honorablie interteined. Which fact of his bred great mislike in the peoples minds, and brought him in danger of his life, had not the queene (of hir clemencie) pardoned him the same.

Buchan. li. 17.

This done, there was a consultation had for a mariage to be solemnized betweene hir and the earle Bothwell, which (after a diuorse had betweene this earle and his then wife Katharine Gordon, granted by the iudges spirituall & temporall; and after the solemne bands asked betweene the said earle James Hepborne, and the quéene Marie Steward) was with great solemnitie of the nobilitie (by their hands in writing consenting thereunto) consummat at Edenburgh. Against which onelie the bishop of Orkenie was found to resist; and at which monsieur de Crocke the French ambassador then in Scotland would not be present: being a thing which did greatly occasion the Edenburgers to mislike of the quéene.

Which mariage breeding some euill opinion of the said quéene of Scots, not onelie in hir owne realme, but in the mouths of forreine nations, she wiselie consulteth with hir friends, how she might establish hir power, and prouide to saue hirselfe and hir kingdome from tumults and insurrections. Wherupon, first she determineth to send an ambassador into France, to reconcile the minds of the king, and of the Guises, offended with this marriage. Which office of ambassage was laid vpon William bishop of Dunblane, with this charge (as saith Buchanan) almost word for word.

"First, you shall excuse to the king, and to our vncles, that our mariage (to be consummate) came to their eares, before that we had opened our counsell touching that matter by ante messengers. This excuse (as it were to a foundation) doth leane to the true exposition of his whole life, and chiefflie to the offices and duties of the duke or capteine of the Orcades towards vs, euen vnto that day in which it séemed good to vs to take him to husband. For the opening of the historie whereof you shall take occasion to treat from the beginning of the last times of his adolescencie (youth, or yéres of discretion, as wée terme it) in this sort.

"That when he first began to manage his owne affaires

The king murthered. 1566. Stow.

In Januarie the king came to Glascow, where he fell sicke, and remouing from thence went to Edenburgh, and the quéene accompanied him. She lodged at Holie rod house, but hée was lodged at a house within the towne, neere to the kirke a field, within the which, on the tenth of the moneth of Februarie in the night he was shamefullie murthered, together with one William Parat. He was cast into an orchard, and herewith the house was blowne vp with gunpowder. [Some giue report of his death, but touch not the maner thereof, onelie saieng that he was shamefullie murthered in a morning (a heauie breakefast) by his owne (but vnnaturall and rebellious) people, whose innocent blood crieth out for vengeance at the hands of God, who in iustice will (when he séeth due time) giue them their portion with malefactors agréeable to their merits.

"faires (being from the death of his father one of the "chiefe of the nobilitie) he did wholie dedicate himſelfe
"to the dutie and ſeruice of the princes and kings of "Scotland, as one borne of a famous familie for his "ancient nobilitie, & of great reuenues in this king"dome which he poſſeſſeth by right of inheritance. At "that time alſo he did eſpeciallie and altogither con-"ſecrate himſelfe to our mother, whileſt ſhe had the "gouernement of the realme.

"In which dutie towards hir, he did ſo conſtantlie
"perſeuere, that although the greater part of the no"bilitie, and almoſt all the townes were fallen from
"hir obedience (vnder the colour of religion) yet hée
"would neuer decline from hir authoritie, as a per-"ſon that could not be woone by anie promiſes or be"nefits, or feared with anie threats, or loſſe of his li"uings, to neglect his dutie in anie part vnto hir: but "that he wold rather ſuffer his principall houſe, which "was the head of his patrimonie, with his plentifull
"and pretious ſtore of furniture thereof to be taken "from him, and all his other lands to be left for ſpoile
"to the enimie, than violate his faith to our mother.
"Beſides which, being deſtitute of helpe both of vs
"and our people (when the Engliſh hoſt was brought
"by our domeſticall enimies into the bowels of our
"kingdome, which directed their weapons to none o"ther marke, than that our now husband at that time
"earle Bothwell, ſhould by force be inforced to flie) he "fled into France, forſaking all his patrimonie, where "he honored me with all dutie and ſeruice (that hée
"might) vntill my returne into Scotland.

"Neither are thoſe exploits to be omitted, which "were done by him in the warres againſt the Eng-
"liſh before my returne into mine owne countrie,
"where he ſhewed ſuch parts of warlike valure and "graue wiſedome, that he was iudged (being then ve-"rie yoong) méet to haue the gouernment of ancient
"perſons, to be made chiefe capteine of the armie of "the countrie, & alſo to be choſen or ſubſtitute depu-
"tie and chancellor: as in truth he was. In which of"fice he did not deceiue the hope and expectation which "men conceiued of him. For (by his affaires valiant-"lie atchiued) he left a ſingular praiſe and fame of
"him, as well amongſt his owne people, as amongſt
"the enimies.

"After our returne into Scotland, he employed
"all his indeuor to the inlarging of our authoritie, and
"ſpared not to put himſelfe in danger, in ſubduing
"thoſe rebels which dwell about the borders of Eng"land. The diſpatch whereof being ſhortlie perfor"med, and they brought to great quiet, he was appointed to "do the like in all the other parts of the kingdome.
"But as enuie doth alwaies accompanie vertue, ſo
"the Scots repining thereat, and deſirous of innoua-
"tion, did labor to diminiſh our fauour towards him
"(for his great labors imployed in our behalfe) in miſ-
"conſtruing his good deeds.

"By which in the end they wrought ſo much with "me, that we committed him to priſon; partlie to ſa-
"tiſfie the minds of ſuch as were emulous againſt
"him, and could not brooke the increaſe of his follow"ing honor and greatneſſe; and partlie to appeaſe ſuch
"ſeditions as were likelie then to breake forth to the "deſtruction of the whole kingdome. But he (eſcaping "out of priſon) got him into France, to giue place to
"the power of his enimies, where he remained almoſt
"two yéeres next following. At what time the authors "of the former ſedition, forgetting my clemencie to"wards them, and their dutie towards vs, did raiſe
"warre, and toke weapons againſt their quéene.

"From thence was he called backe into Scotland,
"& being reſtored to his former honors & poſſeſſions,
"he was againe made generall of all the armie: by
"whoſe helpe our authoritie began afreſh ſo to flouriſh, that all the rebels (ſuddenlie forſaking their coun-trie) were inforced to flie into England, vntill part of them vpon humble ſubmiſſion were receiued anew into our fauour. But how traitorouſlie I was handled by the reſt that were reſtored (and eſpeciallie ſuch, whoſe anceſtors I had with benefits moſt promoted) our vncle is not ignorant, and therefore we will touch that no more.

Neither is it to be ouerpaſſed in ſilence, with what diligence he deliuered me from the hands of ſuch as deteined me priſoner, and with what ſpeed (and ſingu-lar prouidence of his) I did both eſcape from priſon, and recouered my former authoritie: after that I had diſperſed the factions of the conſpirators and ſeditious perſons. In which truſtie I am inforced to confeſſe, that his dutie and diligence at that time ſhewed towards me, was ſo acceptable vnto me, that I could neuer after forget it. Theſe things although they be great of themſelues, yet he hath hitherto increaſed them with ſuch diligence and carefulneſſe, that we cannot deſire greater dutie, or wiſh more aſſured truſt in anie man, than we haue found in him; vntill theſe laſt times which followed the deceaſſe of our husband.

But from that time, as his thoughts did ſéeme to tend higher, ſo his actions did after a ſort ſéeme to be more inſolent. And although the matter went ſo far, that we were to take all things in the beſt part: yet theſe things did then moſt greuouſlie offend me; but eſpeciallie his arrogancie, in that he thought that there were not other ſufficient abilities in vs, to recompenſe his deſeruings, vnleſſe we gaue our ſelfe to him in mariage. Touching which, at the firſt he vſed ſecret reaſons and counſels: but in the end, when he ſaw them not to ſucceed after his mind, at length, ſhewing an open contempt of my authoritie, he fled to the benefit of violence, and vſed force (to the end his attempt might not want due effect) to bring me vnder his gouernement.

Wherefore all this courſe of his life maie be an example, to ſhew how craftilie they can contriue their drifts (in attempting great things) vntill they haue obteined their purpoſe. For I did ſuppoſe, that all this his continuall dutie and carefulneſſe in ſpéedie obeieng of my commandements, had not iſſued from anie other founteine, than of a vehement deſire to ſhew his obedience and good will towards me:
neither did I hope that a little more fauourable countenance (which we are accuſtomed to vſe to the more worthie perſons, to the end to win their minds to be more obedient to vs in dutie) ſhould ſo haue raiſed his ſtomach (more than anie others) that he would promiſe to himſelfe anie larger good will to proceed from me towards him, than he had before.

But he taking aduantage of all haps, & drawing all things (that chanced) to the furtherance of his purpoſe, and keeping all his counſels ſecret from me, did ſtill ſhew his accuſtomed dutie, nouriſhed my old fauour to him, & ſecretlie attempted a new thing by the helpe of the nobilitie. Which he brought to paſſe with ſuch ſpéedie diligence, that (vnknowen to me) he obteined of the péeres of the realme (in the aſſemblie of the parlement héere) a writing with all their hands ſet therevnto, for the more credit of the ſame.
In which writing was conteined, that they did not onlie aſſent vnto the mariage; but that they alſo further promiſed to ſpend their life and goods (offered to all dangers) in the executing thereof, and that they would be vtter enimies to all ſuch as ſhould labor to hinder it. For the more eaſie obteining of whoſe conſents in this ſort, he had perſuaded the ſaid nobilitie, that the ſame was not done againſt my mind and conſent. At length, when he had purchaſed this writing from them, he began by little and little (with ear-

" neſt intreaties & flatteries) to obteine our conſent.
" But when at the firſt our anſwers did not content
" his deſire, he began to laie before me almoſt all thoſe
" things, which are accuſtomed to happen in the at" tempt of ſuch matters.
" Firſt, the outward tokens of our good fauour to" wards him, the reaſons by which our friends or his e-" nimies might hinder the ſame, & manie other things " which being obiected or willinglie happening, might " fruſtrate his hope, or change the minds of ſuch as had " before ſubſcribed. At length (fortune fauouring him
" therein) he determined to purſue the matter, & in one
" inſtance to hazard his hope and life about the ſame.
" Wherefore, when he had determined with himſelfe,
" with all importunitie to attempt the ſucceſſe of his " determination, he foure daies after hauing conue-
" nient time and place therefore in the high waie, ſet
" vpon me with a ſtrong hand, as I was comming
" from ſéeing of my déere ſonne, and with great ſpéed
" caried me to Dunbar.
" Which euill déed how gréeuouſlie we take (eſpe-
" ciallie done by him, from whome all our ſubiects ne-
" uer looked to haue ſuch things to procéed) euerie bo-
" die maie eaſilie conſider. For there I did vpbraid
" him, with what fauour I haue alwaies vſed him,
" what honorable opinion I haue had of him and of " his conditions in my ſpéech vſed to others, and of his " vnthankefulneſſe to me therefore; with all other " things that might deliuer me out of his hands. Theſe " matters I laied againſt him with bitter words. But " his anſwers thervnto were more mild, and tempe" red with gentler ſpéeches, in this, that he would ſtill
" vſe all honor and dutie towards vs, and labor by all " means to haue our good will, whom he would not of" fend.
" As touching this, that he had againſt our will cari-
" ed vs into one of our own caſtels, he humblie craued
" pardon therefore (in that he was inforced therevnto)
" although in the ſame he had forgotten that reue-
" rence and dutie, which euerie ſubiect owght vnto vs.
" Wherevnto he added, that he did the ſame for our " ſafetie and defenſe. At which time alſo he began to re" peat vnto me the whole courſe of his life, lamenting
" his fortune, to haue them (whome he neuer hurt) ſo
" gréeuouſlie offended with him, that their malice had " not ouerpaſſed ante occaſions vniuſtlie to hurt him
" withall.
" But eſpeciallie in this, that their great enuie had " burdened him with the murther of the king, and that " his power was vnequall to reſiſt the ſecret conſpira" cies of his enimies, whome he could not know; be" cauſe they did in ſhew and ſpéeches diſſemble their
" friendſhip: & not knowing them, there was no waie
" for him to foreſée and auoid their deceipts. Whoſe ex" treme hatred was now growen to ſuch height, that
" he could not liue in ſafetie in ante place, or at ante
" time, except he might be aſſured of the quéenes vn" changeable fauour towards him. Which certeintie of " hir fauor could not be ſhewed but by this one meane,
" to perſuade hir ſelfe to receiue him into the mariage
" bed. At what time he did moſt holilie ſweare, that he " gaped not after anie extraordinarie gouernement,
" or that he would leape to the higheſt ſtep of ſupreme
" rule thereby; but onlie to reape this fruit thereof, that " he might ſerue and obeie hir as long as he liued, in " ſuch ſort as he did before. Wherevnto he added the de" lights of ſuch ſpéeches as that matter required.
" But in the end, when he ſaw that we could not be
" moued therevnto, either with praiers or promiſes,
" he ſhewed vnto vs what he had done with the whole
" nobilitie, and the chiefe of the parlement, and what " they againe had promiſed vnder their hands. Which " being ſuddenlie and vnhoped for laied againſt vs,
" whether it did with iuſt cauſe greatlie aſtoniſh vs, we leaue to the conſideration of the king, the quéene, our vncles, and the reſt of our friends. Wherefore, when "
I perceiued my ſelfe a priſoner vnder the power of "
an other man, farre from the helpe of all thoſe whoſe " counſell I did and ſhould haue vſed; yea and that I " ſaw them before my face, in whoſe former faith and " wiſedome I did repoſe my ſelfe; whoſe ſtrength did " defend our authoritie, and without which our power was but ſmall or none: when (I ſay) I had ſéene " all theſe to haue vowed themſelues to ſerue his de-ſire, and that I was alone left a préie for him, I did " with my ſelfe in my mind conſider manie things, " but could bring none of them to effect.
Beſides which, he gaue to vs but ſhort time to take " anie aduiſe, but incontinentlie and importunatlie did " ſtill vrge the ſame vnto me. At length, when I ſaw " no waie to eſcape by flight, nor anie perſon of all our " kingdome which had anie care of our libertie (for we "
well perceiued by their hands giuen, and by their " deepe ſilence at that time, that they were all drawen " to take his part) I was compelled (after that I a lit- " tle pacified mine anger & diſpleaſure againſt him) to " refer my ſelfe to the diſcuſſe and conſideration of his " demands, & to laie before my ſelfe his dutie in times " paſt, and the hope which we had of the following con- " tinuance of the ſame towards vs. "
And further, how greeuouſlie our people would " ſuffer a ſtrange king, and heauilie receiue one vnac- " quainted, and not inured with their lawes and cu- " ſtoms, that they would not ſuffer me long to liue vn- " maried, and that the people (being by nature facti- " ous) could not be kept in obedience, except our au- " thoritie were ſupported and practiſed by a man which " could equall them in bearing labor, and were able to " bridle the inſolencie of rebels in the adminiſtration " of the common wealth: the weight of which charge, " our power (being weakened and almoſt brought to "
nothing by continuall tumults and rebellions, ſince " our comming into Scotland) was not able anie " longer to ſuſteine. For by reaſon of theſe ſeditions, " we were inforced to appoint foure or more deputies " in diuerſe parts of our realmes, which afterward al- " ſo did (vnder the colour of the authoritie which they " were permitted to vſe vnder vs) inforce our owne " ſubiects to take armes againſt vs. "
For all which cauſes, when we well perceiued that " if we labored to preſerue the dignitie of kinglie ma- " ieſtie, that they would inforce me to mariage, that " our people could not abide a forren prince, and that a- " mongeſt our owne ſubiects, there was not anie " which for the nobilitie of his familie, for his wiſdome " and valure, or for other vertues of bodie and mind, " might be preferred before or equalled vnto him, "
I commanded my ſelfe to ioine with the whole con- " ſent of the parlement, and aſſemblie of the nobilitie " before mentioned. After that my former conſtant de- " termination was thus ſomewhat mollified by theſe " and other reaſons, he did wring from me partlie by " force, and partlie by intreatie, a promiſe to him of " mariage. "
Which done, we could not yet by ante meanes and " perſuaſion obteine of him (fearing an alteration in " our mind) that the time wherein this mariage ſhould " be performed, might be deferred ſo long, as that we " might participat the ſame with the king and quéene " of France, and ſuch other friends as we had remai- " ning in thoſe parts. For he beginning with a bold at- " tempt (after that he had once thereby atteined the " firſt ſtep of his deſire) did neuer after that ceaſſe to "
ioine importunat praiers to his perſuaſions and ar- " guments of reaſon, vntill he did without violence " inforce vs to ſet end to the woorke begun, and that at " ſuch time, and after ſuch order, as ſeemed moſt con- " uenient vnto him for the execution of his determi- " nation

"nation. In which matter I cannot diſſemble, but "that I was otherwiſe intreated by him, than either
"I would or had deſerued.
"For he was more carefull to ſatiſfie them, by
"whoſe conſent (ſhewed at the beginning) he thought "himſelfe to haue obteined his purpoſe (though he did
"both deceiue them and mée) than to gratifie me, or
"to weie how méet it were for me, being brought vp
"in the precepts and rites of our religion; from which,
"neither he nor anie man liuing, whileſt I did liue,
"could draw me awaie (aliue) by anie action. In which
"thing trulie, though we dow acknowledge our error,
"yet we willinglis deſire, that the king and quéene
"his mother, our vncle, or anie friend of ours, dow not "expoſtulat with him, nor anie waie laie the fault vn-
"to his charge.
"For ſith things be now ſo ended, as that they "cannot be againe vndone, we take all things in the "beſt part: & as he is in déed, ſo he is to be accounted
"our huſband, whome from henceforwards we haue
"determined both to loue & reuerence. Wherefore all
"they which profeſſe themſelues to be our friends,
"muſt alſo ſhew the like to him which is ioined vnto
"vs with an indiſſoluble knot. And although he hath
"in manie things behaued himſelfe leſſe diligentlie, &
"almoſt ouer-raſhlie, which we willinglie impute to
"his immoderat affection towards vs; yet we deſire
"the king, the quéene, our vncle, and the reſt of our "friends, no leſſe to loue and fauor him, than if all "things had till this day béene done after their aduiſe
"and determination; in the behalfe of which our huſ-
"band, we promiſe that he ſhall in all things (which "ſhalbe required of him hereafter) alwaies grati-
"fie them in what he maie.

Theſe remedies being found to defend the quéens credit amongſt forren princes, other remedies were to be ſought for defenſe of hir owne perſon againſt hir owne ſubiects. Wherefore (after that the earle of Murrete was appointed to remaine as baniſhed be-yond the ſeas in France, whither he toke his iour-nie through England) the quéene (deliuered of ſuch a feare as he was to hir, & therfore better able to rule, or at leaſt to make better ſhift, with ſuch other as were conſured, to vſe Buchanans word, againſt hir) vſed what diligence ſhe might to gather forces, eſpe-ciallie in the Mers and eaſt Louthian.]

The quéene gathereth forces.

And thinking that the enterprize of the lords had béene broken and diſappointed, they marched from Dunbar on ſaturdaie the fourth of June, firſt to Hathington, & there reſting till the euen, ſet forward to Gladiſmore, and taking there deliberation in the matter; they lodged that night at Seiton, and in the morning marched in order of battell towards Carbarrie hill, and there choſe forth a plot of ground of great aduantage, appointing to fight on foot, be-cauſe the power of the lords in number of horſſe-men, was ſtronger than the quéens, and of greater experience. There were with the quéene and Both-well, the lords Seiton, Peſter, and Borthwike; al-ſo the lards of Wauchton, Bas, Drmiſton, Wea-derburne, Blackater, and Langton. They had with them alſo two hundred harquebuſiers waged, and of great artilleric ſome field péeces. Their whole number was eſtéemed to be about 2000: but the more part of them were commons & countriemen.

The earles of Morton, Atholl, War, Glencarne, the lords of Hunte, Lindſeie, Ruthwen, Sempill, Sanquhar; the lards of Drumlangrig, Tulibar-den, Grange, and yong Seſford, were aſſembled togither at Edenburgh with a power like in num-ber to the quéens, but for the more part conſiſting of gentlemen, although not furniſhed with anie num-ber of harquebuſiers, except a few of the townſmen of Edenburgh, that willinglie ioined with them in that quarrell. Upon the fifteenth of June, they came forth of the towne, and approched their aduerſaries. But there was monſieur la Croque, the French kings ambaſſadour, who toke great paine, in tra-uelling betwixt the parties to reduce them to ſome a-gréement. * Who by his interpretor laid before them how carefullie he had ſtudied for the commoditie & tranquillitie of the publike ſtate of Scotland before this; and that now alſo he caried the ſame mind with him. Wherefore he did vehementlie deſire (if it were poſſible) that the matter might be ſo taken vp, for the commoditie of both parties; that it might be ended without force or bloudſhed. For the compaſ-ſing whereof, he would imploie all his trauell, ſith the quéene alſo did not refuſe to heare the counſell & perſuaſion of peace. For the more certeintie wherof, he did at that time promiſe them pardon and vtter forgetfulneſſe of all things paſſed before time; & did with great holineſſe there pledge him ſelfe, that no hurt ſhould fall vnto anie man there, for taking weapon againſt the higheſt gouernor.

Fr. Thin. Bucha. lib. 18.

After that the interpretor had deliuered theſe things, the earle of Morton anſwered, that he did not take armor againſt the quéene; but againſt him that had killed the king. Whome if the quéene would deliuer to puniſhment, or ſeparat him from hir; ſhe ſhould well vnderſtand, that they & the reſt of hir ſub-iects held nothing more déere vnto them, than to con-tinue in their dutifull obedience: without which gran-ted to them, there could be no agréement made; be-cauſe they came not thither to craue pardon for anie offenſe which they had committed (wherevnto the earle of Glencarne added) but rather to giue pardon to ſuch as had offended.]

Wherfore the ambaſſador Croque returned backe to Edenburgh, and the quéens part began to de-creaſe, diuerſe ſhrinking awaie from hir; ſo that af-ter it began to grow towards the euening, Both-well fled to the caſtell of Dunbar. But the quéene deſirous to talke with William Kircadie the lard of Grange, went to him, accompanied onelie with one capteine, and after ſome talke with him, ſhe paſſed to the lords, who toke hir with them to Edenburgh, [ſhe being in a ſhort garment, baſe, & worne, com-ming a little beneath hir knees (as ſaith Buchanan) of which lords ſhe requeſted that they would ſuffer hir to depart, & not to kéepe hir in that ſort.] The Ha-miltons were on the waie comming to aſſiſt the quéene, with ſeuen or eight hundred horſſemen; but before they could reach to the place, the quéene was in the hands of the lords, and ſo they returned.

The quéene commeth to the lords.

Fr. Thin.

The lard of Cragmiller [then prouoſt of Eden-burgh] and ſir James Balfure alſo the capteine of the caſtell, were ioined in this confederacie with the lords, as ſhortlie after it appeared. The quéene after this was conueied ouer the Forth, and brought to Lochleuin, where ſhe was appointed to remaine in ward vnder the ſafe kéeping of William Dowglas lard of that place. The earle Bothwell, eſcaping to Dunbar, found meanes to flée into Denmarke, where he was ſtaied and committed to priſon, where-in at length he died. Diuerſe perſons afterwards were apprehended as parties to the murther of the king, and thereupon condemned, were executed, confeſſing the ſaid earle to be the principall executor of the ſame murther. * Leauing the quéene therfore in this miſerable plight, we will not yet forget (for the honor ſhe once had) to ſet downe certeine verſes made by Alexander Seton a Scot, in the commen-dation of hir anceſtors, and of hir; who in the firſt yeares of hir gouernement vſed hir ſelfe to the good liking of all hir ſubiects. In which verſes Seton doth further meane, that Leſle ſhould hereafter ſet forth hir gouernement, as he hath done that of the

A proauis ne ſim degener ipſe meis.]

Iames the ſixt.

The nineténth of Julie, Charles Iames the yong prince of Scotland, after a ſermon made by Iohn Knor, was crowned king of the Scots in Sterling church, where were read certeine letters of commiſſion and procuration, with the quéens priuie ſeale at them for the eſtabliſhing of the ſame coronation. The firſt, for hir reſignation of the crowne and gouernement of the yong prince hir ſonne. The ſecond, to authorize the earle of Murreie to be regent during the kings minoritie. The third, to giue authoritie and power to ſeuen other ioining with the ſaid earle of Murreie, in caſe he ſhould refuſe to exerciſe the ſame alone; that is to ſay, the duke of Chaſtelerault, the earls of Lennor, Argile, Atholl, Morton, Glencarne, and Mar. The tenors of which letters of commiſſion and procuration do héere inſue, as we find them imprinted at Edenburgh by Robert Lekpreuic printer to the king of Scots, the firſt of Aprill 1568, among the acts of parlement begun and holden at Edenburgh, the fiftéenth of December, in the yeare 1567, by Iames earle of Murreie lord Abernethie, &c: regent vnto the ſaid king.

The tenor of the commiſſion, where-by Marie the queene of Scots reſigneth the crowne to hir ſonne, appointeth his gardians, and maketh the earle of Murreie regent.

MArie be the grace of God quene of Scottis, to all and ſindrie our iudgeis and miniſteris of law, liegis and ſubiectis, quhome it effeiris to quhais knalege thir our letteris ſall come, greting. Forſamekle as by lang irkeſome and tedious trauell takin by vs, in the gouernament of this our realme and liegis thairof, we are ſa verit and weritit, that our bodie, ſpirit, and ſenſis are altogeddir become vnhabill langer to trauell in that rowme: and thairfore we haue dimittit and renuncit the office of gouernament of this our realme and liegis thairof, in fauouris of our anelie maiſt deir ſonne, natiue prince of this our realme. And becauſe of his tender zouth and inhabilitie to vſe the ſaid gouernament in his awin perſoun, during his minoritie, we haue conſtitute our derreſt brother Iames earle of Murreie, lord Abernethie, &c: regent to our ſaid ſonne, realme and liegis foirſaidis.

And in reſpect that our ſaid derreſt brother is actuallie furth of our realme, and cannot inſtantlie be preſent to accept the ſaid office of regentrie vpon him, and vſe and exerce the ſamin during our ſaidis derreſt ſonis minoritie; we quhill his returning within our relme, or in cais of his deceis haue maid, conſtitute, namit, appointit, & ordainit, and by thir our letteris makis, conſtitutis, namis, appointis, and ordainis our traiſt conſingis and counſalouris, Iames duke of Chatelerault, earle of Arrane, lord Hamiltoun, Matho earle of Leuinar, lord Dernleie, &c: Archibald earle of Argile, lord Campbell and Lorne, &c: Iohn earle of Atholl, Iames earle of Mortoun, Alexander earle of Glencarne, and Iohn earle of Mar, regentis to our ſaid derreſt ſon, realme and liegis; & in cais our ſaid brother Iames earle of Murreie cum within our realme, and refuſis to accept the ſaid office of regentrie vpon his ſingular perſoun, we make, conſtitute, name, appoint, and ordeine, our traiſt conſingis and counſallouris foirſaidis, and our ſaid brother regentis of our ſaid deir ſonne, realme, and liegis.

Geuand, grantand, and committand to thame, or onie fiue of thame coniunctlie full power for our ſaid ſonne, and in his name to reſaue reſignatiounis of landis, make diſpoſitiounis of wairdis, nonentreſſis, releuis, mariageis, beneficis, eſchetis, officis, and vtheris caſualiteis and priuilegeis, quhat ſumeuer concerning the ſaid office, ſignatouris thair vpon to make, ſubſcriue, and cauſe be paſt throughe the ſeillis. And to vſe and exerce the ſaid office of regentrie in all thingis, priuilegeis, and commoditeis, ſiclike as frélie and with als greit libertie as onie regent or gouernor to vs or our predeceſſouris vſit the ſamin in onye times bigan. Promittand to hald firme and ſtabill in the word and faith of ane prince, to quhatſumeuer thingis our ſaidis traiſt couſingis dois in the premiſſis.

Charging heirfore zow all and ſindrie our iudgeis and miniſteris of law, liegis and ſubiectis foirſaidis, to anſwer and obeie to our ſaidis traiſt conſingis, regentis foirſadis in all and ſindrie thingis concerning the ſaid office of regentrie, during our ſaid derreſt ſonis minoritie, and ay and quhill he be of the age of ſeuentæne zeiris compleit. As ze and ilke ane of zow will declair zow luiſing ſubiectis to our ſaid maiſt deir ſon, zour natiue prince, and vnder all paine, charge, and offenſe that ze and ilke ane of zow maie commit and incur agains his maieſtie in that pairt. Subſcriuit with our hand, and giuen vnder our priuie ſeill, at Lochleuin, the foure and twentith day of Julij, and of our reigne the fiue and twentith zeir.

The commiſſion, authoriſing certeine *noble men in the queens name, to re-*nounce the kingdome to hir ſonne, and authoriſing others to receiue the ſame in hir ſons name.

MArie be the grace of God quéene of Scotis, to all and ſindrie our iudgeis, and miniſteris of law, liegis, and ſubiects; quhome it effeiris, to quhais knalege thir our letteris ſall cum, greting. Forſamekle as ſen our arriuall, and returning within our realme, we willing the commoun commoditie, welth, profeit, and quietnes thairof, liegis, and ſubiectis of the ſamin, haue emploit our bodie, ſpirit, haill ſenſis, and forcis, to gouerne the ſamin in ſic ſort, that our rotall and honorabill eſtate micht ſtand and continue with vs, and our poſteritie, and our luiſing and kind liegis micht inioie the quietnſſe of true ſubiectis. In trauelling quhairin, not anelie is our bodie, ſpirit, and ſenſis ſa verit, brokin, and vnquietit, that langer we are not of habilitie be onie meanis to indure ſa greit and intollerabill panis and trauellis, quhairwith we ar altogidder weritit, bot als greit commotiounis and troublis be ſindrie occaſiounis in the meintime hes enſuit thairin, to our greit greif.

And ſeing it hes béene the pleſour of the eternall God,

God, of his kindlie luſe, mercie, and gudnes to grant vnto vs, of our awin perſoun, ane ſone, quha in cais be the hand of God we be veſeit, will, and of richt, and of equitie man, and aucht to ſucceid to vs and to the gouernement of our realme. And knawing that all creaturis ar ſubiect to that immutabill decreit of the eternall, ains to rander and gif vp this life tempozall (the hour and time quhairof is maiſt vncertane) and in cais be deceis we be takin fra this life, during the time of his minozitie, it maie be dowtit greitlie, that reſiſtance and troubill maie be maid to our ſaid ſon, now natiue pzince of this our realme, in his tender zeires (being ſwa deſtitute of vs) to ſucceid to that rowme and kingdome, quhilk maiſt iuſtlie of all lawis apperteneis to him. Quhilk inconuenience be Godis helpe and gud pzouidence we mene to pzeuent, in ſick maner, that it ſall not lie in the power of onie vnnaturall ſubiects to reſiſt Godis ordinance in that behalfe. And vnderſtanding that na thing eirdlie is mair ioious, and happie to vs, noz to ſee our ſaid derreſt ſonne, in our awin life time peciablie placit in that rowme, and honozabill eſtate quhairto he iuſtlie aucht and man ſucceid to: we of the motherlie affectioun we beir toward our ſaid onlie ſonne, haue renuncit, and dimittit, and be thir our letteris freelie, of our awin motiue will renuncis, & dimittis the gouernement, guiding and gouerning of this our realme of Scotland, liegis, and ſubiects thairof, and all intromiſſioun and diſpoſitioun of onie caſualiteis, pzoperties, benefices, and offices, and all thingis apperteining, oz heirtofoir is knawin, oz heireftir ſall happen to appertein thairto, in fauouris of our ſaid derreſt ſone. To that effect, that he maie be plantit, placit, & poſſeſſit thairin, vſe & exerce all thingis belang and thairto, as natiue king, and pzince of the ſamis, & ſiclike as we oz onie our pzedeceſſouris, kingis of Scottis, hes done in onie times bypaſt.

Attour, that this our dimiſſioun maie tak the mair ſolempne effect, and that nane pzetend ignozance thairof, we haue giuin, grantit, and committit, and be thir our letteris, geuis, grantis, & committis our commiſſioun full, fre, and plane powar, generall, & ſpeciall command, to our traiſt couſingis, Patrike lozd Lindeſaie of the Biris, and William lozd Ruthuen, and to ilk ane of thame coniunctlie and ſeuerallie, to compeir befoze ſa monie of the nobilitie, clergie, burgeſſis, and vther pepill of our realme, as ſall happin to be aſſemblit to that effect in our burgh of Striuiling, oz anie vther place, oz placis quhair it ſall be thocht maiſt conuenient, at onie daie oz daiis, and thair publikelie in thair pzeſence, foz vs, in our name, and vpon our behalf dimit, and renunce the gouernement, guiding, & reuling of this our realme, liegis, and ſubiects thairof, all intromiſſioun with the pzopertie, caſualtie, oz vtheris things apperteining to vs thairby, and all richt, and title that we had, hes, oz maie haue be onie maner of way thairto, in fauouris of our ſaid ſon, to that effect, that he maie be inaugurat, placit, and rowmit thairin, and the crowne roiall deliuerit to him, and be obeyit in all thingis concerning the ſamin, as we, oz our pzedeceſſouris hes beene in times bypaſt.

And in likewiſe be thir pzeſents geuis, grantis, and committis our full, fre, and plane powar, to our richt traiſt couſingis, James earle of Mozton, lozd of Dalkeith, Johne earle of Atholl, &c: Johne earle of Mar, &c: Alexander earle of Glencarne, William earle of Menteith, Johne maiſter of Grahame, Alexander lozd Hume, Adam biſchop of Orkneie, the pzouoſtis of Dundie, Montrois, oz onie of thame, to reſſaue the ſaid renuntiatioun, and dimiſſioun in fauouris of our ſaid ſon, and thair efter the reſſauing thairof, to plant, place, and inaugurat him in the kingdome, and with all ceremonies requiſit to put the crowne roiall vpon his heid, in ſigne and takin of the eſtabliſing of him thairin, and in his name to make, and gif to the ſaidis nobilitie, clergie, burgeſſis, and vtheris our liegis, his pzincelie and kinglie aith deitfullie, & lauchfullie as effeiris: and to reſſaue thair aithis, foz due and lauchfull homage to be maid be thame to him, in all times cuming, as becumis ſubiects to thair natiue king and pzince. And generallie all and ſundzie vther thingis to dow, exerce, and vſe, that foz ſure perfozmance and accompliſhment heirof maie, oz can be done, firme and ſtable haldand, and foz to hald all and quhat ſumeuer thingis in our name, in the pzemiſſis leidis to be done, in the wozd and faithfull pzomis of ane pzince. And ozdanis thir our letteris (gif neid be is) to be publiſt at all places neidfull. Subſcriuit with our hand, and giuin vnder our pzeute ſeill, at Lochleuin the foure and twentith daie of Julij, and of our reigne the fiue and twentith zeir, 1567.

The commiſſion, in which the earle of Murreie is alone appointed to be regent of the yoong king, and of his kingdome.

MArie be the grace of God, quéene of Scots, to all & ſindzie our iudgis, and miniſteris of our lawis, liegis, and ſubiects, quhome it effeiris, to quhais knalege thir our letteris ſall cum, greting. Foz ſamekle as efter lang, greit, and intollerable panis, & labouris takin be vs ſen our arriuall within our realme, foz gouernement thairof, and keeping of the liegis of the ſame in quietnes, we haue not anelie beene berit in our ſpirit, bodie, and ſenſis thairby, bot als at lenth ar altogidder ſa berit thairof, that our habilitie, and ſtrenth of bodie is not habill langer to indure the ſamin: thairfoze, and becauſe nathing eirdlie can be mair confoztabill and happie to vs in this eird, noz in our life time, than to ſe our deir ſon, the natiue pzince of this our realme, placit in the kingdome thairof, and the crowne roiall ſet on his heid, we of our owin fre will, an ſpeciall motiue, haue dimittit, and renuncit the gouernement, giding, and gouerning of this our realme of Scotland, liegis, and ſubiects thairof, in fauouris of our ſaid ſon, to that effect: that in all times heirafter, he maie peciablie, and quietlie enioie the ſamin, without troubill, an be obeit as natiue king, and pzince of the ſamin be the liegis thairof.

And vnderſtanding that (be reſoun of his tender zouth) he is not of habilitie in his awin perſoun to adminiſtrate in his kinglie rowme and gouernement, as equitie requiris, quhill that heireftir he cum to the zeires of diſcretioun; and als knawing the pzoximitie of blude ſtandand betuirt vs, our ſaid ſone, and our derreſt brother James erle of Murray, lozd Abirnethie, &c; and hauand experience of the naturall affectioun, and tenderlie luſe he hes in all times bozne, and pzeſentlie beires towardis vs, the honour & eſtate of our ſaid ſone; of quhais luſe and fauour towardis him we can not bot aſſure our ſelfe: to quhome na greter honour, ioy, noz felicitie in eird can cum, noz to ſe our ſaid ſone inaugurat in his kingdome, feirit, reuerencit, and obeit be his liegis thairof. In reſpect quhairof, and of the certanetie, and notozitie, of the honeſtie, habilitie, qualificatioun, and ſufficiencie of our ſaid derreſt brother, to haue the cure and regiment of our ſaid ſone, realme, and liegis foirſaidis, during our ſaid ſonis minozitie: we haue maid, namid, appointit, conſtitute, tute, and ordanit, and be thir our letteris namis, appointis, makis, conſtitutis, and ordanis our ſaid derreſt brother James erle of Murray, regent to our ſaid derreſt ſone, realme, and liegis foirſaidis, during his minoritie and les age, and ay and quhill he be of the age of ſeuintene zeiris compleit. And that our ſaid brother be callit, during the ſaid ſpace, regent to our ſaid ſone, his realme, and liegis.

Swa that our ſaid ſone efter the completing of the zeiris foirſaidis, in his awin perſoun may tak vpon him the ſaid gouernement, and vſe, and exerce all and ſindrie priuilegis, honouris, and vtheris immunitetis that appertenis to the office of ane king, als weill in gouerning his realme and pepill, accoirding to the lawis, as in repreſſing the violence of ſic as wald inuaid, or iniuſtlie reſiſt him or thame, or his authoritie roiall. With power to our ſaid derreſt brother James erle of Murray, in name, authoritie, and behalfe of our ſaid maiſt deir ſone, to reſſaue reſignatiounis of quhatſumeuer landis haldin of him, or zit of offices, caſtels, towris, fortalicis, milnis, fiſchingis woddis, beneficis, or pertinencis quhatſumeuer; the ſamin againe in our ſaid ſonis name to gif, and deliuer ſignaturis thairvpon: and vpon the giftis of wairdis, nonentreſſis, and releuis of landis, and mariageis of airis falland, or that ſall happin to fall in our ſaid ſonis handis as ſuperiour thairof.

And als vpon preſentatioun of landis, beneficis, eſchetis of guids mouabill and vnmouabill, dettis and takkis, reſpittis, remiſſiounis, ſupерſedereis, and vpon the diſpoſitioun of officis vacand, or quhen they ſall happin to vaik, to ſubſcriue, and cauſe be paſt the ſeillis the ſaid office of regentrie, to vſe and exerce in all thingis, priuilegis, and commoditeis, ſicklike as frelie, and with als greit libertie, as ony regent, or gouernour to vſe, or our predeceſſouris vſit in ony times bigane, and ſicklike as gif euerie heid, priuilege and article concerning the ſaid office wer at lenth expreſſit and amplifiit in thir our letteris. Promiſand to hald firme and ſtabill in the word and faith of ane prince, to quhatſumeuer thingis our ſaid derreſt brother in the premiſſis happinnis to do. Chargeing heirfoir zow all, and ſindrie our iudgeis, and miniſteris of law, liegis, and ſubiectis foirſaidis, to anſwer and obey to our ſaid derreſt brother, in all and ſindrie thingis concerning the ſaid office of regentrie, as ze and ilke ane of zow will declair zow luiſing ſubiectis, to our ſaid maiſt deir ſone, and vnder all paine, charge, and offenſe that ze and ilke ane of zow may commit, and incur againis his maieſtie in that pairt. Subſcriuit with our hand, and geuin vnder our preuie ſeill, at Lochleuin the 14 day of Julij. And of our reigne, the twentie fiue zeir.

The kings oth.

These commiſſions being read, the biſhop of Argile, with two ſuperintendents, proceeded to the coronation: the earle of Morton, and the lord Hume toke the oth for the king, that he ſhould rule in the faith, feare, and loue of God, and to mainteine the religion then preached and exerciſed in Scotland, and to perſecute all aduerſaries to the ſame. The whole ceremonie was done in the Scots Engliſh tong, the quéene mother to the king remaining at

Fr. Thin. that time priſoner in Lochleuin. ✻ But before we enter into the augmentation of the hiſtorie of this kings time, I thinke it not vnmeet to deliuer one thing, which I haue with ſome wonder obſerued in all the kings of Scotland deſcended of the Stewards: that neuer anie one of them except the firſt & ſecond king of that name was of the age of man, or of one and twentie yéeres when they put on the kinglie ornaments. A rare thing, and not vnméet to be conſidered of, although we can not enter into the ſecret iudgements of God. The proofe of which matter, being after this ſort, I haue ſet downe in a catalog of the orderlie deſcent of thoſe kings. In the computation of the yéeres of whoſe age and firſt comming to the crowne I haue followed Leſleus.

Robert Steward the firſt king of that ſurname, was 57 yéeres old when he began his reigne, in the yéere of our redemption 1370. Iohn Steward ſon of the ſaid Robert began his reigne 1390. These two alone were of full age, when the title of the kingdome deſcended vnto them. James Steward, the firſt of the name of James, & the third of the name of Stewards, was within age at the death of his father, when the title and crowne deſcended vnto him: who although he receiued not the crowne at Scone (becauſe he was about eightéene yéeres honorablie kept as a priſoner in England) vntill hée was of mans age: yet being king in right, and the crowne inueſted in him when he was within age, I doubt not to make him king from the death of his father, and ſo within age to haue obteined the kingdome, though not the kinglie vſe thereof, beginning his reigne in the yéere of our redemption 1424.

James the ſecond, and the fourth of the Stewards, was ſix yéeres old when he was crowned, in the yéere of Chriſt 1436. James the third, and fift of the Stewards, being ſeuen yeares old, was crowned king of Scotland in the yéere that the word became fleſh 1460. James the fourth, and ſixt of the Stewards, being ſixtéene yeares of age, was adorned with the enſignes of the kingdome, in the yéere of our ſaluation 1488. James the fift, and the ſeuenth of the Stewards, being one yéere, fiue moneths, and ten dais old, was crowned king of Scotland, in the yéere from the birth of Chriſt 1513. Marie the eight of the name of Stewards, being but ſeuen daies old, was crowned quæne of Scots, in the yéere of Chriſt 1542. Henrie Steward, ſonne to Matthew earle of Lennox, and huſband to the ſaid Marie Steward, was not one and twentie yéeres old, when he came to be king in the right of his wife Marie: for he was not paſt one and twentie when he was ſlaine, as before in the yéere 1567. Charles James Steward, the firſt of the name of James, and the ninth of the ſurname of Stewards, ſonne of the ſaid Henrie Steward and Marie Steward, being about a yéere old, began his reigne in the yéere that God became man 1567. To whome Andrew Melvine (this yéere 1585 in England) did whileſt he was in Scotland dedicate theſe verſes following:

Dum tu, magne puer, patribus das iura vocatis,
Et populi penſas crimina lance pari,
Iura tibi, tuus ille Solon, tuus ille Lycurgus,
Quæ recti è puris fontibus hauſta dedit,
Nobilium regum exemplis obſignat auitis,
Hîc, vbi quid fugias, quídue ſequaris, habes.
Felix, ſi fugias fugienda, ſequenda ſequaris!
Felix cum populo túq; patréſq; tuo.

Out of the booke printed thereof.

There was order taken by the magiſtrates of the reformed churches, aſſembled for that purpoſe, touching the diſcipline of excommunication, and the excommunicated, diuided into theſe heads: that is to ſay, what crimes be worthie of that ſeuere cenſure of the church by excommunication: how the miniſter ſhall behaue himſelfe in publike audience of the people: of confeſſion of the penitent: of the offenſes which merit publike repentance: of the order to proceed therein: the forme and the order of publike repentance: an admonition to the church: a thankeſgiuing for the conuerſion and repentance of the cenſured: the forme of the excommunication: the praier for the obſtinate that will not repent after that cenſure: the praier before the excommunication:

cation: the maner to inuocate the name of Jeſus, with the ſentence of excommunication: the order to receiue the excommunicate againe into the church: the forme of the abſolution: and laſtlie the praier for the church. Which booke conteining the diſcourſe of theſe matters at large, with authoritie of ſcriptures and reaſons, was ſet forth by John Knox miniſter, and commanded to be printed by the generall aſſemblie, in the yéere of Chriſt 1569, being ſéene and allowed by thoſe which follow, appointed to that function by the ſaid aſſemblie: whoſe names were John Willike, maiſter John Crage, Robert Pont, John Row, Dauid Lindſcie, William Chriſtiſon, James Greg, &c.

A parlement holden at Edenburgh.

On the fifteenth of December a parlement begun, being holden at Edenburgh before the earle of Murreie lord regent, in the which diuers acts and ſtatutes were deuiſed, made, and ratified: as firſt concerning the quéenes demiſſion of hir crowne, and reſignation thereof made to hir ſonne king James the firſt. And likewiſe concerning the inſtituting of the earle of Murreie in the regencie of the realme, which he tooke vpon him the two and twentith day of Auguſt laſt paſt, according to hir letters of commiſſion and procuration aboue ſpecified. Alſo there was an act made for the aboliſhing of the pope, and his vſurped authoritie. And an other act for the annulling of former acts made in parlement for maintenance of ſuperſtition and idolatrie. And hereto was annexed a confeſſion of the faith and doctrine receiued by the proteſtants of the realme of Scotland, authoriſed in the ſame parlement. There was alſo an act made for the indemnitie of thoſe that had leuied warre, and apprehended the queene at Carbarrie hill, the fiftéenth of Julie laſt paſt, and concerning the deteining of hir in Lochleuin.

An act for the aboliſhing of the popes authoritie in Scotland.

The caſtell of Dunbar and the fortreſſe of Inſketh to be raced.

Moreouer, it was ordeined by an act paſſed in this parlement, that the caſtell of Dunbar, and the fortreſſe of Inſketh, ſhould be demoliſhed and raced downe to the earth. To be briefe, there were one and fortie acts or ſtatutes made and ſtabliſhed in this parlement, as by the regiſter thereof it maie appéere.

Fr. Thin. Buchanan. lib. 19.

* In the firſt beginning of the ſpring, the gouernor determined to make a progreſſe ouer the realme, with the iudges that were appointed to adminiſter law: which he ment to do, to the end that he might amend and eſtabliſh ſuch things as were indamaged by the tumults of the yéere before. Which matter working diuerſe opinions in thoſe of the quéenes faction, did cauſe that Metellane and John Balfurie ſought meanes to deliuer the quéene out of priſon. Touching which matter alſo the Hamiltons labored who (being next to the crowne, if the yong king were gone, and the quéene made awaie, both which perhaps was no great matter to procure) did ioine with the queenes faction and fauourers. Whoſe part in like manner the earles of Atholl and Huntleie refuſed not to take, becauſe the mother of the one, and the wife of the other, were of the familie of the Hamiltons.

William Murreie of Tillibartine, for his contrarie opinion in the controuerſies of religion, and for priuat quarrels, being eſtranged and grieued from and with the gouernor, did not onelie now depart from the kings faction (although before he ſhewed great diligence in taking the quéene) but did alſo draw with him a great companie of his friends intiſed thereunto with no ſmall hope of benefit to riſe vnto them thereby. And as theſe were heads and chiefe of ſuch as ſought the quéenes deliuerance: ſo there were a great manie other, whom priuat neceſſitie, ſecret grudge, deſire of reuenge, hope of aduancement, and néereneſſe of aliance to thoſe which are before named, procured to follow, and to further the cauſe of the quéenes libertie. In the meane time, whileſt the regent was at Glaſcow to miniſter law to ſuch as required it (and that he had there heard of theſe things) this determination of ſetting the quéene at libertie was put in execution, the manner whereof was in this ſort. There was in the caſtell of Lochleuin, wherein the quéene was kept as priſoner, the mother of the regent, and three of his brethren by an other father, with a great troupe of women: but none were admitted to ſee the quéene, ſaue ſuch as were well knowen or ſent thither by the regent.

Of all this houſhold companie, there was none that ſéemed ſo meet to the queene to execute anie matter, as was George Dowglas the yongeſt brother of the regent, being a man of a pleaſant wit, and eaſilie to be ouertaken with the faire ſpeeches of women. This man had acceſſe vnto the quéene to plaie at cards, and to vſe hir with other courtlie paſtimes: who determining to ſet hir at libertie, did with promiſes and gifts win the ſeruants of the caſtell to fauour him and his enterpriſes. Whereupon this Dowglaſſe (not vnwitting as was thought to his mother) omitteth nothing that might ſéeme to ſerue for the queenes libertie: the which although manie there did perceiue & tooke not in verie good part, giuing intelligence therof to the regent; yet he gaue ſuch credit to his owne people there, that he changed (as hath Buchanan) none of the kéepers in that place, but onelie commanded his brother George to depart out of the Iland. This ſaid George, when he paſſed into the nert countrie adioining to the lake, in which the caſtell ſtood, did more liberallie than before (by corrupting the kéepers with monie) conſult with the quéene of all hir affaires.

Wherefore not onelie the Scots (whome the preſent ſtate of things did miſlike) being drawen into that faction; but alſo the Frenchmen by James Hamilton (which had béene regent not manie yéeres before) and James archbiſhop of Glaſcow ſollicited thereunto, the Scots promiſed their bodilie force, and the French promiſed their helping purſe. Now about the end of Aprill, an ambaſſador came out of France requiring in the name of his king, that he might haue leaue to go to the quéene: which if he were denied, he made ſhew that he would preſentlie depart. Whereunto the gouernor anſwered, that it was not in his power to grant it: that the quéene was not committed to priſon by him, and that he could not determine anie thing herein without their knowledge which firſt reſtreined hir of libertie, and after by decrée confirmed that déed: but he would not ceaſſe in pleaſuring his ſiſter, and ſuch a frend as the king (his maiſter) was, to do all that he might: and further, that he would take order for an aſſemblie of the nobilitie the twentith daie of the nert moneth. Vntill which time the ambaſſador ſéemed ſomwhat appeaſed, and the regent applied the adminiſtration of the lawes.]

1568. The quéenes eſcape out of Lochleuin.

On ſundaie the ſecond of Maie, in the yeere 1568, at ſupper time, the quéene eſcaped out of Lochleuin, by the meanes and helpe of George Dowglas brother to the lard of Lochleuin. The lard Seton, the lard of Ricarton, and James Hamilton of Orbiſton, were readie to receiue hir, and conueied hir ouer the quéenes ferrie, firſt to Nudrie the lard Seton his houſe, and from thence to Hamilton caſtell, where ſhe remained till the thirtéenth daie of Maie being thurſdaie, gathering in the meane time ſuch forces as ſhe might from all places. The earle of Murreie lord regent was in Glaſcow, at what time ſhe thus eſcaped out of Lochleuin; and vpon knowledge had therof, ment at the firſt to haue withdrawen himſelfe to Sterling: but ſuddenlie changing his purpoſe in that behalfe, he determined to continue at Glaſcow, cow, which is not past eight miles from Hamilton, because he was persuaded, that if she should shrinke backe neuer so little, he should incourage his aduersaries, and discourage his friends, and so consequentlie weaken his part greatlie. * Which they also supposed was the more weakened, by the departure of Robert Boid (vnto the quéenes part) hauing vntill that time wone a great opinion of his constancie towards the regent.

Fr. Thin. Buchan. lib. 19.

This man, being of a famous familie, was now in the decaie of his house meanelie and sparinglie brought vp vnder his father, a valiant gentleman, and one that followed the frugalitie of the Scots, who (willing to prepare a waie to the readuance of his house, as manie of his other kinred did) was now content to séeke meanes therefore: for which cause both he and his father did first follow the Hamiltons then ruling all things. But after that their gouernement was posted ouer from them to the quéene mother the regent; and that contention was moued about religion: he ioined himselfe to the lords of the congregation, from whome his father was most estranged: in which this Robert Boid firmelie continued vntill the quéenes returne out of France. By meanes whereof, there was a great opinion of his valure & wisdome, on whose counsell Coline Campbell earle of Atholl did almost wholie depend. But when by chance certeine of the nobilitie had coniured or conspired (to vse Buchanans word) for no euill act, but for the defense of the king, he subscribed to the same league.

But after, with like lightnesse both he and the earle of Argile (which hong vpon his aduise) wrote vnto the quéene euerie thing that was done in the same assemblie, from which time this Boid was partaker of all the quéenes secrets against his old friends, who with the queene did yet obteine no greater opinion of constancie, than he did amongest others of lightnesse and inconstancie. But after that the queene was imprisoned, and the earle of Murreie made regent, he went then to the part of the gouernor: with whome he shewed such proofe of his wit and industrie, that he was admitted into the priuie counsels of the regent, contrarie to the opinion of others. But after when the matter should be tried by fight betweéne the regent & the quéene (after hir escape from Lochleuin) he fled againe to the queene.] All which notwithstanding, the thirtéenth daie of Maie afore mentioned, the quéene with hir power marched from Hamilton, by the south side of Clede toward Dunbreton; and out of Glascow on the other part marched the lord regent with his forces: so as at length both the armies met at a place called the Langside, néere to the house of Cathcart within two miles of Glascow.

The armies met at Langside.

Lords on the quænes part.

There were on the quéenes part the earles of Argile, Cassiles, Eglinton, and Rothes, Claud Hamilton sonne to the duke of Chatelerault, the lords Seton, Summeruill, Yester, Borthwike, Leuingston, Herries, Marwell, Sanquhar, Boid and Rosse, lards and knights, Lochinwar, Bas, Wlauchton, Malhousie, Rosien the shiriffe of Aire, sir James Hamilton, and manie others. On the regents part were these accounted as principall, the earles of Morton, Mar, Glencarne, Menteith, the maister of Graham, the lords Hume, Lindsie, Ruthwen, Sempill, Ogiltrœ and Cathcart, of lairds and knights, Bargawy, Blacquhan, Drumlanrig, Sesford, Lus, Buchanan, Tulibardin, Peteur, Grange, Lochleuin, Lethington, and sir James Balfour. At the first ioining there was a verie sharpe incounter: for after they had bestowed their shot of harquebuzes and arrows, they fell to it with speares and swords. But at length, after thrée quarters of an houres fight, the quéenes part was put to flight.

The quéenes part discomfited.

The victorie remained with the regent, who suffered none to be slaine but those that were killed in the fight, before they turned their backs: among the which were foure téene of the surname of the Hamiltons killed. There were taken prisoners about thrée hundred, of which number the principall were these: the lords Seton and Rosse, sir James Hamilton, and manie other of that surname. Of the regents part, the lord Hume was hurt in the leg and face, and the lord Ogiltrœ in the necke, by the lord Herries: the lord Lindsete, and the lards of Drumlanrig, and of Grange, bare themselues verie valiantlie that day, failing not in anie point that belonged to the dutie of hardie capteins. The quéenes part was thought to be néere at the point of six thousand men, and the regents was reckoned to be foure thousand: so that there were ten thousand men in the field that daie, what vpon the one side and the other.

Prisoners taken.

The earle of Huntlete comming forward to haue assisted the quœnes part, but the battell was striken, and hir people discomfited (as ye haue heard) yer he could come, and so he returned. In this battell the valiancie of an Yieland gentleman named Macferlane, stood the regents part in great stéed. For in the hottest brunt of the fight, he came in with two hundred of his friends and countriemen, and so manfullie gaue in vpon the flanke of the quéenes people, that he was a great cause of the disordering of them. This Macferlane had béene latelie before (as I haue heard) condemned to die for some outrage by him committed: and obteining pardon (through sute of the countesse of Murreie) he recompensed that clemencie by this péece of seruice now at this battell, [which was (as saith Buchanan) fought the third daie of Maie, and the eleuenth after the quéene had escaped out of prison.]

The earle of Huntlete comming forward to aid the quœne.

Fr. Thin.

The quéene perceiuing the ouerthrow of hir people, fled from the place where she stood to behold the battell, and withdrew to Crawford towne, and so by the Sanquhar to Dundrenan in Gallowaie: and after she had taried there two or thrée daies, she tooke ship and passed to Workington in England, where she was staied & conueied to Caerleill, and from thence to Bolton castell, belonging to the lord Scrope, who with sir Rafe Sadler (being sent downe for that purpose) had the custodie of hir, till at length she was committed vnto the earle of Shrewesburie. * The French ambassador, which looked for the good successe of this battell, and did promise to himselfe assured victorie on the quéenes part, vnderstanding the contrarie, and being deceiued of his former hope, changed his copie, and with horsse and guides hasted all he could into England, without bidding the regent farwell. In which iournie he was robbed by théeues: but James Dowglasse, capteine of the marches of Drumlanrig, did this honor to the ambassador, that he had all his goods restored vnto him.]

They ioine in battell.

But now to the doings in Scotland. The regent sent to summon Hamilton castell, but the answer was respited till the nert daie: and then he that had the charge came to Glascow, and offered the keies to the regent. The castell of Draffan was also yéelded at the same time to the regent. The eightéenth of Maie, the regent made proclamation, that the inhabitants of the shires of Perns, Angus, Fife, Mers, Louthian, Kile, and Carricke, should prouide themselues of vittels for fiftéene daies, and to méet him at Beggar the tenth of June, to ride with him into the southwest parts of Scotland, to chastise certeine théeues, and other disobedient persons. Héerevpon, the eleuenth of June, the regent marched forth of Edenburgh, and came that night to Beggar. The armie being assembled, conteined foure or fiue thousand

The caſtell of Boghall. Skirling caſtell. Crawford.

The caſtell of Boghall, perteining to the lord Fleming, was ſurrendred to them. The twelfth of June Skirling caſtell was raced (a faire houſe) to the end that other vnderſtanding therof, might be put in greter feare. That night they came to Crawford, where the caſtell was to them ſurrendred; it belonged vnto ſir James Hamilton, whom they had in their hands.

Saucher.

The thirteenth of June they marched to Saucher, a caſtell, the which being rendred they ſpared, becauſe the lord Creichton the owner thereof, promiſed at a certeine daie to come to the regent to Edenburgh.

Barbacaſt.

The fourteenth of June they came to Barbacaſt, where they laie that night, and the lard Wederborne was ſent to ſpeake with the lard of Louchinware. Wedneſdaie the fifteenth of June, they marched to a

The water of Ur. Dunfreis.

The ſeuenteenth of June they came to a gentlemans houſe, ſtanding by the water of Ur, where diuerſe gentlemen came in, and were receiued. The eightéenth of June they marched to Dunfreis, and remained there all the nert daie. A ſtrong houſe ſtanding in that towne, & apperteining to the lord Warwell, was offered vnto them. Diuerſe of the Warwels, Johnſtons, Prewins, Grahams, and Bels, came vnto the regent, and offering themſelues to be obedient, were receiued. Two daies before this, the lord Warwell, the lards of Johnſton, Cowhill, and Louchinwar, had beene at Dunfreis with a thouſand men, and ſpent all the bittels. It was thought that the lord Warwell would haue come in, if the other had not counſelled him to the contrarie. The twentith of June they marched to Hoddom, a place belonging to the lord Herries: a thouſand of the broken men were aſſembled and offered ſkirmiſh; two or three were taken, they laie within a mile of the regent that night.

The lard of Drumlanrig.

The one and twentith the houſe was yeelded, and the cuſtodie thereof committed to the lard of Drumlanrig that was appointed warden of thoſe marches. It was thought verie ſtrong, ſo that the defendants might haue kept it longer if they had beene diſpoſed. Great hunger began to pinch the armie, a pint of wine was ſold at ſeuen ſhillings Scotiſh, and no bread to be had for anie monie. The regent ſent forth the earle of Morton, and the lord Hume with a thouſand men, to trie if they might haue drawen the broken men to a chaſe: but it would not be, for they went their waies, and would not tarrie it. The two and twentith of June the campe laie ſtill, but the regent with a thouſand men went to Annand, and had Lochmaben.

Lochmaben and receiued the caſtell, the which the regent deliuered to Drumlanrig: but ſome of the Warwels being cloſelie hid within an od corner of the houſe, after the regent was gone, brake out and ſeized the houſe againe into their hands.

Two houſes of lard Johnſton taken by the regent.

The ſame daie, two houſes belonging to the lard of Johnſton, the one named Lochwood, and the other Lowhouſie, were taken, but not burnt: becauſe the lard Johnſton had put in ſuertie to come in by a day vnto the regent. The ſame daie they take great ſtore of cattell, and that night with a ſhot of the great artillerie, they ſlue two théeues among three ſcore others that came and approched verie neere to the armie, as the maner of the prickers is. The armie laie that night at Milton holms. The foure and twentith of June they came to Peeples, and the nert day to Edenburgh, ſo ending that iournie; in the which they had paſſed through the countries of Clideſdale, Gallowaie, Niddeſdale, Annandale, & Tweedale. Much a doo and great trouble aroſe within Scotland, by reaſon that the Hamiltons and their adherents made parts againſt the regent, and thoſe other lords that gouerned vnder the king; whereof as I haue no certeine notes, ſo I muſt paſſe the ſame with ſilence. Great trouble in Scotland.

* Whileſt theſe things were thus in doing, letters came to the regent from the queene of England: for ſhe was perſuaded by ſuch as were fled with the queene of Scots into England, that there was great iniurie done vnto the queene of Scots, being burdened with high matters, through the enuie of hir euill ſubiects, in which chiefſtie the kinglie authoritie was reuiled, and the regiment of ſacred maieſtie defaced. A thing which did not alone perteine to the priuat perſon of the queene of Scots, but to the example of all other princes. Which euill of erpelling kings, was ſpeedilie and ſoundlie to be preuented, leaſt it might creepe anie further. By which and other perſuaſions, the queene of England required of the regent to ſend ſufficient men, that ſhould declare to hir the order of all things as they were done, and that ſhould anſwer all ſuch reproches as were laied againſt him. Fr. Thin. Buchan. lib. 19

Touching which matter, although it appeered grieuous and heauie in it ſelfe, to call things in queſtion which before were by parlement eſtabliſhed; and to bring in vſe a new kind of iudgement of their cauſes before forren iudges and kings who were their enimies, and firſt perſuaded againſt the regent by ſuch as maliced him and his faction; and that after a ſort the ſame ſeemed dangerous and full of ſhame: yet on the other ſide there were manie things that inforced him to accept that requeſt of the queene of England, although it were vniuſt. Wherefore when he had determined to ſend ambaſſadors, and that they could not agree who they ſhould be, ſith the chiefeſt, and thoſe of the nobilitie refuſed it: at length the regent profeſſed that he would take that iournie vpon him. For the performance whereof he choſe certeine perſons to accompanie him into England, contrarie to the mind of William Metellan, which onelie denied and ſtood againſt it. Wherefore he caried the ſaid Metellan with him (fauoring the queene) not doubting in the end by one meanes or other to win him to his part.

The reſt that went willinglie with him, were James Dowglas, Patrike Lindſeie, being of the nobilitie; the biſhop of Orknie, & the abbat of Fermlindon, churchmen; James Macgill, and Henrie Balnaue, lawiers of the college of iudges. To whome as the ninth was ioined George Buchanan author of the Scotiſh hiſtorie: with whome the regent accompanied to the number of 100 horſſes, take his iournie into England, and came the fourth nones of October to Yorke, to the aſſemblie appointed there by the queene of England. On which day, and almoſt at the ſame houre, Thomas Howard duke of Northfolke came thither alſo; to which duke were aſſociat in commiſſion, to heare the controuerſie of the Scots, the earle of Suſſex, and ſir Rafe Sadler knight. After a few daies, came thither ſuch as were ſent by the queene of Scots, which did complaine of hir vnkind ſubiects, and required helpe to reſtore hir to hir kingdome. Theſe men being heard ſundered from the regent and the earls) did (after they had proteſted that they came not vnto them as iudges, hauing anie right to make lawes to bind bind them) with manie words open the iniuries which the Scotiſh ſubiects had done vnto their quéene, and required of the quéene of England, that either ſhe would perſuade hir vnkind people to receiue their prince againe; or if they refuſed the ſame, that ſhe would giue them an armie, with which they might compell them thereunto.

In few hours after this, the regent (calling the matter to the deciding of law, before equall arbitrators) did contend (ſith nothing was done but by right, by law, by the ancient cuſtome of their countrie, by the determination of the aſſemblie of parlement, and by the ſubſcription of manie ſuch as were there preſent to accuſe them) that he alone by his authoritie could not vndo the ſame: but when the Engliſh commiſſioners had denied that they could be ſatiſfied with thoſe things done at home, & here pronounced by the Scots, except ſome cauſe were ſhewed that inforced them ſo ſeuerelie to pronounce againſt their queene; the regent anſwered that he did chieflie flee that matter, leaſt he ſhould be driuen to accuſe his quéene and ſiſter. Which he denied to do, not willing to laie abroad to forren nations hir wicked deeds, as Buchanan tearmeth them. To the contrarie whereof he would not be inforced, vnleſſe the quéene of England would promiſe to defend the cauſe of the now king, and to take him into hir protection: if he did manifeſtlie prooue, that the quéene of Scots had murthered the king of Scots hir huſband. Whereunto the Engliſh anſwered, that they had authoritie onelie to heare both parts, and to declare their whole requeſt vnto their queene.

By reaſon whereof, in the end they wrote to the queene of England all the ſtate of their doings; who did write backe, that the earle of Murreie ſhould ſend one or more to the Engliſh court, fullie to informe hir thereof, ſith ſhe would do all therein that belonged vnto hir. Which letters receiued, the earle of Murreie ſent Petellan (a man before ſuſpected, and that did after ſome in conference with John Leſle biſhop of Roſſe) to the court of England, aſſociated with James Macgill. Now after theſe men were come to the quéene at London, it was thought moſt conuenient by hir and hir councell, that the regent himſelfe ſhould be preſent, when all matters of controuerſie were intreated vpon. For which cauſe, ſending part of his companie backe into Scotland, the regent came with a ſmall traine to London: where the ſame difficultie was obiected againſt him which was done at Yorke: to which he anſwered as before. Whilſt theſe things were doing at London, the queene of Scots did by James Balfure moue warres in Scotland. For the furtherance whereof, ſhe wrote letters to hirs and Bothwels friends, and made manie deputies to execute hir authoritie in Scotland.

When the regent ſaw himſelfe thus beſet on euerie ſide, he determined to returne with all ſpéed into Scotland aſwell as he might, without diſpatch of that for which he came. Wherefore the Engliſh ſtill inſtantlie vging him to tell the cauſe (which being vntold, they could not determine ante thing therein) that moued them to do thoſe things in Scotland: the regent (loth to offend the quéene of England) made a long proteſtation how vnwilling he was to accuſe the quéene, and his ſiſter; and therefore requeſted one thing, that they which were the occaſion to lead him into this battell might be preſent thereat, for becauſe he would vſe their witnes in the weightieſt matters. Which for manie great reaſons being denied by the Engliſh, the queene of England required, that the quéene of Scots (by force and armes expelled) might be reſtored home; & therewithall giuing the regent a day, to ſhew cauſe whie the reuengers of the kings death had taken armes againſt the queene; although the erle of Murreie were none of them: for he was in France at the time of the déed done. Wherefore the regent ſhewing all he could againſt the quéene of Scots for the defenſe of hir aduerſaries; in the end, the quéene of England deferring the ſame to another day, permitted the regent to depart home to appeaſe the troubles there, and that he ſhould leaue ſome one of his behind him, to anſwere all ſuch euils as ſhould be obiected againſt him.

But the regent deſired them whileſt he was there, that his accuſors might be brought out. Whereupon the accuſors being preſent, and ſaieng that they had not then anie thing to ſaie; but that they would further ſhew their accuſation where it pleaſed the quéene: the matter with much controuerſie ended on both parts, & the councell brake vp without anie finall ſentence therin. But whileſt the regent remained thus in England (as is a little before touched) there were manie things without ſucceſſe attempted by the queene of Scots followers. For James Hamilton (who a little before had béene gouernor) being grieued with the miſhap of things at home, falling out contrarie vnto his mind, did therefore depart into France, where (remoued from all companie, and onelie attended vpon with a man or two) he did ſecretlie liue to himſelfe.

But when the quéene of Scots was eſcaped the priſon of Lochleuin, and that ſhe was after ſubdued in battell, being within a few daies after compelled to land in England; the Frenchmen that could not draw the earle of Murreie (now by his friends called home into his countrie) into their faction, thought it beſt for manie reaſons (ſith they might not for the troubles in France ſend him ſuccor or monie) to raiſe vp the ſaid Hamilton againſt the earle of Murreie, and eſpecialie at that time whileſt the regent was in England. Wherefore he comming out of his den abrode into the world, inriched by the French with a few golden crownes, and ouercharged with manie faire promiſes, was importuned by his friends and kinſmen, whileſt he haſtened from England into Scotland, that the quéene of England with the authoritie of the quéene of Scots, would induce the earle of Murreie to deliuer vp his regentſhip of Scotland vnto him; ſith that place was of right due vnto him (by the maners and lawes of all nations, but chiefelie by the cuſtome of his countrie) as néereſt in bloud, and next in ſucceſſion.

For the proofe whereof, it is not neceſſarie to reckon vp the memorie of hiſtories from the firſt times, conſidering it is knowne to all men, that gouernors haue béene giuen to thoſe of yong yeares (not able to rule the kingdome) of ſuch as haue béene néereſt of bloud. For ſo, after the death of James the third, Robert his vncle had the gouernement in the abſence of James the firſt; and Murdac the ſon of the ſame Robert ſucceeded him therein. And of late time in our remembrance, John duke of Albanie did gouerne the yong yeares of James the fift; and Hamilton himſelfe, in the minoritie of Marie the queene that now is, being as then neither fit for a huſband or a kingdome, did a few yeares rule all the affaires of Scotland. Who now by certeine rebels, was through vnlawfull voices excluded thereof with force and violence, and that (which is worſe) a baſtard is aduanced thereunto in contempt of lawfull bloud. Which honor, if it were reſtored vnto him, he would ſhortlie appeaſe all thoſe ciuill broiles, and reſtore the queene of Scots vnto hir kingdome, without anie force or tumult of armes.

Whereunto the king of Scots legats did anſwer, that Hamilton did not onelie demand a thing quite

contrarie to the lawes and old cuſtoms of Scotland; but alſo a thing moſt vniuſt, if no authoritie of law were againſt it. For our anceſtors (by reaſon of many murthers committed by thoſe of the kings bloud) almoſt a thouſand three hundred yeares paſt, did change the order in creating of their kings. For whereas before, they which were of the familie of Fergusius, the firſt king of that name, were in the life of the king choſen after to reigne, not as neereſt of bloud; but as perſons moſt worthie to weild a kingdome: Kenneth the third (to the end to take awaie from the court all treacherie towards the kings familie, and cruell murthers of kinreds amongeſt themſelues) did eſtabliſh that order which is now obſerued in creating of our kings; which was, that the next in bloud ſhould be aduanced to the place of the deceaſſed king.

But afterwards, when men were taught by the ſucceſſe of things, that it could ſcarſe be choſen; but that in ſuch inconſtancie of fortune, the right of the chiefeſt magiſtrat muſt ſometime light vpon children and vpon heires alſo vnfit for gouernement, they did ordeine, that he ſhould be choſen to the adminiſtration of the publike wealth; which did excell others in wealth and wiſedome. Which courſe our anceſtors haue kept almoſt theſe ſix hundred yeares, leauing the kingdome whole & ſound to poſteritie. According to the which, when Robert Bruſe was dead, there were gouernors choſen by voices: which were Thomas Randolph earle of Murreie, Donald earle of Mar, Andrew Murreie, John Randolph, & Robert Steward. For ſometime, as manie were choſen gouernors togither; ſo when James the ſecond was a child, Alexander Leuingſton, being no kin to the king, no not ſo much as of the nobilitie, but onelie a knight, was appointed gouernor to the yong king.

Which may not be excuſed, in ſaieng that the ſame was then ſo done, becauſe there wanted men of the kings bloud to ſupplie thoſe places. For at that time were liuing John Kennedie head of the familie, the kings kinſman by the ſiſter of James the firſt; and the vncle by his fathers ſide: James Kennedie alſo, biſhop of ſaint Andrews, a man of moſt account in the kingdome for all kinds of vertue, being borne of the kings aunt: and Dowglas alſo, earle of Angus, with Archembald earle of Dowglas, both of the kings bloud; whereof the laſt was in riches and power almoſt equall to the king, but far beyond the wealth and power of all others; of whome, none did euer complaine to the parlement, when they were put beſides the gouernement, and others not ſo neere of bloud appointed therevnto. Not long after, foure tutors were appointed to James the third, which were not made in reſpect of bloud; but choſen by the voices of the nobilitie.

And although of late, John duke of Albanie was by the nobilitie called out of France to the gouernment of Scotland, during the tender yeeres of James the firſt, and confirmed in the ſame by publike decree of parlement; yet was it not giuen vnto him in reſpect of neereneſſe of bloud. For he had Alexander his elder brother in life, who although perhaps he was inferior to the duke; yet he was farre aboue James Hamilton (in all kind of vertue) which did ſometimes reach after that place. But in the abſence of James the firſt, Robert his vncle ruled the kingdome. But by what right? Was he admitted therevnto for neereneſſe of bloud? No trulie.

What then? Was he choſen of the people? No. How then was he made? Marie when king Robert the third was not ſufficient to rule the kingdome, either for ſtrength of bodie or mind, he did ſubſtitute Robert his brother as his deputie, & commended his children to his gouernment; who in the end famiſhed Dauid the eldeſt, and alſo threatened death vnto the yonger ſonne James, which he did auoid by fleeing Scotland. Which Robert being in the poſſeſſion of authoritie by tyrannie (and his brother killed with thought) did leaue the ſame to Murdac his ſonne. So that it cannot be doubted what the mind of the laſt king Robert was to his brother, for he would neuer (if he had liued and beene in health) haue made him tutor of his children, whom at the houre of his death he curſſed as the butcher of his children.

That time alſo, in which this Hamilton gouerned, doth remember vnto vs manie things (though what ſoeuer was then done, is no proofe that it was well done) which are to be conſidered of. For when the cardinall Beton did labor by ſubtiltie to inuade the chiefe gouernement, this Hamilton rather leaning to the hatred which good men did beare towards Beton, than truſting to the fauor of the people towards himſelfe, did leape into the emptie place of a gouernor; in which he ruled with much crueltie and couetouſneſſe, and in few yeeres after, both ſold the gouernment (obteined by force) and the queene, whom he had vnder his authoritie. At what time was ſhewed the fauour which the people bare vnto him, when they preferred the gouernement of a ſtrange woman, before the bondage which they had vnder him.

You ſee now (I hope) the requeſt of the Hamiltons to be againſt our countrie lawes, and decrees of our anceſtors, and that ſo contrarie vnto them, that wanting other ſufficient arguments, he is conſtreined to confirme the ſame onelie with lies. But if there were anie ſuch cuſtome, I ſuppoſe there is none but doth ſee how vniuſt it were. For what can be more vnrightfull, than to commit yong, weake, and faultleſſe yeeres to his faith, which doth dailie either looke or wiſh for the death of the pupill? Whoſe whole familie hath alwaies beene at dailie and deadlie warre with the houſe of the king that now is? What defenſe can be here by neereneſſe of bloud againſt old malice, vnmeaſurable couetouſneſſe, and the headie violence of (alreadie taſted) tyrannie? Laodice the queene of Cappadocia is ſuppoſed to haue killed hir owne children, as they came to yeers of diſcretion, and to haue bought the ſmall continuance of hir gouernement with the bloud of hir ſonnes.

Wherefore, if the mother ſpared not hir owne fleſh, for the gaine of ſhort authoritie; what will old enimies do, inflamed to crueltie with the brands of couetouſneſſe (nay rather what is to be thought that they will not do) againſt a child, which deferreth effect of their hope of gouernement? If this example ſeeme ouer old or obſcure to anie man, or to be ouer farre fet, I will lay downe ſome nearer home, and thoſe moſt notable. Who is ſo ignorant of this late-lie done, that he knoweth not that Galeas Sforzia (growne to diſcretion, a husband, and ſonne in law to a moſt mightie king) was ſlaine by his vncle Lodowike? Or to whom are the calamities vnknowne, which followed ſo cruell a parricide and kin-ſlaier? For the moſt beautifull countrie of Italie was almoſt brought thereby to vtter deſtruction: the familie of the Sforzies, the mother of manie a valiant perſon cleane deſtroied, and the barbarous people (from whoſe crueltie and couetouſneſſe nothing was ſafe) brought into the pleaſant places about Padus. Who is he that is borne in Britaine, that hath not heard of the crueltie of Richard (the third king of that name in England) againſt the children of his brother? But with what bloudſhed was that in the end purged?

Now, ſith theſe did not feare to do ſuch euils to their their neereſt bloud, by the onelie inforcing deſire to gouerne, being otherwiſe worthie perſons: what ſhall we loke for from him, whoſe inconſtancie of mind all the Scots do know? Whoſe vnſkilfull gouernement they haue tried with manie ſlaughters? And (which is more) whoſe familie not content with the murther of this kings great grandfather, did go about to intrap his grandfather by the mothers ſide, whileſt he was in life; and when he could not kill the grandfather by the fathers ſide, he thruſt the poore father out of the kingdome, brought forth the mother to be ſlaine as a ſacrifice, & ſold hir kingdome (when they could not inioy it) to ſtrangers: out of which bondage ſhe (by the prouidence of God) being deliuered, they haue throwne themſelues into theſe troubles in which they now are. Whereby we may eaſilie vnderſtand, what the iudgement of the common people was touching that matter, in that thoſe men do now ſéeme to be deliuered out of a priſon of miſerable bondage, and to behold the ſwéet light of libertie, when they (which knew not how to order it) did ſell their gouernment to a ſtrange woman.

Theſe things being thus heard on both ſides before the councell of England, the quéene thereof by hir ſaid councell declared to Hamilton, that he required an vniuſt thing, and that he ſhould not hope for anie aid from hir; and that ſhe hath promiſed the kings ambaſſador, that Hamilton ſhould not depart England, before that the ſaid ambaſſador had leaue likewiſe to go home. After that theſe things were done, and that the regent ſomewhat indifferentlie diſpatched his affairs in England, he obteined leaue to depart, and was honorablie conducted home with the Engliſh, who ſufficientlie garded him: but eſpeciallie the nobilitie and companie of the north parts, ſith it was great honor for hir maieſtie ſafelie to returne him home, who (vpon hir letters had) was come out of his owne countrie. Which regent comming to Edenburgh the next day after the kalends of Februarie, hée was there receiued with great pompe.

Buchanan. lib. 19. Few daies after this, thoſe of the kings faction aſſembled at Striueling, where the regent declared vnto them what he had done in England; which being well liked; was in the end confirmed by all the nobilitie. Much about that time, James Hamilton chiefe of that familie came out of England, being by the quéene of Scots authoriſed with a new and arrogant letter: in that ſhe called him hir father, and made him hir vicar and deputie of the kingdome. This man at his firſt comming made proclamation, that no man ſhould obeie anie other than ſuch as were ſubſtituted by him. Whereupon thoſe of the kings part (beſtowing ſummes of monie vpon ſouldiers, to make them readie, if néed required, to the vttermoſt conflict) met on a day appointed at Glaſcow.

But when there was a great aſſemblie of the common people at Hamilton, more than they loked for, a meanes of agréement was attempted, with this condition: that Hamilton, comming to Glaſcow, ſhould acknowledge the king for chiefeſt gouernor: which if he did, all other things ſhould eaſilie be agréed; but if he denied that, he ſhould come in vaine: all which he promiſed to do, and the kings armie was diſmiſſed. When he came to Glaſcow, they obteined their former goods and honors the ſame day, in which he and his friends profeſſed themſelues ſubiects to the king: but yet ſo, that in the meane time they ſhould remaine in priſon, or elſe giue pledges of their next kin; with further notice, that if anie of the ſaid part would ſo do, they ſhould alſo be receiued on the ſame couenants, whereunto the earle of Argile and the earle Huntleie refuſed to ſubſcribe.

Hamilton comming at the day appointed to Edenburgh, did deferre the performance of his promiſes, deuiſing manie delaies; vntill the other principall of the factions were come, whereby the couenants might be eſtabliſhed by all their conſents, for which he praied day till the tenth of Maie: and that in the meane time he might vnderſtand the mind of the impriſoned quéene of Scots: all which in the end was denied vnto him. Whereupon Hamilton (confeſſing the truth) ſaid, that he conſented to thoſe conditions by compulſion; and that (if he were frée) hée would not allow of anie of them. For which anſwer, Hamilton & Parwell were committed priſoners to the caſtell of Edenburgh. The earle of Argile was ſuffered to be quiet at home, but the earle Huntleis was more hardlie dealt withall, bicauſe that in the abſence of the gouernor he had taken manie, and had made deputies about Crawford and Ogiluie.

Whereupon there was day giuen vnto them both to meet at the aſſemblie at ſaint Andrews, whither the earle of Argile firſt came: with whom there was no extreme dealing, bicauſe he ceaſed to trouble the realme anie more, was of kinred to the gouernor, and they two were of great friendſhip togither euen from their yoong yéers. But when the cauſe of Huntleie (long before his comming) was well debated, the gouernor pronounced, that he would pardon all priuate faults done to him, or to the king: but that hée neither could nor would pardon anie iniuries done to any other. And if Huntleie, or his friends that followed his faction, could paſſe away with thoſe ſpoils, he would willinglie labor that arbitrators choſen by both parts, ſhould temper the value of the damage. At what time alſo there grew a further miſchiefe, whether all they which toke part with Huntleie ſhuld alſo be pardoned; but in the end, vpon deliberation, all things ſéemed indifferentlie well pacified.

During theſe things, the queene of England ſent letters into Scotland in the behalfe of the impriſoned queene, either that ſhe might wholie be reſtored, or ſointlie rule with hir ſonne; or admitted to liue priuatlie in hir owne countrie. All which being denied to be granted, the Scots ſent Robert Petcarne, a man of great wiſedome and fidelitie, to deliuer their anſwer vnto the quéene of England. Buchanan, lib. 19.

Whileſt theſe things were in doing, the gouernor fearing the power of the impriſoned quéene, which now waxed great, did call William Pettellan before him, from Perth to Striueling; who requeſted the earle of Argile to go with him for his better ſuertie. Afterwards, this William ſitting in the councell, was accuſed by Thomas Crawford of the kings death, whereupon he was commanded priſoner to a chamber in the caſtell, and others were ſent to apprehend James Balfuris.

But in the end, the gouernors mildneſſe ſuffered no great hurt to fall vpon them; for Balfurie by his friends ſuite obteined pardon; and Pettellan being led to Edenburgh, was left in a houſe there not farre from the caſtell: to whome certeine horſſemen were appointed kéepers, vnder the charge of Alexander Hume a noble yoong man, appointed chiefe ouer them. But William Kircadie, capteine of the caſtell of Edenburgh, about ten of the clocke at night, did counterfeit letters ſigned with the hand of the earle of Murreie, and brought them to Alexander, willing him to deliuer William Pettellan, which he did accordinglie. Whereupon Pettellan was caried by Kircadie into the caſtell, to the great miſlike of the nobilitie, being almoſt vncerteine whether they ſhould impute the déed to Kircadie, or to the gouernor, not being vnacquainted with the boldneſſe of Kircadie: in ſuch ſort, that the ſame was like to grow to a commotion, if the innocencie

of the gouernour had not before béene ſufficientlie knowne.

1569. Rebellion in the north of England, by the earles of Northumberland & Weſtmerland.

In the yeare 1569, the earles of Northumberland and Weſtmerland raiſed a rebellion againſt the quienes maieſtie of England; but by the good diligence and prouident circumſpection of the earle of Suſſex, then lieutenant of the north parts, and by ſuch direction as was giuen by hir maieſtie and hir councell, for the leuieng of an armie vnder the leading of the earle of Warwike, and the lord admerall Clinton, the ſaid two earles were kept ſo in feare, that they durſt not aduance farre forward in their wicked begun enterprize, but were conſtreined to retire backe towards Durham. Wherevpon the earle of Suſſex, ſuppoſing that their meaning was for their laſt refuge and ſafegard to take the caſtels of Alnewike and Warkeworth, he wrote vnto ſir John Foſter lord warden of the middle marches, either by force, policie, or ſome other means, to get into his hands the poſſeſſion of thoſe two caſtels, and the ſame to fortifie with ſuch number and gariſons of men, as to his diſcretion ſhould be thought conuenient, for the ſafe cuſtodie and gard thereof.

Sir John Foſter, being at his houſe neere to Alnewike, when he receiued theſe letters, accompanied with his ſeruants, friends, and tenants, & ſome ſouldiers that were come to him from Berwike, marched vp to the caſtell on foot, where finding the houſe garded with a great number of the earle of Northumberlands ſeruants, reteiners, and tenants, he made proclamation before the caſtell gate, that euerie of them within the caſtell ſhould come forth, and withdraw to their owne houſes, vpon paine to be reputed rebels to the quienes maieſtie: and that which of them ſoeuer did refuſe to obeie this proclamation, ſtaieng either in the caſtell or elſewhere in anie vnlawfull aſſemblie, it ſhould be lawfull for euerie man to ſpoile his goods, and him to kill if he made reſiſtance.

Proclamation made at Alnewike by ſir Io. Foſter.

This proclamation notwithſtanding, they within the caſtell, at the firſt refuſed to yéeld it vp. And thervpon ſir John Foſter marched through the towne into the market place, and there made the like proclamation in behalfe of all the inhabitants that were the earle of Northumberlands tenants, for their repairing home to their houſes. And comming herewith backe towards the caſtell, they within perceiuing themſelues deſtitute of ſuccor, and ſir John Foſter to increaſe in power, did vpon better aduiſe yeeld themſelues vnto him, who ſaued all their liues. After the ſame maner he got alſo the caſtell of Warkeworth, and fortified them both with ſufficient number of men. This done, he aſſembled ſuch forces as he was able to make, ſo that he got together to the number of eleuen hundred horſſemen, and toke order to forlaie and ſtop the paſſages, ſo as the earles friends and tenants in Northumberland ſhould not go vnto him.

Sir John Foſter kéepeth Newcaſtell againſt the rebels.

Sir Henrie Perſie againſt his brother the earle of Northumberland.

After this, hauing in his companie the lord Ogle, and Thomas Foſter his brother, and other gentlemen, he went to Newcaſtell, where, with Thomas Gower eſquire, that had the principall rule therof at that time, he toke order for the defenſe of that towne againſt the rebels. Hither came to him ſir Henrie Perſie, offering his ſeruice againſt his brother, and other the rebels, to the vttermoſt of his power. Herevpon diuerſe excurſions were made forth of Newcaſtell into the biſhoprike, where the two earles were incamped, and ſundrie ſkirmiſhes chanced betwixt the two parties, though no great hurt followed thereof. The erles yet on a day came from Durham, and with their armie marched towards Newcaſtell. Sir John Foſter, and ſir Henrie Perſie, hauing intelligence thereof, iſſued forth of Newcaſtell with all their forces, and certeine péeces of great ordinance. They had alſo with them certeine bands of the ſouldiers of Berwike, meaning verelie to haue ioined battell with the earles: ſir Henrie Perſie ſhewing himſelfe as willing and forward thereto as anie other in all the companies.

At Cheſter deane, midwaie betwixt Durham and Newcaſtell, the armies approched the one neere to the other, a ſmall broke running in a hollow diuiding them aſunder, ſo that there was no paſſage for them to conuete their ordinance ouer, the bankes on either ſide being ſo ſteepe and cumberſome. Wherevpon the erles, perceiuing that they were diſappointed of their purpoſe, after ſome ſkirmiſhes betwixt the horſſemen, they returned vnto Durham: and from thence the next day they went to Yerham, and after being in vtter deſpaire, fled into Scotland: where the erle of Weſtmerland lighted among thoſe that ſhifted him awaie ſo from place to place, that he eſcaped out of that realme, when he could no longer remaine there in ſuertie. But the earle of Northumberland fell into their hands, which deliuered him vnto the regent, who thought he could do no leſſe than put him in ſafe kéeping, conſidering the amitie that was betwixt the two princes, the quienes maieſtie of England, and the king of Scots.

Cheſter deane.

The earles of Northumberland & weſtmerland flée into Scotland.

But ſhortlie after, the regent (as he was riding through Lithquo) was wickedlie ſhot in with an harquebuſe, by one James Hamilton, and ſo wounded, that the next day he died of the hurt [as ſaith Buchanan out of a wood gallerie, in which were clothes hanged as it were to an other vſe.] * But the night before the ſlaughter of the regent, Walter Scot, and Thomas Kar alſo of Fernihirſt entered into England to ſpoile the borders, which they did more cruellie than euer was done before, rather for deſire of reuenge of ſome iniurie, than for the gaine of anie booties. Beſides which, the captéine of the caſtell where Pettellan was priſoner, was now commanded to ſet the ſame Pettellan at libertie: who vpon oth before the nobilitie (which allowed and confirmed the ſame) did purge himſelfe of the death of the king, and of the ciuill warres moued in England (wherewith he was charged) adding that he would proue the ſame at anie time when day ſhould be appointed to him therefore. After which, there was an aſſemblie made for the election of a new gouernour.

1571. Buch. 1570. The earle of Murrete lord regent ſlaine. Fr. Thin.

Buchan. lib. 20.

At what time Thomas Randolph, being ſent thither ambaſſador for the queene of England in the life of the regent, had audience granted vnto him; whoſe meſſage was to demand, the deliuerie of ſuch rebels of England as had fled thither: which ambaſſador the deceaſſed gouernour had before refuſed to heare at Striueling. Wherevpon, ſith all things were then in a turmoile by his death, they departed. But now, when there was a parlement for the chooſing of a new regent, Randolph which had béene in Scotland ſome yéeres before, becauſe he ſeemed beſt to know the men and their conditions of Scotland, and becauſe he had before diſpatched ſome other ambaſſages for the benefit of the realme, was held déere and well eſtéemed of the nobilitie, and therfore was brought into the councell.

Who, after that he had declared what the mind of his prince had béene vnto the Scots, he ſhewed that ſhe would not now abbate the ſame vnto them in theſe troubleſome times, no more than ſhe had before done. After which he remembred the inuaſions made into England, with the ſlaughters, ſpoiles, and burnings committed a little before: all which he well knew was not done by the counſell or labor of the publike ſtate: and therefore his queenes fauor was not diminiſhed to them, but that the ſame good will did remaine to them now, as ample as euer it was. And where ſhe was grieuouſlie offended (and that without hir deſert) yet ſhe was not now determined (although by right ſhe iuſtlie might) to demand publike reſtitution and recompenſe for ſuch euils: nor to exact puniſhment of the whole nation for the miſdoing of a few.

For ſhe was not ignorant what tumults and troubles of all things was of late raiſed amongeſt them. Notwithſtanding this euill, ſhe did not yet anie whit doubt of the fauor of the good and vertuous men vnto hir: and that ſhe would not onlie for their cauſe ſeparate the offenſe from the publike conſent: but alſo (if they themſelues for the domeſticall ſeditions could not inforce the diſturbers of the quiet to make reſtitution of ſuch ſpoiles) that ſhe would ioine hir power with them, to the end by common counſell they might take iuſt puniſhment vpon the truce-breakers. Which if they could not then do by that meanes, that yet ſhe would proſecute thoſe iniuries with hir owne people, whoſe armie ſhould without anie damage to them paſſe through ſuch places as would be quiet, and take no reuenge vpon anie that were not guiltie of that iniurie. The reſt of the parts of his ambaſſage did conteine admonitions alwaies profitable in all lawfull aſſemblies, but moſt neceſſarie for the preſent ſtate of Scotland.

Whereof the firſt aduiſe was for the defenſe of religion, with an eſpeciall care of diligence therein: ſith the ſame alone doth teach vs the forme of our dutie, and peace towards God, our prince, our equall & chriſtian neighbors. For no common-wealth diuided in it ſelfe can long continue: for which cauſe they muſt chieflie labor with all their power, with might and maine, with ſaile and ores, that peace and quiet maie be holilie and vertuouſlie nouriſhed at home amongeſt their people. For ſith God the creator of all things, hath imparted a kinglie gouernement ouer this nation, it is iuſt and meet that they obeie their princes; and in dutifull ſort beſtow all honor, reuerence, and obedience vpon them; ſith peace, concord, amitie, and loue, with all men (as much as in vs lieth to vſe) is moſt acceptable to God, and doth take awaie (or at the leaſt hinder) the thirſt and ſhedding of mens bloud, a fault which God of all others doth moſt hate.

Which vnitie increaſing the wealth of euerie one, maketh all nations more fearefull to their enimies, and is the preſeruer of iuſtice: whoſe chiefe part conſiſting in puniſhing the euill, is eſpeciallie to be imbraced: when contrarilie diſſention and treaſon is a thing moſt deteſtable to all lawfull gouernement: ſith ſuch kind of people are to be purſued with all extremitie, and not be ſuccored with anie fauor, with anie mercie, or with anie pardon, into what countrie ſoeuer they flee for refuge of their hated wickedneſſe. All theſe things did Randolph both godlie and wiſelie admoniſh vs of, and iuſtlie and modeſtlie require from vs.

But becauſe there was no regent choſen for the ſupreme gouernement, there could no certeine anſwer be giuen therevnto: for which cauſe he was for that time put backe to the kalends of Maie. At laſt, William and James Dowglaſſe, brothers of the ſlaine regent by one mother, were heard in this parlement, who required that the vnworthie death of their brother might be reuenged, ſith the ſame was taken awaie not for anie priuat grudge, but for the common-wealths cauſe. Upon the opening whereof men were of diuerſe opinions about his death, though they all agreed that the offendors ſhould be puniſhed: for ſome would haue a day giuen to ſuch as were ſuſpected of the murther: for the names of manie perſons were there ſhewed to anſwer the ſame. But it better pleaſed other not to wait for anie appointed day of law to be giuen to them, who had alreadie taken armes with violence to defend that deed which they had alreadie done; & that they ſhould not onelie raiſe their weapons againſt them, but alſo againſt all ſuch as were condemned in that aſſemblie of the nobilitie.

To which opinion all the knights and ſouldiors did ſome agree, who yet could not hold their determination, eſpeciallie ſith the earle of Atholl and Morton did diſſuade them from it: whereof the firſt would haue them tarrie, vntill there were a greater aſſemblie of the nobilitie: and the other ſuppoſed that it would come to paſſe, that if they ioined manie faults in one, that the reuenge of the regent would periſh and come to nothing, and the matter would burſt out to ciuill wars, whereby all they that feared peace, would flee to the part of ſuch as were guiltie of the murther. Wherefore their faults were to be diuided, and (if it were poſſible) to treat of them by law, and that nothing ſhould be done or changed vntill the kalends of Maie, on which there was an aſſemblie or parlement appointed.

Upon which perſuaſion the companie was diſſolued, though the greateſt part of the nobilitie did condemne this delaie, as moued thervnto: becauſe that the other would ſaie that all things were done at the becke of the kings enimies, who had thus protracted the time, to the end that the malice of the death of this regent might by little and little vaniſh in the meane time, and the aduerſe faction gather greater power togither. Which opinion of the common people was confirmed by manie things that went before, and manie things which followed. For preſentlie (before the death of the regent was fullie ſpread abroad) James Hamilton (mortgaging his lands to John Sommeruill of Caninethame) borowed monie thereof: with which, and with other monie taken vp of the reſt of his friends, he ſent to his fauorers (to hire ſouldiors) being warned before, that they ſhould alwaies be readie at all times, and for all cauſes which ſhould happen by the taking awaie of their deadlie enimie, the earle of Murreie: neither after that time did the quænes factions ceaſſe from meeting in diuerſe diſtant places.

On the fiftéenth kalends of March, there did aſſemble the chiefe of the rebellious faction (for by that name and epitheton doth Buchanan alwaies terme thoſe that toke the quænes part) to deuiſe of their affaires. At what time the earle of Argile, and the lord Boid did write vnto earle Morton, that they would willinglie (ſith they did not yet know who killed the regent, and who were conſenting thervnto) conſult with the other nobilitie about the ſame matter, both to ſearch out and to puniſh the ſame: and that they would not come to Edenburgh about that matter. But if the kings faction would be ſo perſuaded, they would willinglie come to Lithquo, to Faukirke, or to Striueling, there to meet with them. Whervpon, the earle of Morton, conſulting with Petellan about the ſame (for ſo it was deſired in the letters) in the end it came to no effect. At the ſame time, Thomas Bar wrote to Limnch (to vſe Buchanans word) to the gardian of the caſtell, to ſee if he could obteine of the quéene of England to ſtate hir armie: which if he brought to paſſe, that then he would take ſuch order, that he would eaſilie pacifie the borders without anie further trouble, and that they ſhould remaine in that dutie which they were wont: but if ſhe did refuſe this condition, he would continue in his attempt, not doubting but the good ſubiects would ſhew their obedience towards their impriſoned quéene, & would ioine themſelues togither, becauſe aid would ſhortlie come out of France vnto them.

On the fift nones of March, the Hamiltons, the earle of Argile, and Boid came to Lithquo; but the murther of one hired ſouldior did trouble all their deuiſe by a ſudden tumult that was raiſed therevpon. Wherefore the next day after the archbiſhop of ſaint Andrewes did bring the Hamiltons home, the reſt of the quéenes faction, eſpeciallie the earles of Huntleie, Atholl, Crawford, and the lords Ogiluie, Hume, Seton, and Petellan, met at Edenburgh: in which the earle Morton was accompanied with a ſmall traine, vntill the earles of Glencarne and Mar were come with their retinue. The fourth nones of March the chiefe of the factions met togither to conſult of the eſtate of things: but the ſame did proceed verie ſlowlie, by reaſon of the abſence of the earle of Argile, whoſe power and authoritie was then verie great.

This man did Huntleie ſéeke to perſuade to ioine with the reſt of the faction, but he returned without doing anie thing (as it was ſuppoſed by moſt men) through the ſubtiltie of Petellan, which would haue things long deferred, that more conuenient meane might be had in that troubleſome ſtate of the kingdome, for the innouation of things. The greateſt thing done in this aſſembling, was the argument for the choiſe of a new gouernor, which (as it ſéemeth) came to no effect. Now when all theſe aſſemblies tended to little purpoſe, thoſe of the quéenes faction returned to ſowe ſedition by procuring Engliſh warres, thereby to draw the common-people to aſſiſt their part. Wherefore they ſend the capteine (that before had done the like) afreſh at this time to execute the ſame, who left nothing vndone that might tend to extreme crueltie.

During which, the heads of the faction do reproch the quéene of England, and ſlander the nobilitie of Scotland, as though they were the clients and followers of the Engliſh; further threatning abroad in euerie place, that they would vſe the aid of the French and Spaniſh, if the lord of the congregation praied in aid of the Engliſh. Much about that time, (as it were by chance) landed (out of France) at Dunbreton, Meriacke, one of the chamber to the French king, which aduanced the mindes of the quéenes faction, with manie large promiſes: by meanes whereof the Hamiltons appointed an aſſemblie of their people at Lithquo the firſt ides of Aprill.

At which day, when a great aſſemblie was made of the quéenes faction, they began there openlie to treat of thoſe things which before were whiſpered in ſecret: which was, that the death of the king and regent might be either forgotten, or at leaſt war cold in the publike turmoile of the realme, by making warre vpon the Engliſh. After which conſultation, they determined to go to Edenburgh the third ides of Aprill, there (beſides manie other commodities which might grow to them by that place) to ioine vnto them the citizens, by whom there was great helpe of good ſucceſſe to be receiued. Which they thought they might eaſilie bring about, by reaſon that William Kircadie was gouernor both of the caſtell and towne, againſt which deuiſe the citizens did yet contend. But in the end, with hard conditions, the quéenes part was admitted into the towne. After which, not thus contented, they perſuaded the citizens to deliuer vp the keies of their towne, which they moſt wiſelie refuſed.

All this while there was a great reſort to Petellan then lieng of the gowt, for which cauſe his houſe was commonlie called the ſchoolehouſe, and himſelfe the ſchoolemaiſter. In which meane time, the earle of Atholl did not ſpare to trauell hither and thither, to draw thoſe of the other faction to that aſſemblie at Edenburgh. But they would not come thither at all, vntill the kalends of Maie (which was a day appointed for the parlement) vnleſſe they knew ſome iuſt neceſſitie which might preuent that day: and then if there happened anie thing of moment, which might not ſuffer anie delaie, they would communicate the ſame to the earle Morton, whoſe houſe was but foure mile from thence, & he ſhould giue other knowledge thereof. In the end, a day was appointed by the earle of Atholl, in which a few of both factions ſhould meet at the towne of the earle Morton, called Dalketh, which place did not like the quéenes faction, whoſe ſtrength was much holpen by ſuch priſoners as Kircadie had ſet at libertie out of the caſtell of Edenburgh.

But all the deuiſes and helps of the quéens faction were quailed, by the rumor of the Engliſh armie comming to Berwike. Wherevpon, Alexander Hume, and John Parwell latelie deliuered out of priſon, without anie publike authoritie, or leaue to ſet them free, went home to defend their owne poſſeſſions; and a portion of that monie, which they had gathered to hire ſouldiers, was giuen to the ſaid lord Hume, to ſtrengthen his caſtell of Hume. Thomas Kar, and Walter Scot (who were iudged to haue made ſome roads into England by the perſuaſion of the biſhop of ſaint Andrews, whereby wars ſhould riſe in England) being forſaken of thoſe which inhabited neere theſe places, & fearing their owne eſtate, ſent vnto the chiefe of the faction, requeſting helpe of them: or if they would not do ſo, that at leaſt they ſhould come to Lowther the next towne; and from thence ſhew or make warre vpon England. Which when they could not obteine (nor anie of the publike monie) they forthwith departed to their owne lands in great anger.

After this, whileſt manie other things paſſed, as that the quéens faction ſent an ambaſſador to the earle of Suſſex, to ſtaie his iournie into Scotland; that they alſo ſent letters to the quéene of England concerning their cauſe; and that a ſeruant of monſieur Lauſac in France, had brought letters to the quéens factions (with thanks for their fidelitie) directed alſo vnto other that were indifferent, to ioine with the impriſoned quéene; and that he promiſed them aid out of France; and that the quéens people were aſſured, that the kings part would come to Edenburgh at the kalends of Maie: after all theſe things (I ſay) they of the quéens ſide departed to Lithquo, ſuppoſing that place moſt commodious to aſſemble their confederats. Whither when the Hamiltons and their clients were come, they beſet all the way to Edenburgh: for when they vnderſtood that John Areſkin earle of Mar was comming thither, they laid ambuſhes vnder the nert hils to intrap him.

But he knowing the iniurie of the place, paſſed the riuer two miles aboue, and came to Edenburgh the third day of Maie about euening. Shortlie after, the kings part remaining at Edenburgh, and the quéens at Lithquo, the three earls, Arran, Argile, and Huntleie appoint a parlement at Lithquo, the three nones of Auguſt. The other faction ſent Robert Petcarne ambaſſador to the quéene of England, to intreat with hir about the ſuppreſſion of the common enimie; and further to let hir vnderſtand, that ſuch were the good minds of the Scots vnto hir, that they would chooſe a regent by hir appointment.

Beſides which, the ſaid lords of the kings part with generall conſent wrote letters vnto the erle of Lennor, then remaining in England, to repaire home with all conuenient ſpéed into Scotland. ¶ We maie read in the hiſtorie of England, in what ſort the erle of Suſſex lord lieutenant of the north parts, entring into Tiuidale the ſeuen & twentith of Aprill, burnt the Moſſe towèr, the towne of Crawling, the caſtell of Fernitherſt, the towne of Hawike, and the caſtell of Bzaurton, that belonged to the laird of Buclewgh, with diuerſe other caſtels, piles, towns, villages, and hamlets belonging to the lairds of Fernitherſt, Buclewgh, and others in thoſe parts: alſo how the lozd Scrope inuaded the weſt bozders of Scotland at the ſame time: and likewiſe how the ſaid earle of Suſſex wan the caſtell of Hume, with diuerſe other matters which here I paſſe ouer, referring you to the ſaid hiſtozie.

The earle of Lennox ſent fozward to returne into Scotland.

But now about the ſame time, the earle of Lennox, hauing got licence of the queene of England to make his returne into Scotland, was ſet fozward, and came to Berwike towards the latter end of Apzill, where being viſited with ſickeneſſe, he remained by the ſpace of fourtéene daies oz moze. In the meane time the duke of Chatelerault, the earles of Huntleie, and Caſſils, the lozd Fleming, and ſundzie others of that faction, ſéeing the time ſerued well foz their purpoſe, now that the regent was ſlaine and diſpatched out of the waie, gathered a power, to the number of thzee thouſand men, and came downe to Edenburgh. But after that they had knowledge that the erle of Lennox was comming out of England with a power of Engliſhmen, by the quéens maieſties appointment; aſwell foz the ſafegard of the yong king, as alſo foz the ſafe conduct of the earle of Lennox home into Scotland: the duke and earles afozeſaid retired themſelues from Edenburgh to Glaſcow, where they beſieged the caſtell by the ſpace of fiue oz ſix daies, vntill the earle of Lennox approched thitherwards. Foz ye haue to vnderſtand, that after the earle of Lennox was recouered of his ſickeneſſe, there was appointed a power of hozſſemen and footmen, to go with him into Scotland, vnder the leading of ſir William Dzurie; as in the Engliſh ſtozie ye may read moze at large.

There were diuerſe valiant capteins and gentlemen that went with him in that iournie, aſwell ſuch as had charge, as thoſe that went with him of their owne good wils, to ſée the ozder of things, and to helpe to aduance their pzinces ſeruice. With charge there were theſe; ſir Geozge Carie capteine of an hundzed lances, Henrie Auſſell capteine of fiftie lances, William Gurleie capteine of fiftie lances, maiſter Henrie Carie capteine of two hundzed light hozſſemen, capteine Caſe lieutenant of the generals band of light hozſſemen, being alſo two hundzed: ſir Robert Conſtable ſergeant maioz of the footbands, ſir Thomas Paners, capteine Bzikwell, capteine Carnill, capteine Game, capteine Lambard, capteine Erington, John Conſtable, and Humfreie Berwike leaders of the footmen. Capteine Erington was alſo lieutenant to ſir Geozge Caries companie of lances. Other gentlemen that went of their owne good wils, there were diuers; as maiſter Geozge Deuereur, ſir Jerome Bowes, maiſter William Knolles, maiſter Robert Knolles, maiſter Michaell Carie, maiſter Gawdie, maiſter William Dzurie of Suffolke couſine to the generall, maiſter Greuill, bzother to ſir Fulke Greuill, maiſter Conweie, bzother to ſir John Conweie, maiſter Edmund Uerneie, and manie others, whoſe names I could not learne.

The footmen laie the firſt night at Coldingham. The nert day the earle of Lennox himſelfe with ſir William Dzurie and the hozſſemen ouertooke the footmen, and lodged that night at Dunbar. The nert day they made ſuch ſpéed in their march, that they came thzough to Edenburgh, where they found the earles of Mozton, Murreie, Glencarne, the lozds Ruthwen, Lindſeie, Sempill, Glamis, Methuen, Ogiltrée, and Cathcart, with diuerſe gentlemen of the kings ſide; who receiued the ſaid earle of Lennox, and the Engliſhmen verie courteouſlie. From Edenburgh they paſſed to Lithquho, as in the Engliſh hiſtozie it maie appeare: and from thence the footmen paſſed to Faukirke, and there lodged. But the earle of Lennox, and the Scotiſh lozds, with ſir William Dzurie and the hozſſemen rode to Sterling, where the king laie, then being in the cuſtodie of the earle of Mar. From thence they went to Glaſcow, where the duke had beſieged the caſtell, which was valiantlie defended by the lard of Winto and his bzethzen, with their ſeruants, being not paſt eightéene perſons in all; and yet they kept it fiue oz ſix daies againſt the duke and his whole power, ſlaieng (as hath béene repozted) aboue foztie oz fiftie of his men; but in the end they were in great danger to haue béene taken, if they had not béene the moze ſpéedilie relieued. But the duke and his adherents, vnderſtanding of the comming fozward of the erle of Lennox with the Engliſh fozces, bzake vp his ſiege and fled awaie, with loſſe and diſhonoz, as in the Engliſh hiſtozie we haue likewiſe noted.

After that the earle of Lennox and his friends were thus come vnto Glaſcow, finding the ſiege raiſed, he remained there by the ſpace of fiue oz ſix daies. During which time, there came to him of his kinred and friends, which owght him their ſeruice, according to the vſe of the countrie, the number of foure thouſand men, verie well appointed after their maner; the moze part out of the countries of Lennox and Darneleie, which muſtered befoze the ſaid earle, and ſir William Dzurie, generall of the Engliſh there. This done, the earle of Lennox, accompanied with the earles and lozds befoze mentioned, & likewiſe with the Engliſhmen, marched to Hamilton, where they entred into the palace belonging to the duke, and lodged therein that night.

The nert day they beſieged the caſtell, whereof Andzew Hamilton of Merinton was capteine, hauing vnder him fiftie ſouldiers to defend it; and would not therefoze deliuer it, till that two péeces of great ozdinance being bzought from Sterling, were planted in batterie. Foz then perceiuing themſelues in danger to be taken by fozce, the capteine offered to yéeld the houſe to the Engliſhmen; but not to the lozds of Scotland, with condition, to haue the liues of all them within ſaued. Which was granted, vpon pzomiſe, that they ſhould neuer after beare armes againſt their king, and to depart the realme within a certeine terme, and herevnto they were ſwozne. But they kept not long their oth, foz the night nert inſuing, they did beſet the lozd Sempill that was lodged at that pzeſent in a houſe not far off, and not able to keepe it till reſcue came, yéelded it and himſelfe pziſoner, ſo that he was kept by the Hamiltons in ſafe cuſtodie by the ſpace of twelue moneths after. The caſtell of Hamilton being yéelded (as ye haue heard) was blowen vp with powder. Diuers other houſes there in the countrie about were burnt alſo, as Roplocke, the abbat of Kilwinnings houſe, with diuerſe other of the Hamiltons houſes in Clidesdale.

After the caſtell of Hamilton was thus wonne and ouerthzowen, the lozds returned to the palace, and lodged there againe that night; and on the mozrow, they ſet fire both vpon the ſame palace, and alſo vpon the towne of Hamilton: and therewith the Engliſhmen taking leaue of the lozds in Scotland, departed homewards; as in the Engliſh hiſtozie ye may reade moze at large. The erle of Mozton went with them; but the earle of Lennox and the other earles and lozds with their companies toke their way towards Glaſcow, and from thence euerie of the the noble men departed home to their houſes. Shortlie after, there was a conuention of the lords at Striueling, where the earle of Lennox was made lord lieutenant of Scotland: and afterwards in Auguſt following, there was an other conuention at Edenburgh, where, by the conſent of the three eſtates of the realme, the ſaid earle was made regent of Scotland.

A conuention of the lords. The earle of Lennox made regent.

And about the ſame time, the earle of Huntleie tooke vpon him to be lieutenant of Scotland for the quéene of Scots that remained ſtill in England, and therevpon in hir name ſummoned a parlement to be holden at Lithquho the one and twentith of September then next following. Vnto the which parlement, aſwell the earle of Lennox then regent, as all the reſidue of the lords of both parties were ſummoned. Whereof the regent being aduertiſed, cauſed a parlement to be ſummoned in the kings name to be kept at Lithquho, at the ſelfe ſame day which was appointed by the earle Huntleie. At which day there appeared the lords of the kings partie, & alſo ſundrie great lards, knights, and gentlemen, to the number of eight thouſand, verie well furniſhed, looking for the earle of Huntleis comming, according to his appointed order; but he came no néerer than Bzechine.

The earle of Huntleie commeth no néerer than Bzechine.

Wherevpon it was decréed by the regent and nobilitie there, to purſue him: and to that end, James Dowglas earle of Morton was ſent before with a thouſand horſſemen to haue taken him vpon the ſudden in the towne of Bzechine, before he ſhould haue anie warning of their comming, the regent following after with an armie. But Huntlie hauing warning of their approch, eſcaped their hands, although verie narrowlie; in ſomuch that ſome of his footmen were ſo put to their ſhifts, that they were driuen for their refuge (being ſo beſet on the ſudden) to take the caſtell of Bzechine: the earle of Huntleie promiſing before he went from them, to ſuccour them within eight daies; but they being ſtreictlie beſieged, and the earle not kéeping promiſe with them, after thoſe eight daies were expired, they yéelded themſelues and the caſtell vnto the regents mercie.

The earle of Huntleie eſcapeth.

They were in all about thrée hundred, of which number one and thirtie of the chiefeſt were executed. Some of them had borne armes againſt the king before that time, and had bæne pardoned, and therefore were now thought by the regent and his friends the more worthie to die. After this, the regent returned to Striueling, and from thence paſſed to the caſtell of Downe, and beſieged it; being kept by the ſeruants of the lord of ſaint Colmes Inch, who yéelded it to the regent after thrée daies ſiege. During the time of the regents being there, he ſent one of his ſeruants called John Pone, with letters into England, directed to the quéene of Englands councell: who (for his ſecret practiſing and conference had with ſuch as were enimies to the king and regent before his departure out of Scotland, and for receiuing of their letters to be conueied alſo, and herewith diſcouering ſundrie ſecrets to them, the which were committed vnto his credit and truſt) was apprehended, and the ſame letters which he had ſecretlie receiued being found vpon him, and the matters aforeſaid proued againſt him, he was by law executed.

Execution.

The caſtell of Downe yéelded.

About the ſame time the earle of Morton, the abbat of Dunfermeling, and James Macgill, clearke of the regiſter, were ſent into England commiſſioners vpon the kings partie; the biſhop of Roſſe, the abbat of Kilwinning, & the lord Leuingſton, appointed for the quéene then being in England. In Januarie following, the regent then being at Edenburgh, Claud Hamilton, one of the duke of Chaſtelerault ſonnes, entred the houſe of Paſleie, then being kept by the ſeruants of the lord Sempill: and ſeizing vpon all things which they found as ſtood with his pleaſure, he fortified the houſe with men, munition, and vittels, ſuch as he could get either in the towne of Paſleie, or neere thereabouts. The regent aduertiſed thereof, repaired thither with a power in all ſpéedie wiſe, and laid ſiege to the houſe. They within ſued for a truce, which was granted to them for the ſpace of ſix daies, the better to aduiſe of their owne eſtate: which terme being expired, proclamation was made by the regent, that if they would yæld the houſe, ſo manie of them as had not borne armes before that time againſt the king and regent, ſhould haue their liues ſaued, the reſt to remaine at the regents pleaſure.

Herevpon contention roſe among them within the houſe: for whereas the more part of them hauing not ſerued in anie iournie or exploit againſt the king before that time, would néeds yéeld; the other, being the leſſe number, were not able, to defend it of themſelues. Wherevpon they were readie to drawe their weapons one againſt another; but yet in the end they agréed to ſurrender the houſe, and yéelded themſelues, vpon ſuch condition as the regent had preſcribed: wherevpon fiue of them were executed, & all the reſt were pardoned of their liues. The capteine John Hamilton, lard of Coughnall, and his two brethren excepted, who were ſent to the caſtell of Glaſcow, there to remaine in priſon, and ſhortlie after the ſaid John Hamilton was executed.

Paſleie is furrendzed to the regent.

In March following, the regent returned to Glaſcow, and for that Gilbert Kennedie with the erles of Caſſils & Eglenton refuſed to ſhew themſelues obedient to the king, and would not come to the regent, who had ſent for them by letters at ſundrie times, the regent gathered his power at Glaſcow, and with the ſame marched towards Vrwin and Air, and ſo forward to the earle of Caſſils countrie, who hearing of the regents comming, ſent forth his brother to offer his ſubmiſſion. Wherevpon it was concluded, that the meſſenger ſhould remaine with the regent as pledge for his brother, by the ſpace of twentie daies; and then the ſaid earle to make his appearance before the regent at Striueling, to anſwere ſuch matters as ſhould be laid to his charge.

The regent goeth againſt the earle of Caſſils.

The ſame time alſo Hugh Montgomerie earle of Eglenton, and Robert Boid leuied their bands alſo to appeare and anſwer in like ſort: and as well the one as the other (according to their aſſurance giuen) appeared at the day appointed; but yet not agréeing to ſuch articles as were required of them, they were both committed to priſon, the one in the caſtell of Dunbzeton, & the other in the caſtell of Downe. Afterwards there was a truce taken betwéene the regent, the Hamiltons, and their adherents for twentie daies, to wit, vntill the laſt of March. Which truce once ended, the regent determined with himſelfe to giue an attempt to the caſtell of Dunbzeton, which had bæne long kept by the lord Fleming againſt the king, and the earle of Murreie late regent, who had beſieged it for the ſpace of halfe a yéere or more, but could not by anie meanes compaſſe to win it.

The earles of Caſſils and Eglenton committed to ward.

A truce for twentie daies.

But now on the firſt of Aprill, the truce being then expired, the regent going forward with his purpoſe, cauſed all the paſſages round about the countrie to be ſtopped, as well by land as by water; and the ſame night ſent thitherward captein Thomas Crawford, and capteine Hume, with an hundred ſouldiers, choſen out for the purpoſe: who the ſecond of Aprill, about foure of the clocke in the morning, came to the caſtell, where the ſouldiers with ladders, ropes, and other deuiſes, found meanes to clime vp the rocke, which which is of an exceeding great heigth, and so with great paine, and more danger, at length got vp to the wall of the castell, standing vpon the heigth of the rocke, to the which wall they reared vp a ladder, by the which entered first one Alexander Ramsie, ensigne-bearer to capteine Crawford, & leaping ouer the wall, was streightwaies assailed by three of the watchmen, of the which he slue one: and a souldier named Wederborne that followed him, being the second that entered, slue another of them: the third of those watchmen was also slaine, as he was about to flee from them.

Herewith capteine Crawford & capteine Hume got ouer the wall, and entering the castell with the rest of their souldiers, stroke vp the drum, & cried; A Derneleie, being their watchword; and seizing vpon the ordinance, manned the same. The lord Fleming capteine of the castell, hearing that sudden fright and tumult within the house, fled out by the posterne gate at the neither baile, and so escaping, got a fishers boat, and passed into Argile. The souldiers of the castell, perceiuing their captein fled, and the castell possessed by the enimies, yeelded themselues, and were pardoned. There were taken within the castell John Hamilton, the archbishop of saint Andrews, monsieur de Veriacke a Frenchman, sent thither by the French king, also the ladie Fleming, wife to the lord Fleming, and John Fleming lard of Boghall. Alexander the sonne of William Leuingston, and John Hall an Englishman, being partener of a new intended conspiracie, as was after proued against him, for the which he was arreigned, condemned, and executed at London; as in the English historie appeareth.

The third of Aprill, being the morrow after that Dunbreton was thus strangelie wone, the regent came thither, and entered the same, where he calling the capteins and souldiers togither, caused them with him to kneele downe vpon their knees, and to giue God humble thanks for their good successe in that enterprise, brought to passe rather by the prouidence of God than otherwise, sith the castell seemed to all those that knew it, impossible in maner to be wone, by reason of the great heigth of the rocke, and the strange situation, being inuironed almost round about with the water of Clide on the one side, and the water of Leuin on the other. The report of the winning of this castell was ioifull to the townes and countries about, which before had béene a continuall scourge to them, by reason that the souldiers that kept it, would issue out at sundrie times, robbing, spoiling, and carieng awaie the commodities of the inhabitants there abouts, as well by land as by water.

The strong situation of the castell of Dunbreton.

The regent dealt verie honorablie with the ladie Fleming, suffering hir to depart away with all such plate and iewels, as apperteined either to hir or hir husband. He granted also a safe conduct to monsieur de Veriacke, to passe homewards through the countrie, but the archbishop of saint Andrews was sent prisoner to Striueling. The spoile of the goods found in the castell was giuen to the souldiers that ventured so dangerouslie to atchiue so high an enterprise, bringing it to the wished effect by policie with so little bloudshed as deserueth perpetuall remembrance. The day next insuing, being the fourth of Aprill, the regent appointed John Cuninghame lard of Drumwhassell, a man of good seruice, and seruant to the regent, to be capteine of that castell, and leauing him therein, departed to Striueling, where he caused the archbishop of saint Andrews to be examined vpon certeine articles, as well touching the murther of the late king Henrie, as also for the death of the earle of Murreie the late regent.

The ladie Fleming honorablie intreated.

At what time there came in a priest without compulsion of anie (as hath béene said) and before the regent declared, that one John Hamilton, being in extreme sicknesse, vnder confession told him, that the bishop did send him with three others to the murther of the king. And as touching the murther of the erle of Murreie, the bishops flat answer was, he might haue letted it if he would. Herewith the people that heard him, cried, Awaie with him, hang him. And so for these and other offenses, for the which he had bene forfalted afore that time, he was now executed on a gibet, set vp in the market place of Striueling towne. After this, the regent summoned a parlement, to begin at Edenburgh the fourteenth of Maie next insuing, and passed from Striueling to Lithquo.

The archbishop of saint Andrews executed.

A parlement summoned.

Here the earle of Morton (with the rest of the commissioners for the kings part, being returned out of England, with other of the nobilitie) met the regent, and then they passed toward Edenburgh, where they thought to haue béene receiued, and so to haue kept the parlement there. But they were not suffered to enter that towne, nor yet the castell, the same being defended against them by the lard of Grange, who after the death of the earle of Murreie, was reuolted from the kings part to the Hamiltons side, and had fortified both the towne and castell: so that the regent and nobilitie being kept out there, held their parlement in the Cannogate stréet, within the suburbs of the towne, where sundrie of the quéenes part were forfalted. This being done, and sundrie skirmishes had with them that issued forth of the towne against them without, the regent returned to Striueling, there to remaine for a season.

The castell of Edenburgh kept by the lard of Grange against the regent.

In the meane time the earle of Morton, hauing certeine stuffe come forth of England by sea, and brought to land at Leith, sent the lard of Carmichell with his houshould seruants, & two hundred shot, to fetch the same from thence vnto Dalketh, being fiue miles distant from Leith. At their returne with the stuffe, they were set vpon by the earle of Huntleie, and the lord Hume, who issued out of Edenburgh with their power: so that betwixt them was a verie hot skirmish. But in the end the earle of Huntleie, & the lord Hume were constreined to flie, and were pursued by Carmichell and his companie euen vnto the gates of Edenburgh, some of their men béeing slaine, and others taken prisoners. For reuenge of which ouerthrow, shortlie after the earle of Huntleie, and Claud Hamilton, with their forces marched from Edenburgh, to Dalketh, purposing to haue spoiled the towne.

The lard of Carmichell.

The earle of Huntleie and lord Hume put to flight.

But the earle of Morton, hauing knowledge of their intention and comming, sallied forth of Dalketh with the power which he had there with him, although not comparable in number to his aduersaries; & meeting them in the field, there was a sharpe skirmish betwixt them, and manie hurt on both parties: but in the end the earle of Morton was put to the worse, fourtie or more of his men taken prisoners. And the cause was, for that his footmen were too forward, wanting helpe of their horsemen that should haue succoured them. About the fiue & twentith day of Maie following, capteine Cullen issued forth of Edenburgh with two hundred shot, meaning to intercept certeine harquebusers, which were appointed to come out of Fife ouer the riuer of the Forth, vnto the earle of Morton, who kept still at Dalketh.

The earle of Morton put to the worse.

Wherevpon the said earle, hauing knowledge of Cullens enterprise, aduertised the regent therof, who being then at Striueling, the next day came downe to Dunfermling in Fife. But before his comming thither, thither, Cullen had met with a bote vpon the water, wherein were aboord fiue and twentie ſhot, whome he toke priſoners, and led them awaie with him to Edenburgh. The nert day the earle of Morton came to Leith, where he met with ſir William Drurie, and there they lodged that night. The nert morning ſir William Drurie paſſing forth of Leith towards Edenburgh, accompanied with ſundrie capteins, and other gentlemen for his conuoie thither, they within Edenburgh perceiuing them comming, imagined that they were come forth to offer a ſkirmiſh, wherevpon they iſſued out of the towne and caſtell to incounter them.

So that being readie on either ſide to begin the ſkirmiſh, ſir William Drurie, being come to talke with the parties for ſome accord to be had, toke in hand with great diligence to appeaſe them: and at length procured them to agrée vpon a truce to indure till eight of the clocke at night. But yet when both parts ſtaied in the fields for the ſpace of an houre, becauſe they could not agrée whether companie ſhuld firſt retire from the field, they fell at length in ſkirmiſh (notwithſtanding the truce) and fought verie ſharplie for the time, till in the end they of the towne and caſtell had the ouerthrow: the abbat of Kilwinning being ſlaine, with diuerſe other; and there were taken aboue an hundred priſoners: amongeſt the which the lord Hume, and capteine Cullen were accounted principall. Thoſe that eſcaped were chaſed, & conſtreined for their ſafetie to flee into the towne of Edenburgh, & capteine Cullen was afterwards beheaded.

The regent immediatlie after this ſkirmiſh came with all ſpéd to Leith, as well to fortifie the towne, as to make ſome further attempt againſt his aduerſaries within the towne and caſtell of Edenburgh. Herevpon was Leith [whoſe capteine was Patrike Lindſete] intrenched round about, being eſteemed a place of great importance, ſtanding both in the face of the enimies, and ſo readie to annoie them, and alſo ſeruing well to preuent them of ſuch ſuccour as they loked for dailie out of France. In this meane time, the lard of Grange, then capteine of the caſtell, and prouoſt of the towne of Edenburgh, cauſed proclamation to be made, that all thoſe inhabitants which were not willing to take part with him in his doings, ſhould depart out of the towne. Wherevpon, manie of them departed thence, togither with their wiues and children, and toke with them alſo ſuch goods as they could ſecretlie conueie: and comming to Leith, offered their ſeruice vnto the regent, who thankfullie accepted their offer: and ſo they remained at Leith, ſeruing againſt the contrarie faction vpon their owne expenſes.

After this, the lard of Grange, vnderſtanding that report had bene made by ſome of the kings part, that he was a traitor to the king, and an enimie to his countrie, offered the combat to anie that would iuſtifie the ſame. Which being aduertiſed to them within Leith, diuerſe gentlemen were deſirous to vndertake the challenge: but the regent granted it to the lard of Garliſch, being a Steward, & his kinſman, who had earneſtlie requeſted it. Wherevpon, after diuerſe meſſages by heralds ſent to and fro betwixt them, the time and place was appointed; but the matter went not forward, excuſe being made on the behalfe of the lard Grange, that by reaſon of the charge which was committed to him, it was not thought conuenient that he ſhould hazard the whole cauſe vpon his owne perſon.

The lard of Garliſch.

Shortlie after, there came out of France one John Cheſeholme, who was ſent with monie to the lard of Grange for the paiment of his ſouldiors: he brought with him alſo a certeine quantitie of powder, and three hundred caleuers. Vpon his entering into the water of Fourth, and comming vp the ſame, he learned how the regent was in Leith: wherevpon he landed at Brent Iland, and afterwards for feare hid himſelfe betwixt two cliffs of a rocke, not farre from the queenes ferrie: but at length he was found out by the abbat of ſaint Colmes Inch, and deliuered to the regent at Leith, in which towne the ſaid regent laie aboue two moneths, vſing ſundrie meanes, as well by practiſe and policie, as by force to haue taken the towne of Edenburgh. In the meane time ſundrie ſkirmiſhes chanced betwixt them, and diuerſe priſoners were taken on either part.

John Cheſeholme.

At length, the regent cauſed a parlement to be ſummoned, appointing the ſame to be holden at Striueling the two & twentith of Auguſt nert inſuing. And when that day approched, he left the lord Lindſete at Leith in charge, as his lieutenant to gouerne the towne, and all the men of warre appointed to remaine in gard thereof; and repaired himſelfe to Striueling, where at the preſtired date did aſſemble the earles of Morton, Mar, Crawford, Sutherland, Montroſſe, Eglenton, Glencarne, the lords Ruthwen, Glamis, Methwen, Sempill, Ogiltree, and Cathcart, with manie lards and gentlemen. The firſt day of this parlement the king was conueied thither, the crowne, ſcepter, and ſword being borne before him.

A parlement ſummoned.

When he had taken his place, he vttered a certeine ſpeech as had béene taught him, touching the aſſembling of that parlement, which matter the regent more at large declared vnto the whole houſe: and this done, they proceéded further to other affaires, conterning the ſtate of the common-wealth. Moreouer in this parlement, the duke of Chatelerault with his two ſonnes, the abbat of Arbroth, and Claud Hamilton, the earle of Huntlete, the lard of Grange and ſundrie others were forfalted. This parlement continued by the ſpace of ſeuen daies: at the end whereof, to wit, vpon the ſecond of September, Claud Hamilton, the lard of Bouclugh, the lard of Dumiſton, and diuerſe others, to the number of three hundred horſſemen, verie earlie in the morning entered the towne of Striueling, and ſuddenlie beſet not onelie the regent, but alſo the reſt of the nobilitie within their lodgings.

The duke of Chatelerault forfalted.

The regent hearing a great vprore raiſed within the towne [in which George Ruthwen was ſlaine] and not vnderſtanding the cauſe, nor who were the authors thereof, after he perceiued how the houſe wherein he lodged was beſet on ech ſide, he defended the ſame againſt the enimies for a good ſpace: but at length deſpairing of ſuccours, and doubting leaſt the houſe had béene vnderlaid with ſome barrels of powder, and that it would be blowen vp if he yéelded not as ſome told him: and the enimie to increaſe that doubt, crieng ſtill; Blow vp the houſe, what ſhuld we ſtand longer about him? at length he was contented to yéeld to the lard of Dumiſton, but not before he ſaw that ſome of his ſtouteſt capteins had yéelded themſelues before his face. He yéelded, with condition to haue his life ſaued: but promiſe in that behalfe was not long kept. For thoſe that had thus taken him, when they perceiued reſcue comming downe from the caſtell, ſo that they ſhould not be able to carrie him awaie, capteine Cauder with a piſtolet ſhot him into the bodie, before he could be recouered out of their hands.

The earle of Morton being in the hands of the lard of Bouclugh, toke the ſame lard priſoner, he yéelding himſelfe vnto him:

and

and likewiſe the earle of Glencarne toke his képer priſoner, and ſo did ſundrie others take their takers: but Claud Hamilton, with others their companies, hauing firſt gotten all the horſſes that were found in the towne into their hands, when they heard that the reſcue was comming, ſhifted for themſelues, and fled awaie. The regent, being mortallie wounded, but yet deliuered from his enimies, rid vp to the caſtell, and calling there vnto him the whole nobilitie, when he perceiued his end to approch, he vſed theſe words (or the like in ſubſtance) as followeth.

The earle of Lennox his words before his death.

My lords, it is not vnknowen vnto you all, that my comming hither to take this regiment vpon me, was not of mine owne ſéeking, but at the requeſt of you all. And that which chiefliе moued me heerevnto, was, for the defenſe of the kings perſon, being yet (as you ſée) an infant; of whome by nature and dutie I was bounden to haue carefull conſideration, and that in his minoritie, the good and quiet gouernement of this common-wealth might be aduanced, and iuſtice executed vpon thoſe that moſt cruellie did murther the late king, my ſonne the kings father, and his vncle the good earle of Murreie, late regent: whoſe miſchéeuous and diuelliſh deuiſes if in time you doo not preuent by your wiſedoms and diſcretions, they will procure the finall ouerthrow and deſtruction of you all. In this action (as you ſée) I haue ſpent my bloud, and haue plaied the laſt part of my tragedie, and now I féele death to draw néere at hand.

Wherefore I require you all, for the due regard that you haue of your duties, firſt to almightie God, and next to the king your moſt lawfull and naturall prince now in theſe his tender yéeres, wholie to imploie your ſeruice in his defenſe, with care to maintéine the ſtate of this common-wealth, whereby you ſhall not onelie accompliſh your duties towards God, but ſhall be aſſured to find in your king in time to come (God lending him life) all that good which you can iuſtlie require. And I ſhall further commit to your friendlie protection, my poore ſeruants, who for their good ſeruice haue well deſerued, and yet remaine vnrecompenſed, deſiring you all to be good to them. And laſtlie, I deſire you to commend me vnto the ladie Margaret my déere wife, now being in England: vnto whome I beſéech God to be a comforter. And now ſith my ſpirits begin to faile, and that my life draweth néere to an end, I take my leaue of you all, deſiring you to praie to God for me. Theſe words being ended, he called to God for mercie, and continuing in praier vnto the end, within a while after he departed this life, and was buried in the kings chappell in the caſtell of Striueling.

The earle of Lennox departeth this life.

¶ Thus haue I hitherto continued this hiſtorie of Scotland, not ſo largelie nor perfectlie as I could haue wiſhed, but ſkambled forward with it in ſuch ſort as you maie ſée; hauing deliuered nothing vnto you to impaire the credit of the Scotiſh nation, otherwiſe than I haue found in authors, or learned by credible report (as I take it) hauing put off the partiall affection, which I beare of dutie to mine owne countrie, in this reſpect, that I ſhuld not ſéeme to wreſt the words of writers, either to the aduantage of the Engliſh people, or diſaduantage of the Scots, ſpeciallie in politike gouernement, warlike exploits, ciuill demeanor, and other vertuous exerciſes: which as I haue found them either in anie one perſon particularlie, or in the multitude in generall; ſo haue I reported the ſame, not ſparing the truth herein, as I haue found it recorded, either for loue or hatred, dread, fauor, or enuie: but yet in no wiſe preſuming (as elſe-where I haue ſaid) to vſe mine owne cenſure, but rather leauing the iudgement of other mens reports vnto the readers diſcretion. To whome I wiſh ſuch vnderſtanding and knowledge in the truth, as maie ſatiſfie himſelfe, and redound to the publike commoditie of his countrie, and pleaſure of the almightie; in whoſe hands are the hearts of kings & gouernors, guiding the ſtates of realms and common wealths, as to his diuine wiſedome ſéemeth moſt expedient. To whome be glorie, honor, and praiſe for euermore; Amen.

Thus farre the painefull induſtrie of Raphaell Hollinſhed, and others.
The ſequele, concerning the continuation of this Scotiſh hiſtorie, is a new addition before this time neuer in Engliſh publiſhed.

THE ANNALES OF

Scotland in ſome part continued

from the time in which Holinſhed left,

being the yeare of our Lord 1571, vntill the yeare of our redemption 1586, by Francis Boteuile, commonlie called Thin.

SOcrates (good reader) being demanded how a man might ſpeake that which ſhould be beſt and acceptable to all men, moſt wiſelie (as one in all his life wholie giuen to ſerch and ſaie the truth in euerie thing) anſwered: That we then ſpeake beſt & moſt to be allowed, when we ſpeake nothing but that which we beſt and perfectlie know. For we know nothing excellentlie well, but ſuch things as are often heard by vs from others, manie times repeated by our ſelues; and that which is commonlie receiued, imbraced, approoued, and vſed by all men. Now thoſe things are moſt vſed which concerne publike affaires, and ſuch publike affaires are moſt knowne when they end in publike action; & publike action, ſo farre foorth as it concerneth the thing doone, muſt needs be true that the ſame was ſo doone in that order, as it was openlie ſene to be doone. Wherby might be concluded, that in chronicling and treating of publike affaires, we ſhould ſpeake that which is beſt, which is moſt acceptable, & moſt true: bicauſe we report things doone in the eies of all men. But how trulie that is performed in ſome new writers, it is well knowne to all men of iudgement. For ſuch is the affection of our age, that ſome of malice, and ſome for flatterie, and euerie one to feed their owne diſpoſition, doo ſo gloſe things publiklie doone, as with a certeine witcherie of words, they like Circes transforme the things doone in publike ſhew to be of other ſhapes than they were indeed. Whereby Socrates maie now ſeeme to be confuted, in ſaieng, that they ſpeake beſt that ſpeake things receiued of all men, and that be common to the world: for ſo ſhall miſreporting and flatterie, a thing commonlie knowne and vſed of all men, be the beſt ſpeech; which in truth neither is nor can be. Now what I haue ſeene and knowne in that, as well of things at home as of things abroad, I forbeare to write; and for that cauſe alſo might moſt iuſtlie reſtraine my pen (writing vpon the report of others) both now and hereafter from treating of ſuch publike affaires, to the end my ſelfe ſhould not run into the danger of a like falſifier or miſreporter. But then on the contrarie part, when I fall to an other expoſition of the ſame ſaieng of Socrates, that he ſpeaketh beſt, that ſpeaketh that which he beſt knoweth, and that we beſt know the things which are commonlie receiued, and that we receiue thoſe for ſoundeſt which time trieth to be moſt true, and thoſe things which be moſt true are ſuch as are knowne to be publikelie doone; I ſuppoſe I ſhall ſpeake beſt and moſt acceptablie in writing publike affaires; conſidering that I am not ſworne to anie faction, nor carried with hate or loue, nor bewitched with promiſe of gaine or honour, nor inforced to turne to the right or left hand, but onelie left at libertie to make truth the daughter of time to be the common end, knowledge, and report of publike things: ſith the end of labor, of contemplation of ſtudie, & fruit of writing (as appeareth 2. Met. 4.) is the atteining of truth, and not that perpetuitie or memorie of a famous name or report, a thing alwaies ſought by me to be auoided, being onlie content in ſecrecie to relie my ſelfe vpon the recording of truth, which of all things (in my mind) is moſt pleaſant, bicauſe the ſame is alwaie a conqueror. For as ſaith Nehemias, Truth is great and dooth mightilie preuaile. Wherefore, as I ſaid, ſith thoſe things be moſt true & beſt knowne which are publikelie doone, and that they are publikelie doone that ſort to anie action in the common-welth: we then conclude that we write beſt and moſt acceptablie, when we trulie ſet downe a common truth of common occurrents doone in the common-wealth; bicauſe that ſuch things trulie reported, doo conclude with Socrates that we ſpeake and write beſt in declaring a deed trulie doone, in that order (without ambages, gloſes, or parcialities) as the ſame was moſt trulie performed touching the truth of that outward act.

Accept therfore (good reader) that which I doo ſuppoſe I haue beſt ſpoken (by this my argument grounded vpon Socrates) in this my continuance of the Annales of Scotland vnwillinglie attempted, but by inforcement of others, whoſe commanding friendſhip it had beene ſacrilege for me to haue gainſaid. And therefore rather careleſſe to hazard the hard opinion of others, deſcanting vpon my ſudden leaping into the printers ſhop (eſpecialie at the firſt in a matter of ſuch importance) than the loſſe of the long and aſſured friendſhip of thoſe which laied this heauie charge vpon my weake ſhoulders, I haue like blind baiard boldlie run into this matter, vnder the hope of thy fauourable acceptance. And though herein I ſhall not in euerie reſpect ſatisfie all mens minds and iudgements, that for fauour of perſons, times, & actions, will like Proteus at their owne pleaſure make black ſeeme white, alter euerie matter into euerie ſhape, & curiouſlie carping at my barrennes in writing, bicauſe I omit manie things in this my continuance of the Annales of Scotland, & haue reported things in other formes than ſome mens humors would haue had me to doo: I muſt deſire thee to conſider for the firſt that the Scots themſelues, beſides manie others of our owne nation are the cauſe thereof, who either for feare durſt not, or for prentended aduiſe and conſultation in the matter would not, or for the reſtreint of others might not, impart to me ſuch things as ſhould both concerne the honour of the Scotiſh nation, and the ſubſtance of their owne cauſe. For the other matter, if I ſhould bind my ſtile to the affections of ſome, I ſhould breake the rule of Socrates, and not ſpeake the beſt, ſith I ſhould then ſpeake publike and common things, publikelie knowne to all men, contrarie to that order, in which they were commonlie and publikelie ſeene to be doone of all men; and ſo by that meanes fall into the reproch of a diſdeined reporter.

Now, if thou which art the reader, thinke that I (vnacquainted with mattets of ſtate, eſpeciallie in an other countrie, better knowne to all men than to my ſelfe) am far vnable to breake the dangerous ice of ſuch matters, and ſo more vnmeet to enter into the boſome of princes (whoſe harts as Salomon ſaith are vnſearchable) ſhould for my vnaduiſedneſſe ſeeme worthie the puniſhment of Prometheus, that ſtale the fier from Iupiter, and caried it abrode into the world, bicauſe the affaires of princes are not to be made common, to be ſubmitted to the cenſure of their ſubiects, nor to be written vntill the aſhes of all thoſe whome the things concerne were vtterlie conſumed: thou muſt yet remember that men haue eſcaped puniſhment in dealing with higher matters than with things of chronicles, or of ſuch like which onelie touch the life of the bodie. And therefore in puniſhing thereof vpon Prometheus, Iupiter went beyond himſelfe. For if the greater, that is for matters touching the ſoule, went not onelie free from puniſhment, but receiued eternall reward, as after ſhall appeare, how much more ſhould Prometheus haue beene ſpared, that but onelie medled with the bodie? Now it is manifeſt that in diuinitie and matters of the ſoule (a thing that ſo far exceedeth the bodie as the ſunne dooth the moone, as angels doo inferior creatures, and as light dooth darkeneſſe) there be manie which haue lept into heauen, and by contemplation placed their pen amongſt the ſonnes of God in writing, and laieng abrode to the world (as much as in them laie) the vnſearchable works of the Almightie, whereof we cannot comprehend the leaſt cauſe, order or perfection, and haue therefore not onelie not receiued puniſhment, but eternall reward both in bodie and ſoule; as Enoch was tranſlated to paradiſe; Elias taken vp in a fierie chariot; Paule rapt vp into the third heauen, with manie others. For which cauſe I ſaie, if they which lepped into matters farre beyond the reach of men, to expreſſe in the meaneſt degree of perfection, were not puniſhed for medling therein, and writing thereof; much leſſe ought I to be puniſhed with Prometheus in medling with the diſcourſe of matters vpon the earth, and ſuch as concerne the actions of mortall creatures, as battels, mutations of kingdoms, death of princes, and ſuch other earthlie accidents. Into which yet I would not haue ſo raſhlie deſcended, or taken ſo hard a prouince in hand, had not (as before I ſaid) the commandement of ſuch as I durſt not gainſaie, interponed it ſelfe as a ſhield to receiue and beat backe the ſharpe darts of enuious toongs. For which cauſe ſith I was bound to him by deſart, and that he had better opinion of me than there was cauſe whie; I feared not (though I deemed it the part of him which doubted the iudgement and reproch of the wiſer ſort, not to haue hazarded his credit) to enter into this dangerous ſea, being not ſo much furniſhed with hope to performe it well, as deſirous to diſcharge the requeſt of him, and to ſhew the hope I conceiued at the well acceptance thereof by thee. In which diſcourſe I had rather good reader thou ſhouldeſt complaine of want of ſufficiencie in me to performe ſo hard a thing: than that he ſhould miſlike of my goodwill in anſwering his deſire. And ſhould I feare to enter heereinto, being a thing meet onelie for great councellors and men priuie of matters of eſtate; as though there were no place for Greeke poets but onelie to Homer and Sophocles; and for Latine poets, but to Virgill, Ouid, and Horace? Did the ſingularitie and ampleneſſe of Platos knowledge in philoſophie feare Ariſtotle to write in the like argument? Or hath Ariſtotle ſtaied the pen of others? Shall no man be painters but Appelles or Zeuxis, or caruers or grauers but Phidias and Lyſias? Shall no man be orators but Cicero, Quintilian, aud Demoſthenes? Shall none write hiſtories but Cæſar, Liuie, Sabellicus, Paulus Iouius, Comineus, Guicciardine, or ſuch like? Or ſhall none deliuer their trauell to the world bicauſe they cannot write in Engliſh as did ſir Thomas Moore, ſir Iohn Cheeke, Roger Askam, Gefferie Fenton, or Iohn Lilie? Yes trulie, for when they haue doone their beſt, and written what they can, a man may yet imagine a far more excellent thing, euen of and in that wherein they haue beſt trauelled, written, painted, or graued, and that euen by the ſelfe ſame thing which they haue doone. And more good reader thou canſt not doo either vpon the baſenes of my ſtile, the diſorder of the matter, or the barrenneſſe of ſupplieng of things requiſit for the furniſhing and maieſtie of an hiſtorie, than to ſuppoſe and ſaie that a better forme and method of writing, a more ample diſcourſe for the matter, and a ſweeter ſtile for the manner might haue beene had for the hiſtorie of Scotland, than that which I haue ſet downe. Wherefore if the beſt writers be ſubiect to theſe faults, that when they haue ſpent all their wit, eloquence, and art, there is yet ſomewhat to be deſired in them, as well as in me the meaneſt writer, I am content to beare all ſpeeches, and deſire thee to thinke what I would doo, and not what I ſhould doo; to excuſe me by others, and not to condemne me with others; to accept this in that ſort as I haue meant it, and rather with mildneſſe to pardon my imperfections, than with malice to barke at my well meaning. Beſides which, if thou ſhalt deeme this worke and continuation of mine for Scotland, ought to haue been conſecrated to the fauourable acceptance, and honourable protection of him to whom the firſt volume was dedicated; I anſwer (beſides that I am to him an eſtranger, and not to beg vndeſerued fauour of anie perſon, and that the firſt patrone of this Scotiſh hiſtorie is now in the low countries beyond the ſeas) this is a thing by me ſo ſlenderlie doone, that it meriteth not his honourable iudgement, or the learned view or patronage of anie other of the nobilitie. For if it had, I would then haue beſtowed the ſame vpon thoſe to whom I haue alreadie conſecrated my ſelfe, whatſoeuer I am, hauing long before this couenanted with my bodie, onelie to tie it vnto their good commandement. For hauing but one heart, I cannot dilate it to ſerue and offer it ſelfe to manie perſons, conſidering that where is but one heart, there muſt needs be but one waie: and he that will beſtowe one heart vpon manie perſons, muſt diuide the ſame into manie portions, and ſo diſmember it, that in the end it will be no heart at all; or els he muſt go to the ſhambles to prouide manie ſheepes hearts, to beſtow vpon thoſe manie to whom he will bind his manie ſeruices: for which cauſes I may neither chooſe a new patrone, nor dedicate this to the old, but onelie to thee the fauourable reader. Now before I knit vp this exordium (which may ſeeme to thee in reſpect of the following hiſtorie, to be like the towne, the gates and entrance whereinto being verie great, occaſioned Diogenes to will the inhabitants to ſhut thoſe great gates, leaſt that little towne did run out thereat) I am to admoniſh thee good reader, that in all my former additions to the hiſtorie of Scotland, I haue neither word for word, nor ſentence for ſentence, ſet downe the writings of Leſleus or Buchanan, but haue choſen out the matter as I thought beſt and apt to my deſire. After which ſort I haue likewiſe in this my continuation of the annales of that countrie, not ſet downe or deliuered things to the world in that ſort and ſtile as I haue receiued intelligence thereof, but onelie culled foorth ſuch matter as both the time wherein we liue, the matter whereof I intreat, and the method required therefore, may well beare and chalenge. Thus hauing laid before thee, that he writeth beſt that trulie writeth publike affaires, that I was commanded by my deere freends to enter into this ſand: that I cannot diſcourſe of this hiſtorie as I willinglie would: that I ought not to forbeare to write bicauſe I cannot in ſtile and matter equall the beſt: that they are to be pardoned that attempt high things: that I haue purpoſelie in generall dedicated this labour to the common reader, and not in particular to anie honourable perſon: and hoping that thou wilt pardon all imperfections, I ſparinglie enter into the continuation of the annales of Scotland (being ſuch as thou maiſt be content to read, and I am contented to write) in this ſort as heere followeth, making my firſt entrance thereinto with the death of the earle of Lennox, with whome Holinſhed finiſhed his chronicle, and ſo to the matter, after this long and tedious deteining of thee from the ſame.

THE CONTINVANCE of the annales of Scotland, from ## the death of the regent Matthew earle of Leneaux.

Lesleus lib.10. pag.387. Buchan.lib.20.

THe earle of Lineaur slaine and buried at Stearlinge (as the state of that same troblsome time wold so permit) the noblemen which were there present of that faction, taking part with the king, assembled themselues for the creating of a new regent, to which function they named three, and those first by oth compelled to yeeld to the voices of the nobilitie. The three appointed by them were Gilspec Cambell earle of Argile, James Dowglasse earle of Mourton, and John Areskine earle of Mar. But in the end, vpon consultation which of these for most causes (both beneficiall and honorable to the realme and king) were meetest to weeld so troublesome and dangerous an office; in the end it was laid vpon the shoulders of the last of the three, to whome (they wholie inclining) gaue full authoritie to execute the office of a regent. At the first entrance into which place, this Areskine, hauing nothing more deere or desired to and of him, than the besieging and recouerie of the castell and town of Edenbrough (out of the hands of the queens faction) to the vse of his maister and pupill (whervnto the last calends of October he was appointed, with a sufficient armie by the last deceassed regent his predecessor) he was now hindered therof by sudden (and vnlooked for) turmoiles of the estates of the realme. Where vpon for that instant, the same was proroged to the ides of the said moneth of October. Which delaie was after occasion of great impediment for the recouerie thereof, because it ministred time, power, substance, and succor to the citizens and capteins, to mure and strengthen the castell and towne, when the sharpe winter, the long nights, the hard carriage for the wars, preparation, and the want of sufficient furniture therefore (at the same time with the said turmoiles) occasioned departure from thense, without dispatch of that for which he came.

Colen.

The earle of Mar made regent of Scotland.

Certeine moneths after that the regent was gone from thense, there were some few and small excursions and skirmishes vsed amongst them, the victorie inclining to neither part. For the free sight & watch out of the castell of Edenborough (towards euerie part of the countrie) so wrought, that the queenes faction should neither come to handstrokes, nor yet (being vnprouided) should be intrapped with the deceits of their enimies: because by a priuie token (giuen out of the highest towre of the castell) they were easilie warned to recoile and draw homeward in conuenient time. All which notwithstanding, they once felt the smart of the enimie, when all the horsse and footmen were come out of the towne to intercept a part of the kings armie. For the kings faction (hauing first laid an ambush in the vallie) did with the rest come before the castell, in hope to traine the towne garrison vpon them out of the wals of their defense, which their expectation was not deceiued. For the said Edenburgers made hast out of the towne, to pursue the said part of the kings armie, which feined a speedie flight, to draw the other part further from defense of the castell. By means wherof, they of the towne did so egerlie pursue them so flieng, that in the end they went so far after their enimies, that they drew neere the ensignes of the other ambush, now shewing themselues out of the vallie to rescue their fellowes put to this feined flight. Which thing being well perceiued by the watch of the castell of Edenborough, forthwith it gaue the appointed signe, whereby those on the queenes part (before that they came neere to the place in which they were laid for) began fearfullie to recoile for their better safetie; whose flight was the more troublesome to them, because they knew they were in danger, and could not suspect from whense or how their hurt should come, although they were before warned therof by the said watch of the towre. In which recoile of the queenes part, the few horssemen which had before feined the flight (to draw on the other) returned, and made such hast on the backe of the footmen, that the footmen were inforced (with all the speed that might be) to flie vnto the citie, the nert waie that euerie man could find for his best defense: at what time yet manie of them were wounded, and manie taken prisoners, as well capteins and gentlemen of armes, as others.

Skirmishes about Edenborough.

An ambush laid by the kings faction.

The queenes part warned by the watch of Edenborough castell.

They which late in ambush pursue those that came forth to set vpō the kings part.

Whilest these things were thus slowlie performed, in that the towne of Edenbrough was with no more heat sought to be recouered, a miserable misfortune happened in an other part of Scotland: for a great slaughter was in the north end of the realme occasioned by this means. There were in that countrie two families of great power and authoritie, both valiant and wise, both harboring deadlie feed of long rooted betweene them. These two were of the sirnames of Gordon, and of Forboise, whereof the first liued with great concord and amitie amongst themselues,

A conflict betweene the Gordons and the Forboises ſelues, and by the kings ſufferance had manie yeares gouerned the people adioining vnto them, whereby they purchaſed both ſtrength amongſt themſelues, and the helpe of other men towards them: when contrarie, the Fozboiſes were at wars one with another, dailie impaired their owne ſtrength by their owne ſlaughters, and in the end wrought their owne confuſion, for euerie diuided kingdome cannot long continue. But yet though this ſecret rancor did ſtill remaine amongſt theſe families, they did not in manie yeares before attempt anie open warres the one againſt the other; rather liuing in ſecret emulation, than open enuie, bicauſe they had (in waie of ſome ſhew of reconciliation) by marriage intermingled both their families togither. Among theſe Fozboiſes there was one called Arthur (a man of ſingular wit, and of no leſſe readie hand to perfozme his deuiſe) who had alwaies followed the kings part to his vttermoſt, from the firſt time of theſe diſcozds. This man therefoze ſuppoſing this to be the time (now oz neuer) wherin he muſt honoz himſelfe and his name, increaſe the ſubſtance of that part which followed him, & ſuppreſſe the rage of the Gozdons, firſt labourred to bring his familie to vnitie and mutuall loue, foz all vertue gathered into it ſelfe is greateſt ſtrength. The which if he might compaſſe (as by anie poſſible meanes he would leaue no ſtone vnturned that might further it) he was then in ſo good ſafetie as he deſired. Foz then was there not anie faction oz familie in thoſe parts whatſoeuer, whoſe wealth oz ſtrength he doubted, and whoſe ſtate oz authozitie he did feare.

The Fozboiſes diſagree among themſelues.

Arthur Fozboiſe.

Foz furtherance of which vnion, when daie and place was appointed to aſſemble the Fozboiſes togither, Adam Gozdon, the brother of the earle of Huntleie (deuiſing by all policie he might to hinder the ſame, and hauing priuie intelligence thereof by his kin, fauourers, and followers) came with a great power of armed men vnto the ſame place (at the time appointed foz the aſſemblie of the Fozboiſes) to breake off their vnion. And although there were two troopes of the Fozboiſes, which preſentlie appeered in their ſight, yet before they could ioine their ſtrengths, Adam Gozdon ſpædilie ſet vpon the one armie (not readie to be ſuccoured by the other) and in the middle thereof did kill this Arthur Fozboiſe; who being the hope of all that race and now ſlaine, his death did ſo amaze the other, that forthwith the reſt were ſone ouerthrowne, ſcattered, and fled each one as he might beſt ſhift foz himſelfe. In which vnhappie conflict ſome perſons of name were preſentlie killed, and manie others taken and reſerued foz ranſome. Wherupon the reſidue (fearing moze crueltie ſhould be vſed vpon the priſoners, loath to haue anie moze of their race to be cut awaie, and giuing place to the time preſent) withdrew themſelues from the fight, and neuer attempted anie thing afterward in the reuenge of their ouerthrow. Which feare and wiſe ſuppreſſion of reuenge grew not without iuſt cauſe, ſuppoſing that their aduerſaries (if they were further vrged) would ſhew no moze mercie to ſuch as they had priſoners, than they did to the houſe of Alexander Fozboiſe before time, which they burnt with his great bellied wife and the other of his childzen.

Adam Gozdon diſappointeth the vnion of the Fozboiſes.

Arthur Fozboiſe ſlaine.

The houſe, great bellied wife, and childzen of Alexander Fozboiſe burnt.

The eldeſt brother of Arthur (who was the chiefe of that familie) hauing his houſe ſo ſpoiled, and himſelfe hardlie eſcaping from his enimies hands, haſtned to the court, from whenſe (though the matter was in great extremitie) he was by the king to be releeued. Foz which cauſe there were appointed two hundzed footmen to ſuch of the nobilitie as fauoured and followed that faction, with letters to the adioining nobilitie to aſſociat themſelues to the part of the Fozboiſes. Theſe thus confederat and come togither to the reſt of the Fozboiſes, with certeine other families of their affinitie & neighbours, ſo aduanced the ſpirit of this Alexander, that he now thought himſelfe ſufficientlie fenſed againſt all the fozces of his aduerſaries. But as their number increaſed, ſo there wanted amongſt them one perſon ſufficient to inioy the place of a capteine, whome the reſt might follow, ſith all the principals and heads of the families were almoſt yong men, and ſcarſe one better than others in degree of calling. Wherefoze the aſſemblie being drawen into diuerſe companies (foz they were inforced to follow ſeuerall leaders) John Keth with fiue hundzed hozſemen departed to his houſe not far from thenſe. Alexander Fozboiſe with his retinue and two hundzed footmen went to Aberden, to expell Adam Gozdon from thenſe, and to repare his armie in the iournie.

The Fozboiſes follow ſeuerall leaders.

John Keth departed.

Alexander Fozboiſe goeth to Aberden.

Adam Gozdon (not ſléeping his affaires, knowing the preparation of the Fozboiſes, and vnderſtanding the approch of his enimie ſo néere with ſo ſmall companie) aſſembled his people, led them out of the towne, and compelled the citizens to follow, to make the number of his armie to ſéeme the greater. Shozтlie after, in a field next adioining to the towne, the two companies met, and a ſharpe conflict was committed betwéene them. In which the kings footmen (appointed to the Fozboiſes) deſirous (moze haſtilie than wiſelie) to fight, and aduenturing further in following of the Gozdons (than their ſhot of powder would continue) they went ſo far, that in the end (being out of the reach of defenſe oz helpe of their company) they were put to fearfull flight by the bowmen of the Gozdons, who purſued them egerlie, and continued the battell vntill night. At what time there were not manie of the vanquiſhed ſlaine, but moſtlie taken and reſerued as priſoners, amongſt which was the ſaid Alexander Fozboiſe taken, after that he had long and valiantlie defended himſelfe againſt his enimies in the ſame conflict, to the perpetuall glozie of that houſe.

The Fozboiſes ouerthrowen beſides Aberden.

After the ſuppreſſion of the Fozboiſes in the nozth parts, the quænes fauourers were highlie incouraged to attempt greater matters. Wherefoze aſſembling their power out of diuerſe parts of the kingdome, they bend their minds to the ſuppreſſing of Jedwozth, a towne which after the manner of the countrie is vnwalled and vnfenſed, but onelie with the ſtrength of the inhabitants: which towne (certeine yeares paſt had ſtronglie reſiſted the fozce of the quéenes faction. Néere vnto this towne were neighbours Thomas Car of Fernitherſt, and Walter Scot, both which beſides their owne retinue had ioined vnto them the people of the nert countries, being Lideſdale, Euian, and Eſkine, alwaies troubled with robberie and giuen to ſpoile, who at that time by the libertie of war freélie without reſtreint, did wander into further countries, to preie, ſpoile and catch what they could. Beſides whom there were alſo in Teuiot (aſwell by the infection of theſe countries, as by the cuſtome of ſpoiling in the wars, foz theſe things were by vſe made an other nature and priuilege, as it were from the note and paine of ſin) great families defamed with ſuch theft and rapines, and not theſe alone (ſith this poiſon had crept almoſt ouer all the land) but certeine of the next Engliſh pale (being allured with hope of preie, and ſuppoſing all things lawfull in ciuill warres) ioined togither; and (to make their number the greater, and their power the ſtronger) called from Edenbozough one hundzed and twentie harquebuſhers, choſen out of the cheefeſt ſouldiers, to be aſſiſtant vnto them.

Whereupon Walter Car of Stefford, being called before the regent for that cause, had the charge of such aid granted vnto him, as a person who both for valure & experience was of sufficiencie to discharge anie such matter laied vpon him. Besides which, a conuenient number of sufficient souldiers, gathered out of the countries adioining, for that season assembled themselues in defense of the towne, & ioined their armie with them at Iedworth. At what time also to strike more feare in the one part & to aduance the courage of the other part, it was noised amongst both armies that William Ruthwine with a hundred shot and certeine horsmen (wherof he brought part with him, and part he gathered out of the marches adioining) were at the same time comming to Dirburge with the said Ruthwine. All which notwithstanding, the queenes faction trusting to their owne strength consisting in multitude (for they were in number three thousand men) did earlie in the morning draw towards the towne, to preuent the comming of such succours as both were promised, looked for, and then almost at hand. Which being by Ruthwine partlie before suspected, he hastened the people with more spéed to follow them at the héeles, and by continuall shot wearied the taile of his aduersaries with often assaults and skirmishes.

Walter Car ioineth with william Ruthwine.

Walter Car also ioining vnto him and to his complices the townes men (readie to defend their liues, their goods, their wiues, and their children) take the direct waie towards his enimies, to the end the better to suppresse them and their vnited force. Which when the aduerse part perceiued, forthwith they retired to places of more defense, lest they shuld incounter their enimies with doubtfull battell; and least being set vpon before and behind, they might be suddenlie inclosed, before they could be able to turne themselues, either to escape, or to preuent the approching enimie. At what time such as sought after spoile, and were allured to that warre with hope of gaine, being now by that means defrauded of their preie, when they saw the towne manfullie defended, and the kings part readilie and stronglie come forth to battell, left the field, and departed euerie man to his owne house, as it was nérest to the place where they then remained. Whose sudden flight, without any occasion of danger, being vnderstood of the chiefe of the rest of such as were of the queenes faction (supposing at the first nothing lesse than that the enimie would make vpon them) they also followed after the others, raised their campe, and departed to Hawike with the rest of their followers and companie of footmen, hoping thereby to escape all danger, by reason of the sharpenesse of the winter and late fall of the snow, which would stale the following of the enimie.

The queenes faction flie awaie.

Ruthwine with his armie commeth to Hawike.

But Ruthwine, iudging it best to vse the opportunitie of time, did before daie so spéedilie lead his armie to Hawike, that he was within a mile of his enimies, before they could by anie means be certified of his comming. Whose spéedie and vnlooked for approch did strike such extreame feare into the hearts of those which possessed Hawike, that there was no place left for anie consultation; but presentlie that euerie one should shift for himselfe as well as hée might. Whereupon suddenlie bringing forth their horsses and footmen, and following the course of the nert riuer, they attempted to withdraw into places of more safetie for themselues, and further from their enimies. But the horssemen of Ruthwine spéedilie following at their héeles, so preuented their de-uise, that forsaking their footmen, they fled euer all the countrie to the places best knowne vnto them.

Upon which the footmen being thus left to the spoile and preie of their enimies, did (for their more safegard) hide themselues in a little wood adioining to the said riuer. In which, being on euerie side beset with the force of their aduersaries (fullie determined to preie vpon them) they did in the end wholie yéeld themselues with submission to their courtesie. Whervpon (sith they were not able like prisoners, for their number was ouer great to be caried about from place to place in that sharpe winter) they were (vpon their oth to returne and become true prisoners) suffered harmelesse of bodie, and lossesse of furniture to depart, some few being still reteined in that place as pledges for the others departed companie. But when the time of their returne approched, Kircawdie, deceiuing their faith with his light promises, forbad them to returne at their daie appointed, and made them incurre the note of periurie. The rest of the winter, and all the nert spring was passed forth with light skirmishes on both parties of the kings and quéenes factions, in which few lost their liues, and of that few more on the quéens than kings part. For the quéenes fauourers, remaining in the mounteins nert adioining to the citie, whilest they would take occasion and aduantage to performe anie thing well, would (scarse entring into the danger of the conflict) for the most part retire and flie into the citie for more defense.

Kircawdie causeth the prisoners not to returne at their daie appointed.

In the meane time, while these things were thus ordered, there came manie ambassadors out of England, to pacifie these discords growne to these great extremities, betweene the king and the imprisoned quéenes factions. But the same ambassage so well meant by the quéene of England, and reiected by the seditious of Scotland, sorted not to that end which was meant, nor as the state of Scotland required. Wherefore these ambassadors returned home without anie such dispatch as might answer their trauels, their mistresses care and loue, and the vnitie of that quarelsome people: by reason that the Frenchmen fauouring the cause of the banished quéene, did not onelie hinder the peace and quiet of the Scots, for the benefit of the realme; but also sought warres for the destruction of they naturall subiects, and to bring in their owne gouernement; who for the furtherance thereof, did with great promises interteine the apt minds of the quarrelling faction, to kindle and mainteine the fire of continuall warre, vntill such time as by force they had gotten the vpper hand, and brought the kings fauourers to destruction. For the better support whereof, the French king sent some portion of monie, which being of it selfe not great, or such as their necessitie required, seemed rather sufficient to nourish an hope of abilitie to mainteine the warres, than fullie to dispatch or defraie the charges or the affaires therein; and that the rather, bicause some part of that monie was euer deuoured by such as had the cariage thereof.

Amongst these things there still continued, for a few monethes, certeine light skirmishes to little purpose betwéene the aduerse parties. But the greater companie, who could not satisfie their eagles minds with litle flies, abstained not from robbing and burning the countrie. For Adam Gordon, entring into Angus, besieged the house of William Dowglasse of Glemberuie: but after that long besiege, perceiuing that the man whome he sought for, was not to be found there, he cruellie destroied all whatsoeuer there was left, consuming it with fire and sword. Which tyrannie did strike such fearfull impression into the harts of those of Dundée, that they despairing of their owne abilitie to resist them, called their neighbours of Fife vnto their aid, ſith they were next adioining vnto them, vnto whom alſo Gordon was a perſecuting enimie continuallie in all that poſſiblie he might, becauſe they conſtantlie and ſubiect like did in all dutie ſupport the kings part.

Blackneſſe betraied.

At which time Blackeneſſe being betraied to the Hamiltons by the kéeper of that caſtell, did greatlie hinder the traffike and paſſage betwéene Leith and Sterling. For which cauſe the regent as a perſon that hædfullie loked into the dangers of that time, and with wiſe forecaſt ſought to prevent following euils, Edenburgh vnits broken. brake downe all the mils about Edenburgh, furniſhed all the noble mens houſes and places of defenſe with garriſons néere vnto the towne, and cloſed vp all paſſage to and from the citie. For now there was freſh ſkirmiſhing, and manie on both parts, as well of the king as of the depoſed quéene were taken priſoners, Priſoners taken both on the king and quéens part. put to their ranſome, compelled to abiure their faction, kept in continuall priſon, or elſe preſentlie ſlaine.

These things thus depending, and the king and the depoſed quéenes faction contending ſtill to ſupport their parts, the matter did dailie more and more grow to great ſlaughters: which being well perceiued by forreine nations (pitieng the preſent calamities, and ſéeking to prouide to ſtaie the following diſſention of that countrie which was like to be at hand vpon theſe ciuill and vnnaturall warres, if better order were not taken therefore) The quéene of England & the French king ſend ambaſſadors into Scotland. the quéene of England as the kings next and louing neighbour, and the French king alſo the confederat of Scotland, ſent their ambaſſadors into the realme, to ſée what qualification might be had in theſe troubleſome and dangerous times of the kings minoritie; hoping either to ſet a finall end to theſe inconuenients, or at leaſt to mitigate and ſtaie that furie, that it ſhould not at that preſent, or during the kings minoritie paſſe anie further. For the accompliſhment whereof, ſir William Drurie knight, and Thomas Randolph eſquier, were ſent from the quéene of England: and monſieur de Croque, who had alſo béene ambaſſador out of France into Scotland before that time, was now againe ſent thither from the French king.

These much about one time arriuing in Scotland, and ioining togither concerning the execution of their ambaſſage, dealt ſo effectuallie therein, that in the end they concluded an abſtinence of warre to be had betwéene the parties of the king and quéenes faction, from that time which was about the firſt of Auguſt, to continue vntill the firſt of December following: and ſo brought both the parties in concluſion to relie and abide the full determination of all quarels to be ſet downe by the quéene of England, and the French king. Which being done the ambaſſadors returned home, monſieur Corque into France, and ſir William Drurie and maiſter Randolph into England.

An abſtinence of warre for a time.

Sir William Drurie and maiſter Randolph go into Scotland.

In October following died the earle of Marre, regent of Scotland, of a lingering ſickneſſe (as ſome affirme) but Leſleus ſaith lib. 10. pag. vltima, that morte repentina concidit) being buried in Allowaie a place of his owne, ſituat foure miles from Sterling, to whom in the erledome ſuccéeded John erle of Marre, who after fled into England, as in this following diſcourſe ſhall appeare. Which John Areſkine earle of Marre the regent did marrie Annable Murrie daughter to the lard of Tullebarton, by whom he had iſſue this John, which ſuccæded him in the earledome of Marre (as is before ſaid) and one daughter which was married to Archibald Dowglaſſe now earle of Angus: but ſhe died without iſſue. Of which deceſſed Areſkine earle of Marre, Buchanan compoſed theſe verſes commendatorie, expreſſing the nature, vertues, qualities, and valour of the ſaid earle in this forme and maner following:

The death of the earle of Marre.

Upon the death of which earle Marre the regent, there happened long conſultation for the election of a new regent to ſuccéed in his place, that might in all reſpects defend the kings perſon and the realme, as he had done before. Wherefore the noble men, aſſembling for that cauſe, did in the moneth of December, ons moneth and more after the death of that laſt regent, elect by one conſent the earle Morton to that office, a man no leſſe wiſe than prouident, and ſuch a perſon, as both for the nobilitie of his birth, good ſeruice to the realme and to the king, did well merit the ſame. After whoſe election, the two princes, the Engliſh quéene, and the French king, minding to make a full concluſion of peace and amitie, and to ſettle the kingdome of Scotland in due obedience and vnitie, did in the meane time that the abſtinence of warre before named continued, ſend their ambaſſadors to the regent and ſtates of Scotland. Which ambaſſadors were maiſter Henrie Killigrew eſquire for England, and monſieur de Veracke for France. But as monſieur de Veracke was diſlodged from the coaſts of France, and vpon the ſea in his iournete to Scotland; he was apprehended and taken, before he could attaine to the ſhore of Scotland: whereby he neuer came on land amongeſt the Scots to performe his ambaſſage. Which being knowne to the Scots, and they finding that their moſt aid & ſureſt friendſhip would come forth of England from that prince, whome religion, bloud, affinitie, and neighborhood had moued to like and follow, did in the end reſolue themſelues, that both the affection, aſwell of the yong king, and of the impriſoned quéene, ſhould referre themſelues to the quéene of England, to make a finall concluſion of all controuerſies and troubles which were then amongſt them.

Earle Morton made regent.

Maiſter Henrie Killigrew ſent into Scotland.

Wherevpon the ſaid Henrie Killigrew made a quiet end and pacification of all matters & debates betwéene all the lords of Scotland after this maner. In February following the new creation of this regent Morton, there aſſembled at Perth, or ſaint Johns towne (by eſpeciall edict therefore) the greateſt part of the nobilitie of Scotland, as the regent, the earles of Huntleie, Argile, Atholl, and others: who pitieng the miſerie of their countrie, condeſcended that the quéene of England ſhould by hir ambaſſador, ſet a quiet end and order amongeſt them. Which the ſaid Henrie Killigrew did in all points accordinglie, extending the ſame vnto all the nobilitie of Scotland, except ſuch as were in the caſtell of Edenborough: which were the lord Hume, the lord of Grange, ſecretarie Lidington, the lord Raſtalrege, and others: who rather deſirous of warre than peace, as perſons méetelie well inured therewithall, would not conſent to anie peace, other than ſuch as might ſtand with their owne liking, and ſupport of the impriſoned quéenes faction, which they earneſtlie followed, as after ſhall more appeare.

An aſſemblie at ſaint Johns towne.

But before this finall agreement, as I haue béene crediblie informed, there was a parlement called at Edenborough to begin the fifteenth of Januarie, in which were aſſembled the earle Morton regent, the earles of Angus, Argile, Glencarne, Caſſels,

Out of which number of this aſſemblie were choſen for to be lords and iudges, to determine the articles propounded in that parlement, the earles of Argile, Glencarne, and Mountroſſe, the lords Ruthwen, Lindſeie, Boid, Simple, and Herris, with the biſhops of ſaint Andrews & Orkeneie, the abbats of Aberbroth, Dunfirmling, Canbuſkineth, and Newbottle, beſides the ꝑior of ſaint Marie ile and Portintake, which were alſo adioined vnto them: all which perſons ſo paſſed, named, and appointed, determined, ratified, & paſſed theſe articles following.

15 Annenſt the reparation of the deſtructions, biggings, and other damneges within the towne of Edenborough during the late trouble.

16 A confirmation of the infeftement of certeine rents to the pedagog or college of Glaſcow. All which acts thus fullie paſſed in this parlement, there was the ſame aduiſe giuen to the regent, touching the receiuing to pardon of perſons guiltie to the ſlaughter of the earle of Lennox late regent, & touching ſuſpenſion and delaieng of purſute of the murther of the kings father. Whereof much being ſpoken, and thought good to be followed; ẏet there was nothing enacted that might eſtabliſh the ſame.

During the time of which ſeſſion of this parlement, manie occurrents deſeruing remembrance happened after the ſaid fiftéenth of Januarie. For Edenborough caſtell being ſomewhat diſtreſſed, the caſtilians were put from ſallieng out of the caſtell gate, where capteine Craiford, and capteine Hume laie with their bands to kéepe them in. Notwithſtanding all which, they within repaired vnto a poſterne in the northſide of the caſtell beſides ſaint Cutberts church, and ſaint Margarets well, where they iſſued and fet water at their pleaſure: which being eſpied by their enimies, capteine Michaell and his band came from Dondiſke to ſtop their paſſage thereto. Who within thrée daies after ſuch his approch, deſtroied their well, and inforced them to kéepe within the wals of the caſtell: at what time the regent aduanced his trenches made againſt the caſtell, from the bulworke or ſpurre of that caſtell to the weſt part: and from thenſe, to ſaint Cutberts kirke: ſo that with the water lieng on the ſouthweſtſide, and the regents power on the other ſide, the caſtell was wholie inuironed. During which ſiege, the ſirtænth of the ſame moneth, the caſtilians, to feare ſuch as were aſſembled in the forenamed parlement kept within the towne of Edenborough, beſtowed foureſcore and ſeuen great ſhot vpon the towne, which harmed not anie one creature, but a ꝑre dog that was ſlaine before the dore of the regents houſe: although men, women, and childꝛen did dailie frequent and paſſe the ſtréets of the towne. Which was a rare matter, but ẏet not more ſtrange than this: that there was not ſlaine on the regents part (from the firſt of the moneth of Januarie vntill this time, either by great or ſmall ſhot in the towne or trenches, ſkirmiſhes or otherwiſe) aboue ſix perſons, and within the caſtell but thrée, with as manie hurt betwéene the tolbooth and the ſpurre of the caſtell. The cauſe whereof grew by reaſon of thrée trauerſes made ouerthwart the ſtréets to ſaue the people, beſides the other trenches made againſt the caſtell: at what time alſo the tolbooth and the church was fenſed with a rampier forced of turffes, fagots, and other ſtuffe fit for that purpoſe. Whereby the lords of the parlement did as ſafelie aſſemble and ſit in the tolbooth, and the people went as quietlie and ſafelie to the church to heare diuine ſeruice, as they at anie time did before the warres began, and before that the caſtell was beſieged.

Skirmiſhes about Edenborough.

During which doings in the caſtell & the towne, there was an abſtinence granted at the ſute of the ambaſſadors of England for the duke and his adherents, vntill the foure and twentith of Februarie: in which meane time, certeine lords were appointed to conferre with the ſaid ambaſſadors for an accord to be had betwéene the king and impriſoned quéenes faction. Whereupon ſir James Balfor̃d came to the regents grace, obteined pardon for his offenſe, and earneſtlie laboured to further this agrément. The earle of Argile was aduanced to the honour of the chancellorſhip. And Alexander Areſkine maiſter of Marre was appointed to haue the kéeping of the kings perſon vpon certeine conditions, for the performance whereof he was to find foure ſuerties, lords of the parlement, to be bound for him bodie and lands, hauing fiftéene daies appointed vnto him to conſider thereof, whether he would enter into ſo great a charge or no. And if in caſe he ſhould refuſe to accept the ſame, it was further reſolued and concluded, that the erles of Glencarne and Buquhan, quhan, the lord Glanes, and maſter Marſhall ſhould haue the keeping of the king quarterlie one after another. And if anie of the foure ſhould happen, during the time of his quarterlie gouernement, to be ſicke, or not able to execute that function; that then the lord Lindſeie ſhould be aſſiſtant to him in that gouernement, during that time. Which being thus on all parts concluded, James Kircawdie arriued in the Blackeneſſe in a ſmall pinneſſe, and entred the caſtell of Edenborough, with ſuch monie as he had prouided to bring thither. Which occaſioned the caſtell of Edenborough to be reaſſeged and inuironed both by ſea and land, and was the cauſe that capteine Bruſe ſallieng forth with other of his companie to forage the countrie, and to prouide vittels, were taken by the regents companie. Notwithſtanding all which, yet the others within the caſtell continued their purpoſe, and defended the ſame againſt the regent and his companie, farre otherwiſe than was ſuppoſed that either they could or would do.

Whereupon the regent of Scotland ſolicited the quéene of England, in the behalfe, and for the ſuccor of the yong king of Scots hir couſine, thus grieuouſlie moleſted with the warres of his owne people. So that the quéene of England ſent a power of fiftéene hundred Engliſhmen to the ſiege of Edenborough caſtell, ouer whome ſir William Drurie knight and marſhall of Berwike was made generall, with ſuch capteins as follow; which were ſir Francis Ruſſell knight, third ſonne to Francis erle of Bedford with other capteins, as Read, Parleie, Wood, Brickwell, Pikeman, Gam, Caſe, Carew, Errington prouoſt marſhall, Aſtoll, Stærleie capteine of the pioners, and capteine Barton. To whom alſo to ſerue at their owne frée will theſe gentlemen of name, ſir George Carie, ſir Henrie Leie knights, Thomas Cicill eldeſt ſon of the lord treſuror of England, William Knolles, Sutton, Cotton, Kelwaie, Dier, Tilneie, William Killegrew, & manie other gentlemen of good eſtimation did aſſociat themſelues with conuenient number to attend vpon them. Theſe with their generall paſſed from Berwike to Leith, where they met with maiſter Henrie Killegrew the quéene of Englands ambaſſador, whoſe care, trauell, & furtherance at that time deſerued no ſmall commendation; and with the Scotiſh nobilitie, & ſuch as they had aſſembled to ſome with the Engliſh in the behalfe of the yong king againſt ſuch as toke part with the depoſed quéene. Which Scotiſh nobilitie and gentlemen of Scotland were the earle Morton regent, and ſuch other earles and gentlemen as were tied and alied to him by kindnes and kinred, and ſuch as fauoured the yong king, diſtreſſed by the depoſed quéene, as was pretended. After the ioining of theſe two nations, they on the fiue and twentith of Aprill marched towards Edenborough: and the ſame daie ſir William Drurie the generall ſummoned the caſtell of that towne in forme as followeth.

The taking of Edenborough caſtell by the Engliſh and the regent of Scotland.

The ſummons giuen to the caſtell of Edenborough.

SIr William Kircawdie, ſometimes of Grange knight, forſomuch as the queens maieſtie my ſouereigne ladie, vpon the earneſt requeſt of hir deere couſin the king of Scots your ſouereigne lord made to hir highnes by his regent, nobilitie, & eſtates of Scotland, after all good meanes vſed to haue reduced you to a dutifull obedience of his authoritie by treatie, which hitherto you haue not dulie harkened vnto, to the onlie hinderance of the vniuerſall peace in this realme, by withholding that his highneſſe caſtell, meaning (as it ſéemeth) to reſerue the ſame for a receptacle of forren forces, to the manifeſt dangers both of this realme and of my ſouereigns; and therefore neceſſarie to remoue ſo perilous a danger to both the realmes. For which conſideration hir maieſtie hath ſent hir aid and ſuccors, men, ordinance, and munition vnder my charge and leading, for the expugnation and recouerie of the ſaid caſtell to the ſaid kings vſe and behoſe. And therefore, according to hir maieſties commandement and commiſſion; this ſhall be in due maner to warne, require, and ſummon you, that you render and deliuer the ſaid caſtell with the whole ordinance, artillerie, munitions, iewels, houſhold ſtuffe, and ſuch other implements within the ſame to me, and to the vſe and behoſe of the king your ſouereigne and his regent in his name, immediatlie after this my letter of ſummons or knowledge of the ſame ſhall come to you. Which if you obeie, as of dutie you ought; then ſhall I in hir maieſties name interpone my ſelfe to trauell with the regent, councell, and nobilitie here for the ſafetie of your liues, &c: otherwiſe, if you continue in your former obſtinacie, abiding the canon, then no further to looke for grace or fauor; but you and the reſt within that caſtell, to be purſued to the vttermoſt, and holden as enimies to hir maieſtie, your owne ſouereigne, and countrie. Giuen at Edenborough by me ſir William Drurie knight generall of hir maieſties forces now in Scotland, this fiue and twentith daie of Aprill, in the yeare of Chriſt 1573.

This letter by the lord Grange capteine of the caſtell thus in due ſort receiued, he not regarding the contents thereof, nor conſidering the mild diſpoſition of ſuch as went about to ſpare their bloud, did vtterlie denie the ſurrender of the caſtell, and with all force determined to defend themſelues. Wherewith the Engliſh generall greatlie grieued, did incontinently redeliuer ſuch anſwer to the ſaid lord Grange as wrought an vtter diſcontent and miſlike in the man. By meanes of which the pioners attending their charge, with expedition aplied the caſting of trenches and erecting of mounts or fortreſſes to plant the artillerie therevpon againſt the caſtell. After which euerie one haſtening the cauſe of his comming, & ioining their force togither, began to inuiron the towne, & to laie ſiege to the caſtell in fiue ſeuerall places, where were fiue ſeuerall fortreſſes erected for that cauſe, intituled by theſe names. The firſt mount allotted to the regent, had the name of the kings mount, the ſecond the generall thereof the Engliſh ſir William Drurie did poſſeſſe, the third was in charge of ſir George Carie, the fourth was called ſir Henrie Leies mount, and the fift fell to the gouernement of Thomas Sutton maiſter of the ordinance in the north parts of England. The whole number of which armie vnder paie was two thouſand, wherof fiftéene hundred were Engliſh, and the other fiue hundred Scots: beſides the nobilitie and gentlemen with their companie, and the citizens of Edenborough defended with thirtie péeces of artillerie conteining ſix canons, nine demicanons, nine culuerings, and ſix ſacres. Whileſt the armie without was thus preparing for to aſſaile the companie within, the capteine of the caſtell (to hinder their worke) liberallie ſaluted the pioners & other ſoldiors with ſuch artillerie as they had within the caſtell, and vpon and about the walles thereof; whereby manie were hurt, ſome ſlaine, but more hindered before the trenches and mounts might be brought to their due perfection, for defenſe of the aſſailants, and offenſe of the aſſailed. In which action alſo the aduerſe part forgot not to requite the caſtillians, but moſtlie after that the pioners and laborers had finiſhed ſhed the mounts. At what time they gaue vehement and ſharpe aſſault to the caſtell, although that the extreame heat thereof began not vntill the ſeauentéenth daie of Maie following. In which ſiege on the ſaid ſeauentéenth daie of Maie, the caſtell was moſt roughlie aſſailed by thirtie ſhot of canon diſcharged againſt the ſame. At what time thoſe pæces ſo well perſormed their parts againſt Dauids tower, that the force of the Engliſh canons was eaſie to be then and long after ſeene therein. Which aſſalt continued vntill the one and twentith daie of Maie following, on which daie the whole batterie began not againe as before againſt part, but wholie round about on ech ſide of the caſtell. For vntill then Dauids towre was onelie the marke of the enimie: but after that daie they laid out their power in euerie place, offending and defending ech others ſoldiors, as well within the caſtell as within the mounts and trenches, in that ſharpe conflict hurting and killing manie of the Engliſh and Scots. Whereupon the diligence of the Engliſh began to be ſo great, that they forthwith diſplaced the ordinance in the caſtell, and ſtroke one of their greateſt péeces iuſt in the mouth: whereby the ſame was broken, and the caſtillians force somewhat abated.

After this, on the ſix and twentith daie of the ſaid moneth of Maie, there was a freſh aſſault giuen at ſeuen of the clocke in the morning to the Spurre (a place of defenſe or blockehouſe before the ſaid caſtell) which by the aſſailants was taken, & forthwith vpon the entrance therin was the banner of the generall diſplated and ſet vp, to declare who poſſeſſed the ſame, to the great diſcomfort of them in the caſtell. For although before they had loſt the vſe of one of their great péeces, that their walles were battered, that ſome of their men were ſlaine, & that they had almoſt all their water taken from them: yet would they not yéeld, neither did anie whit begin to deſpaire of kéeping the caſtell, or repelling the enimie; vntill ſuch time as the Engliſh had now gotten the poſſeſſion of the Spurre.

Now, during the time that theſe gaue the aſſault to the Spurre, there was an other band of Engliſhmen and Scots, that had in charge to make ſhew of a freſh aſſault, at the weſt part of the caſtell; to the end that ſuch as laied batterie to the Spurre, might with more eaſe to themſelues, and leſſe ſuſpicion of the aduerſe part, obteine the ſaid Spurre. But this laſt named band, ouer haſtilie putting themſelues in aduenture beyond the limits of their charge, were repelled and driuen to the recoile, with the hurt and loſſe of thirtie perſons, or thereabouts. All which notwithſtanding, the caſtillians (perceiuing their chiefeſt defenſe the Spurre to be loſt, and not greatlie reioiſing of this ſmall victorie ouer thoſe which aſſailed them on the weſt ſide) did the ſame daie by a drumme demand parlee: which they obteined with truce of peace from that daie, vntill the eight and twentith of Maie next following. For which cauſe the lard of Pittadrow was let downe by a rope from the caſtell, and after him the lard of Grange, capteine of the ſaid caſtell, with Robert Peluine; all which came to haue conference with the generall ſir William Drurie, & ſuch other perſons as were choſen to accompanie him about the ſame. In the end, vpon much conferrence had betweene the Scotiſh lards and the generall, the caſtell was the ſame eight and twentith daie (in which the truce ended) deliuered vp into the hands of the ſaid ſir William Drurie, which he kept in his poſſeſſion for a certeine time; during whoſe abode in the caſtell, he ſet vp and ſpred his enſignes and banners vpon ſundrie parts of the wals of the ſame.

This done, the generall (after quiet poſſeſſion had, not determining to reteine it vnto his miſtreſſe vſe, ſith he was onelie appointed by hir to aid the king of Scots, and ſuch of the nobilitie as toke his part) did after (according to his commiſſion) deliuer ouer the ſame caſtell to the vſe of the yong king of Scots; for which cauſe not meaning vtterlie to ſpoile the caſtell, he gaue but part of the ſpoile to the vſe of the ſoldiers, leauing the canons and other artillerie to the kings pleaſure. For before the ſurrender of the caſtell, it was agréed, that if the Engliſhmen had by force taken it, as they obteined it by compoſition, that then they ſhould wholie haue inioied the full ſpoile by the ſpace of thrée daies, the artillerie onelie excepted, which ſhould be carried awaie by the Engliſh. But ſith for theſe cauſes following, the ſame could not abide anie long ſiege, but muſt of neceſſitie yéeld it ſelfe, there was euerie part of the ſaid ſpoile giuen vnto the ſouldiers vpon the deliuerie of the ſame caſtell to ſir William Drurie. The cauſes of which ſurrender were manie.

First, for that they were depriued of water, bicauſe the well within the caſtell was choked with the ruines of the caſtell wals; & the other well without could not ſerue them, bicauſe there was a mount made to hinder them. An other water there was (which was vnknowne to ſuch as were without the caſtell) and was taken from them by the loſſe of the Spurre, out of which they were wont to haue a pint a daie for euerie ſouldier. The other cauſes of ſurrender were theſe.

Secondlie, diuerſe perſons were ſicke, eſpeciallie thorough drinke of the water of ſaint Margarets well without the caſtell on the north ſide, which had béene poiſoned by ſome of their enimies.

Thirdlie, diuerſe others were hurt.

Fourthlie, not manie to mainteine the caſtell, and they not able to take anie reſt, being ſo plied and dailie wearied with batterie.

Fifthlie, diuerſe of the ſouldiers diuided in opinions.

Sixthlie, ſome were no ſouldiers at all.

Seauenthlie, that no aid was to be loked for by the waie of France.

The eight and chiefe cauſe was, that the regent and his forces planted in the ſtrengths round about, and the horſſemen daſtie and nightlie watching and riding, which held and toke from them all vittels, and had brought them to great ſcant of food before the ſiege began. All theſe eight cauſes moued the ſaid ſurrender of the caſtell.

After that the caſtell was thus gotten, the ſixtéenth daie of June following, the priſoners were deliuered by the ſaid ſir William Drurie, in the preſence of ſundrie Scots & Engliſhmen, vnto the regent; and that done, the ſame daie ſir William Drurie departed with his power to Berwike. The names of the priſoners were theſe; ſir William Kircawdie lard of Grange, and capteine of the caſtell of Edenborough, the lord Yume, William Metellan, lord of Lethington ſecretarie, the lard of Pittadrow conſtable of the caſtell, the counteſſe of Argile, the ladie of Lethington and the ladie of Grange, with others. But yet the priuat ſoldiers & others of meaner ſort were ſuffered to depart with bag and baggage.

Thus was the caſtell of Edenborough woone, as you haue heard, which by the common opinion of men was impregnable, and not to be taken by force; inſomuch as manie thought it toke the name of the maiden caſtell, for that it had not béene woone at anie time before except by famine or practiſe. Which opinion being common is ſo much the falſer, in that the common ſort do imbrace it, for that they iuſtlie incline to common fables. For this caſtell was not surnamed the maiden caſtell, bicauſe it was neuer taken ken by force: but becauſe the princes children were there nouriſhed, as maie well appeare by that which I ſhall ſet downe touching the antiquitie of this towne & the name thereof; of which there be diuerſe opinions. For ſome will haue it to be built by Eboracus, of ſome called Ebrancus king of Britaines, called alſo in Britiſh Caſtle mynid Agnes, the caſtell of ſaint Agnes hill, afterward the caſtell of virgins. But Leſleus will haue it built long after the time of H. Lhoid, by the ſpace of ſix hundred foure ſcore and foure yeares, for thus he writeth. Chrutnæus Camelodunum primariam Pictorum vrbem & Agnedam poſtea Ethinburgum ab Etho quondam rege dictam, cum puellarum caſtro, vbi regis & nobilium Pictorum filiæ dum nuptui darentur, ſeruari, & præceptis ad humanitatem & virtutem informari ſolebant, condidit. A little before which, the ſaid Leſleus writeth that Fergusius died Anno ante Chriſti in carnem aduentum 305, & that Hoc tempore Eſdadus Britonum & Chrutnæus Camelonus Pictorum imperium tenebant. Now this king Chrutneus that built Agneda, liued before Chriſt three hundred and fiue yeares by the Scots account, and Eboracor Ebranke liued nine hundred foure ſcore & nine yeares before Chriſt: ſo that the Engliſhmen make this towne more ancient than the Scots. But as Leſleus hath miſtaken himſelfe, following Boetius, to place Camelodunum in Scotland: ſo hath he appointed Edenburgh to be built by the Scots, being built by the Britaines. But true it might be that Eboracor firſt builded it, & that being in the ſpace of ſix hundred foure ſcore and foure yeares waſted and vtterlie decaied, the ſame was afreſh erected by Chrutneus, and after repared by Ethus. The caſtell of which towne, being ſometime appointed for the bringing vp of the daughters of the noblemen of the Picts, vntill they were mariageable, was for that cauſe (and not becauſe it was neuer wone by force) called the maiden caſtell, as the ſaid Leſleus affirmeth. But after, when chriſtianitie came into Scotland, it was called (as I coniecture) Agneda, becauſe it was the caſtell that ſtood on ſaint Agnes hill, & not before the comming of Chriſt ſo called Agneda, as hitherto it hath beene ſet downe, but not rightlie; as I maie with reuerence ſpeake vnder correction of ſuch as by better authoritie can diſproue that I ſaie.

But here let vs a little leaue the countrie ſoile of Scotland, and ſuch things as were there then done; and talke ſomewhat of the perſons of that realme, who performed matter of valure in forren countries. Whileſt the towne of Leiden was ſtronglie beſieged (in the moneth of June) and that the townesmen (hauing a needfull and heedfull care) were altogither imploied about making of proviſion of all ſuch things as were deemed neceſſarie for the defenſe of the ſame towne; the principall part of the commandators armie arriued in Bommell quarters, Gorcum, and Lowieſtein. Howbeit the prince and the eſtates of the low countries made no great account therof, by reaſon that Bommell (which was well furniſhed of all things neceſſarie for the wars) was vnder the cuſtodie of capteine Baufoure, coronell of the Scotiſhmen, who had there attending on him the number of ſeauen Scotiſh enſignes. Which Scots deſirous to performe ſome matter of valure, dailie ſallied out of the towne with ſome of the citizens and gentlemen Hollanders; in which often iſſuing they valiantlie ſkirmiſhed with the enimies. Whereby in the end amongeſt their ſundrie conflicts there were manie warlike exploits performed by the Scots, which deſerued not to be forgotten: as well for that they often repelled the enimie, and kept their ſtrength togither; as for that they being few in number, aduentured (beyond the hope of good hap, by incountering with a greater troope of ſuch as came againſt them, than they were themſelues) either to returne victors, or to loſe their liues.

The Scots repelled their enimies at Bommell.

After which alſo the ſame Scots, continuing in thoſe low countries, performed manie other matters of martiall exploits, which I will ſet downe in this place. For ſith I haue béene denied of ſome of the Scots (whom theſe annales chiefelie concerne) ſuch things as might ſupplie the default of ſufficient matter of Scotland to furniſh the ſame; and for that I haue béene defrauded of the performance of promiſe made vnto me by manie others of that nation, who for dutie vnto that countrie ought, and for clearing ſome ſiniſter opinion conceiued againſt them of their actions in their owne countrie ſhould haue ſought to further me in theſe my labours: I muſt leaue things done in Scotland, and turne my pen to other places; producing matter to helpe my barren diſcourſe, which inforced therevnto doth deliuer an action performed by the Scots in the ſame low countries; where they which were then in ſeruice againſt the Spaniards, vnder the pale of the prince of Orenge, did that which deſerueth not to be forgot.

1576 The Scots denie their furtherance to the writing of the annales of Scotland.

Theſe Scots therefore remaining in thoſe countries, ſeruing vnder the conduct of their coronell ſurnamed Baufoure, did in Januarie ſet forth & meet with the Spaniards at a place called the Fotbale, diſtant not much more than a mile frõ Leige, where was a long and ſharpe conflict betweene theſe two nations. In which by the ſucceſſe of battell (for the moſt part yéelding victorie vnto the ſtronger ſide) a great multitude of them were left dead in the place, and the reſt driuen to ſaue themſelues by flight from their enimies: who yet felt not this ouerthrow ſo ſweet and gainefull, but that they loſt manie of their people before the Scots were put to the worſt.

The tragicall hiſtorie of the warres of the low countries lib. 4.

The Scots put to flight beſides Leige.

But leauing theſe Scots in the midſt of the wars of theſe countries vnder the prince of Orenge, we are to come to other matters following by ſucceſſion of time, which hath deliuered to vs that Margaret the daughter & heire of Archibald Dowglaſſe earle of Angus, died in England the tenth of March in the yeare of our redemption 1577, beginning the yeare at the Annuntiation of the virgin. Which ladie being borne at Harbotell caſtell in England in the yeare of Chriſt 1515, was afterward brought vp in England; and then being priuilie affianced in the eight and twentith yeare of king Henrie the eight, being the yeare of Chriſt 1536, to Thomas Howard yongeſt brother to the duke of Northfolke, ſhe was that yeare committed priſoner to the tower; but after ſet at libertie the laſt of October, in the nine and twentith yeare of king Henrie the eight, in the yeare 1537, & maried to Matthew Steward earle of Lennor by the conſent of Henrie the eight king of England, in the yeare of our ſaluation 1544. After which, being toſſed with both fortunes, ſometime in aduerſitie, & ſometime in proſperitie, ſhe was notwithſtanding alwaies honorablie interteined in England, as both hir birth in reſpect of hir kinglie bloud, and hir calling in reſpect of hir place, did worthilie deſerue. In the end, to cut off all hir other aduerſities, and to draw to things falling in mine owne knowledge, ſhe was on the two and twentith of Aprill in the yeare 1565 (vpon the mariage of hir ſonne Henrie Steward lord Darneleie vnto Marie Steward quéene of Scots) commanded by the quéene of England firſt to keepe hir chamber in the Whitehall the princes court and palace, where ſhe remained vntill the two and twentith daie of June next inſuing; and was then by ſir Francis Knolles (one of the priuie councell and vicechamberleine to the quéene of England) and by ſome other of the gard conueied to the towre of London by water; in which place ſhe remained priſoner vntill that

that hir ſonne the ſaid Henrie Steward was miſerablie and traitorouſlie ſlaine by the earle Bothwell and his complices (as ſome affirme, but how trulie I know not) vpon the twentith of Februarie one thouſand fiue hundred three ſcore & ſir. In which yeare, on the two and twentith of the ſame moneth, the ſaid ladie Margaret was diſcharged out of the towre and ſet at libertie, who ſtill remaining in England did (as before is ſaid) in the three ſcore & ſecond yeare of hir age, and in the firſt yeare of hir widowhood, ſurrender hir ſoule to God, being moſt honorablie buried & anſwerablie to hir calling in the great chapell of Weſtminſter (built by Henrie the ſeuenth king of England) among the kings of that realme in an inward chapell ſtanding on the right & the ſouthſide of the ſaid great chapell. The yeare before whoſe death hir ſonne Charles Steward earle of Lennor (hauing before maried Eliſabeth the daughter of ſir William Candiſh, by whome he had iſſue Arbella) did alſo depart this life. Ouer the bodies of both which perſons, Thomas Fowler executor to the ſaid ladie Margaret, did with the goods of the ſaid ladie erect a coſtlie and ſtatelie tome of rich ſtone and curious workemanſhip, with the picture of that ladie, as liuelie, and as well coloured as art might afford it, about which monument is grauen this memorable epitaph declaring hir nobilitie, as inſueth.

At the head of the toome is ſet downe

Memoriæ ſacrum.

On the right ſide of which toome is this ingrauen.

Margareta potens, virtute potentior, ortu
Regibus ac proauis nobilitata ſuis:
Inde Calidonijs auſtralibus, inde Britannis
Aedita principibus, principibuſque parens:

Henrie ſecond ſonne to this ladie and father to Iames the firſt now king. This Henrie was murdered at the age of one and twentie yeares, Charles the yongeſt ſonne was earle of Lennor father to the late Arbell. He died at the age of one and twentie yeares, and is here intoomed.

On the left ſide of the toome is this ingrauen.

This ladie had to hir great grandfather king Edward the fourth, to hir grandfather king Henrie the ſeuenth, to hir vncle king Henrie the eight, to hir couſine germane king Edward the firſt, to hir brother king Iames of Scotland the fift, to hir ſonne king Henrie the firſt, to hir grandchild king Iames the firſt; hauing to hir great grandmother and grandmother two queens both named Eliſabeth, to hir mother Margaret quéene of Scots, to hir aunt Marie the French quene, to hir couſines germane Marie and Eliſabeth quéens of England, to hir neece and daughter in law Marie quene of Scots.

At the foot of hir toome is this written.

Here lieth the noble ladie Margaret counteſſe of Lennor, daughter and ſole heire to Archibald Dowglaſſe earle of Angus, by Margaret quéene of Scots his wife, that was eldeſt daughter to king Henrie the ſeuenth, which bare vnto Matthew earle of Lennor hir huſband, foure ſonnes and foure daughters.]

Which honourable toome, with theſe ſuperſcriptions, was erected for the ſaid ladie, and finiſhed in the yeare of our redemption 1578, being begun and almoſt perfected in the life of the ſaid ladie Margaret. This ladie being (as before is ſhewed) counteſſe of Lennor and Angus, it will not be amiſſe to declare in this place, what became of both the ſaid earledoms, as well in hir life, as after hir and hir ſonne Charls his death. Touching Angus, this ladie Margaret, vpon the mariage of hir ſon Henrie lord Darneleie, which was ſolemnized the nine and twentith daie of Julie 1565, to Marie quene of Scots, did giue the ſaid earledome with all the rights and members thereof vnto the ſaid quene Marie, to diſpoſe as ſell beſt vnto hir liking. Whereupon the ſaid quéene beſtowed that honour and earledome vpon Archibald Dowglaſſe couſine to the ſaid ladie Margaret: who being exiled, was here in England at the writing hereof. The earledome of Lennor, after the ſlaughter of Matthew earle of Lennor (huſband to this Margaret) which was in Sterling the fourth of September, in the yeare of our redemption 1571, but 1572 as hath Leſleus, was inueſted in Charles Iames the firſt king of Scotland, heire in blood to the ſaid Matthew earle of Lennor, father to Henrie lord Derneleie (that maried the quene) father to the ſaid Iames the firſt. Whereupon the yong king, mindfull of the aduancement of his vncle Charles ſonne to the ſaid Margaret, did inueſt the ſaid Charls with the honour of the ſaid earledome of Lennor, which Charles died in the life of his mother Margaret without heire male, by reaſon whereof the ſaid earledome reuerted to the crowne.

But here leauing the title and ſucceſſion of the earles of Lennor to an other place following (ſith I am entered into the diſcourſe of ſuch of the earles & counteſſes of Lennor as be dead) I thinke it better in this place, than not at all, to mention the epitaph of Matthew earle of Lennor ſlaine at Sterling (as is before touched) in the yeare of Chriſt 1571. For although the ſame matter would more aptlie haue béene placed before at the end of the hiſtorie of Scotland, written by Holinſhed, or at the beginning of my continuance of the annales of that countrie, when I mention the death of the ſaid earle: yet ſith the note of that epitaph came not vnto my hands, vntill I had thus farre proceeded in the hiſtorie; and the ſame alſo at that time paſſed the print (whereby I could not ſet it downe in due place) I will here (hauing ſo good occaſion therfore) intreating of the tome of his wife (whoſe charge alſo wanted not in erecting of this tome of hir ſlaine huſband, and for that this doth alſo touch ſome part of hir epitaph) inſert the ſame in this place after this maner, as it is written vpon the ſtatelie tome of the ſaid Matthew Lennor, and now ſtanding in the chapell within Sterling caſtell, being as hereafter followeth.

The epitaph of Matthew earle of Lennox.

Lo here a prince and potentate,
whoſe life to vnderſtand,
Was godlie, iuſt, and fortunate,
though from his natiue land
His enmies thrice did him out thring, he thrice returnd againe,
Was lawfull tutor to the king,
and regent did remaine:
Where he with rigor rebels rackt,
the right for to defend,
Till enmies old through tyrans trackt,
did worke his fatall end.
Lo thus reſpects the death no wight,
When God permits the time,
Yet ſhall the vengeance on them light that wrought that curſſed crime.

Beſides which alſo on the ſame tome are theſe heroicall verſes ſet downe, declaring his name, his deſcent, his mariage, his iſſue, his offices, and ſuch other

ther matters belonging vnto him, as followeth.

Behold herein interred is,
Matthew of Lennox earle,
Who long of late in Britaine ſoile,
did liue a pearleſſe pearle.
And as he was of roiall bloud,
by roiall progenie,
From Stewards ſtocke of ancient time,
princes of Albanie:
His fortune was euen ſo to match,
with paſſing vertuous wight, Whoſe race deriued from famous kings, of wide renowmed might.
His mother queene of Scotland was,
and eldeſt daughter deare,
Of Henrie ſeuenth Engliſh king,
a princelie mirror cleare.
Hir father earle of Angus was,
ſhe ladie Margaret hight,
The onelie heire of Angus lands,
and all his fathers right.
Thus did king Brutus bloud conioine,
for both by grace diuine
Are come of Northwales princes hault, which were of Troians line.
And diuerſe goodlie imps there were,
that iſſued from them twaine:
Charls Iames now king, and *Charls the earle of them dooth ſtill remaine,
King Henrie father to this king,
their firſt begotten ſonne:
Oh cruell fates! the which ſo ſoone,
his vitall thred vnſponne,
By whoſe deuiſe the grandſire came,
lord regent in this land:
And noblie bare the regall ſword
of iuſtice in his hand.
Whereby he did in tender age
of the kings maieſtie,
This realme protect with fortitude,
prudence and equitie.
But now dame fame with flickering wings withouten anie let,
Shall ſpread abrode this worthie man,
and through the world him ſet.
And tearing time ſhall not conſume,
nor weare the ſame awaie,
But with the worthieſt reckned be,
vntill the latter daie.
After which time, eternitie
dooth triumph then by right:
Where he with angels ſhall reioiſe,
in Gods eternall ſight.

*This was Charles earle of Lennox buried in the towne which his grandmother the ladie Margaret Lennox before mentioned ſurvived after the death of this Matthew his grandfather.

Beſides which Engliſh epitaph theſe verſes were alſo compoſed by Buchanan vpon the ſame earle of Lennor, wherein is not onelie ſet downe (as before) the honourable birth of the man, but alſo ſome of the places of his education, with other things which right fortunatlie happened vnto him in this ſort.

*James the ſixt king of Scots.

Thus ſetting end to the liues & deaths of this Matthew Steward erle of Lennor, of Margaret Dowglaſſe his wife, to their honourable epitaphs, and to their ſumptuous ſepulchres, we will come backe againe to ſuch others, either generall or ſpeciall, accidents as haue fallen in the kingdome of Scotland, and which will touch the vniuerſall gouernement, or the particular occurrents as well of Scotiſh as of other forren affaires managed by them at home, or in other countries, therwithall ioining the diſcourſe of ſuch things as haue béne performed by other nations in that kingdome. Amongſt which accidents in Scotland this rarelie happened, that the earle Morton ſurrendered his protectorſhip or regentſhip of the king and kingdome of Scotland. Which I maie worthilie count rare, ſith men in ſo great authoritie of commanding all perſons, can hardlie be brought to giue ouer ſuch honour, and to yéeld themſelues to the commandement of others, bicauſe Qui primatus ſui authoritatem perdit, in deſpectionem & anguſtiam ſe mittit: qui autem locum ſuum ſapienter cuſtodit, ſe ac ſuos ad profectum dirigit. And Bias the philoſopher knew, that it was a moſt hard thing of all other, and onelie ſauouring of great magnanimitie and wiſdome, Fortiter ferre mutationes rerum in deterius. But he being verie wiſe, feared not the alteration of his eſtate, but rather deſired to be rid thereof, conſidering the weightineſſe and danger which depended therevpon, and remembring that notable ſaieng of Gregorie in his Morals, declaring the ſingular good of ſuch, which doo ſhun the gouernement of temporall things, in theſe words. Quaſi quodam iugo ſeruitutis premunt proſpera, dum appetuntur; premunt aduerſa dum formidantur. At ſi quis ſemel dominationem deſideriorum temporalium à collo mentis excuſſerit, quadam iam etiam vitæ libertate perfruitur, & dum nullo deſiderio fœlicitatis afficitur, nullo aduerſitatis errore coarctatur.

Gl. ſuper ill eccleſ. 23 melius eſt vt filij.

This earle Morton (I ſaie) ſurrendred his office (as before is touched) in the moneth of March, in this yeare of our Lord one thouſand fiue hundred ſeuentie & ſeuen, at what time alſo Robert Bowes eſquier was then in Scotland for hir maieſtie of England. Vpon the remouing of which erle Morton there were no more regents in that countrie, but the king toke vpon him to rule the realme by himſelfe & by ſuch curators as he ſhuld appoint therfore. For the king now about the twelfe yéere of his age thought he might aſwell take vpon him the gouernment of the countrie by himſelfe, and ſuch as he appointed at thoſe yeares, as manie of his anceſtors had donne before in their yoong yeares; notwithſtanding the opinion of manie of the better ſort of the preſbiterie, which maintеine that he cannot abſolutelie rule, or perfectlie eſtabliſh anie thing by the cuſtomes of their countrie, vntill he come to the age of fiue and twentie yeares. But we find in their owne hiſtories of Scotland, written euen by men of beſt iudgement, that Iames the ſecond of that name king of Scots, did in the fourtеenth yeare of his age, in the ſeuenth yeare of his reigne, and in the yeare of our Lord one thouſand foure hundred fortie and foure, put Alexander Leuinſtone knight from his regentſhip, and toke vpon himſelfe the abſolute gouernement of the kingdome, of whom thus writeth Leſleus. Gubernatoris cancellariique concilio & iuſſu factum eſt, vt omnium ordinum comitijs Striueling indies diceretur. An. Dom. 440, menſe Ianuarij, omnium aſſenſu eſt conſtitutum, vt rex ſuum regnum luſtrans, contentiones ſopiat, cauſas decidat, concrouerſias dirimat, reliquáq; reipublicæ negotia præſens procuret. Multi nobiles ſeſe comites itineris adiungunt, qui in illius ſocietatem ſe penitus immergentes, odij cancellarij ac gubernatoris elati, perſuadent regi, vt aliorum ſeruituti ſe premi diutius non ſinat: ſed vt omni iugo excuſſo, ipſe ſibi reipublicæ gubernandæ partes aſſumat. Is iuuenili quodam regnandi ardore incenſus, illorum voces tanquam Syrenum cantum in ſuas aures effluere liberaliſſimè patiebatur. Decimum iam quartum annum agens, in regium ſolium præceps irruit, ac vt publicis comitijs ſolus præeſſet, omnes ordines Striueling vocat, 4 Nouembris 1444.

The earle Morton ſurrendred his regentſhip.

The kings of Scotland take on them to rule the realme without procurators being within age.

Leſleus li. 8. pag. 295.

After

After which, about fiue yeares following, the ſame James, to ſhew his abſolute and ſufficient gouernement, did in the yeare of Chriſt 1449, in the nineteenth yeare of his age, and the twelfe yeare of his gouernement create Alexander Seton lord Gourdon earle of Huntleie, and George Leſle a baron earle of Rothſeie. James the fourth of that name king of Scotland, being but ſixteene yeares of age when he came to the crowne, in the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand foure hundred foure ſcore & eight, adminiſtred the realme by himſelfe without any procurator, as I gather out of Leſleus. James the fift the king of Scots, in the yeare of our Lord one thouſand fiue hundred twentie and eight, in the ſeuentéenth yeare of his age, & about the fiftéenth yeare of his gouernment, remoued the earle of Angus from the regentſhip, and toke vpon himſelfe the gouernment of the kingdome. And Marie the mother of the now liuing king of Scots, did in like ſort in the yeare one thouſand fiue hundred fiftie and two, in the tenth of hir age, and as much of hir gouernment of Scotland appoint procurators to gouerne the realme, whileſt ſhe remained in France with the French king hir husband. But enough of this, ſith Leſleus in his 9. booke pag. 429, and alſo in his 10. booke pag. 517, hath liberallie argued on both parts, at what yeares the kings of Scotland may aſſume to themſelues the gouernement of the kingdome, after that they haue atteined to the crowne in thoſe yeares, which are ouer tender and vnfit to diſpoſe of the ſword and ſcepter. Wherefore to paſſe ouer the ſame, I thinke it not vnmeet in this place, ſith we haue mentioned this Morton which was the laſt regent, gouernour or protector of the kingdome, to ſet downe a catalog of all ſuch regents and gouernours of that realme, as haue come to my knowledge, after the ſame ſort as I haue done in England at the end of the gouernement of the duke of Summerſet, who was the laſt protector of that realme: into the diſcourſe whereof I enter as followeth.

The protectors, gouernours, or regents of Scotland, during the kings minoritie or his inſufficiencie of gouernement, or during his abſence out of the realme.

Conanus. Conanus was gouernor vnder Thereus about the yeare before the birth of Chriſt, one hundred thirtie and ſeuen: for Thereus renouncing the kingdome and fleeing to Yorke, where in the end he died, this Conanus during the exile of this Thereus, was regent or gouernour, of whom writeth Leſleus lib. 2. pag. 89. Conanus qui rempublicam Therei iam exulantis loco optimè adminiſtraret, interrex à nobilibus declaratur. Nam Thereo viuo nullum alium regem ſubſtituere voluerunt, quo mortuo, Ioſina eius frater ſuffectus eſt.

Cadallus. Cadallus liuing about the yeare before the birth of Chriſt, ſeuentie and nine, did purſue Gillus (the baſtard of Euenus) hauing ſlaine the ſonne of Euenus, and vſurping the crowne, of whom thus writeth Leſleus lib. 6, pag. 92. Tandem auctore Cadallo viro fortiſſimo, qui interrex à regni nobilibus interea conſtitutus eſt, quidam in illum (which was Gillus) conſpirant, quem in Hiberniam profugam aſſecuti, inita prius pugna capiunt, & ſtatim capite plectuntur.

Argadus erle of Argile. Argadus earle of Argile, when Conar who began his reigne in the yeare of Chriſt one hundred fortie and eight, was caſt in priſon for his euill life, was by the nobilitie choſen gouernour of Scotland, after which Ethodius the next king, whome this Argadus holpe vnto the crowne made him chiefe iuſtice of Scotland to him and his heires, which function at this date the earles of Argile do inioie by inheritance.

Donald, Colollan, Mordacke and Conrade were made gouernors of the kingdome, for thus writeth Leſleus lib. 4. pag. 198. Senectutis tandem tædio illius (which was Elphine who began his reigne about the yeare of Chriſt, ſeuen hundred thirtie and three) vires ita debilitatæ ſunt, & cum regni oneri ferendo impar fuerit, quatuor ſui regni regulos (in quibus præſtans quædam ſed ficata virtutis ſpecies eluxit) delegit, quibus ſingulis ſingulas prouincias decreuit; Donaldo Argadiam; Colano Atholiam; Mordaco Gallouidiam; & Conano Morauiam. Donald, Colollan, Mordacke, & Conrade.

William Fraiſer biſhop of S. Andrews, &c: after the death of Alexander the third king of Scotland, which fell in the yeare of our Lord, one thouſand two hundred foure ſcore and three, who died without iſſue, the nobilitie (becauſe it was not knowen to whome the kingdome did apperteine, ſith there were manie which claimed the ſame, as Baliol, Bruſe, Haſtings, and others) agréed amongſt themſelues, and choſe ſix regents or gouernors of the ſame, vntil a king were fullie known and eſtabliſhed: the names of which ſix were theſe, William Fraiſer biſhop of ſaint Andrewes, Duncane earle of Fife, John Cumine earle of Buchquane, to whome the rule of the north parts were committed. The other three were Robert biſhop of Glaſcow, ſir John Cumine, and James high ſteward of Scotland, who had the diſpoſition of the ſouth parts. William Fraiſer.

Hugh Creſſingham an Engliſhman was made gouernor of Scotland by Edward the firſt, who going into France about the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand two hundred ninetie and ſix, after that he had brought Scotland vnder his ſubiection, appointed the ſaid Hugh (whom he had before made treaſuror of Scotland) to haue the gouernment of that realme in his abſence, whileſt he was buſied in the wars of France. But not long after, this Creſſingham was ſlaine at Sterling by William Wallace (and ſuch Scots as attempted by all the force they could to ſet themſelues at libertie from the ſubiection of the Engliſh) in the ides of September, in the yeare of Chriſt, one thouſand two hundred ninetie and ſeuen, at what time alſo Andrew Murreie was ſlaine, whoſe ſonne did certeine yeares after (as hath Buchanan) adminiſter and gouerne Scotland for the king. Hugh Creſſingham. Buchan. lib. 8.

William Wallace after manie worthie exploits done in the behalfe of his countrie againſt the Engliſh, was for the Scots choſen gouernor of the realme vnder John Baliol, when the king had forſaken the realme and was come into England, about the yeare of Chriſt, one thouſand two hundred ninetie and ſix, who after that (as is before touched) did ſlea Creſſingham the gouernor of Scotland vnder the king of England, which Wallace did after in the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand two hundred nintie and eight renounce his office of gouernor, and was in the end for his rebellion againſt king Edward the firſt king of England, and abſolute lord of Scotland, taken, brought to London, drawen, hanged and quartered, in the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand three hundred and fiue. William Wallace.

John Cumine, after that William Wallace had giuen ouer his office of gouernor, was choſen to be gouernor for the Scots, in purpoſe to trie with the Engliſhmen for their liberties, which being knowen to Edward the firſt king of England, he ſent an armie into the countrie, and deſtroied it. Wherupon John Cumine admitted Simon Fraiſer fellow with him in the adminiſtration of the wars againſt the John Cumine.

the Engliſh, and diſcomfited the Engliſh in the yere of our Lord God one thouſand thrée hundred and two. After which, king Edward being againe a conqueror of the Scots, returned homewards, and left Odomare de Ualence his deputie in Scotland.

Odomare de Ualence or Aimer de Ualence.

Odomare de Ualence or Aimer de Ualence, vncle to king Edward the firſt king of England by the halfe bloud, was about the yeare of our Lord one thouſand thrée hundred and foure, made gouernor of Scotland vnder Edward the firſt king of England, who before in the yeare one thouſand thrée hundred & two, toke William Wallace and ſent him to London to king Edward, to be dealt withall as you haue heard before. After which Robert Bruſe being crowned king of Scotland, was on the nineteenth of June in the yéere of Chriſt one thouſand thrée hundred and ſix, at Peſen diſcomfited by the Engliſh armie, and put to flight by the ſaid Odomare de Ualence, who after baniſhed all thoſe which anie waie toke part with king Robert Bruſe. But in the end Robert Bruſe recouering himſelfe & more aid, draue all the Engliſhmen out of Scotland, gouerning the kingdome all his life, by himſelfe & his ſubſtitutes, as by that which followeth maie well appeare.

Thomas Randolph.

Thomas Randolph earle of Murreie, much about the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand thrée hundred and ſix and twentie, being about the 21 yere of Robert Bruſe, was made protector of the realme. For Robert Bruſe being fallen into extreme ſickeneſſe, whereby he could not wéeld the ſcepter to gouerne as the ſtate of that countrie required, cõmitted the adminiſtration of the reime to erle Thomas Randolph, and to James Dowglaſſe knight, who ruled the ſame to their ſingular commendation, and the countries good about foure yeares, during the life of the ſaid Robert Bruſe, whoſe death happened in the yére of Chriſt one thouſand thrée hundred twentie and nine. After the death of king Robert, when Dauid his ſonne came to the crowne, being but ſeuen yeares old, this Randolph was againe appointed to haue the adminiſtration of the kingdome as regent of the ſame, during the kings minoritie and inſufficiencie of gouernement, who confirmed a new peace betweene England and Scotland. Shortlie after which the gouernor died of poiſon at Muſcleborough, in the yere of our redemption one thouſand thrée hundred thirtie and one, being about the ſecond yeare of king Dauid, & was buried at Dunfermling, hauing had two ſons, John erle of Murreie, and Thomas, both being perſons worthie of ſuch a father.

Patrike Dunbar.

Patrike Dunbar earle of March was made regent after this ſort. After the death of earle Thomas Randolph, there was an aſſemblie of parlement of the three eſtates of the realme, in which in the ſaid yeare of Chriſt one thouſand thrée hundred thirtie and one, and the ſecond yere of the reigne of king Dauid, theſe two, Patrike earle of March and Dauid (whom Leſle calleth Donald) earle of Marre were choſen gouernors of the reime by common conſent. Whereof the firſt had the charge of that part of the reime which lieth on the ſouth ſide of the Frith, & the other was appointed to gouerne all that on the north: which Donald in the yere of Chriſt one thouſand thrée hundred thirtie and two was ſlaine ſléeping in his bed at Duplin nære to the water of Erne, by ſuch as followed and toke part with Edward Baliol atteining the crowne, and expelling Dauid from the kingdome.

Andrew Murreie.

Andrew Murreie, a man of great power, and of no leſſe poſſeſſion, hauing performed manie exploits of warre for his countrie, was made gouernor after the death of the earle of Marre, and ioined in that office with Patrike of Dunbar earle of March. Shortlie after which this Andrew was taken priſoner at Rockſborough, being yet in the end ranſomed for a great ſumme of gold. After which he died of a vehement ſickneſſe, and was buried in Roſe Markie, in the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand thrée hundred thirtie and eight.

Archibald Dowglaſſe.

Archibald Dowglaſſe, after the decreaſe of Andrew Murreie, was by one conſent of the nobilitie choſen gouernor in the place of Andrew Murreie, whileſt king Edward did beſiege Berwike, who raiſing a power of men entred England, and cauſed the king to remoue his ſiege of Berwike. Afterward this Dowglaſſe was ſlaine at the battell of Halidon hill, in the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand thrée hundred thirtie and two (as ſome haue) but Hector Boetius and Buchanan refer it to the yeare of our Lord God one thouſand thrée hundred thirtie and thrée, the nineténth of Julie.

David Cumine.

David Cumine was made protector in this ſort. When that Edward the third king of England, in the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand thrée hundred thirtie and ſix had entred Scotland with maine force by land and by ſea; he afterwards hauing Edward Baliol the king of Scotland in his companie with 50000 men came by land to Glaſcow: but perceiuing no reſiſtance againſt him, retired with Baliol into England, and left Dauid Cumine earle of Atholl gouernor in his rome, to win ſuch holds and ſtrengths as were yet defended againſt him. Which Dauid toke on him to be gouernor in the name of Edward Plantagenet king of England, and of Edward Baliol king of Scots, ſeizing into his hands all the lands which perteined to Robert Steward, ſo that at one time there was chopping and changing of gouernors by each part which became ſtronger.

Robert Steward.

Robert Steward regent of Scotland poſſeſſed that place, at this time alſo when Dauid Cumine was gouernor for Edward Baliol; for this writeth Leſleus li. 7. pa. 234. Verùm ne patria gubernatoris imperio deſtituta, aduerſariorum inſidijs pateret magis, Robertus Stuartus omnem regni curam in ſe tranſtulit, quoad Dauid ex Gallia rediret, ipſe tũc regni gubernacula ſuſcepturus. By which words appeareth, that as Dauid Cumine was gouernor for Edward Baliol gone into England, ſo this Robert Steward toke vpon him the regent ſhip for king Dauid Bruſe fled into France: the which he the rather did, becauſe he would incounter Dauid Cumine which had ſpoiled him of all his liuings and patrimonie. Which Robert being thus procurator of the kingdome, granted ſundrie priuileges to the inhabitants of Bute & Arrane, as amongſt other things, to be frée from paieng of tribute of corne and graine. For this Steward togither with John Randolph earle of Murreie, were by a councell aſſembled at Edenborough by generall voices elected and confirmed to be gouernors of the realme, about the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand thrée hundred thirtie and foure, or one thouſand thrée hundred thirtie and fiue.

John Randolph earle of Murreie protector.

Robert Steward.

Robert Steward earle of Fife, ſecond ſonne to Robert Steward the firſt king of Scotland (by the name of Steward) and the ſecond by the name of Robert, was (becauſe his father became extreme old, and could not follow the affaires of the kingdome) made gouernor by the conſent of the realme during the life of his father, about the yeare of our Lord God one thouſand thrée hundred foure ſcore and nine, being about the nineteenth yeare of the reigne of the ſaid Robert the ſecond: which office this Robert continued during the life of his father, dieng in the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand thrée hundred & ninetie. After whoſe death, when Robert the third, being before called John, came to the kingdome, and had by a fall from his horſſe ſo bruſed himſelfe, that he was not able to follow the gouernement of the kingdome, this Robert earle of Fife his brother was made gouernor of the kingdome. After which about the yeare of our redemption one thouſand three hundred ninetie and eight, being about the ninth yeare of Robert the third king of Scotland, the king created this Robert Steward duke of Albanie, being one of the firſt dukes which were made in Scotland. Beſides which alſo, after the death of the ſame Robert the third, which fell in the yeare of our Lord one thouſand foure hundred and ſix, this Robert duke of Albanie was by new election, or rather confirmation eſtabliſhed in the office of gouernor (as haue ſome Scotiſh chronicles) which duke of Albanie died in the yeare of our Lord one thouſand foure hundred and nineteene, the third of September, when he had béene gouernor fifteene yeares after the death of Robert the third. Wherein it ſeemeth to me for this time that there is much difference of yeares, if the Scots haue truelie ſet the ſame downe: for thoſe accounts can not ſtand together, with the death of king Robert the third, and the yeares gouernement of the duke of Albanie, after the death of the king. But I paſſe it ouer, and rather impute the fault to the offendor, in miſtaking the figure of the number of yeares, than anie want of conſideration in the writer of the hiſtorie.

Murdacke Steward.

Murdacke Steward erle of Fife & Pentith, the eldeſt ſonne of Robert duke of Albanie, was after his fathers death made gouernor of Scotland, continuing in that office by the ſpace of foure yeares, vntill about the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand foure hundred twentie and foure, in which yeare he found meanes to bring home James the right king of Scots, who had béene eightéene yeares deteined in England, and placed him in the kingdome of Scotland, by the name of James the firſt: at what time the crowne was ſet vpon the kings head with the hands of the ſaid Murdacke the gouernor, & Henrie biſhop of ſaint Andrews. This duke was in the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand foure hundred twentie and ſix, and in the ſecond yeare of the reigne of James the firſt conuicted of high treaſon, and beheaded before the caſtell of Sterling. He had iſſue two ſons, Walter Steward, and Alexander, which were alſo beheaded at the ſame place the daie before the death of their father.

Alexander Leuingſtone.

Alexander Leuingſtone knight was made gouernor the daie after that James the ſecond was crowned, in the yeare of our Lord God one thouſand foure hundred thirtie & ſix: for the king being but ſix yeares old, the nobilitie did appoint the ſaid Alexander Leuingſtone of Calender knight to be gouernor of the realme: at what time the kings perſon was committed to the education and rule of William Creicton.

William Creicton knight lord chancellor, who was then confirmed in his office. After this in the yeare of our Lord one thouſand foure hundred fortie and foure, about the eight yere of James the ſecond, they both (through diſſention which had long continued betweene them about their authorities) were put from their offices, remoued from the king all their friends, baniſhed the court, and they themſelues commanded to appéere before the king: which bicauſe they refuſed ſo to do, they were both proclamed rebels and put to the horne.

Marie.

Marie the daughter of the duke of Guelderland & widow to James the ſecond, was appointed with others to be gouernors: for after the death of James the ſecond, which fell in the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand foure hundred & three ſcore (when James the third hir ſonne was but ſeauen yeares old) the nobilitie aſſembled at Edenborough to prouide for the adminiſtration of the realme, becauſe the king was ſo yong. Wherevpon there were ſeuen regents appointed for the gouernement both of the kings perſon, and alſo of the kingdome, which were Marie the quéene his mother, James Kennedie biſhop of S. Andrews, being ſiſters ſonne to James the firſt, the biſhop of Glaſcow, the earles of Angus, Huntleie, Argile, and Orkenie. Theſe ſo long as Kennedie liued, agréed well togither about the gouernment of the realme; but ſhortlie after his deceaſe, or rather before, they fell at square, which we will more largelie touch hereafter when we haue a little ſpoken of the death of this biſhop, falling in the yeare of our redemption one thouſand foure hundred three ſcore and ſix, and in the firſt yeare of the reigne of king James the third, who being buried in the college of ſaint Sauior which he founded moſt ſumptuouſlie in the towne of ſaint Andrews, did in his life time beſides his biſhoprike hold in his poſſeſſion the commandrie of the abbeie of Pettinwen, which was worth vnto him 800 crownes by yeare: the grauitie and wiſdome of which biſhop occaſioned Leſleus in his commendation to ſet downe theſe few words.

Hic (which was this biſhop of ſaint Andrews) prudentia conſilióque ita valuit, vt quicquid latebat in republica inſidiarum, apperiret, vnde meritò poteſt dici, non armis regem, ſed ingenio epiſcopum Douglaſij ſuperbiam fregiſſe, ac furorem retudiſſe. Tria confecit (quorum fabrica artificio inſigniter polita, & ſumptu magnificè inſtructa, omnibus admirationem ſui faciebant) collegium ſancti Saluatoris, in quo iuuentus ad eruditionem ac religionem informari poſſit; ſepulchrum quo mortuus tegebatur, ac nauim onerariam ingentis magnitudinis. Horum vnumquódque eiuſdem fuiſſe pretij vulgi ſermone celebratum eſt. After his death, or rather (as hath Hector Boetius) in his life, in the ſecond yeare of the reigne of king James the third, being in the yeare that the word became fleſh one thouſand foure hundred three ſcore and two, there was diſcord kindled betweene quéene Marie the Dowager, and the archbiſhop Kennedie, who perceiuing that the woman did wholie ſéeke to vſurpe the gouernement vnto hir ſelfe, withſtood it in that behalfe, inſomuch that it was doubted that the matter would haue broken forth into ſome ciuill warre, if that the biſhops of Glaſcow, Dunkeld, and Aberden, with certeins abbats had not taken in hand to trauell betwixt both the parties for attonement, who wrought ſo effectuouſlie therein, that the matter was quieted in this maner. The quéene mother was appointed to haue the charge and cuſtodie of the kings perſon, and of his brethren Alexander duke of Albanie, and John earle of Marre, and alſo of their two ſiſters. But as for the adminiſtration and gouernement of the realme of Scotland, ſhe ſhould leaue it to the péeres, wherefore by common conſent there were elected as gouernors the biſhops of Glaſcow, and Dunkeld, the earle of Orkenie, the lord Graham, Thomas Boid, and the chancellor.

Margaret.

Margaret the daughter to Henrie the ſeuenth king of England was (after the death of hir huſband James the fourth, and in the minoritie of hir ſonne James the fift, being but a yeare and ſix moneths old when he was inueſted with the kingdome) made regent of the realme, which ſhe ſhould gouerne by the counſell of James Betune archbiſhop of Glaſcow, the earles of Huntleie, Angus, and Arrane, but shortlie after they falling out amongst themselues for the bestowing of benefices, the duke of Albanie was called out of France to performe that office.

John duke of Albanie.

John duke of Albanie being sent for out of France (where he accustomed to abide) to come into Scotland (to be tutor to the king and gouernor of the realme, as he which next of blood to the king, and nèerest to the crowne) was by vniuersall consent at saint Johns towne admitted to those offices accordinglie, hauing the same confirmed vnto him by a parlement holden at Edenburgh in the yeare of Christ one thousand fiue hundred and thirtèene, and the first yeare of the yong king James the fift. Whereof intelligence being brought vnto the duke, yet in France, he in the yeare of Christ one thousand fiue hundred and fourtèene, directeth dilatorie and excusing letters of his acceptance of that charge. At that time, but in the yere following, being the yeare of Christ, one thousand fiue hundred and fiftèene, and in the third of James the fift, on the seuentènth of Maie, he arriued at the towne of Aire in Scotland to execute his office of gouernor, who was honorablie interteined at sundrie places as he passed along by the sea coasts, before he came to Edenburgh. After which a parlement was made to be called at Edenburgh (being but the continuance of the former parlement, as my memorie serueth) in which this duke of Albanie was againe confirmed gouernor, the scepter and sword being deliuered vnto him, and an oth by him to the lords, and by the lords to him giuen, that ech of them should be faithfull to ech other, and euerie of them to their lord and king, &c. After this the duke of Albanie going into France in the yeare of Christ one thousand fiue hundred and seuentèene, as saieth Lesleus, committeth the gouernement of the kingdome in his absence to the archbishops of S. Andrews and Glascow, and to the earles of Huntleie, Argile, Angus, and Arrane. And least ante euill might happen to the kings person in his absence, he appointed the king to be brought into the castle of Edenburgh, there to be committed to the earle marshall, and to the lords Eschwine, Bothwike, and Ruthwèene, whereof two at the least should alwaies be present with him. The duke hauing thus beene about some three yeares in France, returned into Scotland about the yeare of Christ one thousand fiue hundred and twentie, remaining still gouernor: but in following time, which was the yere of Christ one thousand fiue hundred twentie and foure, and about the twelfe yeare of the reigne of king James the fift, the duke of Albanie left that office, and went againe into France.

Margaret the quèene.

Margaret the quèene, the mother of James the fift, did (after the departure of the duke of Albanie into France, in the yeare of Christ one thousand fiue hundred twentie and foure, the six and twentith of Julie) find meanes that the yong king came from Sterling vnto Edenburgh: three daies after which the quèene toke the whole gouernment vpon hir, and entred into the castle of Edenburgh with the king, making the lord Mariwell prouost of Edenburgh. Then the quèene appointing a parlement to be held the Februarie following, there were in the same parlement eight lords chosen to be of the kings priuie councell, to take on them the gouernment of the king and the realme, which were the archbishop of S. Andrewes and Glascow, the bishops of Aberden & Dunblane: the earles of Angus, Arrane and Leneur, to whom the quèene was adioined as principall, without whose aduise nothing should be done. Which ordinance did not long hold, Archibald Dowglasse earle of Angus in the end fullie getting the whole gouernement into his hands.

Archibald Dowglas.

Archibald Dowglas (after that the bishop of Dunbane was dead, and the quèene gone vnto Sterling, leauing the king with the earle of Angus, in the yeare of Christ one thousand fiue hundred twentie and fiue, being about the thirtenth of James the fift) toke the whole gouernement vpon him both of the king and kingdome, setting vp, remouing, and pulling downe what officer it best pleased him: who for the more declaration of his authoritie and gouernment, made his vncle Archibald Dowglas treasuror of the realme, and bestowed all benefices and offices by the aduise of his brother George Dowglas and the earle of Leneur who assisted him. After which there was a diuorce had betwèene the quèene and the earle, who falling in the kings disgrace in the yeare of Christ one thousand fiue hundred twentie and eight, and the sirtènth yeare of the same James the fift, was atteinted by parlement holden at Edenburgh in September, when the king had taken the absolute gouernment into his hands in the seuentènth yeare of his age, and the said sirtenth yeare of his said gouernement. Whereupon the yeare following, this Archibald came vnto the king for to submit himselfe, but the king would not receiue him, by reason wherof he fled into England.

James earle of Arrane.

James earle of Arrane in the yeare of Christ one thousand fiue hundred fourtie and two, when Marie (the daughter of James the fift) being but seuen daies old obteined the kingdome, was by authoritie of the nobilitie proclamed regent and protector of Scotland, notwithstanding all that Dauid Beton, fauorer of the French causes had without all reason vsurped the gouernment, vnder the pretense of a deuised will and testament of James the fift, in which testament he was appointed gouernor. This earle thus made protector, appointed by the old quèenes consent a gouernor to the person of the yong quèen, which was the lord Leuingstone capteine of Lithquo. This protector in the yeare of Christ one thousand fiue hundred fortie and foure, being the second yere of quèen Marie, was by the French king made knight of the order of saint Michaell. About eight yeares after which, that is in the yeare of Christ one thousand fiue hundred fiftie and three, being about the twelfe yeare of quèene Marie, this earle was inforced to leaue his office of gouernor, and the quèene toke the same into hir hands, appointing procurators to rule the same vnder hir: whereupon the gouernor in the yeare following, being one thousand fiue hundred fiftie & foure, was by the French king made duke of Chatelerault. The procurators which were appointed for and by quèene Marie, were (as hath Lesleus) Henrie king of France, Charles cardinall of Lorreine and the duke of Guise his brother, touching whom thus writeth the same Lesleus in these words: Hos (which was hir curators) sibi in Gallia delegerat regina nostra (being Marie the quèene of Scots) matris suasu, Henricum regem Franciæ, Carolum cardinalem Lotharingum, ac ducem Guisium eius fratrem, qui totam regni nostri molem reginæ matri procurandam transtulerunt: &c. This duke had issue James Hamilton earle of Arrane after lunatike, and one Dauid Hamilton.

Marie dowager of Scotland.

Marie descended of the house of Guise, the dowager of Scotland, as widow to James the fift, and mother to the yong quèene Marie, was in the yeare of Christ one thousand fiue hundred fiftie and foure, being the twelfe yeare both of the age and reigne of the same quèene Marie, made regent of Scotland vnder hir daughter the same yong quèene, which office office this regent toke vpon hir hauing the ſame confirmed by parlement, continuing in that place about ſix yeares, & died in the caſtle of Edenburgh, in the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand fiue hundred and three ſcore, being vpon the point of the eightéenth yeare of quéene Marie, whoſe bodie (as hath Leſleus) was after caried into France, for thus he writeth: Leſleus lib. 10. pag. 569. Fuit autem corpus in Galliam poſtea tranſuectum, primùm ad monaſteriũ Feckamenſe, quod in Normania eſt, deinde ad cœnobium S. Petri Rhemis in Campania, cui ſoror ipſius piè tunc præerat, delatũ, honorificè condebatur.

James Steward. James Steward baſtard ſonne to king James the fift king of Scots, and baſe brother to Marie quéene of Scots now liuing and impriſoned, being prior of ſaint Andrews and earle of Mar, was in the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand fiue hundred three-ſcore and two, being about the twentith yeare of the reigne of the ſame quéene Marie, made earle of Murreie. About fiue yeares following, after that the nobilitie had conſpired againſt quéene Marie, toke hir, committed hir to priſon, depoſed hir, and vpon the ſame (on the nineténth daie of Julie in the ſhe yeare a thouſand fiue hundred thrée ſcore & ſeuen, being the fiue & twentith yeare of the reigne of that quéene) aduanced hir ſonne Charles James Steward (being then about a yeare old) to the kingdome, by the name of James the firſt: this James earle of Murreie, was made regent and gouernor of the yong king James the firſt, and of the kingdome: who vpon the office receiued, did by parlement abolith the popes authoritie and doctrine in Scotland: continuing that office of regent vntill his death, falling about the time of thrée yeares after. For in the time of Chriſt one thouſand fiue hundred thrée ſcore and ten, being in the third yeare of the reigne of James the firſt, this regent as he was riding through Lithquo, was ſhot at with an harquebus by one James Hamilton, and ſo wounded, that he died of the hurt the nert daie following, hauing before in that yeare, in which he was created earle of Murreie, maried Agnes Keith daughter to the earle Marſhall.

Matthew earle of Leneur. Matthew earle of Leneur, being ſent for out of England, where he had before long remained, was after the death of the earle of Murreie, in the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand fiue hundred three ſcore and ten, being in the third yeare of the reigne of James the firſt, made lord lieutenant or protector of Scotland, in a conuention of the lords of Sterling. After which in Auguſt following, there was another conuention at Edenburgh, where by the conſent of the three eſtates of the realme, the ſaid earle was made regent of Scotland, at what time the earle of Huntleie toke vpon him to be lord lieutenant of Scotland: for Marie quéene of Scots remaining then vnder cuſtodie in England, which Huntleie in hir name ſummoned a parlement at Lithquo the 21 daie of September, wherevnto the earle of Leneur was ſummoned: to incounter which, the earle of Leneur cauſed a parlement likewiſe to be ſummoned in the kings name at the ſame place, wherevnto the earle of Huntleie was warned at the ſame daie. But the earle of Huntleie comming no néerer at that time than Brechin, it was ordered by the regent Leneur and the nobilitie, to purſue him: whereupon inſued great warres betweene the nobilitie of Scotland diuided into factions, ſome taking part with the depoſed quéene Marie, and other with the yong king in poſſeſſion. During which turmoiles & warres, this earle of Leneur hauing bin regent about a yeare and more, was wounded at Sterling with a piſtoll by capteine Cawder, whereof he ſhortlie after died, in the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand fiue hundred three ſcore and eleuen, being about the fourth yeare of James the firſt.

John Areſkin earle of Mar. John Areſkin earle of Mar was made regent after the death of the earle Leneur, as maie apeare by that which I haue before ſet downe in the continuance of the annals of Scotland, after whome ſucceeded the earle Morton, of whome I haue a little before ſpoken, and of whome we will more intreat hereafter, when we come to ſpeake of his beheading, in the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand fiue hundred foureſcore and one, falling about the fourtéenth yeare of Lewes the firſt, after that the ſaid earle had continued that office about fiue yeares. For being aduanced to that place, about the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand fiue hundred threéſcore and twelue, he continued in the ſame, vntill he ſurrendered it, in the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand fiue hundred three ſcore and ſeuentéene, as is before touched. Thus ſetting end to the diſcourſe of the protectors of Scotland, let vs deſcend to other matters which haue ſucceeded.

Earle Morton regent of Scotland.

Going therefore forward with that yeare one thouſand fiue hundred three ſcore and ſeuentéene, we ſaie that much about the time in the which the earle Morton gaue ouer his regentſhip, that the lord Glames, who was then in office of the chancellorſhip, was trecherouſlie ſlaine by his enimies at Sterling, with a ſhot of purpoſe diſcharged againſt him, as he was comming out of Sterling caſtell, & going to his owne lodging from the councell or parlement. Whereby it ſeemeth that this murthering by ſudden ſhot began now to be a common thing: for there were three great perſons in ſhort time diſpatched after that ſort, which were the earles of Murreie and Leneur regents, & this lord Glames chancellor. After the death of which lord Glames, the earle of Atholl was aduanced to that place, and inueſted with the title of lord chancellor of Scotland. Wherefore, hauing ſo good occaſion therefore at this time by talking of this earle of Atholl thus made lord chancellor to treate of that office: I thinke it not inconuenient in this place, nor diſagréable to the nature of the matter which I haue in hand, ſomewhat by wate of digreſſion, to diſcourſe of the originall of this office in Scotland, of the etymon of the name, and other circumſtances belonging thereto.

The lord Glames chancellor ſlaine.

The earle of Atholl made chancellor.

The originall of the office of the chancellor. This officer the chancellor had his firſt originall in Scotland by Malcolme the ſecond of that name king of Scots, who beginning his reigne in the yeare of our redemption one thouſand and ten, and gouerning thirtie yeares, departed the world in the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand and fortie. This man, during the time of his gouernment, ordeining manie neceſſarie lawes for the better rule of his countrie, and for the benefit of the crowne, did alſo firſt ordeine the honorable officers of the kingdome, as chancellor, conſtable, marſhall, chamberleine, and others, as appeareth by Leſleus in his hiſtorie of Scotland in theſe words: Fœliciter rempublicam haud paucos annos adminiſtrauit (king Malcolme) multis & egregijs operibus illuſtris: intérque cætera municipialium legum volumen condidit, quas noſtrates exinde in iudicijs ferendis ſeruarunt, nihil pene immutatas, regiorum magiſtratuum iudicúmque, quos licet mundiùs, magiſque Latinè vocare poſſunt, vulgò tamen cancellarium, conſtabilem, mariſcallum, camerarium, inſticiariúmque vocitant, & qui a ſecretis, a theſauris, a cubiculo, a chartophylaceo eſſent: cunctorúmque miniſtrorum aulæ annua ſalaria, vt noſtris diebus penduntur, quantúmque regijs pro diplomatibus, ac cæteris literis, libellionibus, tabularijs, lectoribúſque ſoluendum foret, inſtituit. Leſleus lib. 5. pag. 204. This officer being in Scotland before the time of Edward the Confeſſor, ſéemeth alſo to me co-nerlie to proue, that the ſame officer was in England before the time of the ſame king, ſith it appeareth, that the Scots for the moſt part haue alwaies taken their maner of gouernement, lawes, and cuſtomes from vs, as will be I doubt not ſufficientlie proued, although it maie be that ſome will affirme that they might haue this officer from the Frenchmen and Romans as other nations had: which as I do not ſuppoſe, becauſe the Romans had but little dooings amongeſt them, for as they neuer vſed anie ſuch officer in this land whileſt they gouerned here (for anie thing that I can yet learne) ſo it may be, (becauſe they will not ſéeme to haue borrowed anie order of their gouernement from vs) that they will ſuppoſe that they had the firſt ground of this officer from the French, with whome they haue alwaies béene in league euer ſince the time of their king Achaius the firſt, who (beginning his reigne in the yeare of Chriſt ſeuen hundred fourеſcore and eight) did knit a perpetuall league with Charles the great. But leauing that to be as it will (ſith it is no diſhonor for one nation to deriue their good lawes, beneficiall cuſtomes, or needfull officers from another, no more than it was for the Romans to fetch their lawes of the twelue tables from the Grecians) true it is, that this officer ſo ordeined by Malcolme amongſt the Scots, was ſuch an officer as was vſed amongſt the Romans, touching the cauſe of whoſe name, the ciuilians affirme that he was called Cancellarius à cancellando, cuius officium eſt reſcripta, vel reſponſa imperatoris, & mandata inſpicere, mala ſcripta cãcellare, & bene ſcripta cũ ſignaculo ſuo ſignare, & ſigillũ eis imprimere. Of which word chancellor is riſen this name, Archicãcellarius quaſi princeps cancellariæ, as is noted by Azo in ſumma.

This officer taking his name of Cancellando, (that is) of defacing, blotting, or putting out of writings, did vſe to annull all writings, as we at this daie do obſerue in our chancerie, by drawing certeine ſtrokes or lines made croſſe one vpon an other ouer the writing, in forme of wodden latices, in Latine termed Cancelli, which are either ſuch latices as we at this daie, and of antiquitie vſed in windowes, or ſuch as were made to compaſſe about the iudgement ſeats. For thus ſaid the ciuilians touching that; Cancelli ſunt ligna inter ſe modicis interuallis in traſuerſum connexa, quibus tribunalia, ſcænæ & feneſtræ muniri conſueuerunt. And Cicero ſaith in his firſt booke De Oratore; Forenſibus cancellis circumſcriptam ſententiam, &c. From which word Cancelli, is deduced this word Cancellare. For thus do ſome write thereof: Cancello verbum videtur eſſe deductum à Cancellis, in quibus vt tranſuerſaria nectuntur ligna, ita cum ſcripta expungenda ſunt, tranſuerſo calamo lineæ inducuntur, quod propriè illinere, ſeu allinere eſt, vel litura: whervpon thus writeth Q. F. Horace the liricall poet in his tract called the art of poetrie:

——incomptis allinet atrum
Tranſuerſo calamo ſignum, &c:

as who ſhould ſaie, He doth cancell and blot out the writing with lines drawne one ouer an other like latices, the ciuilians fullie agréeing to the ſame and ſaieng, that Cancellare eſt ſcripta tranſductis lineis inſtar cancellorum delere. Beſide which this word Cancellarius is alſo by ſome (whoſe curious ears and pens count the words of former ages to be barbarous) taken ſcarſelie for good Latine, and therefore ſaie that this officer more purelie ought to be called Scribarum præfectus, of which number Polydor Virgil is one, who in his admonition to the reader, at the end of his hiſtorie of England, ſetteth downe theſe words: Monitum te optime lector volo, per multa verba minùs Latina longo vſu non item ratione iam primùm in conſuetudinẽ quotidiani ſermonis veniſſe, ſic vt velimus nolimus ea interdum vſurpare cogamur, cuiuſmodi ſunt dux & comes, olim officij tantùm at ſummæ nuc dignitatis vocabula. Item comitatus pro regione, cancellarius pro ſcribarum, abbas prior pro monachorum præfecto: and Leland calleth the chancellor Archigrammateus. Beſides which there be ſome in our age, who ſearching after the originall & etymologies of names, affirme this word chancellor to be deriued from the Saxon tong, as it were a cleare or ſhining perſon or one excelling other men: compounding that word of theſe two parts, chance and clere, in which word this part clere doth after the Saxon ſignifie in Latine Præeminens, or clarus, and that part chance muſt note to vs a man. But how aptlie and trulie the ſame may ſtand to make the etymon of chancellor, I leaue to others to conſider. This thus ſaid for the originall and name of the officer called the chancellor, of whoſe ſucceſſion we will talke hereafter, and will now returne to the matters of Scotland in this ſort.

In the moneth of Julie there was a parlement of the nobilitie aſſembled, where Robert Steward great vncle to the king was created erle of Leneur, being girded with the ſword of that earledome, after the death of Charles Steward, ſonne of Matthew Steward erle of Leneur, wherof we haue before intreated. But ouerpaſſing this Robert, being honoured with a new title, not due to him by inheritance, for anie thing which I can yet perceiue, we will for a while take our leaue of the Scotiſh ſoile, though not of the Scotiſh perſons, and remember to ſpeake ſomewhat of the doings of Steward, coronell of the Scots, which ſerued in the wars of the low countries: where he behaued himſelfe right valiantlie to his owne and his countries commendation. For when the warres were at the hotteſt in thoſe low countries betweene the ſtates and king Philip (at what time the archduke Matthias was generall for the noblemen or ſtates, and John duke of Auſtria, the baſe ſonne of Charles the fift, and like brother to king Philip, was gouernour of thoſe parts for the ſame king Philip) the ſtates gathered a puiſſant armie of all ſuch nations as were there in ſeruice with them (as Engliſh, Scots, Germans, and their owne countriemen) vnder the conduct of the countie Boſſue, with whome duke John of Auſtria determining to encounter, hoping by that one conflict to ſet end to all the warres, and to make a full pacification of the countrie: it happened that on the firſt of Auguſt, in this yeare that the armie of the duke of Auſtria comming to viſit the armie of the ſtates (which late then incamped in the field called Remnant) that in the armie (as I ſaid before compoſed of diuerſe nations both footmen and horſſemen) there was amongſt others one companie of Scots vnder the leading of Steward their capteine and countriman, who being with his companie called forth into the battell, was appointed to keepe the ſtreict on the left ſide, when the Engliſh ſhould keepe the like ſtreict on the right hand. After which the enimie making towards the armie of the ſtates, they were intercepted by the Engliſh, who interteined them with ſuch ſufficient ſkirmiſh, as that they forced Don Johns men to giue ground and retire towards the ſtrength of the Scots (which the ſame Steward had in charge) and that ſo farre, that in the ſame action the Engliſh brought themſelues betwixt the enimie and the Scots, who miſtaking the companie, and ſuppoſing them to be their enimies, gaue them from the hedge, where they laie ſuch a volée of ſhot, that it made them to loſe more ground than euer the enimie could haue done.

The enimie in the meane time perceiuing that, and

and being now fighting vpon the retreit came forward with great force and furie, hauing a new supplie of numbers of freſh ſouldiors to ſuccour them. All which notwithſtanding they could not for all that they might do, force them to abandon the ſtreit which they had in charge, vntill ſuch time as certeine Engliſhmen (that were left within the cloſes to diſcouer the enimie) brought word that the enimie had entred the ſtreit vpon the Scots. Which thing was in déd verie true, for euen at that inſtant the fire was ſéene to ariſe in the village, and the whole forces which were to enter betwéene the water and the Engliſh companies, retired themſelues to the heath againe. The Scots then valiantlie making good their fight vpon the retreit, the lieutenant of the Engliſh was likewiſe driuen to the ſame: which if he had not done, the enimie had cut betwixt him, his companie and the trenches. This being well perceiued by capteine Liggins, he preſentlie aduanced himſelfe, and was now come halfe the waie to the ſuccour of the lieutenant, to preuent the enimie and to ioine with the forces of the ſame lieutenant, all who being gotten togither doo retire to the church, and perceiuing that the enimie came on appaſe, the lieutenant of the Engliſh leaueth capteine Liggins to a reaſonable ground of ſtrength to interteine them, when he himſelfe rideth backe to fetch releefe for capteine Liggins his retreit.

The enimie ſéeing the ſtreit of the waie, and that their other forces preuailed more on the other ſtreit, forſooke anie longer to attempt the ſame againſt the Engliſh, and retired themſelues all they might on the ſide ouer the cloſes, to ioine them with their other forces, which had euen now paſſed the ſtreit which the Scots had in gard, who all togither made haſt vp to the hill, and ſo to the burnt houſe, then fired by the Scots, at that inſtant forſaking the field, and retiring them to the campe, after that they had obteined victorie againſt the Spaniards, by valiant reſiſting & purſuing the force of the enimie. At what time alſo maiſter Norris coronell of the Engliſh, and the forenamed maiſter Steward coronell of the Scots, carried awaie the whole commendation of this victorie obteined by the men of theſe two nations of England and Scotland. But leauing the Scots reioiſing of this good ſucceſſe in thoſe low countries, we will call backe our pen and reſalute the countrie of Scotland, at this time in ſome ciuill diſſentions amongſt themſelues, whereof theſe manie yeares, ſince the gouernment of this yong king, it ſéemeth to me that it hath not long béene free.

In the forenamed moneth of Auguſt, there grew ſecret diſſention amongſt the nobilitie at home, which ſtill continued & fed the former vnkindlie fire of contention betweene the two factions of the yong king, and the impriſoned queene: by occaſion whereof the realme was diuided into three parts, ſome following the king, ſome ſtanding one the queenes ſide, & ſome aſſiſting neither of both, all which by ſome were termed by three ſeuerall names; as the kings faction, the part of the male-contents, and the neutrals, conſiſting of ſuch as remained indifferent on both ſides, neither ſeeking to vphold the one or to ſuppreſſe the other. Amongſt which on the kings part were manie earls, lords and biſhops, as Dowglaſſe erle Morton admerall of Scotland, Dowglaſſe erle of Angus, Dowglaſſe earle of Buquhane, Areſkin earle of Marre, Steward earle Bothwell, Cuningham earle of Glenkarne, Leſleh earle of Wrothouſe, Montgomerie earle of Eglington, Steward earle of Dikeneie, and Steward earle of Lenoux, all which were in houſe with the king, and attendant vpon his perſon, with whome were confederat the lords Bold, Ochiltree, Ruthwen treaſuror of Scotland, Harris, Marwell, Lindſeie, Semple, and others.

Beſides theſe, biſhops and abbats, that is to ſaie, Patrike Adamſon archbiſhop of S. Andrews, Cuningham (kinſman to the erle of Glencarne) biſhop of Aberden, Bold (of blood and kindered with the lord Bold) archbiſhop of Glaſcow, Dolwglaſſe biſhop of Mannaw, Herburne biſhop of Roſſe, Robert Petcarne abbat of Dunfermeling, cheefe ſecretarie of Scotland, Colvington abbat of Cowlros, Richard Bedwell abbat of Holierood houſe, one of the councell, the abbats of Cambuſkinnell and of Dribourgh, with James Maghill maiſter of the rolles, or clearke of the regiſter, and one of the councell. Theſe noble perſons thus aiding the king, the partie of the male-contents was ſupported by manie other perſons of the nobilitie: as Camberle erle of Argile, Steward earle of Atholl, Sincleare earle of Cathneſſe, Gordon earle of Southerland, Gordon earle Huntleie (who was verie yong, of ſix yeares of age, and had his power with theſe earles) the earles of Mentros and Menteth (being both ſurnamed Grahams) and Kenedie earle of Caſſelles a child of three yeares old, whoſe ſtrength was alſo ioined to theſe male-contents. Beſides which earles there was to aſſiſt thoſe male-contents Crawford ſhiriffe of Aire, Kenedie lord of Kargenie, Kenedie lord of Blacheſkichen, the lords of Marewell, Lochenar, Hume (being but ſix yeares old) which Hume lord of Colden Knolles (warden of the middle marches of Scotland) Alexander Hume of Maundſtone, Care (lord Sefford, and the lord Lindſeie, with the Hebburns, which wholie depended vpon the lord Lindſeie; vnto whom in like ſort, as partaking of the ſame malecontentment, were added Alexander Areſkine, of Mar, vncle to the earle of Mar, & capteine of the caſtell of Edenburgh, and Cunningham the laird of Drumwaſſell, capteine of Dunbritaine, with manie other perſons of honour and ſtrength.

The heads of theſe two factions thus ſet downe, it reſteth now to declare who were the neutrals, who being but few, and as I can yet learne onelie three in number, ſo they were of no great power; aſwell for that the one of them being Keth the earle Marſhall, was a tickelie man; as for that the Hamiltons were not beloued of the king, nor greatlie eſteemed of the other factions: and the third, the Leuingſtons familie, wanting their head the lord of that houſe, being then in France, whereby they could not be of great power, which part ſoeuer they ſhould ſupport. The order of which diuiſion and proceeding in Scotland, comming afterward to the knowledge of the queene of England, who had ſent Robert Bowes a man of good ſeruice hir ambaſſador into Scotland, ſhe did alſo (tendering the yong king of Scots, and as a carefull neighbour and louing godmother, fearing leaſt that he might receiue iniurie, by the aſſemblie of theſe malecontents, whoſe power grew to be ſomewhat ſtrong) direct hir commiſſion to the earle of Huntington, preſident of the north in England, and to the lord Hunſdon capteine of Berwike, they both being of blood and alliance vnto hir maieſtie. In which commiſſion, ſhe willed them to leuie an armie of footemen and horſſemen to be imploied in thoſe warres. All which theſe Engliſh lords ſhould haue in a redineſſe, againſt ſuch time as the ſaid maiſter Bowes (who, as ye haue heard before, had béene ſent into Scotland to pacifie theſe troubles, and to eſtabliſh a quiet peace and loue amongſt them) ſhould giue knowledge for their entrance into the Scotiſh dominions (vnder the conduct of the ſame lord of Hunſdon) againſt the power of thoſe male-contents. Whereupon the lord Hunſdon (hauing a time appointed him accordinglie, and being in order ſet, well furniſhed with men and munition) ſetting forward to execute the force of his commiſſion, threatned ſpoile to manie places of Scotland belonging to the borderers, and burnt the houſes of the lords there inhabiting: if they ioined themſelues with the male-contents, as they had fullie deliberated for to do. By reaſon whereof, they leauing their former determination, and for that preſent refuſing to ioine againſt the king: theſe male-contents (doubting the ſequell of their attempt, and how they might performe that which they had taken in hand, being now in the field and in armes (againſt the other faction) began to hearken vnto a pacification, and were after reconciled to the king and the other lords, about the two and twentith of the ſame moneth of Auguſt, as I haue béene informed. Which matter being more largelie to be diſcuſſed, becauſe it is knowne by the name of the battell of Fankirke, I muſt for this time paſſe ouer, determining hereafter more liberallie to intreat thereof. Wherefore, falling into other matter, we ſaie, that much about this time, Iohn Leſle biſhop of Roſſe (who had ſome yeares before béene ſome certeine time impriſoned in the Tower of London in England, and had trauelled to Rome about the affaires of the impriſoned queene of Scotland, where he labored to procure ſuch aid for hir, as the princes which fauored hir faction would yeld) did depart from Rome, and went from the pope to Randulph, as the ſecond of that name now emperor. Which Leſle, taking his iournie out of Italie, paſſed through the frontier townes of Germanie, and was ſtaied at Phaltzburgh, otherwiſe called Palatinopolis, by George duke of Bauier, countie Palatine of Rhene, and earle of Weldtzens; in which citie, his cofers and other thinges were rifled and ſearched: at what time there were manie writings found, and amongſt others certeine papers, in which did appeare what friends the queene of Scots had of all the parts of Europe, what enimies, and what neutrals: with letters and other inſtructions of Philip king of Spaine.

All which notwithſtanding (though they gaue the ſaid George occaſion to miſtruſt Leſle, as an enimie to his religion) this biſhop of Roſſe was afterward diſmiſſed, becauſe he was furniſhed with the emperors paſport, or ſafeconduct to come vnto him. Wherefore the duke of Bauier for his better diſcharge, and to manifeſt to the world that they did nothing but that, which both the preſent eſtate of theſe troubleſome times, and the dutie of a religious prince required, did honorablie diſmiſſe the ſaid Leſle, bearing all his charges, reſtoring all his goods, and conueieng him out of his dominions with a goodlie compante of horſſemen, after that he had cauſed the ſaid biſhop of Roſſe to leaue a teſtimoniall writing in the Latine tong vnder his owne hand, to ſhew that no iniurie was done to the ſaid biſhop, in that his deteining and ſearch for thoſe cauſes; & that the biſhop ſhould not anie wate ſéeke anie reuenge thereof: the copie of which writing (as I receiued the ſame) I haue faithfullie and verbatim ſet downe in this ſort.

Iohannes Leſleus epiſcopus Roſſenſis & adminiſtrator eccleſiæ Morauenſis.

This Leſle being yet liuing, and (as I vnderſtand) in great credit in France, poſſeſſing the place of the chancellor of Lions, is deſcended of an ancient familie, as one whoſe anceſtors and name hath both inioied honorable titles in deſcent, and great places of gouernement in the common-wealth of Scotland. For when Edgar the ſonne of Edward the outlaw and kinſman to Edward the Confeſſor king of England was vexed with vniuſt war, firſt by Harold king of England the ſon of Godwine, & then by the Norman baſtard ſurnamed the Conqueror, which ſlue Harold and obteined the crowne of England; Edgar did priuilie take shipping with his mother Agatha, and his two ſiſters, to the end, that being now out of all hope euer to obteine the kingdom of England, they might direct their courſe and ſaile againe into Hungarie, from whenſe they came. But it happened by diuine prouidence, that being on the ſea, they were grieuouſlie moleſted with vehement winds, which forciblie made them forſake their appointed courſe, and draue them into the mouth of the riuer of Forth or Frith, whoſe landing place is yet to be ſeene, & at this daie called S. Margarets hauen (after the name of hir which was ſiſter to this Edgar & called Margaret) whome Malcolme king of Scots (for the rare parts both of bodie & mind wherwith ſhe was wonderfully indued) did after take to wife, & ſolemnlie crowned to the great comfort of the whole kingdome. Vpon which deed William the Conqueror, being more greeuouſlie moued than he was before, baniſhed all the friends of Edgar out of England. By occaſion whereof, Lindſeie, Vaus, Ramſeie, Louell, and diuerſe other men of great nobilitie came then firſt into Scotland to craue aid of king Malcolme; which perſons being liberallie indued with rich poſſeſſions by the ſame Malcolme; their poſteritie do at this daie in our age flouriſh with great honor. Beſides which alſo, at this time there came out of Hungarie with Agatha before touched diuerſe other perſons of account, as Crichton, Fodringham, Giffert, Manlis, Brothike, and others; amongſt whome Bartholomew Leſle deſcended of noble parentage, and of great valor of mind, did with the reſt appeare verie famous, whoſe ſharpe wit, and excellencie of knowledge (ioined with a ſound and ſtrong bodie) when Malcolme the king of Scots did behold, he vſed his helpe in the defenſe of the caſtell of Edenburgh, and in all other weightie affaires which concerned the warres.

Out of this familie of the Leſles haue ſprong and flouriſhed manie worthie perſons, valiantlie reſiſting and ſubduing their enimies. And amongſt thoſe, one Walter Leſle earle of Roſſe, who afterward purchaſed ſuch ſingular commendation for valor and wiſedome ſhewed in manie battels of the emperor Lewes the ſecond, & Charles the fourth, againſt the Saracens, Vt (one of their owne name now a biſhop of Roſſe in his hiſtorie of Scotland ſateth) à quodam animi generoſo impetu, quo hoſtes frãgere, & ſub iugũ fortiter mittere ſolebat, generoſi equitis cognomentum ſit conſecutus: eiuſdem ſtirpis comes Rotheſius, multíque alij barones & equites Leſlei cognominati (quos Malcolmus primùm, ac alij deinde reges multis amplíſque agris, in Fifa, Auguſia, Gourea, & Gareocha, alijſque prouincijs munificè cumulabant) magnæ hodie nobilitatis virtutíſque commendatione in Scotia vigent. Of whoſe line and name at this date (as is before ſaid) continuing in great honor, the earle of Rothos now liuing called Leſle dwelleth in Fife, and married the daughter of the earle of Gowrie or Gowrike, the ſame earle of Rothos being a perſon no leſſe wiſe and honorable, than deſcended of ancient and honorable anceſtors. But leauing that familie, let vs returne from whenſe we haue digreſſed.

The biſhop of Roſſe being departed from the duke of Vanter (as before you haue heard) in the yeare following, which was the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand flue hundred three ſcore and ninetæne, Amies Steward the lord of Obignie in France, being of the houſe of the Stewards, and ſonne to John the eldeſt brother of Matthew Leneur, ſometime regent of Scotland, buried at Sterling, as is before touched, did come into Scotland, was by the king moſt honorablie receiued, and aduanced to further honor. For the king taking from Robert Steward (whom the laſt yeare he had created earle of Leneur) the title of that earledome of Leneur, he now inueſted this lord of Obignie with the ſame, and created him earle of Leneur, thereby more firmelie to bind the lord of Obignie in France to be faithfull vnto him in Scotland. And leaſt he ſhould ſeeme by taking the earledome from Robert Steward to haue wronged him, the king for recompenſe thereof, beſtoweth vpon the ſaid Robert Steward as honorable a title and earldome as the ſame was, for he inueſted the ſame Robert with the earledome of March. Not long after which the king erecting the ſame earledome of Leneur vnto a dukedome, he did beſtow that honor of duke vpon the ſaid lord of Obignie, & created him duke of Leneur, which title at this date, his ſonne being a towardlie yong gentleman doth moſt honorablie poſſeſſe, he being the onlie perſon in that countrie which doth in this our age inioie that title of duke, being ſuch an honor as was but latelie begun amongſt them, and neuer verie plentifull in that region: for the ſame hath not yet as I for this preſent ſuppoſe noriſhed at anie one time (when that title was riſeſt amongſt them) three perſons adorned with that ſtile. Now touching the matter of their firſt creation and continuance, I thinke it not vnfit to ſaie ſomwhat in this place.

The lord of Obignie made earle of Leneur.

Robert Steward made erle of March.

The firſt creation of dukes in that countrie was vſed by Robert the third of that name, whoſe right name being John, was after turned vnto Robert, for doubt of euill ſucceſſe to grow to the kingdome by a gouernor ſo called. For thus write the Scots as Leſleus hath deliuered with theſe ſpeeches: Verùm quum ipſi nobiles arbitrarẽtur nomini ineſſe neſcio quid ominis infauſti, quòd reges Franciæ & Angliæ, hoc nomine conſignati, bello prehenderẽtur, mutato nomine Robertum vt patrem eum appellari decreuerũt. Quæ illorum ſiue in nominis obſeruatione ſuperſtitio, ſiue in regis conſeruatione diligentia, maioris mali regi iam impendentis augurium quoddam mihi videtur. Nam non multò poſt ex equo illi decidenti, omnia membra ita contuſa fuerunt, vt (quòd regnandi moleſtias ac labores nullo modo poterat pati) Roberti comiti Fifenſi fratri ſuo regni gubernationẽ dedere cogeretur. Which John as before is ſaid, hauing now obteined a new name, was the firſt which brought a new title of honor into his kingdome: for he created Dauid his eldeſt ſonne duke of Rothſeie, and his brother Robert (whom he had made protector of the kingdome) duke of Albanis, as is ſet downe by the ſame Leſleus in theſe words;

The firſt creation of dukes in Scotland.

Leſleus lib. 7. pag. 264.

To which king John of England and France, he might alſo haue added one of his own countrie of Scotland John Baliol the king, who was as infortunate in his gouernment as anie of the other.

Leſleus lib. 6. pag. 211.

words: Tertio plus minus anno (which was about the yeare of our redemption one thouſand three hundred foure ſcore and thirteene) concilio ex omni ordinum genere Perthi habito, poſt alias res pro regni cómodo ſapienter actas, rex Dauidem filium ſuum titulo ducis Rothſaiæ,& Robertum fratrem ſuum quem regno adminiſtrando præfecerat, ducis Albanij honore ornabat: qui duo primi fuerunt in Scotia his titulis illuſtrati. Thus much he, proouing that it is not aboue one hundred foure ſcore and thirteene yeares ſince that title came firſt into Scotland. Wherby it appereth that England ſince the conqueſt hauing dukes erected by king Edward the third, who in the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand three hundred thirtie & ſeuen, made his eldeſt ſonne duke of Cornwall, hath had dukes about two hundred fortie & nine yeres paſt, being fiftie and ſix yere before they had anie in Scotland. And as thoſe two before named were the firſt which were inueſted with the honor of duke in Scotland, ſo after the death of the ſame king which fell in the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand foure hundred and ſix, in the Interregnum or vacancie of the kingdome (which continued eightéene yeares from the ſaid yere of Chriſt one thouſand foure hundred and ſix, vntill the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand foure hundred twentie and foure) in which James the firſt hauing béene trained vp in England obteined the crowne, and vnder the protectorſhip of Murdacke (the ſonne of the foreſaid Robert the firſt duke of Albanie) to whom the gouernment of the realme of Scotland was committed after the death of the ſaid Robert the third.

Leſleus lib.7. pag.268.

Archibald Dowglaſſe was the firſt Scot which paſſing the ſeas, & ſeruing a ſtrange prince, intoted anie ſuch title of duke in anie forrein nation. For the Scots going then to aid the French againſt the Engliſh, the French king to honour the Scots and to bind them to be more faithfull vnto him, created John Steward earle of Buquaine conſtable of France, & aduanced the ſaid Archibald Dowglaſſe to the honor of the dukedome of Turone: but he did not long inioie that great title, being ſhortlie after ſlaine at the battell of Vernoile, in the yere of Chriſt one thouſand foure hundred twentie and foure. In treting of which battell Bucchanan, whoſe name may rightlie be deduced from Bucca vana, beyond all modeſtie and courſe of reaſon forgetting his calling, his learning and humanitie, hath ſpued out all his malice againſt the Engliſh nation, whereof I haue treated in my former additions to the hiſtorie of Scotland. Thus hauing somewhat digreſſed from the matter of later yeares, wherewith I ought to haue furniſhed my imperfect continuances of the annals of Scotland, I will returne to the lord of Obegnie, who was at this time created duke of Leneur, and who occaſioned me to make this diſcourſe. Wherefore I will here ſet downe what Leſleus hath written of the firſt originall of that houſe in France, and of this duke of Leneur thus by the king newlie as before ſaid created, the words of which Leſleus biſhop of Roſſe be theſe: Nouam quoque Scotorum equitum turmam Carolus 6 (king of France, which had the warres againſt the king of England, when the Scots were thus aduanced in the dominions of France, being meane betweene the ſaid yeares of Chriſt one thouſand foure hundred and ſix, and one thouſand foure hundred twentie and foure) paulo ante conſcripſit, quæ vulgò Scotorum armatorum cohors dicebatur. Huius primus dux Robertus Stuartus ex Lenoxij comitis familia ortus, domino de Aubigne multíſque alijs terris, muneribus, honoribus,& baleagijs cómuni populi ſermone dictis, a rege inſignitus eſt. Quæ omnia a Scotis eiuſdem cognominis & proſapiæ continuata, ſucceſſionis ſerie per Barnardum nimirum celebrem militiæ ducem, deinde per Robertum, denique Iohannem Stuartum comitis Lenoxij fratrem iam diu poſſeſſa, præclaræ nobilitatis ac indolis iuuenis, Iohānis filius non paruam ſuorum virtutis ſpem de ſe excitans, etiam nunc hodie obtinet. Thus much Leſle. Beſide which that Leſleus hath ſet downe of the firſt lord of Obegnie in France, Paulus Iouius in his booke of Empreſſe written in Italian, hath not forgotten to ſpeake ſomewhat of him, where he ſetteth downe the deuiſe of his enſignes or armes in this ſort tranſlated by me into Engliſh.

There was (ſaith Iouius) amongſt the Frenchmen a man of knowne vertue or proweſſe, & moſt famous capteine called *Heberard Steward) borne of the bloud rotall of Scotland) being honored with the title of monſieur de Obegnie, who being of kinred to James the fourth of that name, did beare for his deuiſe or enſigne, a field ſiluer, a ramping lion gewles, with a number of buckles thereabout; the which cote armour he did weare vpon his vpper garment, and likewiſe beare in his ſtandard, with this poſie, Diſtantia iungit: ſignifieng thereby, that he was the mean or buckle to hold and knit togither the king of Scots and the French king, with a iuſt counterpeiſe againſt the force of the king of England, naturall enimie to Scotland and France. Thus much Iouius, & thus much I of the duke of Leneur lord of Obegnie in France. After which, ſith I am now in diſcourſing of dukes of that countrie, and haue ſhewed when the firſt duke was made in Scotland, and who they were; I thinke it not vnfit for this place, to ſet downe a catalog of all ſuch dukes of Scotland as haue come vnto my knowlege by ſearch of hiſtories, ſince the creation of the ſame firſt dukes, in the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand foure hundred and eightéene; which I will not refuſe to do in this place, following the ſame courſe which I haue obſerued before in the hiſtorie of England, where I haue ſet downe all the dukes, ſince the firſt creation of anie duke in that countrie. Wherefore thus I enter into my dukes of Scotland.

A catalog of all the dukes of Scotland by creation or deſcent.

Dauid Steward duke of Rothſeie.

DAuid Steward (eldeſt ſon of John Steward earle of Carricke, after called Robert the third, and leauing the name of John when he came to the crowne of Scotland) was (by parlement, about the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand three hundred foure ſcore and eightéene, being the eight yeare of Robert the third) made duke of Rothſeie, when he was about eightéene yeares of age, or rather twentie, as by all accounts it muſt be, if that be true that he was borne the two and twentith daie of October one thouſand three hundred three ſcore and eightéene, made duke in the yeare one thouſand three hundred foure ſcore & eightéene, as ſome haue. But Leſleus (as before) referreth this as I by all circumſtances do gather, to the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand three hundred foure ſcore & thirteene. He maried Margerie the daughter of Archibald earle Dowglas, about the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand foure hundred, being the tenth of Robert the ſecond.

Robert Steward duke of Albanie.

Robert Steward ſecond ſon to Robert the ſecond king of Scots, by Eliſabeth Mure or More his wife, being by his father created earle of Fife and Menteth, was in the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand three hundred foure ſcore and eightéene, and the eight yeare of the gouernement of Robert the ſecond, aduanced nanced to the title and honor of the dukedome of Albanie: this Robert and the other Dauid as I haue before noted, being the first dukes that euer were in Scotland. This man being gouernor of Scotland in the yeare of Christ one thousand foure hundred and one, falling in the yeare of the reigne of Robert the third, did apprehend Dauid the duke of Rothseie, and committed him to streict prisonment in Faukeland, where in the end he died by extreame famine, whose want of food was such, that he was faine to gnaw his owne fingers: of this Robert is more spoken in my protectors of Scotland.

Murdacke duke of Albanie.

Murdacke called duke, was also earle of Fife, eldest sonne to this Robert duke of Albanie, was as is most likelie duke of Albanie after his father, who being gouernor of Scotland, occasioned me to intreat more of him in that place.

Alexander duke of Albanie.

Alexander Steward the second sonne of James the second, was by his father aduanced to the dukedome of Albanie, who being verie yong at the time of his fathers death, which happened in the yeare of Christ one thousand foure hundred & threescore, was with his brother John earle of Mar, committed to the custodie of Marie their mother. After which in the yeare of Christ one thousand foure hundred three score and three, being the third yeare of James the third, he was taken on the sea by the Englishmen in the moneth of June, as he returned from his grandfather the duke of Guelderland, but was after restored home by the meanes of James Kennedie bishop of saint Andrews. About sirteene yeares following, in the yeare of Christ one thousand foure hundred threescore and nineteene, falling in the sirteenth yeare of James the third, this duke was committed prisoner to the castell of Edenburgh, out of which he brake and escaped to Dunbar, from whense being well furnished, he sailed into France where he was honorablie receiued, and there maried the daughter and heire of the earle of Bononie, who shortlie after dieng, and the duke perceiuing himself not to be so well vsed as he was before, came into England & was by king Edward the fourth louinglie accepted; who granted aid to this duke. Whereupon he in the yeare of Christ one thousand foure hundred fourescore and two, did enter Scotland with a great power & spoiled the countrie, comming (without ante resistance in the yeare of Christ one thousand foure hundred fourescore and two, being the two and twentith yeare of James the third) as far as Radstrag, or Rastalrig, where he pitched his campe: which being knowne, he was by mediation of the nobilitie admitted home to his countrie, being further preferred to the earldomes of March and Mar, and proclamed generall lieutenant of the king; by meanes whereof, he gouerned the whole realme, the king being now in prison. After which, this duke setteth the king at libertie through the persuasions of the queene, without knowlege thereof giuen to the other of the nobilitie: whereby new turmoiles did arise amongst the people. Then in the yeare of Christ one thousand foure hundred fourescore and two, and the three and twentith yeare of James the third; this duke hauing intelligence that there was poison prepared to be giuen to him in drinke in the kings chamber, whereby he stood in feare of his life, did forsake the court and fled to Dunbar: at what time also the king for his owne safetie, got him vnto the castell of Edenburgh: whereupon the earle of Angus and Buccleuch forsaking the king, tooke part with the duke.

Lesle. lib. 8. pag. 319.

After which the duke being summoned as some haue (or being besieged in the castle of Dunbar as other haue) fled into England. But Lesleus saith that he tooke a little bote and so escaped into France, where he was honorablie interteined by Charles king of that realme; and where the Frenchmen for his singularitie in feats of armes, termed him the father of chiualrie; thus writeth Lesleus. But others (deliuering this matter in other forme) saie that after his flight from Dunbar, he passed into England, gathered power, returned into Scotland, did inuade the kingdome, & was put to flight: whereupon growing in disgrace with the king of England, he then fled into France. And then after, the same Lesleus saith: Parisijs dum singulare certamen Aurelianensis dux cum aliquo equite iniuit astans, particula cuiusdam hastæ traijcitur, breuique post moritur, about the yere of Christ one thousand foure hundred eightie three. He left two sonnes behind him, John duke of Albanie gouernor of Scotland during the minoritie of James the fourth, and one other Alexander, whom he had by his first wife in Scotland the daughter of the earle of Orchadie, which Alexander was after bishop of Murreie, and abbat of Scone.

John duke of Albanie.

John Steward duke of Albanie, sonne to the foresaid Alexander duke of Albanie, did after the death of his father obteine that dukedome, in the yeare of Christ one thousand foure hundred eightie three: of this man I haue made a more large discourse in the gouernors of Scotland, whereunto I refer thee; and therefore omit to talke anie further of him in this place.

James Steward duke of Rothesele.

James Steward (eldest sonne to James the third) being duke of Rothesele, is by some termed prince of Rothesele, was borne in the yeare of Christ one thousand foure hundred seuentie and two on the tenth date of March, being about the twelfe yeare of the reigne of his father James the third. This duke in the yeare of Christ one thousand foure hundred eightie and eight, in the nine and twentith yeare of his father, and the sirteenth of his age, was by the nobilitie rebelling against his father made capteine or leader of those rebels, who at that time at Banocksburne two miles from Sterling, incountring with the king his father, did there slea him; whereupon this James duke of Rothesele was presentlie made king by the name of James the fourth.

Alexander duke of Rothesele.

Alexander Steward the second, sonne to James the third, king of Scotland, and brother to James the fourth, was duke of Rothesele: for thus writeth Lesleus li. 8. pag. 331. In studium incubuit rex (which was James the fourth then king, in the yeare of Christ one thousand foure hundred eightie and nine) sedulò, vt Alexander dux Rothesiæ & Iohannes comes Marriæ sui fratres tenelli adhuc liberali educatione diligentissimè imbuerentur, tantóque sumptu pro ratione patrimonij, quod singulis pater reliquerat satis amplum, magnificè alerentur. He died the fifteenth kalends of Januarie, in the yeare of Christ one thousand fiue hundred and fiftéene at Sterling.

Henrie duke of Albanie.

Henrie Steward lord Dernelele the eldest sonne to Matthew Steward erle of Leneux, was brought vp in England, a goodlie and beautifull personage, being to be married to Marie the queene of Scots, was after his comming into Scotland made earle of Rosse, in the yere of Christ one thousand fiue hundred threescore and fiue by the same queene, about the three and twentith yeare of hir reigne: shortlie after which he was in the Julie following created duke of Albanie; and on saturdaie the eight and twentith day of the same moneth before the marriage, proclamed king by the queenes commandement, at the market crosse of Edenborough, being married to the same Marie on the nine and twentith date of the same moneth, in the chapell at Holie rood house, at fiue of the cloeke in the morning: which honor he did not long inioie, inioie. For in the tenth of Februarie, in the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand fiue hundred threeſcore and ſix (what by the malice of ſome of the nobilitie, and falſe perſuaſion of others, he was led to enter into thoſe actions, which in the end were his owne ouerthrow, and that by ſuch as moued him thereunto) he was miſerablie ſlaine in a houſe within the towne, néere to Kirke a field.

Amies Steward duke of Leneux.

Amies Steward lord of Obigneie in France, ſonne to John Steward brother to Matthew Steward earle of Leneux, being firſt by James the firſt of that name made earle of Leneux, was after by the ſame king made duke of Leneux; who being dead, hath left a yong ſonne behind him, a gentleman of great hope, at this daie liuing, inioieng the title of his father, and called duke of Leneux. Thus hauing ſet downe all the dukes which haue béene in Scotland, we will deſcend to ſuch Scots as haue inioied that title in a forren nation.

Lodowike Steward duke of Leneux.

That diuers of the Scots haue obteined the title and honor of dukes in forren countries.

AS it is honorable to anie man to be aduanced vnto anie title of honour in his owne countrie, either for deſert or fauor; whereof yet parcialitie maie moſt commonlie be the furtherer: ſo is it far more honorable and remoued from all ſuſpicion of vndeſerued fauor, to be inueſted with anie title of dignitie for anie cauſe in a forren countrie; becauſe princes (whoſe hands are moſtlie opened to inrich their ſubiects, in whoſe faithfull hearts their ſafetie is principallie incloſed) do not commonlie without ſingular deſert aduance ſtrangers to them by birth in an other nation, & not their native ſubiects, for that they are people, to whom without an eſpeciall triall anie prince is not to commit anie portion of his kingdome, and much leſſe anie part of his perſon. Therefore the ſame being an argument of worthie deſert, either for aſſured fidelitie to the perſon of ſuch prince, or for the valour of ſeruice of the aduanced, when anie one is adorned with anie ſuch title of honor, I thinke it not vnfit in this place to obſcure the glorie of the Scots (who might impute the ſame to be maliciouſlie done by me) and to omit ſuch of their nation as haue inioied the title of dukes in a forren countrie, eſpeciallie being now in hand with all the dukes of Scotland.

And although the number of ſuch dukes be ſmall, as not exceeding the figure of foure, and therefore in ſome mens minds might well enough be paſſed ouer in ſilence: yet carrieng a contrarie mind, in that I would not anie waie pretermit what they iuſtlie deſerue, I will faithfullie ſet downe what I find recorded touching the ſame after this maner.

Archibald Dowglaſſe duke of Touraine,

Archibald Dowglaſſe was created duke of Touraine in France in this ſort. In the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand foure hundred twentie and three as ſome ſaie, or one thouſand foure hundred and ſix as other haue (whereof I maie not determine anie thing by reaſon I cannot reconcile theſe defaults of numbers which haue happened through the contrarietie of bookes) Charles the ſeuenth of that name king of France, ſending ambaſſadors into Scotland, to renew the old league betweene the two nations of France and Scotland, and to craue aid againſt the Engliſh, there were ambaſſadors and other noble men ſent likewiſe into France out of Scotland; with whoſe comming the French king being greatlie comforted, and hoping of good ſucceſſe againſt the Engliſh by reaſon of the Scottiſh aid, he did vpon the comming of the Scots to the court creat this Archibald Dowglaſſe (then erle of Wigh-ton) duke of Touraine. But that honor continued not long with him, for in the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand foure hundred twentie and foure, at the battell of Vernoile in Perth the Engliſh obteined the victorie, and this new duke with his ſonne and heire James Dowglaſſe earle of Wighton was amongſt others moſt vnfortunatlie ſlaine.

Archibald Dowglaſſe duke of Touraine,

Archibald earle Dowglaſſe was duke of Touraine, as I gather by the words of Leſleus touching this Archibalds ſonne, of whom we will ſpeake hereafter, and then ſet downe the ſame words of Leſleus to proue Archibald duke of Touraine, who married the earle of Crawfords daughter, by whom he had iſſue William earle Dowglaſſe, a child of foureteene yeares old which ſucceeded him, & one Dauid Dowglaſſe. After which this Archibald died at Leſſelrig in the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand foure hundred thirtie and nine, being about the third yeare of king James the firſt.

William earle Dowglaſſe a child of foureteene yeares of age ſucceeded his father in his inheritances, and was after made duke of Touraine or Tourone, who being now earle Dowglaſſe, deliuered forth ſuch buds of vertue, as he lent great hope to all men of his worthineſſe and good ſucceſſe, to his further honor and his countries benefit. But in the end their expectations were deceiued after that he was made duke of Touraine: for being puft vp in pride with thoſe great honors, he forgot himſelfe, and wrought his owne and his countries harme, whereof we will not now ſpeake; but onelie ſet downe Leſleus words touching his admittance to the dukedome of Touraine. Gulielmus (which was this earle Dowglaſſe) Malcolmum Flemingum dominum Cummirnald & Alanū Lowder ad Carolum ſeptimū Francorum regem miſit, oratū, vt ducatu Toronenſi eius patrimonia & dignitates amplificarentur: æquum enim eſſe contendit, vt quo ducatu Archibaldus Dowglaſsius (qui pro libertate Franciæ bello Vernolenſi mortem oppetiuit) frueb.ur * & pater illius nuper mortuus potiebatur, idem ad ſe quoque perueniret. Carolus non inuitus conceſſit, quo dono quantum illi ad honorem dignitatémque cumuli, tantum profectò ad ſuperbiam, inſolentiámque materiæ acceſſit. Thus much Leſle, placing the ſame to be done as other authors alſo do, in the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand foure hundred thirtie and nine, being about the third yeare of the reigne of James the firſt of that name king of Scotland. Which honor he did not long inioie, for in the yeare following being the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand foure hundred and fortie, and the fourth yeare of the ſame king James; he was, for that he would neither obete the gouernment of the gouernor or chancellor, bidden to a banket at Edenburgh caſtle, whereas when he and his brother Dauid were ſet at dinner, the meat was ſuddenlie remoued, and a buls head preſented to the erle of Dowglaſſe, being in thoſe daies a token that he ſhould ſhortlie be executed. Immediatlie whereupon, the ſaid earle with his brother Dauid, & Malcolme Fleming lord of Cummirnald were beheaded before the caſtle gate: ſo that this great honor ſéemed to thoſe Scots which poſſeſſed the ſame, not much vnlike to the Sejane horſe, or to the honor of the dukedome of Gloceſter.

Leſleus. lib. 8. pag. 292.

This prooueth Archibald Dowglaſſe father to this William to be duke of Touraine.

James earle of Arrane being made gouernor to Marie quéene of Scots, in the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand foure hundred fortie and two (in which being about ſeuen daies old, ſhe began the firſt yeare of hir vnfortunate gouernement, which I maie ſo rightlie terme, becauſe ſhe was after depoſed in the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand fiue hundred threeſcore and ſeuen, in the fiue and twentith yeare of hir reigne) was made

made duke of Chatelerault by the French king in the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand fiue hundred fiftie and foure, being the twelfe yeare of the reigne of the ſame quéene Marie, of whom I haue intreated more liberallie in my diſcourſe of the protectors of of Scotland, and therefore meane not to ſpeake anie thing of that here: wherfore leauing theſe dukes, we will returne our pen to other matters done in Scotland.

This yeare there was a practiſe by forren perſons of great ſtate in Europe, to make ſome inuaſion, or at the leaſt ſome diſturbance vpon or amongſt ſuch realmes as profeſſed the goſpell, and were enimies to the Romane religion, by meanes whereof as it was ſuppoſed, manie princes inclining their heads to the popes obedience, embracing his doctrine and reſting at his diſpoſition, expected the performance of ſome actions then to be done by them in the territories of the aduerſe part, and in the realmes of ſuch princes, as not onelie oppoſed themſelues againſt the popes doctrine, but had alſo drawne their necks from the yoke of his ſubiection, in matters both of ciuill gouernement and of religion. Amongſt which princes, being commonlie termed catholiks, the duke of Guiſe a perſon of great account in France, tied néerelie in bloud to the impriſoned quéene, and to the yoong king of Scots, and ſupported with other princes purſſes, purpoſed to haue ſet full foot in Scotland, and to haue obteined the whole diſpoſition and rule of that king and kingdome. But God, in whoſe hands reſteth the ordering of princes harts, not permitting ſuch determinations to ſort to the purpoſed effect, did for that time fruſtrate the execution thereof.

For whereas the duke of Guiſe ſhould with martiall power haue inuaded, entered and poſſeſſed Scotland, there aroſe troubles and turmoiles of warres in his owne countrie of France, about the parts of Picardie and Dalphinée, which called him from the diſpatch of that his former deuiſe, for the ſtaieng to appeaſe the ſame new inſurrection, employeng all his gathered forces thereunto, and encountring with thoſe perſons: the rigor of the ſame warres ſo weakened his ſtrength, that he was not able (without ſome new ſupplie of men and monie, which could not be had vpon the ſudden) to produce his former intent to anie effect. But yet, leaſt that the ſame intention might not ſeeme altogither to haue quailed, or that he ſhould be noted to haue made ſhew to enterprize a thing which he neither could nor would proſecute to the vttermoſt; there was ſomewhat by his meanes and furtherance attempted in Scotland, which yet in the end fell not forth in all reſpects to anſwer the expected hope of good ſucceſſe therin. For partlie by the policie of the Scots, and partlie by the ſupport of the alies and friends to the king, but altogither by the vnited ſtrength of both ſorts, the Scots rid themſelues of the ſame deuiſe, and ſince remained ſafe from the danger of the Guiſe and of his partakers.

After this the earle of Morton, ſometime regent of Scotland, being condemned to die, and readie to ſuffer that execution which was appointed vn him, ſome perſons had conference with him abo matters of great importance, on the ſame da wherein he was to ſuffer, which perſons ſo conferring with him, were Iohn Durie, and maſter Walter Bancanquell. In which diſcourſe betweéne the earle and them theſe matters in ſubſtance amongſt manie others fell forth, in queſtions propounded by them, and in anſwers made by him in this ſort almoſt word for word, drawne into ſome ſeuerall heads and articles, as they were deliuered vnto me,

The examinations and anſwers of the earle of Morton before his death, but after his condemnation.

First he was exhorted by them that he ſhould not be diſcouraged by his ouerthrow, in conſidering the eſtate whervnto he had beene once called in this world, but rather remembring the glorie to come, he ſhould reioiſe and be of good comfort. Whereunto he anſwered, that as concerning all the glorie which he had in this world, he reſpected it not, bicauſe he was perſuaded that all worldlie honor is but vanitie, and the broken réed of Egypt. And as concerning the eſtate whereunto he was brought, he thanked God for it, and was at that point, that he was rather content to render his life than to liue, bicauſe he knew, that as God had appointed the time for his death, ſo had he alſo appointed the manner thereof, ſéeing that now was the time, and this was the manner which beſt pleaſed his God to take him in, and therefore was content. And as for his life in this world, he cared not for it, in reſpect of that immortalitie, & the euerlaſting ioy which he looked for, and whereof he was aſſured.

Secondlie, being required what was his part or knowledge in the kings * death or murther: he anſwered with this atteſtation, that as he ſhould anſwer to his Lord God, ſo he would declare all his knowledge therein: the ſum whereof was, that after his returne out of England, whither he was baniſhed for * Dauids ſlaughter, he came out of Whetherbone to Whethingham, where the erle Bothwell was at the ſame time, with whome there was communication about the kings murther, but he would not conſent therto. After which, opening a large diſcourſe thereof, laieng the cauſe, the contriuing, and the execution of the ſame in great perſons now liuing, and confeſſing that they vnderſtood thereof, and durſt not for manie cauſes reueale the ſame, neither to the king nor the kings father the earle of Lenox; he added, how that in the end he was by the law now of late conuicted of knowledge and concealing the kings murther, when as he ſhould anſwer to God he had no part or knowledge in that matter. Furthermore, ſhewing that after the earle of Bothwell was cléered of that murther by aſſiſe, that he and ſundrie of the nobilitie ſubſcribed a bond with the earle of Bothwell, that if anie ſhould laie the kings murther to his charge, he would aſſiſt him to the contrarie, and that therefore he ſubſcribed to the quéenes mariage with the earle Bothwell as ſundrie other of the nobilitie did, being charged thereunto by the quéenes owne writing and commandement.

* Dauid Richi the Italian, ſecretarie to the quéene, ſlaine in the yeare 1566.

Then being required in the name of the liuing God, that ſéeing this murther of the king was one of the moſt filthieſt acts that euer was done in Scotland, and that the ſecrets thereof hath not hitherto béene opened, neither who was the chéefe doer therein, or whether the king was then ſtrangled or blowne vp into the aire; that he ſhould declare if he knew anie further ſecret therein: he anſwered, that as he ſhould make anſwer to God, he knew no more ſecrets in that matter than he had alreadie declared and heard, by the depoſitions of ſuch as had alreadie ſuffered for it, which depoſitions are yet extant. Againe, being demanded if he knew anie preſentlie about the king, which were doers of that worke, by whoſe companie the king and commonwealth might be hurt: he anſwered that he knew none, neither would he accuſe anie, &c.

Thirdlie, being examined of the poiſoning of the earle of Athiolts, if he had anie act or part therein:

he answered with good attestation, saieng; Let God neuer be mercifull vnto me, if euer I knew anie thing of that matter, or heard of it before it came to my eares by the common brute of the countrie. And being further demanded if he knew that maister Iohn Prouandt brought him anie poison; he replied that he knew no such thing, and that he knew nothing by maister Prouandt but honestie, to which he more added these speeches; Fie, fie, there is ouermuch filthinesse in Scotland alreadie, God forbid that vile practising of poisoning should enter among vs: I would not for all the earledome of Athole, haue neither ministred poison to him, or caused it to haue béene ministred, yea if there had béen one hundred on my part, and but he alone, I would not haue stirred one heare of his head.

Fourthlie, being demanded if he made anie conspiracie against the earle of Leneux: he answered with like attestation as before, that he neuer thought in his heart, or once purposed anie conspiracie against the earle of Leneux, neither minded to him anie hurt in bodie or otherwise. But it grœued him that the earle of Leneux knew not the estate of their countrie, nor yet perceiued the danger of the kings person. For being thereunto requested by others, sundrie were brought home who were the kings enimies, ouerthrowers of the kingdome, and enimies to religion; whereby there was apparant danger to his person and the relme: all which he hoped to haue helped by counsell, when the earle of Leneux familiaritie and his should haue béene greater.

Fiftlie, being demanded whether he had anie league or dealing with England for the conueieng of the king or otherwise, or if he had anie pension of the quéene of England for that purpose, he answered in these words: As I shall answer to God vnder paine of condemnation or saluation, I neuer had anie dealings with England that waie: there was neuer one in Scotland or England, neither the quéene nor anie in hir name, that euer moued anie such thing to me, so indirectlie as to conueie the king into England; it neuer entred into my hart, I would not for all the realme of England haue put him into England, except that it had béene for his profit and honor, &c. And for the more cléere purgation of my selfe in this matter I will saie, if euer I meant but directlie his wealth, let God neuer be mercifull vnto me; and I shall neuer aske God mercie for anie thing that entred in my hart against the king: yea there was nothing more that I regarded in this life, than that he should be brought vp in vertue and godlinesse. And I will saie more. If I had bœne as carefull to serue God & walke in his feare, as I was to séeke the kings wealth, I had not béene brought to the point I am at this daie. And where they allege I was the quéene of Englands pensionarie, as I shall answer to God, I had neuer pension of the quéene of England in all my life. And although they caused the brute to go, that I should haue furnished the quéene of Englands souldiors now last vpon the borders, I neuer knew of it. And last of all, where they allege that I should haue bene a great dealer with England, I praise God I neuer had dealing with them, but for the weale publike of the king, his countrie, and subiects, &c.

Sixtlie, being demanded what was his part of the enterprise of the castell of Sterling, he answered, that he knew nothing of it till it was done; but being in Lochleuen, he receiued aduertisement out of the castell of Sterling, and a writing from the king, that he should come thither. And whereas they said, that he minded to kéepe the king in captiuitie there, the truth was, that he neuer meant to kœpe him in captiuitie there or in anie other place. But he vnderstood by the kings owne speaking, that he was as frée at that time as euer he was before, or desired to be, for the present. And if he had knowen that his grace would haue gone to anie other place, where greater libertie had bin, he would gladlie haue gone with him.

Seuenthlie, being laid to his charge, that he was a great hinderance of the matters and authoritie of the bishops, &c: when he might haue done much good for the furtherance of Gods glorie & aduancement of his gospell, both in the time of his gouernement, and since: his answer was, that concerning the religion and doctrine as then it was preached and professed in Scotland, he alwaies meant well in his hart to it, and acknowledged it to be the verie truth of God; insomuch that rather than anie hurt should haue come vnto the religion, he would haue spent his life and goods in the defense, like as now he was contented to die in the constant profession thereof. But indéed as concerning some things in policie of the church, as the state of the bishops, and such like, which were in question betwéene him and the church, he did therein according to his knowledge, and follow the opinion which he thought to be best at that time, in consideration of the estate of all things as they were. Howbeit he would not stand in defense of those things which he then did, but yet he would make this protestation, that as he should answer to God, he did nothing in those matters either of contempt, malice, or enuie; but if there were anie things done amisse, it was of ignorance, and for lacke of better knowledge; and if he had knowen better, he would haue done otherwise, being now purposed at the last to haue holpen them so farre as he might.

Eightlie, he was desired in the name of God, not to stand in his owne innocencie, but plainelie to confesse his sinnes to Gods glorie, and to thinke, that howsoeuer it be that men haue done in this life, yet God had alwaies before him whereof he might be worthie of this and more: whereunto he yéelded this speech; Howsoeuer it be that men haue done, I commit them to God and their owne consciences. But I acknowledge indéed, that God hath alwaies done iustlie to me, and not onlie iustlie but mercifullie also, because amongst all the other sinners I confesse my selfe to be one of the greatest and filthiest abusers of my bodie in the pleasures of the flesh; and also to haue giuen my selfe ouermuch to the world, to the pleasures thereof, and to other sinnes, that God might iustlie laie it to my charge, in that I expressed not the fruits of my profession in my life and conuersation as I ought to haue done, for which I beséech God to be mercifull vnto me. And indéed now I acknowledge the great mercie of God in this, that amongst all the benefits which he hath bestowed vpon me, one of the chiefest is, that he hath in this my last trouble giuen me space and leasure to repent me of my sinnes, and to be at a point with God. In which trouble also I haue found farre greater comfort than euer I could find before, because I haue thereby concluded thus with my selfe, that if God should haue spared my life, and deliuered me out of this trouble, I should then haue cast awaie all the cares of the world, the pleasures of the flesh, the delights of earthlie things, and declared my selfe to serue my God in all kind of quietnesse and simplicitie. And if it shall please God to take me in this trouble, I am concluded also to be content therewith, being alwaies assured of the mercies of God. And for that cause I do now thanke God that I find my selfe at this point, that I am rather content to die than to liue, and that I shall not sée the miseries to come: for I will assure you that I think this to be the most acceptable time that euer God could haue taken me in, because I perceiue and sée such miseries and confusions to insue, that I thanke God that I shall not sée them. And you who dw feare God, and liue after me, when you shall sée these things, you will wish to be where I shall be, that is, with him.

Ninethlie, being demanded what he thought of the forme of iudgement vsed against him, what his opinion therof was, whether he thought anie wrong done vnto him or no, &c: he answered, I would be verie loth to find fault or blame the noble men which haue taken themselues vpon their consciences to condemne me, but I will remit them to God and their owne consciences; yet I am moued to speake somewhat frélie in this matter which is this. I saw such partiall dealing against me, that it hath béene all one to me, if I had bæne as innocent as saint Stephan, or that I had béene as giltie as Judas was: for I perceiued there was nothing sought but my life, howsoeuer things had béene, which appeareth in this, that no exception of anie person which was to passe vpon my assise could be admitted: for I required the earle of Argile to purge himselfe of partiall counsell giuen to the pursuer my accuser; he purged himselfe indeed, but I knew the contrarie, that he gaue partiall counsell to him. Likewise the lord of Wanthon, the lord of Seiton, and such others, who were knowen to be my enimies, (notwithstanding lawfull exception) were put vpon my quest. In consideration wherof I can not but be persuaded of one thing, which it behoueth me to communicat vnto you, and it is thus. I perceiue it is not my life that they séeke onelie, but they who are authors of my death haue some other purpose in hand, which they perceiue will not be done, except I and such other which dw fauor the good cause, were taken out of the waie. Wherefore I can not but suspect that I haue béene so handled, and that such as héereafter shall be put thereunto, may haue a more plaine waie to dw their turne or intent: and I praie God that they which are to liue behind me sée not the practise thereof, but I feare it sore. And therefore in respect of this apparant danger of the common cause, I will giue my counsell to the king my maister, and wish you in the name of God to beare it to him, the summe whereof is this. I perceiue that they which haue bæne the kings foes and enimies, are brought into credit & court, and they who haue béene the mainteiners of his crowne & good friends, are discredited and misliked of. And likewise such as are knowen to be papists, and suspected to be enimies to the religion, are ouer familiar and great in credit with his maiestie, which surelie can not be without great danger to the religion, and hurt to his estat. For which cause I admonish him in the name of God to beware of them, and to seeke a remedie thereof. And as he hath bene brought vp in the feare of God, and companie of good men, so to continue therein, and not to go backe, or else he hath done with it for euer. For I tell you what moueth me to speake thus, which is, that the state of religion in this countrie appeared neuer to be in such danger, and that for this cause. I here saie there is a dealing put in practise betwéene France and England, and Monsieurs marriage with the quéene is like to be feared; if France and England bind togither, and that marriage go forward, you may easilie vnderstand, that the one of them will persuade the other to their religion, &c.

Tenthlie, being required to giue his counsell to the earle of Angus, and to shew him what was meetest to be done, seeing presentlie he was in great trouble, he answered: I dare giue him no counsell, and I will tell you whie; to bid him come in, partlie I dare not, all men may sée in what danger he is although he now come in: and to counsell him to abide forth I dare not, for then he shall lose the kings fauour for euer, himselfe and his heritage, friends and all; and therefore the best counsell that I can giue him in this matter is, that he make all meanes possible to purchase the kings fauor againe, and to sée if he may haue anie assurance of his life, and that he may serue his God and his king trulie, and submit himselfe, and all that he hath to his maiesties good will: he hath done nothing yet, but it may be amended. I saie no more, the Lord giue him his spirit to follow that which is best.

Eleuenthlie being required to declare what was the summe of that admonition, which John Knokes gaue him before he accepted the regiment, when he came vnto him a little before his departure, he answered: I shall tell you as far as I can remember. First, he asked of me if I knew anie thing of the kings murder, I answered in deed I knew nothing of it. Then he said vnto me, Well God hath beautified you with manie benefits which he hath not giuen to euerie man, for he hath giuen to you riches, wisedome and friends, and now he is to prefer you to the gouernement of this realme: and therefore in the name of God I charge you, to vse these benefits aright, and better in time to come than you haue done in times past; first to Gods glorie, to the furtherance of the gospell, to the mainteinance of the church of God & of his ministers, next for the weale of the king, his realme and true subiects: which if you shall not dw, God shall spoile you of these benefits, and your end shall be ignominie & shame. Then being inquired if he said true or no, he answered: I haue found it true, and yet I doubt not but the Lord will be mercifull vnto me.

Twelfelie, being demanded for what cause he held some of the neighbours of Edenburgh in ward, he answered: Surelie I meant no euill to those men, but it was done in this respect: we had the matter of Bulzoine then in hand, and I was informed that they were hinderers therof, for which cause I thought it best at that time to put them in ward for a while vntill the turne had béene done. And if I did them anie wrong, I craue forgiuenesse of them as I forgiue all men.

Thirtænthlie, being required to declare if hée knew before hand that he should be accused of this matter or no, he answered: I was aduertised in déed, and might haue escaped, but I would not, trusting alwaie vnto mine innocencie, and therefore supposed that they would not condemne me vpon such a thing. After this, the said earle with the foresaid John Durie and Walter Balcanquall did together call to God by earnest praier, which being ended the earle said vnto vs (meaning the said Durie and Balcanquall who as I gather were the penners of this matter) I thanke you hartilie for your comfort which you haue offered to me, for now in déed is greatest need of comfort, and therefore as you haue begun, I praie you to continue with me: for now that I am come to the knowledge of mine owne sinnes, there resteth onlie two things which I craue of you, that is first that you will shew vnto me some kind of argument, whereby I maie be comforted against naturall death, because the flesh is fearefull and weake; whose desire we trauelled to satisfie by long conference, which is too long to rehearse in euerie point, yet the summe of that was thus. It was said vnto him that there were thrée things chéefelie which might make him assured of the mercie of God in Christ: first the innumerable and comfortable promises of God conteined in his word, wherevnto it behoued him alwaies to leane. Secondlie the example of Gods mercie practised towards his owne seruants, albeit they haue bene great sinners; as appeared in Dauid, Magdalen, Peter, and the theefe, &c. Thirdlie the often experiences of Gods mercies from time to time, which he had found in his owne person, being a light to assure him of his mercie. In the end he answered to this, saieng: I know it to be true, for since I past to Dunbarton I haue read the fiue bookes of Moses, Iosue, the Iudges, and now I am in Samuell, and will tell you what I haue found there. I see that the mercie of God is wonderfull, and alwaies inclined to haue pittie vpon his owne people: for there it appeareth that although he punished them so oft as they sinned, yet as soone as they turned againe to him, he was mercifull vnto them, and when they sinned againe he punished them, and as often as they repented he was mercifull againe, and therefore I am assured, that albeit that I haue offended against my God, yet he will be mercifull vnto me. Also further in this point it was said vnto him, that in case Sathan should trauell to discourage him in consideration of the iustice of God on the one part, and of his sinnes on the other part, we exhorted him to the contrarie, to be of good courage, and that in respect of the verie selfe same iustice of God, which will not suffer him twise to take paiment for one thing, as we know in the common dealing of men: for he that is a iust man will not twise demand paiment of that whereof he was alredie paid, for sith Christ died for our sinnes, and paid the vttermost farthing that God could craue, he cannot laie our sinnes vnto our charge being satisfied in Christ, because his iustice will not suffer him twise to take paiment for one thing. Vnto this the earle answered, Truelie it is verie good.

And concerning the naturall feare of death, we exhorted him to be alwaies exercised in the consideration of the glorie, ioie, and felicitie of the life to come, which would be the onlie waie to swallow vp the feare of this naturall death. Wherevnto he answered, I praise God I do so. This being thus done, and he hauing in his hand a prettie treatise of the meditation of death, written by Bradford (which he said that he had gotten from the ladie Drmeston before he went into ward, and for that cause before he came forth of prison againe gaue it to maister Lawson, desiring him to deliuer it to the said ladie againe) he willed maister Walter to read him a peece thereof, which he did, in which reading (hauing sundrie conferences vpon the thing read) both he and we found great comfort, in so much that he said; I protest now that I heare with other eares than I did before. Wherewith being called to breakefast, he earnestlie desired vs to take part with him (as we did) at what time he eat his meat with great cheerefulnesse, as all the companie saw, and as appeared by these his words: I see there is great difference (said he) betweene a man which is troubled with the cares of the world, and him which is free from them, the which I haue found by these two former nights: for before mine accusation, I could not in things find anie rest by reason of cares which I had, because I was to be accused vpon the morrow; and therefore being carefull to answer euerie point that should be laid vnto my charge I could not sleepe: but this night, after that I was condemned, and knew that I should die, I was at a point with my selfe, and had nothing of this world, nor care of this life, but cast my onelie care vpon God, and I praise God I neuer slept better in my life than I did this night. Then he said vnto the steward, William you can beare me record of this; who answered, It is true my lord. Then maister Walter said vnto him, My lord I will drinke to you vpon a condition, vpon this condition my lord, that you and I shall drinke together in the kingdome of heauen, of that immortall drinke which shall neuer suffer vs to thirst againe. Wherevnto the earle answered, Truelie I will pledge you maister Walter on the same condition. After which he said, John Durie, now John I will drinke to you vpon the same condition. This thus ended for that time, and thanks being giuen to God, the earle passed againe to his chamber, at what time maister James Lawson came to him, with whom he considered the substance of all other things againe. After this we departed from him.

Then at afternoone we came to him againe, with sundrie of the brethren of the ministerie, as maister Iames Lawson, maister Robert Pont, Dauid Fargasone, maister Dauid Hensa, John Brand, maister James Carmichell, and maister John Dauison, whom the earle receiued verie louinglie in his arms, and said to him; Maister John you wrote a little booke indeed, but truelie I meant neuer euill towards you in my mind, forgiue me, and I forgiue you: vpon which words maister John was moued with teares. Then all the brethren being present, the earle reported againe the cheefe substance of all the things whereof before he spake, being demanded thereof point by point, as their testification of this matter subscribed by them at more length will declare. After which the earle was called to his dinner about two of the clocke in the after none, who being thus at his dinner, the brethren of the ministerie were informed that there was iniust report made of his profession to the king, & that he should haue confessed much otherwise than he did, whereby the king might haue a worse opinion of him. Wherefore they thought good to send down some before his suffering to informe his maiestie of the truth of his confession: which persons so sent were Dauid Fargasone, John Durie, and John Brand, who before his death did largelie tell the simple truth of his confession (as it was made) vnto the kings maiestie. At their returning the earls keeper required him that he would come forth to the scaffold, wherevnto the earle answered; Sith they haue thus troubled me ouermuch this daie with worldlie things, I supposed that they should haue giuen me one nights leisure to haue aduised my selfe with my God. Then the keeper said, All things are redie now my lord, and I thinke they will not staie. The earle replied, I am redie also I praise God: and so comfortable prater being made, the earle passed downe to the gate, minding to go directlie to the scaffold; but the earle of Arrane staied him, brought him backe againe to the chamber, and willed him to staie vntill his confession should be put in writing & subscribed with his owne hand. Wherevnto the ministers which were present answered, and the earle also answered: Naie my lord, I praie you trouble me no more with these things, for now I haue another thing to muse vpon, which is to prepare me for my God. And sith I am at a point to go to my death, I can not write in the estate wherein I now am; and all these honest men can testifie what I haue spoken in that matter. With which answer the earle of Arrane being satisfied, he said to him, My lord you will be reconciled with me, for I haue done nothing vpon anie particular quarell against you. The earle of Morton replied, It is no time now to remember quarels, I haue no quarell to you nor to anie other, I forgiue you and all others as I would you forgaue me. And so after with a good courage he passed to the scaffold, who being vpon the scaffold, repeated in few words the substance of the things before confessed, &c: adding some exhortation to the people which he spake not before, in this sort.

Surs

Sure I am the king ſhall loſe a good ſeruant this daie, and ſo he exhorted the people, ſaieng: I teſtifie before God, that as I profeſſe the goſpell which this daie is taught & profeſſed in Scotland: ſo alſo now I willinglie laie downe my life in the perſecution thereof. And albeit I haue not walked according thereunto as I ought, yet I am aſſured that God will be merciſull vnto me; and I charge you all in God which are profeſſors of the goſpell, that you continue the true profeſſing and maintaining thereof to your power, as I would haue done God willing with my life, lands, and goods as long as I had liued: which if you do, I aſſure you God ſhall be merciſull vnto you; but if you do it not, be ſure the vengeance of God ſhall fall vpon you, both in bodie and ſoule. As concerning all the reſt of the words which he had vpon the ſcaffold, he ſpake them in effect and more amplie before. When all theſe ſpeaches were ended vpon the ſcaffold, a comfortable praier was made by maiſter Iohn Lawſon, during the time of which praier, the erle Morton laie grouelling vpon his face before the place of execution, his bodie making great reboundings with ſighes and ſobs, being euident ſignes of the inward and mightie working of the ſpirit of God, as all they which were preſent, and knew what it was to be earneſtlie moued in praier, might eaſilie perceiue.

The praier being ended, and ſundrie comming to him before his death, he did moſt louinglie receiue them; who after he had taken vs all by the hand that were about him, & bidden vs farewell in the Lord, he paſſed both conſtantlie, patientlie, and humblie (without feare of death) to the place of execution, and laid his necke vnder the axe being vnbound. And there maiſter Walter putting him alwaies in mind to call vpon God; the earle continuallie cried vntill his head was ſtriken off, Lord Ieſus receiue my ſpirit, Lord Ieſus receiue my ſpirit: which words he ſpake euen while the axe fell on his necke. Now what ſoeuer he had béene before, he conſtantlie died the ſeruant of God. And howſoeuer it be that his foes alleged, that as he liued proudlie, ſo he died proudlie; the charitable ſeruants of God could perceiue nothing in him but all kind of humilitie in his death: inſomuch that we are aſſured, that his ſoule is receiued into the ioies and glories of the heauens; and we praie God, that they which are behind, may learne by his example to die in the true feare of God our Lord. ¶ Thus far the confeſſion & death of the earle Morton, penned by ſuch of the preſbyterie as were preſent thereat, and fauored him in all reſpects, ſeeking to cléere him of ante euill impoſed againſt him. In ſetting downe whereof, I haue not varied from the verie words of my copie in manner of penning it; but onelie in ſome few places of ſome part of the matter, the which I haue purpoſelie omitted, becauſe it conteined the affaires of ſtate, and the accuſation of diuerſe perſons now liuing; both which are neither néedfull to be knowne to the common people, nor méete to be opened to others, thereby to bring thoſe in queſtion vpon a report, whereof there is no further hold to be had, than there was hate or loue betweéne the accuſer & the accuſed. Wherefore leauing the ſame diſcourſe of the death of the earle (which fell vpon the ſecond daie of June in the towne of Edenburgh) in that ſort, penned by thoſe of the preſbyterie, to ſtand vpon the ſupport of it ſelfe, I will deſcend to other matters.

The time when earle Morton was beheadded.

This earle Morton maried the old earle of Mortons youngeſt daughter, who being halfe an idiot brought forth no iſſue to this earle: but he notwithſtanding, leaſt he ſhould die iſſuleſſe, left behind him two ſonnes, vnlawfullie begotten. Shortlie after the death of which erle, Thomas Randolph eſquier being ſent ambaſſador from the quéene of England, entered into Scotland, whom (being honorablie interteined) I will leaue there to diſpatch the effect of his commiſſion, and fall to that which happened. After the death of this earle Morton, in the winter following there was a parlement called, at what time manie noble men were created, as Ruthwen was made earle of Gowrie, Robert Steward baſe brother to Marie the impriſoned quæne of Scots was aduanced to the honor and title of the earldome of Orkeneie, the lord Marwell was made erle Morton, and Iames Steward was created earle of Arrane, the manner of obteining which earldome of Arrane by the ſaid Steward being extraordinarilie procured, ſeemeth to me not to be forgotten: and therefore I will ſet it downe as I haue had intelligence thereof, in this ſort following. The old earle of Arrane (the duke of Chateleraults eldeſt ſonne and brother to Iohn Hamilton the lord of Arbroth) being lunatike, and firſt committed to the cuſtodie of his ſaid brother the lord of Arbroth, was after taken from that his tutor, and ſet ouer to Iames Steward to haue the ouerſight of his perſon, and the ordering of his liuing. Which Iames Steward being by nature and experience ſubtill witted, and by authoritie and the kings fauor in great credit; found meanes partlie by policie, partlie by perſuaſion, and partlie by flatterie, to wring from the lunatike earle of Arrane, a grant and departure of all his right, title, and honor, to the lands and earledome of Arrane. Which when he had obteined of the ſaid lunatike earle (who knew not what he did) he forthwith came to the ſaid parlement or councell houſe, or place of the aſſemblie of the nobilitie, bringing with him the grant of the earle of Arrane: whereby he had infeffed this Steward with the lands and countrie of Arrane. Which matter being fullie vnderſtood there by the nobilitie, ſuppoſing vpright dealing to haue furthered the purchaſe of this earldome by Steward, did then by the decree and the kings conſent, eſtabliſh, and alſo inueſt him in the lands, and with the title of the earledome of Arrane; which he obteined by ſuch meanes as are before touched. Not vnlike vnto the courſe which Mordacke (made gouernor of Scotland, in the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand foure hundred and ſix) ſometime vſed for the obteining of the earldome of Roſſe, from the daughter and heire of Alexander Leſle, intituled to the ſame earldome: the maner whereof I will here ſet downe Verbatim, taken out of Leſleus hiſtorie of Scotland, which deliuered the ſame in theſe words.

Thomas Randulph ſent ambaſſador into Scotland.

James Steward created earle of Arrane.

Breui poſt tempore Donaldus inſularis Roſſiæ comitatum vendicans, Hebridianos ad ſuas partes allicit: quo autem iure id fecerit hinc facilimè liquebit. Walterus Leſleus vir nobiliſſimus, poſt inſignem operam Romanis imperatoribus in extremo bello nauatam, in Scotiam rediens, filiam Gulielmi comitis Roſſenſis (in prælia apud Holidonum occubuit) vna cum comitatu, dotis loco in coniugem accepit: ex qua vnum filium ſuſtulit, Alexandrum inde comitem Roſſenſem, filiámque, quæ poſtea Donaldo Hebridiano nuptui data eſt. Alexander hic, filia Roberti gubernatoris in vxorem accepta, Euphemiam ſolam ſuſcepit. Quæ adhuc virgo & rerum imperita, gubernatoris partim blanditijs, partim minis inducta, tranſlato in ipſum comitatu Roſſenſi, ſubitò non ſine gubernatoris opera (vt ferebatur) moritur: ac Donaldus qui amitam Euphemiæ Alexandri Leſlei ſororem vxorē habebat, hæreditario iure Roſſiæ comitatum petens, collecta ex Hebridibus ingenti manu in Roſſiam venit: quam paruo negotio in ditionem ſuam redegit, Roſſianis verum recipere hæredē non recuſantibus. Thus much Leſle. Moreouer at the same parlement wherein this James Steward was aduanced to the earledome of Arrane, the king gaue vnto the duke of Leneur the lands that were belonging to the foresaid beheaded erle of Morton, which lands this duke not long reteining, made ouer his part to the earle of Angus, in recompense whereof, the duke obteined of the king the lordship of Methuen, which came to the kings possession by the death of Henrie Steward lord of Methuen, touching whom Buchanan composed these verses following, calling him Regulum Methueniæ, in this sort:

The duke of Leneux obteineth the earle Mortons lands.

Hîc Henrice iaces primæuo in flore, dederunt
Indole cui nullum sæcula nostra parem.
Nemo fuit spes iudicijs cui credula certis,
Sponderet tantum Marte togáque decus.
Nunc pro spe, votis, expectatisque triumphis,
Cura, dolor, lachrymæ, mestitiésque subit:
At tu, mors annis quantum detraxit acerba,
Adijce de gazis posthuma fama tuis.

During these creations of the nobilitie, in a parlement holden in Edenburgh the eight and twentith of Januarie, in this yere one thousand fiue hundred fourescore and one, being the foureténth of the kings reigne, were matters established, touching the ecclesiasticall gouernement, whereof I meane not fullie to set downe the same, sith my pen and purpose is bent to treat of politicall and not spirituall causes. Wherefore onelie determining but slenderlie, and by the waie to touch that matter, set forth in print at Cambridge, vnder the stampe of Thomas Thomas, printer for that vniuersitie, in this yere of Christ one thousand fiue hundred foure score and six, we saie that the same booke, published by the Scots (and intituled, A generall confession of the true christian faith and religion, according to Gods word and our acts of parlement subscribed by the kings maiestie and his household, with diuers others, &c.) hath further, after the preface thereof this title giuen vnto it. The estates of Scotland with the inhabitants of the same, professing Christ Jesus & his holie gospell, to their naturall countriemen and to all other realms and nations, professing the same Jesus Christ with them, wish grace, mercie, and peace from God the father of our Lord Jesus Christ, with the spirit of righteous iudgement of saluation.

A declaration of the Scotish faith, published and confirmed by the king.

After which title and salutation, the substance of the same booke, being declared in the forhead of the chapters following, conteineth these heads: First of God, then of the creation of man, next of originall sinne, fourthlie of the reuelation of the promise of the continuance, increase, and preseruation of the church, of the incarnation of Christ Jesus, why it becommeth the mediator to be verie God and man, of election, of Christes death, passion, and burtall, of his resurrection, of his ascension, of faith in the Holie-ghost, of the cause of good workes, what workes are reputed good before God, of the perfection of the law and the imperfection of man, of the church, of the immortalitie of soules, of the notes by which the true church is discerned from the false, and who shall be iudge of the doctrine, of the authoritie of the scriptures, of generall councels, of their power, authoritie and cause of their conuention, of the sacraments, of the right administration of the sacraments, to whom sacraments apperteine, and of the ciuill magistrat, of the gifts freelie giuen to the church.

The discourse of all which matters, being in that booke largelie and iudiciallie handled, both for the declaration of the faith of those people, and for the further instruction of others, were shortlie after the agreement thereunto in that parlement confirmed by the king, and commanded to be published and vsed through his realme, as appeareth by this his following precept, concerning the same.

The kings maiesties charge to all commissioners and ministers, within his realme.

SEeing that we and our household haue subscribed & giuen this publike confession of our faith, to the good example of our subiects, we command and charge all commissioners and ministers to craue the same confession of their parishioners, and to proceed against the refusers according to our lawes, and order of the church: deliuering their names and lawfull processe to the ministers of our house, with all hast and diligence, vnder the paine of fortie pounds to be taken from their stipend: that we with the aduise of our councell, maie take order with such proud contemners of God, and our lawes. Subscribed with our hand at Holierod house one thousand fiue hundred foure score and one, the second daie of March, the fourtéenth yere of our reigne.

Religion thus setled in Scotland, it fell herupon, 1582 that Amies duke of Leneux, to which honor he was not long before aduanced, as is alreadie set downe in the yeare of Christ one thousand fiue hundred threescore and ninetéene, was now in this yeare vpon displeasure, conceiued against him by others of the nobilitie, banished Scotland, & inforced to returne into France, there to passe the rest of his life as he had done before. In whose exile was performed an old prophesie, which I haue heard, that a nag of fiue shillings should beare all the dukes of England and Scotland. For when this duke was out of the Scotish kingdome, there was neither duke in that countrie, or England. But as I greatlie fauor not these things, so yet finding manie of them to sort to vnhappie successe; I cannot altogither condemne them, especiallie, sith I find two other which concerning the last duke of England, being the duke of Summerset, did prognosticat both the aduancement of religion by him, and that he should not long kéepe his head vpon his shoulders, after that he began to make his statelie buildings. Of which prophetical verses, declaring the same, the first verse expressing his name, was as followeth:

The duke of Leneux banished.

A digression touching the duke of Summerset.

[a] Cessabit missa cùm regnat equa marina.

[a] The mare of the sea, which backeward is seamare.

The other prophesie mentioning his name of honor was in this sort, as also the time of his fall:

[b] Ætatis sedes cùm scandis ad alta per ædes,
Pro certo credes quòd caput perdere debes.

[b] Summers seat, or Summerset.

And to proue that Summerset was manie yeares past called in Latine Aestatis sedes, I find this matter in Roger Wall sometime an herald liuing in the time of Henrie the fift, who named him accordinglie, when the said author excusing himselfe of all eloquence, and complaining of his owne rudenesse, sent his booke to D. John Summerset to correct; which doctor being the kings schoolemaister and physician, a great learned man well séene in the mathematikes, one that had written much therein, and verie eloquent also, was as this Roger Wall thought, most méete to haue the ouersight of his workes: which matter, as it is set downe in the latter end of the same worke of the acts of Henrie the fift, written by this Roger Wall, I shall not gréeue (although they belong not, and be vtterlie impertinent to the matters of Scotland) to set downe, both because I would not maime the author in telling his owne tale, and would a little recreat the reader by the obscuritie of the stile of Roger Wall, with some varie-

Thus hauing expreſſed the words and verſes of Roger Wall, which in Latine termed ſome hundred yeares paſſed (as you haue heard before) the name of Summerſet by the words of Aeſtatis ſedes, I haue truſte béene the willinger to ſet downe the ſame by waie of digreſſion (beſides the former declared cauſes which moued me thereto) for that I would not ſuffer ſo worthie a man as that John Summerſet was to be buried in oblition. And for that I would in ſome part (as ante occaſion may ſerue therefore) make this worke of Roger Wall more common to the world, being onelie now in the hands of one painefull antiquarie. Wherefore in that ſort, leauing our Engliſhmen, let vs returne to the affaires of Scots and Scotland: intreating firſt of ſome thing done by them in the low countries, where one Steward a Scot, hauing had charge of men in ſome part of the low countries of Flanders, Zeland, and Holland, vnder William of Naſſaw, earle of Aurange, did now fall from the ſtates of that countrie, emploie all his force on the king of Spaines ſide, and went to aſſiſt the prince of Parma (the deputie of king Philip in thoſe parts) becauſe the ſtates did not paie to him and his ſoldiors their due ſtipend and wages for the wars. At what time alſo the garriſon of Burels were for the like cauſe in an vprore. But ſome portion of monie being offered vntō them, they were for that time ſomewhat pacified. All which notwithſtanding, one certeine Scot, called Lichfield, ſurnamed Semple, being capteine of the garriſon of Lire, and long vnpaid vnpaied his sallarie, for those warres did in vaine manie times demand that monie due vnto him. Wherevpon, imagining with himselfe how he might deceiue Hietfield the gouernour of the citie, as they had beguiled him in deteining of his due, he deuised with a new stratagem to bring this towne into the subiection of Philip king of Spaine. Wherefore, feining himselfe that he would in the middest of the night with his people go forth to bring home some great bootie for his and the townes benefit, he departed the towne, & late in the night gathered togither a great preie of catell, horsses, oxen, kine, sheepe, and such like, with some prisoners of the kings part. All which he brought to the towne gate of Lire, and then commanded the gates to be opened vnto him, whereby they with their bootie might enter all at once. But the porter fearing at such time of night to set the gates full abroad, onelie opened a little wicket or doore, thereby to receiue Semple into the towne. Which thing Semple then perceiuing (& not finding all things to answer his expectation) feined that the enimies were hard at their backs, would kill them all, and recouer their bootie, vnlesse he did spedilie open the great gate, through the same to receiue them into the towne all at once. Then the porter beléeuing all this to be true, forthwith set open the great gates of the citie; which done, the Scot entereth therat, slue those which kept the watch, possessed the towne, & into the same receiued the kings souldiors, which were not farre behind, but secretlie laie in wait expecting the successe of this deuise. By which meanes the Spaniards and their followers first woone the market place, and the nert daie after the calends of August reduced the whole towne of Lire vnder their owne subiection: the same Lire being a place well fensed, and set in such a conuenient soile, that it would prohibit all passage and carriage to come to Antwerpe, Mecheline and Brusels.

Ambassador frõ the French into Scotlãd.

After this, much about the beginning of September, monsieur de la Mot was sent from Henrie the third the French king ambassador into Scotland, the outward effect of whose commission was to renew and conclude the old league of amitie betwixt those two nations, as it had béene long continued betwéene them in times past, which done, he returned, well accepted by his French master. After which in like sort the king of Scots sent the lord Seton ambassador into France to the same king Henrie, which lord came to Paris in the beginning of March, and there remained about six wéekes or more before he could find conuenient passage for him to returne into his countrie, because there was wait laid (as was supposed) to the end that he might haue béene intercepted by some of his enimies, before he should haue atteined the presence of the king his maister.

Ambassador from the Scot to the French.

But now as a litle before I haue set downe the exploits done by the Scots in the low countries out of their owne nation, so I thinke it not amisse to adde to the same somewhat done by a Scot heere in England, the summe whereof is after this manner. One William Creicton a Scot by birth, and a Iesuit by profession, which name of Creicton first came into Scotland, in the yeare of Christ one thousand three score and six out of Hungarie amongst others with Agatha, the mother of Maud the wife to Malcolme king of Scots, hauing trauelled the most part of Europe, had conference with one William Parrie an Englishman, by waie of discourse and argument touching such matter of treason as concerned the death of the quéene of England. After which (Parrie being returned into England in Januarie following) this Creicton also, not tarrieng long behind him, did come from the parts of beyond the seas to take his iornie towards Scotland, who determining to passe through England, arriued here, was apprehended, & committed prisoner to the Tower of London, in such sort as before yon haue heard that John Lesle bishop of Rosse was staied by the duke of Bauier vpon suspicion, that the same bishop had dealt with the enimies of that prince against the state of his countrie. The cause wherefore the said Creicton was so committed, was for that he had about him diuerse plots for inuasions of this our realme of England. When he was thus prisoner in the Tower, William Parrie was after for the same treason apprehended, examined, committed also to the Tower, and finallie executed on the second daie of March in the yere of our Lord one thousand fiue hundred foure score and foure. In the Februarie before which execution, sir Francis Walsingham knight, principall secretarie to hir maiestie of England, came to the Tower, examined the said Creicton and dealt with him, to vnderstand if the said Parrie had euer had conference with him in the parts beyond the seas touching that question, whether it were lawfull to kill hir maiestie of England or not, the which at that time the said Creicton called not to his remembrance; yet afterwards vpon better consideration thereof it fell into his mind, where, when, & on what occasion such spéech had passed betwéene the said Parrie and him. Wherevpon the twentith daie of Februarie, in the yeare of Christ one thousand fiue hundred foure score and foure, during the time that Parrie also was a prisoner in the Tower, this Creicton wrote to maister secretarie Walsingham a voluntarie letter penned all with his owne hand, which being alreadie set downe in the historie of England is needlesse here to be repeated. Wherefore hauing thus said somewhat of this prisoner, we will leaue him still remaining in the same state, expecting some folowing successe of libertie to come to him, and returne our pen to the countrie of Scotland, thereof to set downe such occurrents as happened from this time.

Creicton a Scot committed to prison in England.

A contention betwéene the earle Morton and the lard Johnstane.

In March was renewed a great & old contention betwéene the lord Marwell earle Morton warden of the west marches of Scotland, and the lard of Johnstane; the occasion of which new dissention proceeded of an old enimitie begun in the time of Dowglasse earle Morton beheaded, as before in the yeare of Christ one thousand fiue hundred eightie and one, touching the receiuing of the same wardenship. In which hurlie burlie the lard of Johnstane behaued himselfe verie rigorouslie against the lord Marwell, in blowing vp with gunpouder the lockes of the castell of Lochmaben. Which dissention secretlie after the death of Dowglasse earle Morton, continuing betwéene the lord Marwell and Johnstane, with further increase of malice, they in this yeare sought a fresh reuenge thereof, sith the lord Johnstane had not (before this) either power or meanes to incounter with the lord Marwell. But now the ladie Johnstane (being verie familiar and fauored with and of James Steward earle of Arrane) obteined of the king some succors of men of warre against the lord Marwell earle Morton, hir husband (as was supposed) not being able otherwise to make his part good against the same earle. Wherevpon capteine Lamie and capteine Granestane were sent with two companies of hackbuts vnto the relefe of the lard of Johnstane. Who being thus furnished, did in the kings name raise the nobilitie and countrie thereabouts to assist him with their power: which being had, he meant and therefore went to haue ioined with the said two capteins Lamie and Granestane. But as man purposeth, and God disposeth

Ladie Johnstane hath aid of the king.

quite contrarie to our determination. So the lard Johnſtane was diſappointed of that meeting; for the earle Morton (whoſe heedfull watch was not idle in learning out the deuiſes of his enimies, a needfull policie for all ſuch as intend to bring great actions to effect) hauing intelligence by ſome of his friends tendering his ſafetie, of this determination and preparation of the lard Johnſtane, and wiſelie (as behoued him) ſeeing what danger might riſe vnto him, if their two forces met, which would riſe to a greater number than he were able to incounter, and iudging it beſt in the beginning to prouide for miſchiefe, and to ſtop their paſſage, did prepare to preuent all their deuiſes, and for that cauſe ſent his baſe brother Robert Marwell capteine of Langholme with ſome horſemen and footmen vnder the conduct of James Fraiſer brother to the lord of Fulloth, which Robert meeting on Craiford mere with the foreſaid capteins Lamie and Craneſtane, before that they had ioined with the lard Johnſtane gaue the charge vpon them, and that ſo fiercelie as they ouerthrew the whole ſtrength of his enimies, ſlue Lamie, tooke Craneſtane priſoner, and ſo handled the matter that all the reſt were taken or ſlaine except ſome few, who ſought their liues by the benefit of flieng. After which victorie the report thereof came to the lard Johnſtane, who deſirous to be reuenged thereof, vſed the helpe of other meanes when he perceiued that force would not preuaile. And for that cauſe aſſembling ſuch power as he had, he vſed the ſtrength of one element againſt an other, of the higheſt againſt the loweſt, of the heauen againſt the earth, of the fire againſt mettall, and of burning againſt fighting. For with all ſpeed he haſtened to the lands of the earle Morton, which he cruellie ſpoiled, and in the ſame did burne certeine houſes and other places belonging to the earle, as Comers trees, Duncoll, Cowhill, and ſuch like. Wherevpon the earle Morton, who in like ſort did not neglect his owne cauſe, but as opportunitie ſerued, ſought the requitall thereof, did with the like furie, but with more hurt, enter the lands of Johnſtane, vtterlie ſpoiled them, and yet not ſo ſatisfied, committed to the fire both the caſtels of Louchhouſe and Louchwood belonging to Johnſtane, and ſlue ſundrie gentlemen of name, the friends to Johnſtane, being perſons of good ſort, as the two brothers of Lokierbie, a brother of the lord Wlaneſtrate, ſome of the ſons of John of Johnſtane of Holgill, with others. Which done, the earle Morton procéeded vnto further purſute, and determining fullie to reuenge himſelfe vpon Johnſtane, and his followers, forced the lard Johnſtane himſelfe to flie his furie. Wherefore he fled to a ſtrong houſe called the Bonſhaw caſtell belonging to Edward Irwine of the Bonſhaw, whome the earle purſued, and beſieged in the ſame place, at what time he ſo battered the caſtell with artillerie, that the houſe was almoſt gotten. Which being perceiued of thoſe within, not able to make further reſiſtance, they fell to parlée, and ſo to compoſition; whereby in the end the matter was wholie compounded and ended betweéne them, by the mediation and furtherance of the lord Scrope of England, with certeine conditions to be performed as well on the part of the earle as of the lard Johnſtane. But the coles of inward griefe being couered with cold aſhes of outward reconciliation, did not long lie couered, but in the end began afreſh to ſhew their fire. For the lard Johnſtane falling from the ſaid accord, vpon what occaſion I know not, either for cauſe giuen by the earle Morton, or for an euill diſpoſition in himſelfe, or for both, they burſt forth againe into the like conflicts & part taking, which in the end falling to the worſt,

Robert Marwell baſe brother to earle Morton ſent againſt capteine Lamie.

Capteine Lamie & Craneſtane ouerthrowen.

The caſtels Louchhouſe and Louchwood burnt.

The lard Johnſtane forced to flie.

The lord Scrope compounded the contention betweéne earle Morton and the lard Johnſtane.

for the lard Johnſtane, he was taken betweén Cinwall and the Warden ditches (where he was laid in ambuſh to haue performed ſome action againſt the ſaid Robert Marwell comming from the towne of Domfreies to Laugham from the earle Morton his brother) by William Carrutheris (baron of Holmence and capteine of the kings caſtell named Traife) being by the earle Morton appointed to incounter with the ſaid lard Johnſtane: which this baron was the more willing to dw, becauſe he intirelie loued the earle, and had alwaies from the beginning followed the earles faction.

The lard Johnſtane taken.

These things thus performed and the ſucceſſe thereof comming to the kings knowledge, he grew ſo beaulie diſpleaſed with the earle Morton, that he was ſcarſe able to ſuſteine the kings diſpleaſure, by reaſon that the earle attempted theſe things againſt the kings mind, when the king had ſupported the lard Johnſtane with men and weapons. But the kings diſpleaſure onlie growing againſt the earle, was partlie for that the earle of Arrane did bitterlie exaſperat the cauſe againſt him, and partlie by the perſuaſion & lamentation of the ladie of Johnſtane, whereof the laſt was enimie to the earle, as of dutie ſhe ought in reſpect of hir huſband, and the firſt (which was the earle of Arrane) became a bitter and heauie enimie beſides all reaſon againſt earle Morton, becauſe that Morton refuſed to exchange the baronies of Poke and Marwell Hewch with Arrane, which moſt inſtantlie required the ſame, in reſpect they adioined nere vnto other lands which Arrane had procured to himſelfe. For although that Arrane would in place of thoſe required lands haue deliuered others of no leſſe value and honor (for he would haue giuen the baronie of Kinneile for the ſame) yet Morton had good cauſe and no leſſe reaſon not to yeld therevnto: as well for that Marwell Hewch was his ancient inheritance, and the firſt land which his anceſtors had, and whereof they tooke the name of lord Marwell; as for that, that there were manie of the ſurname of the Marwels, who dwelling vpon theſe lands, would not become ſubiect to the earle of Arrane, as they muſt haue beene if he had departed with thoſe lands; amongſt which Marwels ſo refuſing to become tenants to Arrane, were John Marwell lard of Newarke, and William Marwell lard of Poke.

The king diſpleaſed with earle Morton for the cauſe of the lard Johnſtane.

The earle of Arrane would exchange lands with the earle Morton.

The Marwels would not be ſubiect to the earle of Arrane.

This thus handled, the king aſſembled a parlement in Paie, wherein were certeine lawes enacted, which giuing occaſion to ſome of the nobilitie and clergie to miſconceiue thereof, and to depart the realme, did after miniſter cauſe to the king (for the more diſcharge of his honour, the better explaining of the ſaid lawes, and the manifeſting of ſecret practiſes againſt him) to ſet downe this following declaration thereof to the view of the world. Wherin he ſhewed himſelfe of a rare and good diſpoſition, in that he would humble himſelfe beneath the maieſtie of his crowne, publikelie to render a reaſon to his neighbours and to his ſubiects of his dealings, towards ſuch as were vnder his gouernment, ſith he was not bound therevnto, being to diſpoſe of thoſe his ſubiects according to the lawes of his realme and the cuſtomes of thoſe countries. But before I ſet downe that declaration, I thinke it not vnmeet to ſaie ſomewhat of ſuch things as went before, and were the cauſe of ſetting forth of the ſame declaration. There were ſome lawes in the ſame parlement enacted for the reformation of religion, which to the king ſeemed to be growne ouer dangerous, in ſéeking a certeine equalitie of gouernment in the eccleſiaſticall hierarchie. Vpon which law eſtabliſhed, the earles of Angus and Mar, with diuers others of the temporaltie and the ſpiritualtie, as Andrew Melvine, and such as professed the purer and reformed religion (as it was termed) were inforced for the vse of their conscience and for other causes, to banish themselues from their countrie, and to flie into England there to vse the libertie of their religion, and to prouide for the safetie of their persons, who comming into this realme, made their abode and sojourned at Norwich. About which time also of their departure out of Scotland, there was a supposed treason discouered by Robert Hamilton vnto the king, intended to be practised against his maiestie, whereupon some were summoned vpon suspicion, some were apprehended, and some were executed for the same cause. Of the first sort, the lord Blakater and George Dowglasse were summoned to the court vpon suspicion that they were consenting and conceling to and of the same treasons. For the second part touching the same, the lord of Donwhasell, the lord of Dunkreth, the lord of Waithkit, Robert Hamilton of Inchmachan, and James Sterling, were apprehended at the kings court: besides which John Hoppingell of the Mores was taken at his owne house by the capteine of the kings gard, and the lord Keier with the lord Mains and other gentlemen were taken about Sterling; and lastlie the lord Donwhasell and the lord Mains were executed, with the lord Ruthwine earle of Gowrike, treasuror of Scotland, who was beheaded in Scotland. Which being thus done, the king as is before said made this following declaration vpon the said acts of parlement, in which he sheweth reason and cause why he ought and might both make and execute those laws, with a further explanation also of the same lawes deliuered in that declaration with these words.

The kings maiesties declaration of his acts confirmed in parlement.

FOr as much as there is some euill affected men that goeth about so farre as in them lieth, to inuent lies and tales to slander and impaire the kings maiesties fame and honor, & to raise reports as if his maiestie had declined to papistrie, & that he had made manie acts to abolish the free passage of the gospell, good order and discipline in the church: which brutes are mainteined by rebellious subiects, who would gladlie couer their seditious enterprises vnder pretense of religion (albeit there can be no good religion in such as raise rebellion to disquiet the state of their natiue souereigne, and periuredlie doth stand against the oth, band, & obligation of their faith, whereunto they haue subscribed) therfore that his maiesties faithfull subiects be not abused with such slanderous reports, and his highnesse good affectionat friends in other countries mate vnderstand the verities of his vpright intention, his highnesse hath commanded this breefe declaration of certeine of his maiesties acts of parlement holden in Maie one thousand fiue hundred foure score and foure, to be published and imprinted, to the effect that the indirect practises of such as slander his maiestie and his lawes maie be detected and discouered.

In the first act his maiestie ratifieth and approueth the true profession of the gospell, sincere preaching of the word and administration of the sacraments, presentlie by the goodnesse of God established within this realme, and alloweth of the confession of the faith set downe by act of parlement the first yere of his maiesties reigne. Likewise his highnesse not onlie professeth the same in all sinceritie, but (praised be God) is come to that ripenesse of iudgement by reading and hearing the word of God, that his highnesse is able to conuince and ouerthrow by the doctrine of the prophets and apostles the most learned of the contrarie sect. So that (as Plato affirmeth that common wealth to be counted happie wherein a philosopher reigneth, or he that reigneth is a philosopher) we maie much more esteeme this countrie of Scotland to be fortunate, wherein our king is a diuine, and whose hart is replenished with the knowledge of the heauenlie philosophie: for the comfort not onlie of his good subiects and friends in other countries but of them that professeth the gospell euerie where, he being a king of great wisedome, and by his birth right borne to great possession; but much more his highnesse, vertue, godlinesse and learning, and dailie increase of all heauenlie sciences, doth promise and assure him of the mightie protection of God, and fauour of all them that feare his holie name.

In the second act his maiesties roiall authoritie ouer all estates both spirituall and temporall is confirmed: which act some of malice, and some of ignorance doth traduce, as if his maiestie pretended to be called the head of the church, a name which his maiestie acknowledgeth to be proper and peculiar to the sonne of God the sauiour of the world, who is the head, and bestoweth life spirituall vpon the members of his mysticall bodie, and he hauing receiued the holie spirit in all abundance, maketh euerie one of the faithfull partakers thereof, according to the measure of faith bestowed vpon them, of the which number of the faithfull vnder the head Christ, his maiestie acknowledgeth himselfe to be a member baptised in his name, partaker of the misterie of the crosse and holie communion, and attending with the faithfull for the comming of the Lord and the finall resurrection of Gods elect. And notwithstanding his maiestie surelie vnderstandeth by the scriptures, that he is the chiefe and principall member appointed by the law of God, to see God glorified, vice punished and vertue mainteined within his realme: and the souereigne iudgment of a godlie quietnesse & order in the common wealth, to apperteine to his highnesse care and solicitude. Which power and authoritie of his highnesse, certeine ministers being called before his maiestie for their seditious and factious sermons in stirring vp the people to rebellion against their natiue king (by the instigation of sundrie vnquiet spirits) would in no wise acknowledge but disclaime his maiesties authoritie as an incompetent iudge: and especiallie one called master Andrew Melvin of a salt and fierie humor, vsurping the pulpit of Saundois, without anie lawfull calling, and priuie at that time to certeine conspiracies attempted against his maiestie and crowne, went about in a sermon vpon a sundaie, to inflame the harts of the people by odious comparisons of his maiesties progenitors and councell, albeit the dutie of a faithfull preacher of the gospell be rather to exhort the people to obedience of their natiue king, and not by popular sermons (which hath beene the euersion and decaie of great cities and common wealths, and hath greatlie in times past bred disquietnesse to the state thereby) to trouble and perturbe the countrie. The said master Andrew being called before his highnesse, presumptuouslie answered that he would not be iudged by the king and councell, because he had spoken the same in pulpit, which pulpit in effect he alleged to be exempted from the iudgement and correction of princes, as if that holie place sanctified to the word of God and to the breaking of the bread of life, might be anie colour to anie sedition in word or deed against the lawfull authoritie, without punishment. Alwaies his maiestie (being of himselfe a most gratious prince) was not willing to haue vsed ſed anie rigor againſt the ſaid maiſter Andrew, if he had humblie ſubmitted himſelfe, acknowledged his offenſe, and craued pardon: who notwithſtanding afraid of his owne giltineſſe, being priuie to diuers conſpirators before, fled out of the realme, whoſe naughtie & preſumptuous refuſing of his highneſſe iudgement, was the occaſion of the making of this ſecond act: that is, that none ſhould decline from his highneſſe authoritie, in reſpect that the common prouerbe beareth Ex malis moribus bonæ leges natæ ſunt, which is, that Of euill maners good lawes proceed. And in verie deed it wanteth not anie right intollerable arrogancie in anie ſubiect called before his prince, profeſſing and authoriſing the ſame truth, to diſclaime his authoritie, neither do the prophets, apoſtles, or others (conducted by the ſpirit of God) miniſter the like example: for it is a great error to affirme (as manie do) that princes and magiſtrats haue onlie power to take order in ciuill affaires, and that eccleſiaſticall matters do onelie belong to the miniſterie.

By which meanes the pope of Rome hath exempted himſelfe and his cleargie from all iudgment of princes, and he made himſelfe to be iudge of iudges, and to be iudged of no man: whereas by the contrarie, not onelie by the example of the godlie gouernors, iudges, and kings of the old teſtament; but alſo by the new teſtament, and the whole hiſtorie of the primitiue church, in which the emperors being iudges ouer the biſhops of Rome, depoſed them from their ſeats, appointed iudges to decide and determine cauſes eccleſiaſticall, and challenge innocent men, as Athanaſius from the determination of the councell holden at Tirus, and by infinit good reaſons which ſhall be ſet downe by the grace of God in an other ſeuerall worke, and ſhall be ſufficientlie proued and verified. But this appéereth at this preſent to be an vntimelie and vnprofitable queſtion, which hath no ground vpon their part, but of the prepoſterous imitation of the pretended iuriſdiction of the pope of Rome. For if there were anie queſtion of this land of hereſie, whereby the profound myſteries of the ſcriptures behoued to be ſearched forth, his maieſtie would vſe the ſame remedie (as moſt expedient) which the moſt godlie emperors haue vſed: and his maieſtie following their example would allow the councell of learned paſtors, that by conference of ſcriptures the veritie might be opened, and hereſie repreſſed.

But God be thanked, we haue no ſuch controuerſies in this land, neither hath anie hereſie taken anie déepe rot in the countrie; but that certeine of the miniſterie, ioining themſelues to rebels haue trauelled to diſquiet the ſtate with ſuch queſtions, that the people might imbrace anie ſiniſter opinion of his maieſties vpright proceédings, and factions might be nouriſhed and interteined in the countrie: neither is it his maieſties meaning nor intention in anie ſort, to take awaie the lawfull and ordinarie iudgement in the church, whereby diſcipline and good order might decaie; but rather to preſerue, increaſe, and mainteine the ſame. And as there is in this realme, iuſtices, conſtables, ſhiriffes, prouoſts, bailiffes, and other iudges in temporall matters: ſo his maieſtie alloweth that all things might be done in order, and a godlie quietnes may be preſerued in the whole eſtate; the ſynodall aſſemblies by the biſhops, or commiſſioners, where the place was vſed to be conuenient, twiſe in the yeare, to haue the ordinarie triall of matters belonging to the miniſterie and their eſtate: alwaies reſeruing to his highneſſe, that if they, or anie of them do amiſſe, neglect their dutie, diſquiet the eſtate, or offend in anie ſuch maner and ſort, that they in no waies pretend anie immunitie, priuilege, and exemption, which onelie was inuented by the popes of Rome, to tread vnder foot the ſcepter of princes, and to eſtabliſh an eccleſiaſticall tyrannie within this countrie, vnder pretenſe of new inuented preſbyters, which neither ſhould anſwer to the king nor biſhop vnder his maieſtie: but ſhould haue ſuch infinit iuriſdiction, as neither the law of God nor man can tollerat; which is onelie his maieſties intention to repreſſe, and not to take awaie anie godlie or due order in the church, as hereafter ſhall appeare.

The third act of his maieſties foreſaid parlement diſchargeth all iudgements eccleſiaſticall, and all aſſemblies which are not allowed by his maieſties parlement. Which act ſpeciallie concerneth the remouing and diſcharging of that forme, inuented in this land, called the preſbyterie: wherein a number of miniſters of certeine precincts and bounds, accounting themſelues to be equall, without anie difference, and gathering vnto them certeine gentlemen and others of his maieſties ſubiects, vſurpe the whole eccleſiaſticall iuriſdiction, & altereth the laws at their owne pleaſure, without the knowledge or approbation of the king, or of the eſtate: a forme of doing without example of anie nation, ſubiect to a chriſtian prince. The perill whereof did ſo increaſe, that in caſe it had not bœne repreſſed in due ſeaſon, & forbidden by his maieſties laws, the ſame had troubled the whole countrie: and being tried by his highneſſe to be the ouerthrow of his maieſties eſtate, the decaie of his crowne, and a readie introduction to Anabaptiſtrie, and popular confuſion in all eſtates; his maieſtie hath giuen commandement againſt the ſame. And that the reader may know the danger thereof by manie inconueniences, which thereby inſueth in this land, I will onelie ſet downe one, whereby they may vnderſtand what perill was in the reſt.

The ambaſſador of France, returning home into his countrie, commanded the prouoſts, bailiffes, and conſtable of Edenburgh to make him a banket, that he might be receiued honorablie according to the amitie of ancient times betwéene the two nations. This commandement was giuen on the ſaturdaie by his highneſſe, and the banket appointed to be on the mondaie. A number of the foreſaid pretended preſbyterie vnderſtanding thereof, aſſembled themſelues on the ſundaie in the morning, and preſumptouſlie determined & agréed, that the miniſters of Edenburgh ſhould proclame a faſting vpon the ſame mondaie; where their ſeuerall miniſters one after another made thrée ſeuerall ſermons, and inuectiues againſt the prouoſts, bailiffes, and councell for the time, and the noble men in the countrie; who repared to the banket at his maieſties command. The foreſaid preſbyterie called and perſuaded them, and ſcarſelie by his maieſties authoritie could be withholden from excommunicating the magiſtrats and noble men, for obeieng onelie his highneſſe lawfull command; which the law of all countries called Ius gentium, requires towards ambaſſadors of forren countries. And not onelie in this, but innumerable other things, their commandement was proclamed directlie, vnder the paine of excommunication to the kings maieſtie and his lawes.

Which forme of proceéding ingendered nothing but diſquietneſſe, ſedition, and trouble: as may manifeſtlie appeare, in that the eſpeciall authors of the inuenting, promoting, and aſſiſting of the foreſaid pretended preſbyterie, hath ioined themſelues with his maieſties rebels; and flieng forth of the realme, in reſpect of their guiltineſſe, hath diſcouered what malicious practiſes was deuiſed amongſt them, if God had not in time prouided remedie.

The

The other forme of iudgement, which his maiestie hath discharged, is the generall assemblie of the whole cleargie in the realme: vnder pretense whereof a number of ministers from sundrie presbyteries did assemble, with some gentlemen of the countrie; whereof, some for that time (malcontents of the state) sought that colour as fauorers of the ministerie, by the which they haue practised manie enterprises in the realme: where there was no certeine law in ecclesiasticall affaires, but all depended vpon the said generall conuention, where the laws of the church were alterable after the number of voices, which for the most part succeded vnto the most vnlearned of the multitude.

This generall assemblie amongst other things, did appoint and agrée with his maiesties regents in his minoritie, that the *estate of bishops should be maintened and authorised, as is registred in the bookes of councell, and subscribed by the commissioners for the time. Which order was obserued manie yeares, and bishops by their consents appointed to their dioceese, vntill within this late time, in assemblies holden at Dundée, and Glascow, respecting the foresaid ministers and assemblies, toke vpon them contrarie to their owne handwriting, to discharge the estate, and to declare the same to be vnlawfull in their pretended manner. And there commanded the bishops of the countrie, to demit and leaue their offices and iurisdictions, and that in no wise they should passe to the kings councell or parlement, without commission obteined from their assemblie: that they should confirme nothing in parlement and councell, but according to their acts and iniunctions. And further, they directed their commissioners to the kings maiestie, commanding him and the councell vnder paine of the censures of the church (whereby they vnderstood excommunication) to appoint no bishop in time to come, because they had concluded that estate to be vnlawfull. And notwithstanding, that which they would haue detected in the bishops, they purposed to erect in themselues, desiring that such commissioners as they should send to parlement and councell, might be authorised in place of the estate: wherby it should haue come to passe, that whereas now his maiestie may select the most godlie, learned, wise, and experimented of the ministerie, to be on his maiesties estate, his highnesse should haue beene by that meanes compelled to accept such as the multitude, by an od consent of the most vnlearned, should haue appointed, which could not tend but to the ouerthrow of the realme.

After they had discharged bishops, they agréed to haue superintendents, commissioners, and visitors: but in the end they decerned that there should be no difference amongst the ministers, and imagined that new forme of presbyterie, whereof we haue spoken before. Neither was there anie other apparance that they should haue stated from such dailie alterations in the common-wealth, which could not but continuallie be disquieted, where the law of conscience, which they mainteined by the sword of cursing, was subiect to such mutations, at the arbitrement of a number, whereof the most part had not greatlie tasted of learning. At once the foresaid assemblie was accustomed, not onelie to prescribe the law to the king and estate, but also did at certeine times appoint generall fastings through out the realme; especiallie, when some factioner in the countrie was to moue anie great enterprise. For at the fast, all the ministers were commanded by the assemblie to sing one song, and to crie out vpon the abuses (as they termed it) of the court and estate for the time: whereby is most certeine great alterations to haue insued in this land; while at the good pleasure of God, and his blessing towards his maiestie, the pretense of the last fast was discouered, and his highnesse deliuered from such attempts, whereby his maiestie hath béene iustlie moued to discharge such conuentions, which might import so preiudiciallie to his estate.

But especiallie his maiestie had no small occasion, whereas the same assemblie being met at Edenburgh, did authorise and auow the fact perpetrate at Ruthwen, in the taking of his highnesse most noble person. The which déed notwithstanding, with the aduise of his estates in parlement accounted to be treason, the said assemblie estéeming their iudgement to be the souereigne iudgement of the realme, hath not onlie approued the same, but also ordeined all them to be excommunicate that would not subscribe and allow the same. So the acts of this assemblie, and the lawes of the estate directed, weied in ciuill matter, with the which the assemblie should not haue medled, it behoued his highnesse either to discharge himselfe of the crowne, or the ministerie of the forme of the assemblie, which in déed of it selfe, without the kings maiesties licence & approbation, could not be lawfull, like as generall councels at no time could assemble, without the commandement of the emperor for the time. And our king hath no lesse power within his owne realme than anie of them had in the empire. Yea the bishop of S. Andrewes had not in time of poperie, power to conuent the bishops and clergie out of their owne dioceese, without licence giuen before by his highnes most noble progenitors of good memorie, and the causes thereof intimate and allowed.

Notwithstanding that his maiesties intention and meaning maie fullie be vnderstood, it is his highnesse will, that the bishop or commissioners of anie dioceese or prouince, or part thereof, shall at their visitation appoint in euerie parish, according to the greatnesse thereof, some honest, vertuous, and discréet men, to aid and assist the minister, and to haue the ouersight and censure of the maners and behauior of the people of that parish. And if there be anie notable offense, worthie of punishment, that the bishop and commissioners be aduertised thereof, who shall haue an officer of armes to be assistant for the punishment of vice and executions to follow therevpon: that they who contemne the godlie and lawfull order of the church, maie find by experience his maiesties displeasure, and be punished according to their deseruings. And further, his maiestie vpon necessarie occasions which shall fall forth, by diuers maners of waies amongst the clergie, vpon humble supplication made to his highnesse, will not refuse to grant them licence to assist the bishops, commissioners, and some of the most vertuous, learned and godlie of their dioceese, where such ecclesiasticall matters, as apperteine to the vniformitie of doctrine and conuersation of a godlie order in the church, maie be intreated and concluded in his maiesties owne presence, or some of his honorable councell, who shall assist for the time: where if necessitie so require, a publike fast throughout the whole realme maie be commanded, and by his maiesties authoritie proclamed, to auoid the imminent displeasure and danger of the wrath of the Lords iudgements, which is the right end of publike humilitie, and not vnder pretense thereof to couer such enterprises, as haue heretofore disquieted and troubled the peace of this common wealth.

The twentith act ratifieth and approueth, and establisheth the estate of the bishops within the realme, to haue the ouersight and iurisdiction, euerie one in their owne dioceese: which forme of gouernement,

and

and rule in eccleſiaſticall affaires, hath not onlie continued in the church from the daies of the apoſtles, by continuall ſucceſſion of time, and manie martyrs in that calling ſhed their bloud for the truth: but alſo ſith this realme imbraced and receiued the chriſtian religion, the ſame eſtate hath béene maintéined, to the welfare of the church, and quietnes of the realme without anie interruption, vntill within theſe few yeares, ſome curious and buſie men haue practiſed to induce into the miniſterie an equalitie in all things, aſwell concerning the preaching of the word, adminiſtration of the ſacraments, as likewiſe in diſcipline, order, and policie. The which confuſion his maieſtie finding by moſt dangerous experience, to haue béene the mother and nurſe of great factions, ſeditions, and troubles within this realme, hath with aduiſe of his highnes eſtates, aduiſedlie concluded, the ſaid pretended partie in diſcipline, orders and policie in the church, to be no longer to be tolerated in his countrie, but the ſolicitude & care of all churches in one dioceſſe to apperteine to the biſhop and commiſſioners therof, who ſhall be anſwerable to God, and his maieſtie, and eſtates, for the right adminiſtration and diſcharge of the office of particular miniſters, within the bounds of his iuriſdiction. For as it becommeth his maieſtie, as Euſebius writeth of Conſtantinus the great, to be a biſhop of biſhops, and vniuerſall biſhop within his realme, in ſo far as his maieſtie ſhould appoint euerie one to diſcharge his duetie: which his highneſſe cannot, his countrie being large and great, take him to euerie miniſter that ſhall offend and tranſgreſſe againſt duties, or quarell with the whole number of the miniſterie: but it behoueth his maieſtie to haue biſhops & ouerſéers vnder him which maie be anſwerable for ſuch bounds, as the law and order of the countrie hath limited and appointed to euerie one of them. And that they hauing acceſſe to his maieſties parlement and councell, maie intercede for the reſt of the brethren of the miniſterie, propone their gréefe vnto his highneſſe and eſtates, and receiue his maieſties fauorable anſwere therein. The which forme doth preſerue a godlie quietneſſe, vnitie, concord and peace in the eſtate, and one vniforme order in the church. As contrariwiſe, the pretended equalitie diuideth the ſame, and vnder the pretenſe of equalitie maketh the ſame of the moſt craftie and ſubtile dealers to be aduanced and inriched: and in pretending of partie, to ſéeke nothing but their owne ambition and aduancement aboue the reſt of the ſimple ſort.

And notwithſtanding that his maieſtie hath reeſtabliſhed the ſaid eſtate, it is not his highneſſe will and intent, that the foreſaid biſhop ſhall haue ſuch full power as to do within his dioceſſe what he pleaſeth. For his maieſtie cannot allow of anis popular confuſion, wherein (as the prouerbe ſaith) Nulla tyrannis æquiparanda eſt tyrannidi multitudinis, that is: No tyrannie can be compared to the tyrannie of a multitude, hauing commandement and power in his hands: ſo on the other part his maieſties will is, that the biſhops authoritie in anie graue matter, be limited to the councell of thirtéene of the moſt ancient, wiſe, and godlie perſons of his dioceſſe, ſelected out of the whole ſynodall aſſemblie of the prouince: by whoſe aduiſe, or at the leaſt the moſt part thereof, the weightie affaires of the church maie be gouerned to the glorie of God, and quietnes of the realme. Further it is his highneſſe will and commandement, that their biſhops and commiſſioners twiſe in the yeare, to wit, ten daies after Eaſter, and the firſt of September, hold their ſynodall aſſemblies in euerie dioceſſe, for the kéeping of good orders therein: and if anie be ſtubborne, or contemne within their bounds the good order of the church, that it maie be declared vnto his maieſtie, and puniſhed to the example of others, according to their deſeruings. Neither is it his maieſties meaning or intent, that ſuch biſhops or commiſſioners as ſhall be appointed, ſhall receiue their onelie and full commiſſion of his maieſtie without admiſſion ordinarie, by ſuch as are appointed to that effect in the church: but hauing his highneſſe nomination, preſentation, and commendation as lawfull and onlie patrone, they to be tried and examined, that their qualities are ſuch as they are able to diſcharge their cure and office. And if it ſhall happen anie of the ſaid biſhops or commiſſioners, to be negligent in their office, or to be ſlanderous or offenſiue in their behauior, life, and maners, in time to come, it is not his highneſſe will, that they ſhall be exempted from correction, notwithſtanding anie priuilege of his highnes eſtate, councell or parlement: but their labors, trauels, diligence and behauiors, to be tried in the generall aſſemblie, not conſiſting of a confuſed multitude, as it was before; but of ſuch worſhipfull perſons as is heretofore preſcribed in his highneſſe preſence, or his deputies to that effect.

Laſtlie his maieſtie giueth commiſſion to the ſaid biſhops or commiſſioners at their viſitations, to conſider in what part of the countrie, the enterpriſe, or interpretation of the ſcripture, by conference of a certeine number of the miniſterie within thoſe bounds, maie be moſt commodiouſlie once in euerie fiftéene daies. For as his maieſtie inhibits all vnlawfull métings, that maie ingender trouble and contention in the countrie: ſo his maieſtie is well affected to ſée the miniſterie increaſe in knowledge and vnderſtanding, and by all meanes to fortifie and aduance the ſame. Wherein his highneſſe commandement is, that a graue, wiſe, and ſage man ſhall be appointed preſident, who maie haue the ouerſight of theſe bounds, and be anſwerable therefore to the biſhop, his councell and ſynod; and he to be reſpected reaſonablie for his paines, at the modification of ſtipends: that all things maie be orderlie done in the church, peace & quietneſſe mainteined in the realme, and we deliuered from apparant plagues, and the bleſſings of God continued to the comfort of our poſteritie. And in the meane time his highneſſe inhibits & erpreſſie forbids vnder the paines conteined in his maieſties acts of parlement, & all other pains arbitrable at his maieſties ſight & councell, that no miniſter take in hand to aſſemble themſelues for the foreſaid cauſe, without the appointment and order taken by the ſaid biſhops or commiſſioners, whereby his highneſſe maie be certeinlie informed, that the foreſaid miniſters aſſemble not, to meddle with anie ciuill matters, or affaires of eſtate, as was accuſtomed before; but onelie to profit in the knowledge of the word, and to be comforted one by another in the adminiſtration of their ſpirituall office: which his highneſſe wiſheth them faithfullie to diſcharge, and then to call to God, that his maieſtie maie in a proſperous reigne enioie good and long life, and continue and increaſe in the feare of the almightie.

Beſides which, the king at the end of this his intention, did further articulate his intention into ſundrie heads as here followeth.

The kings intention drawne into certeine articles, and publiſhed in print.

His maieſties intention is, by the grace of God, to mainteine the true and ſincere profeſſion of the goſpell, and preaching thereof within his realme.

2 His maieſties intention is, to correct and puniſh ſuch as ſeditiouſlie abuſe the truth, and factiouſlie aplie or rather bewraie the text of the ſcripture to the diſquieting of the ſtate and diſturbing of the commonwealth, or imparing of his highneſſe and councels honour.

3 His maieſties intention is, if anie queſtion of faith and doctrine ariſe, to conuocate the moſt learned, godlie, wiſe, and experimented paſtors, that by conference of ſcriptures the veritie may be tried, and all hereſie and ſchiſme by that means erpreſſed.

4 His maieſties intention is, that for the keeping of good order in euerie paroch, certeine ouerſeers to the good behauiour of the reſt, be apointed at the viſitation of the biſhop or viſitour, who ſhall haue his maieſties authoritie, and officers of armes concurring for the puniſhment of vice.

5 His maieſties intention is, to mainteine the exerciſe of propheſie for the increaſe and continuing of knowledge amongſt the miniſterie: in which a wiſe and a graue man ſelected by the biſhop or commiſſioner at the ſynodall aſſemblie, ſhall render accompt of the adminiſtration of thoſe bounds, where the exerciſe is holden, for which cauſe ſome reſpect of liuing ſhall be had vnto him, who ſuſteins that burthen.

6 His maieſties intention is, not to derogate from the ordinarie iudgement of matters of the church by the ordinarie biſhops, their councels and ſynods: but if anie of them do amiſſe, and abuſe their calling, to take order for correcting, amending and puniſhing thereof.

7 His maieſties intention is, not to hinder or ſtaie anie godlie or ſolid order, grounded vpon the word of God, and order of the primitiue church, but that the miniſters of the word meddle themſelues onelie with their owne calling, and iudge not feareſullie of the eſtate.

8 It is his maieſties intention, that the preſbyteries conſiſting of manie miniſters and gentlemen, at Landwar or otherwaies, be not further tollerat in his realme: but the exerciſe of iuriſdiction of all churches to be in the hand of the biſhop or commiſſioner, and their councels and ſynods.

9 It is his maieſties intention, that the biſhops or commiſſioners aſſemble not anie generall aſſemblie out of the whole realme, without his maieſties knowledge and licence obteined thereunto: which vpon ſupplication his highneſſe will not denie, that an vniforme order may be obſerued in the whole realme, and the biſhops and their diligences there tried and examined, and the complaints of euerie particular heard and diſcuſſed.

10 It is his maieſties intention to aſſiſt this aſſemblie himſelfe, or by a noble man of his councell, his highneſſe deputie.

11 It is his maieſties intention, that when anie paroch findeth neceſſitie of anie faſt, they informe the occaſion to the biſhop or commiſſioner and their councell, that they may vnderſtand the cauſe to be lawfull; as likewiſe the biſhop of the dioceſſe finding lawfull occaſion, may within the ſame, with his councell preſcribe anie publike humiliation.

12 It his maieſties intention, that a generall faſt throughout the whole realme, ſhall not be proclamed but by his maieſties commandement, or by a generall councell, wherin his maieſtie or his highneſſe deputie is preſent.

13 It is his highneſſe intention, that the biſhops in the realme in euerie dioceſſe with their councell proceed into the eccleſiaſticall gouernement, but as is ſaid with a councell, that both tyrannie and confuſion may be auoided in the church.

14 It is his maieſties intention, that commiſſioners be directed vniuerſallie throughout the whole realme, to eſtabliſh a godlie order, and that his maieſties commiſſioners take order preſentlie for the tranſlation of ſuch miniſters, whoſe trauels they eſteeme may more conuenientlie and profitablie ſerue in an other place.

These things was the king faine to publiſh, to ſtaie the euill report of ſuch as went about to touch him for the breach of the chriſtian order in religion, which being nothing but that which ſeemeth anſwerable to naturall ſenſe & princelie maieſtie, ſhould neither by malice haue moued, nor for colour of religion procured anie beyond the warrant of the word of God, or the duetie of naturall allegiance to reſiſt the kinglie ordinance, or to lift vp their ſword or word againſt him, who being a god in earth, preſenteth the maieſtie of the God of heauen. But leauing the diſcourſe of theſe things to preachers, to whome it belongeth to inſtruct vs in our dutie to God, to our prince, & to our neighbours, we will turne againe to the other following occurrents of Scotland. And yet before we ſpeake anie thing of thoſe matters, ſith I haue in this place as well as in manie other ſpoken of parlements & acts of parlement, I thinke it not amiſſe to ſet downe ſomewhat collected out of authors touching their manner and order of parlement, and that the rather becauſe the ſame conſiſteth of three eſtates, and the princes confirmation as our parlement doth, from whome it ſeemeth to me that they haue fet their light. Touching which, Leſleus in his Scotiſh hiſtorie lib. 1. pag. 75, vnder the title of Leges Scotorum, writeth in this ſort. Qui verò ſeculi negotijs ſeſe implicantes in eccleſiaſticorum album non referuntur, legibus, quas reges deſcripſerunt, aut regum voce confirmatas, tres regni ordines ſanxerũt, continentur, has partim Latino, partim Scotico ſermone confirmatas, regni municipales leges vocamus: libro qui leges Latinè ſcriptas continet, titulus (regiam maieſtatem) præfigitur, quòd ab illis vocibus libri exordium ducatur. Reliquis legum libris, comitiorũ (quæ populari ſermone parliamenta dicimus) acta inſcribuntur. Quanquam hic aduertendum, nos ita lege municipali teneri, vt ſi cauſa multis controuerſijs implicata (quod ſæpe fit) incidat quæ legibus noſtratibus non poſſit dirimi, ſtatim quicquid ad hanc controuerſiam decidendam neceſſarium cenſetur, ex ciuilibus Romanorum libris promatur. Sed ſi quis legum noſtrarum originem velit conquiſitè inueſtigare, intelligat poteſtatem has ferendi antiquandíque trium ordinum ſuffragijs liberè in publico latis regis aſſenſu confirmatis eſſe poſitam. On which parlements ſo aſſembled, conſiſting of the three eſtates, & the princes confirming voice (in the beginning whereof the king goeth to the place where that aſſemblie is made, to keepe ſuch parlement attired in his regall garments, with the ſword and other ornaments, the enſignes of his kingdome and kinglie authoritie, caried before him, attended on with all his nobilitie and cleargie) thoſe common people will manie times giue ſuch bis names as ſeemeth beſt liking to themſelues, and is moſt anſwerable to the nature & order of that parlement, as we alſo do heere in England, whereof I could produce manie examples of both nations, which at this time I will forbeare, and onelie ſet downe one proofe (as well of England as Scotland) to confirme the ſame, leaſt in paſſing it ouer without ſome example thereof, I might make a vaine ſhew of knowledge conſiſting in naked words, without anie ſound matter. Wherefore I ſaie, that as in England in the yeare of our redemption one thouſand two hundred fiftie and eight, being the two and fortith yeare of the reigne of king Henrie the third, the parlement held at Orkord by the lords againſt the king, was called Parliamentum inſanum, bicauſe manie things were there intreted which turned to the death of diuerſe noble men. So the Scots in like maner bynamed a parlement, in the yeare of Chriſt 1556, (being the fourteenth yeare of Marie the now impriſoned quéene of Scotland) and called the ſame a running parlement, bicauſe there were manie intermiſſions and remouings during the continuance thereof, as appeareth by Leſleus in theſe words. Aeſtate ſequenti habita ſunt Edinburgi trium ordinum comitia, in quibus domini Brunſtonius, Grangius, Balnauius, & alij nonnulli, quorum bona à gubernatore publicata fuerunt, ſingulari regis Franciæ commendatione dignati, famæ atque bonis reſtituti ſunt. Hæc verò comitia quòd intermiſſa, potiùs quàm omiſſa, quaſi continuarentur, nomen à vulgo acceperunt, vt currentia dicerentur. Thus much being ſaid about their parlements, let vs againe fall with our pen into the other matters of Scotland, which followed the former parlement aſſembled in Maie, and moued the king to make that declaration thereof which I haue before ſet downe.

The running parlement.

Leſleus.

About the time that the earle Gowrike or Gowrie was as before is remembred beheaded, the king did roiallie ſet forward his iourneie, and poſſeſſed the towne of Sterling, in which the ſaid earle was erecuted, hauing a ſiſter maried to Leſle earle of Rothos, and a daughter married to Steward earle of Atholl. After the death of the ſaid earle Gowricke lord treaſurer of Scotland, the king beſtowed that office vpon Grahame earle of Montroſſe, who had married the lord Dromonds ſiſter, which name of Grame is ſuppoſed to be deduced from Grahame, who in the yeare of Chriſt foure hundred twentie and two, reſiſted the Romans, inuading the Picts and Scots, for when Victorinus the Romane legat, had againe commanded a trench or fenſe to be made from the caſtell of Abincorne to Cluide, the ſame was vtterlie ouerthrowne and caſt abroad by the noble capteine Grame, of whome as is ſuppoſed the familie of the Grames liuing at this daie had their originall, the ſame place to this daie being called the trench of Grame or Grames trench.

Leſleus li. 4. pag. 133.

The tenth of September (after that he was ſent for by the quéene of England vpon certeine articles laid againſt him) did George Talbot erle of Shrewſburie (a graue and honourable perſon, who had Marie the impriſoned queene of Scots in his cuſtodie at Sheffeld caſtell) repaire to London according to his dutie, to anſwer thoſe things which ſhould be obiected againſt him, who comming to London verie honorablie attended on with his owne retinue, amounting to the number of two hundred horſſe, and with ſome few others of the quéenes men, which were ſent to bring him vp, repaired to his houſe at Coleherbert in London, from whenſe in Nouember going to the court to anſwer the things to be obiected vnto him, about the cuſtodie and vſage of the ſame queene of Scots, which had manie yéars beene vnder his charge, he anſwered the matter verie honourablie, and to his good diſcharge, being then diſmiſſed of the kéeping of the ſame quéene of Scots. During whoſe being here at London, the quéene of Scots was appointed to the charge of ſir Rafe Sadler knight banneret, a graue and old councellor to the ſtate of England, and chancellor of the dutchie of Lancaſter; with whome was alſo ioined in the ſame commiſſion John Summers eſquier, clearke of the ſignet, a wiſe and modeſt gentleman, well ſéene in the languages, excellent at diſciphering, and brought vp vnder that worthie and rare witted gentleman, doctor Nicholas Wotton, of whome I haue ſpoken more in the hiſtorie of England. Theſe hauing this quéene thus committed vnto them, did (as perſons carefull of ſo weightie a charge) remoue hir to a place of good ſtrength, and conuied hir to be kept in the caſtell of Tutberrie, where ſhe (not remaining long in their cuſtodie) bicauſe they were remoued and others put in place, was afterward about Maie following, as anon ſhall appeare, committed to the charge of ſir Aimes Paulet one alſo of the priuie councell of England, hauing before béene ambaſſador legier in France, a perſon deſcended of an ancient and honourable familie, with whome and vnder whoſe charge ſhe ſtill remaineth at this preſent in the ſaid caſtle of Tutburie.

But to leaue that matter, we ſaie that about the tenth daie of Januarie following this diſcharge of the earle of Shrewesburie, ſir Lewis Valentine knight, iuſtice, clerke, and maiſter of the ceremonies of the kings houſe, which office as I haue béene crediblie informed by a Scot (but how truelie I leaue to others) his father, his grandfather, and great grandfather before him, did inioie, and to whome moſt of the nobilitie of Scotland, either by affinitie, conſanguinitie, or alliance, were linked in blood, a goodlie yong gentleman about the age of thirtie yeares, was ſent ambaſſador into England for the redeliuerie and accuſation of the erle of Angus and Marre, and the other nobles which were fled out of Scotland into England for a ſuppoſed treaſon wrought by them againſt their king, whoſe redeliuerie was required of the quéene of England, to the end the king might execute the law vpon them. In which his ambaſſage he behaued himſelfe before the councell of England ſo grauelie and learnedlie, that the ſaid earles were ſent for from Norwich (where they ſoiorned before his comming) to Weſtminſter, there to anſwere to ſuch things as ſhould be laid to their charge by the ſaid ſir Lewis Valentine. Whereupon after that the ſaid ambaſſador had remained in England at London (honorablie interteined and feaſted of the nobilitie and others) by the ſpace of ſeuentéene wéeks, he was diſpatched into his countrie with anſwer, that hir maieſtie would ſhortlie ſend an ambaſſador into Scotland which ſhould fullie ſatiſfie the king. Whereupon the ſaid ſir Lewis Valentine departed from London on the tenth daie of Maie following, in the yeare of our redemption one thouſand fiue hundred eightie and fiue, and ſo returned into Scotland; much about which time, as is before a little touched, was Marie quéene of Scots, remaining in the cuſtodie of ſir Ralfe Sadler in the caſtell of Tutburie, committed to the kéeping of ſir Aimes Paulet. 1585

After this the quéene of England the nineténth daie of the ſaid moneth of Maie diſpatched in ambaſſage into Scotland, Edward Wotton eſquier, a gentleman of good deſcent, and one whoſe anceſtors had honorablie & faithfullie ſerued manie princes of England, as well in the place of priuie councellors, as alſo in manie ambaſſages into forren nations: which ambaſſador being of yeares not much more than the ſaid ſir Lewis Valentine, had trauelled the moſt part of Europe, and had before time béene ambaſſador for the quéene of England into Portingall. This gentleman ſo ſent from the quéene of England to the king of Scots, attended on by other Engliſh gentlemen, departed as is before ſaid from London towards Scotland the nineténth of Maie, who remaining at Berwike about three dais, did there receiue his conduct from the king of Scots to paſſe into his kingdome; which once obteined, he preſentlie entred that land on Whitſun éue, being the nine and twentith daie of the ſaid moneth of Maie, and ſo came that daie to Edenburgh, being firſt at his entrance into the Scotiſh borders receiued ued by the lord Hume and his retinue, who conueied them to Seton houſe, where they were interteined by the lord Seton: after which when the ambaſſador was departed about halfe a mile from the ſaid lord Setons houſe, he was met with ſir Robert Meluin knight, maiſter William Keth one of the kings chamber, and others, which conueied him that night to Edenburgh. The nert morrow (after that the Engliſh ambaſſador was come to the citie of Edenburgh) being Whitſundaie, the ambaſſador was after dinner brought to the kings preſence, where he had full audience for the deliuerie of his ambaſſage, conſiſting vpon the confirming of the old and concluding of a new league of amitie betweene the two nations of England and Scotland; which the king accepting in honorable part, did for that time diſmiſſe the ambaſſador, vntill the minds & conſents of the nobilitie might be vnderſtood and had. With which anſwer the ambaſſador then ſatisfied, toke leaue of the king for that preſent, and remained ſtill at Edenburgh ſome fortnight, interteined with ſports of delights anſwerable to the courſe of the yeere, and the dutie of an ambaſſage. From whenſe the ambaſſador attending on the king was conueied to Dumfermling, where the king remained ſome time to repoſe himſelfe, progreſſing from thenſe to Falkland, and ſo to ſaint Andrews, hauing the ambaſſador alwaies with him. When the king was come to ſaint Andrews, the noblemen and ſtates of the realme repaired thither to hold a parlement, according to the former appointment.

But whileſt theſe things did thus paſſe at ſaint Andrews, the time drew on, when the borderers of both the nations of England and Scotland ſhould aſſemble according to the cuſtome of the true daies, there to determine for recompenſe of all ſuch iniuries as each people had offered to other, in conueieng of cattell or other booties from their borders; for which cauſe there did about the ſixteenth daie of Julie aſſemble the people of both the borders, and the wardens of the ſame; at what time the lord of Fernhurſt warden of the Scotiſh borders, and ſir Francis Ruſſell knight lord Ruſſell, and ſir John Foſter knight warden of the middle marches came with their companie to the borders of Scotland, not far from Berwike, and ſo entred into ſpéech with the Scots of ſuch cauſes for which they repaired thither. After when the wardens were ſet vpon the bench to heare and determine the ſame, there did ſuddenlie ariſe among the people a contention, whereby followed at the firſt ſome ſmall frate, which being perceiued by ſir Francis Ruſſell, he aroſe from the bench and called for his horſſe, who meaning to appeaſe the matter, went amongſt the preaſe. At what time a certeine number of ſhot comming on him, he was ſuddenlie, but moſt vnluckilie, ſlaine with a péece amongſt the reſt diſcharged againſt him by a Scot borne about that place (ſuſpected by the moſt to be the brother of the lord of Fernhurſt) contrarie to the nature of ſuch aſſemblies, where each part ſhuld labor for quiet, ſith publike faith at ſuch times are giuen, that euerie one ſhall returne home without anie damage or iniurie offered by anie ſide. The loſſe of which ſir Francis Ruſſell, being a gentleman of great hope, was much lamented of the Engliſh, and that eſpeciallie ſith his vntimelie death ſo iniurioullie (by the erle of Arrane, as the common fame went) procured and ſo ſuddenlie performed, in the fiue and thirtith yeare of his age, did bereaue the realme of England of a godlie yong perſon, well ſtaied in gouernement, bountifull, wiſe, and vertuous, whoſe death happening the daie before that his honorable father the earle of Bedford (being of the ſame chriſtian and ſurname) departed the world, occaſioned T. G. firſt in Latine, and then in Engliſh, to ſet downe certeine funerall and mourning verſes touching both the father and the ſon in theſe words:

En duo Franciſci ſubitò occubuere, ſimúlque
Et pater & natus, Ruſſella ſplendida ſtirpis
Lumina, quos binos mors abſtulit atra diebus:
Londini, comitem prouecta ætate parentem,
Finibus ac Scotiæ natum florentibus annis,
Ille perit morbo, inſidijs cadit alter iniquis:
Dum miſer occulta traiecit viſcera glande
Incautè Scotus, heu ficta ſub nomine pacis.
Occidit ante patrem, non multis filius horis.
Anglia magna tibi eſt rapti iactura parentis,
Nec leuis eſt nati, de quo ſpes optima fuiſſet.
Quis ſcit an irati foret hæc vindicta Iehouæ,
De vitijs pœnas dum noſtris ſumit acerbas?

The Engliſh whereof is in this ſorme drawne into verſe by the firſt author of them T. G. in this ſort:

Lo Francies twaine at once both ſuddenlie are gone:
Two ſhining ſtars of Ruſſels race,
the father and the ſonne.
Whom in two daies vntimelie death hath from vs caught awaie:
The earle in London natures debt,
the father old did paie.
The ſonne his heire, lord Ruſſell hight, of courage freſh and yeares:
On Scotiſh borders loſt his life,
whoſe want now well appeares.
The father did by ſickneſſe die,
the ſonne through fraud vniuſt:
By Scotiſh hand with gun was ſlaine, whilſt nothing he miſtruſt.
The ſonne before the fathers death not manie houres was ſlaine:
Great is thy loſſe, ô England, of theſe peereleſſe nobles twaine.
Thy fathers worthie vertues late knowne well (and long) to all:
From fathers ſteps the ſonne great hope gaue that he would not fall.
Who knowes if God the Lord of hoſts,
this puniſhment doth ſend:
Our ſinnes ſo great thereby to ſcourge, and wicked liues amend?

Of which erle of Bedford (hauing occaſion to mention him in this place by the death of his ſonne) I ſuppoſe not amiſſe to ſate ſomewhat more, eſpecialie concerning ſuch matters whereof he was a dealer with the impriſoned quéene of Scots, when ſhe was at libertie and in hir beſt eſtate.

In the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand fiue hundred and three ſcore, Francis the French king died at Orleans in the kalends of December. After which, in the yere following, Marie the quéene of Scots, Dowager of France and widow to the ſaid Francis, ſoiourned a certeine time in France about Jamille and Lorreine, where the chéefe part of hir friends & kindred (being of the houſe of Guiſe) did remaine, during whoſe abode in France, and before ſhe went into Scotland: this earle of Bedford and ſir Nicholas Throgmorton (ligier ambaſſador in France for the quéene of England) were ſent vnto the quéene of Scots to conclude with hir, that the agréements and conditions of peace, which were eſtabliſhed a little before at Leith ſhould be eſtabliſhed by hir conſent. Whervnto for anſwere ſhe affirmed, that ſhe could not determine anie thing therein, vnleſſe that ſhe were preſent with the nobilitie of hir kingdome, to whom the adminiſtration of the realme of Scotland was committed at the intreatie of the Engliſh. And that when ſhe was in Scotland, where by Gods good furtherance ſhe hoped ſhortlie for to be be, ſhe would earneſtlie trauell all ſhe might for the eſtabliſhing of all good conditions of peace. Againe when the king of Scots now liuing was by his godfathers to be taken from the font and to be regenerate in Chriſt, in the yere of our ſaluation one thouſand fiue hundred thrée ſcore and ſix, being the foure and twentith yeare of the reigne of the ſame Marie quéene of Scots, this earle of Bedford as ambaſſador from the quéene of England, was ſent to the quéene of Scots by waie of deputiſhip to preſent the perſon of his miſtreſſe requeſted to chriſten the yong prince of Scotland. At what time this earle of Bedford preſented, in the behalfe of the quéene of England, one font of gold curiouſlie wrought, weighing thrée hundred thirtie and thrée ounces, and amounting in value to the ſumme of one thouſand fortie thrée pounds ſ ninetéene ſhillings. Thus this much ſpoken by the way of the earle of Bedford.

The report of the death of ſir Francis Ruſſell before mentioned, came to the knowledge of the ſaid Edward Wotton, as yet remaining ambaſſador in Scotland, and then lieng at S. Andrews: whereupon the ambaſſador went to the king, and opening vnto him the iniurie done to the Engliſh by the procurement, as was thought, of James Steward erle of Arrane then chancellor: he obteined that the king (finding the matter to ſound both to reaſon and iuſtice) did command the ſaid earle to priſon, where he remained ſome time, and was after at the ſute of William Steward brother of the earle, vpon the kings remouing from ſaint Andrewes, releaſed from the priſon, and committed to reſtreint in his owne houſe, vntill ſuch time as he had cléered himſelfe of the ſame impoſed crime, and cauſe of breach of amitie betwéene the two nations of England and Scotland. During which impriſonment of the earle of Arrane, the former appointed parlement or aſſemblie at ſaint Andrewes was holden by the king & the nobilitie there gathered togither, which were Graham earle of Montroſſe treaſuror of Scotland, Robert Steward erle of March ſometime biſhop of Cathenelle, and now prior of S. Andrewes, great vncle to the king and to the yong duke of Leneux, Keith erle marſhall, Leſle erle of Rothos, Steward earle of Atholl, & Patrike Conſtance archbiſhop of S. Andrews, with diuers others. Amongſt whom the king opening the contents of the ambaſſage ſent out of England for the concluding of the league betwéene the two nations, vſed vnto them this following ſpeech, wherein declaring the opinion he conceiued of the religion, the neceſſitie of the ioining with England, the ſworne league of other nations againſt the profeſſors of the goſpell, and the reaſons which induced him to moue this matter vnto his people, all which he vttered in this ſort.

The kings ſpeech to the eſtates, concerning a league in religion with England.

TWo cauſes my lordis and ze all of the eſtatis haue moued me to ſend for zow at this time to craue zour aduiſes towardis them, quharof ſith the one is generall & the vther particular, I will begin at the generall as the matter of greateſt weight. Amongſt all the benefeits that God doth beſtow vpoun his elect and church, the triall and ſifting of the gud choſin from the bad hipocreitis, is ane of the maſt ſpeciall, quhich he hath vſed in all ages for the ſeparatioun of chame, alſwell for that to lang companie of the vicked doth corrupt the godlie, as alſo that their ſeparatioun is ſa taken in this earth, of Godis luue towardis them, quhich triall he doth now chéeflie vſe, for that the number of the vicked doth abound in theſe letter dacis, quherin God doth permit the deuill moſt to rage. For quhat greater triall of the faithfull can there be, than the confederating togidder of all the baſtard chriſtians, I meane the papiſtis, in a league quhich they terme holie, albeit moſt vnholie in varie truth, for the ſubuerſioun of the trew religioun in all realmes throuch out the quhole world. This is a matter ſo manifeſt and notorious to zou all, ſuen by the report of the ſmalleſt merchantis that trauill, as it doth dilat the ſelfe, thought I were ſilent.

This leagues whome of I ſpeake, are compoſed of Frenchmen, and Hiſpaingnols, aſſiſted with the king of Spaines and the papes monie, ſolemlie ſworne to performe the forſaid enterpriſe before they leaue armes: the performance quhereof we aught to reſiſt for thrée cauſes (to wit) for conſcience, honor, and loue of ſelfis. For gif they may atteine to their purpoſe (as God forbid) either will they deſtroie or rot out vs, our vifis, and childrein, & quhatſoeuer we poſſeſſe, gif we remaine conſtant; either elſe muſt we render Chriſt Jeſus, and ſuffer our ſaulis which is the maſt nableſt part of man to be bund with the bundis of idolatrie, and our bodies to be vſed at their inordinat pleſuris. But ſith the loue of our ſelfis and our honour cannot permit the ane, and that our conſciencis and the reuerence we ow to God, cannot ſuffer the vther: I craue my lordis zour beſt and ſoundeſt opinionis and aduiſis quhat ze thinke meeteſt to be vſed for the remedie hereof. But gif ze deſire to haue firſt my opinioun, it is this in few woardis; that as ſondrie chriſtian princis haue alreadie counſelled me, our contraleague ſalbe maid, not anelie in termes, but in effect holie, for the ioining togidder all true chriſtian princis to defend themſelfis, in caſe of vtheris inuaſioun. A thing hurtfull to none, profitable for ſelfis, acceptable to God, and vſe in the ſight of the warld. By this meanes ſall our conſciencis, honors, and liſis be preſeruid, and God and his religioun glorified and aduancid.

And ſith the quéene of England is not anlie a true chriſtian, but alſo neareſt ioinit to vs in nighbourhed, conſanguinitie and gudwill, I thinke it meeteſt in mine opinioun, that it be our league firſt & maiſt adſtrictlie maid with hir; for quhich cauſe I haue maid & ſet downe a forme of act to be ſubſcribit by zou all, quherein ze promes to ratifie and approue in parliament, quhatſoeuer articles I, or anie in my name ſall conclude with the quéene of England, or anie in hir name, for the making and the effectualing of the foreſaid league. But for that the act it ſelfe will mare ample informe zou, it ſalbe preſentlie read in all zour audiencis.

Upon this ſpeech, the lords being of diuerſe opinions, ſome willing to imbrace the league with England, and ſome deſirous to leaue it, and to ioine in amitie with France according to the moſt ancienteſt leagues, which haue béene eſtabliſhed betwéene them and the Scots (by moſt of their former kings, whereof the firſt was Achaius, who entering league with Charles the great, had a token of confirmation thereof, which was the floure delices added to the armes of Scotland) there was nothing done in that conuention. After which, the baniſhed lords of Scotland remaining in England, entered their countrie: the manner and time of the entrance of which nobilitie was in this ſort.

Towards the latter end of September, the earls of Angus and Mar, with ſuch others of their faction as were in England, did (after that they had long before this, ſent thither the maiſter of Glames out of England to prepare their waie, which he did verie effectuallie) returne into Scotland; at whoſe com-ming into that their native countrie, there met with them about the borders, manie others of the nobilitie to ioine in one action, for the redreſſe of ſuch gouernment as was vſed by perſons about the king, ſuſpected to nuzzell him in the Romane religion. After this their firſt meeting, they did by appointment diſperſe themſelues, euerie one to the place of his moſt ſtrength, and where he could make moſt friends and followers, appointing a daie to méete againe at Fawkirke, a méete place fenſed by nature for the aſſemblie of an armie. Whereupon, ſome departed to Lowthian, ſome to Domefreis, and others to other places. But in ſhort time following, they reaſſembled in October at Fawkirke with ſuch power as they could make, which amounted to the number of ten or eleuen thouſand perſons. The report wherof was brought vnto the king, then remaining at a noble mans houſe (not far from Sterling) whereas a contract of mariage was ſolemnized. Upon which, the king ſuppoſing it to ſtand moſt for his ſuretie (iudging theſe noblemen ſo aſſembled to be his enimies) conueied himſelfe, and ſuch nobilitie as were with him to Sterling, raiſing power (ſuch as the preſent ſtate of the time would permit) intending with them to haue ſubdued the earle of Angus and his companie: for which cauſe alſo, the earle of Arrane came from his houſe to Sterling, and the maiſter of Greie with commiſſion rode to ſaint Johns towne to aſſemble the kings ſubiects.

After that the earle of Arrane was come to Sterling to the king, the earles of Angus, Mar, Bothwell, Atholl, Marſhall, the lords Hamilton, Yume, Heres, Cambuſkeneth, Dzibourgh, Paſſlate, & Coldingham; the lairds of Seſford, Drumlarige, Codentnewes, Wedderburne, with other earles, barons, gentlemen & commons, with their friends & complices, marching all night from Fawkirke, did in the nert morning come to ſaint Ninians chappell within a mile of Sterling, and preſented themſelues before the towne of Sterling, before anie ſuſpicion was had of their approch ſo néere. At what time, being the firſt of November, they pitched their tents, placed there as it had béene a new towne, to the great terror of their enimies within Sterling: deliuering for the cauſe of their comming this proclamation following.

The proclamation publiſhed by the nobilitie of Scotland, conteining the cauſes of their repairing towards the towne of Sterling to the kings maieſtie, the ſe- cond day of Nouember.

WHeras the kings maieſtie our ſouereignes good, naturall, and vertuous education is now plainelie vnderſtood to haue béene abuſed, and his rotall qualities giuen to him by the almightie God (which cauſed his fame far aboue the capacitie of his yeares to be magnified, and worthilie praiſed, to the great comfort of all his ſubiects) hath béene theſe yeares paſt obſcured by the craft & ſubtiltie of ſome lewd and wicked perſons of no deſert or worthineſſe, and for the moſt part of baſe linage, not borne to one foot breadth of land, yet of maruelous aſpiring wrongs and cruell inclination; who vnder colour of friendſhip and bloud creeping in about his maieſtie, and ſéeking onelie their owne particuliar profit and promotion: ſhaking off (as it were) not onelie all chriſtian and charitable nature: but euen the generall points and offices of humanitie vſed amongſt moſt barbarous people, without feare of God or man, as ſubtill foxes and bloudie woolues, by wreſting of lawes and other deceitfull practiſes, hath ſo walked, torne in peeces, and deuoured the whole bodie of this afflicted commonwealth, that of the whole ancient forme of iuſtice and policie receiued of our anceſtors, remaineth nothing, neither in ſpirituall or temporall eſtate; but the naked ſhadow & counterfeited maſke thereof to our ſouereignes high diſhonor, our oprobrie (who are a part of his nobilitie) and heauie griefe of all good men throughout the realme. It is euidentlie knowne what iuſtice and quietneſſe was in the realme, what heartie loue betwixt his maieſtie and his ſubiects, what beautifull countenance the church of God had, what dailie hope of increaſe, what expectation was of his highneſſe in forren nations, before the arriuall of Obigneie, afterwards called the duke of Lenoux, and the entring in credit of James Steward, and coronell Steward with their vnhappie companies. But what hath ſucceeded ſince no true Scotiſh heart can remember without extreame dolor: for there is no part or corner within the land at this time peaceable or quiet, but all repleniſhed with particular enimities, and cruell reuenges without puniſhment.

It is alſo well knowne, that whereas the wiſeſt of his maieſties moſt noble progenitors labored by clemencie, not by crueltie to poſſeſſe the hearts of their ſubiects, & to kéepe the ſtrengths of their reims in their owne hands (thereby meaning the better to preſerue themſelues againſt ſuch inconueniences, as manie princes of that land miſgouerned, and lead by peruerſe counſell haue béene ſubiect vnto) that the foreſaid abuſors had depriued his maieſtie both of the one and the other ſo far as in them laie. For the chéefe ſtrength of the realme are in Arrans his hands, who bragging of his pedegrée by deſcent from duke Murdacke (one that was beheaded for his treaſon againſt his ſouereigne) was not aſhamed to ſaie (meaning of himſelfe) Here ſtands the perſon of king James the ſeuenth. And to the end that the hearts of the people might be alienated from his highneſſe, and ſo (as appeareth) his maieſtie made vnable to puniſh them, if at anie time hereafter he ſhould perceiue their falſe and treaſonable dooings, what can be added more than theſe ſaid ſeditious hath alreadie done in that behalfe, ſéeing vnder his maieſties name and authoritie, ſuch parcialitie is vſed in all matters, ſuch extortion with crueltie, and incredible diſſimulation throughout the whole land, that were it not of his good ſubiects (vpon the experience of his mild & calme gouernement before theſe lewd men about him) clérelie vnderſtood that the cauſes of all theſe miſorders ought to be imputed vnto them, & not to himſelfe, they had long agone by vniuerſall male-contentment of the people (procéeding from the cauſes aforeſaid) procured a great diſtraction of the kings léeges hearts, and had caſt his maieſties honor, crowne, and eſtate in marueilous danger, whereas now (bleſſed be God) all his true ſubiects are certeinelie perſuaded, that if the ſaid lewd perſons could be ſeparated from his maieſtie, he would returne againe to exerciſe his former clemencie and towardneſſe in euerie reſpect, which hath béene theſe yeares paſt maruellouſlie eclipſed by the craft of thoſe treaſonable perſons aforeſaid, who not onelie haue ſought & ſéeke for their particular commoditie, the deſtruction of certeine ſeuerall perſons, but euen (as it appeareth) haue conſpired againſt the whole bodie of the realme, in ſo much as there is no eſtate of the land frée from their perſecutions.

The worthieſt and moſt ancient of the barons and nobilitie (namelie ſuch as haue giuen beſt proofe of their forwardneſſe in true religion, and fidelitie to their ſouereigne) are by parcialitie, and wreſting of lawes, without mercie either executed, coſoned, impriſoned, priſoned, baniſhed, or at the leaſt debarred his maieſties preſence, againſt the miniſterie, ſcholes, and clergie, acts and proclamations publiſhed, inhibiting their preſbyteries, aſſemblies, and other exerciſes, priuileges, and immunities ratified by parlements, procædings, or at the leaſt by laudable cuſtome permitted euer ſince the firſt reformation of religion within this land; and without the which the puritie of doctrine, and right forme of the eccleſiaſticall diſcipline cannot long continue: as being the onelie meanes to trie and examine the liues, maners, and knowledge of euerie perſon, and to reforme the ſame if næd require. With this the moſt learned, and of moſt vnſpotted liues of that number, are either compelled for ſafetie of their liues and conſciences to abandon their countrie, or elſe inhibited to preach, or depriued of their ſtipends, Jeſuits, ſeminarie prieſts, and ſuch as be knowne practiſers in diuers nations for the execution of the bloudie councell of Trent are interteined, and in great eſtimation; yea ſome indurated papiſts in ſeſſion, to occupie the places from the which the moſt godlie and faithfull ſenators haue bæne by them detected. An euident preſage of the ouerthrow of true religion. And concerning the eſtate of burowes, by intruſion of ſuch magiſtrates to rule aboue them, as neither are comburgeſſes, nor apt to diſcharge themſelues of ſuch offices, but men elected to applauſe and to conſent to the appetite of the ſeditious aforeſaid, their priuileges and ancient liberties are ſo preiudiced, that without timelie remedie, that eſtate (ſometime a great ornament of the land) muſt næds ſuddenlie decaie. So as theſe thrée pillers (whereby the king and commonwealth ſhould be preſerued) and vpholden) being waſted and vndermined in maner aboue written, what can be erpected but vniuerſall ruine and ouerthrow of the whole bodie of the eſtate; except God of his mercie preuent the ſame? Beſides all theſe, the foreſaid abuſors not reſting content with the enormities aboue erpreſſed, haue practiſed, and dailie do practiſe to turne the happie amitie and loue, which now a good ſpace hath ſtood betwéene the inhabitants of the whole Ile in open hoſtilitie and hatred, without reſpect of neighborhood or kindred, ſtanding betwæne the two princes, or regard had to the benefits that hir maieſtie of England hath beſtowed vpon the king our ſouereigne, and his whole countrie, firſt by planting of true religion within this realme, and next by preſeruing his maieſtie, when as in his minoritie he could not take in hand or enterprize for himſelfe.

To this effect they openlie delt with ſuch perſons, as by all meanes ſought hir maieſties deſtruction, as by the confeſſion of ſundrie hir maieſties rebels latelie executed in England is made manifeſt. But how ſone they perceiued open danger to ariſe, by open dealing with hir enimies, then fraudfullie to illude hir maieſtie, they haue pretended theſe months paſt, in great frendſhip and kindneſſe, promiſing largelie in that behalfe, and offering to capitulate a band offenſiue and defenſiue to ſtand perpetuallie. But in the end, notwithſtanding all theſe liberall promiſes, the effects by erperience declare nothing to haue bæne in their minds but falſhood & crueltie, as by the late murder of the lord Ruſſell is manifeſt to the whole world, who being a yong noble man, for his birth and qualities verie honorable and vertuous, and of great erpectation, & for his earneſt zeale to religion, and good affection to the king our ſouereigne, and to all Scotiſh men in generall, one that merited great praiſe, loue and commendation: yet he was murdered in moſt odious and treaſonable maner, euen when as greateſt kindneſſe and frendſhip was pretended; which cannot but produce mar-uellous ſuſpicion and ſlander, aſwell againſt the king our ſouereigne, as againſt the whole countrie, to his maieſties great diſhonor, and diſcredit of his innocent ſubiects, if condigne iuſtice be not miniſtred vpon the authors and the executors of the horrible crime aforeſaid.

Laſt, which is moſt of all, and neceſſarilie craueth preſent reformation, the foreſaid abuſors couer all theſe enormities with his maieſties name and authoritie, thereby thinking to excuſe themſelues, and to laie the burden on him. And therefore, as it cannot be but verie ſlanderous and dangerous to his maieſtie, if ſuch licentious perſons (who hath alreadie made ſhipwracks of all honeſtie) be ſuffered to remaine in his companie, ſo is it ſhamefull to be reported in other nations, that ſuch a few number of beggerlie fellowes repleniſhed with all vice, ſhould extinguiſh the beautie of the nobilitie, haue empire ouer the whole countrie, & kæpe his maieſtie thrall to authoriſe by his roiall power their abhominable and erecrable facts. For the cauſes aforeſaid and manie others that might be iuſtlie alleged, we of his maieſties nobilitie here preſent, in the feare of God and our ſouereignes obedience, being through Gods frée mercie called to be profeſſors of the bleſſed euangell, and borne councellors to his highneſſe our ſouereigne, bound in duetie not onelie to hazzard, render and renounce our liues, lands, and goods (if næd be) for the ſame euangell and true religion, but alſo in conſcience charged to be carefull of his maieſties welfare, honor, and reputation, and to procure to our abilitie, peace and quietneſſe to him and his realme, hauing our lands and heritages for that effect, holden of his maieſties moſt noble progenitors of worthie memorie.

In conſideration of which great enormities and tyrannies, hauing conuened our ſelues togither for redreſſe and reformation of the ſame, ſeeing the ſuffering thereof hath alreadie wounded the eſtate of true religion, diſhonored his maieſtie, diſturbed the whole realme, and had almoſt diſioined aſwell the hearts of the princes as of the ſubiects of the two nations, we thinke it therefore high time, and we are in duttie and conſcience (all doubt and perill ſet apart) to procure the ſeparation and thruſting awaie of the ſaid deſperate and enorme perſons from about his maieſtie, that his highneſſe being reſtored to his former libertie, maie freelie, peaceablie, and wiſelie gouerne his ſubiects and realme, by aduiſe of graue, modeſt, and indifferent councellors; onelie reſpecting his maieſties ſuertie and preſeruation, to the end that the afflicted church within this land maie be comforted, and all acts latelie made in prediudice of the ſame, maie be ſolemnelie cancelled, and for euer adnulled, his maieſtie reſtored to his former libertie, the bodie of his commonwealth (by puniſhing of vice cheeflie vpon the authors of theſe late miſorders, and maintenance of vertue) maie be once diſburdened of the heauie oppreſſions and iniuries that they haue with no ſmall greefe ſo long ſuſteined, and the happie amitie with England reeſtabliſhed and conſerued, to the high glorie of God, honor of the king our ſouereigne, and vniuerſall contentment of all good men euerie where. In proſecution whereof, we proteſt before God and his holie angels, we ſhall neither ſpare our liues, lands, nor goods, but frankelie hazzard and expend the ſame as næd craueth, vntill the ſaid abuſors be either apprehended or preſented to iuſtice, to ſuffer for their demerits, or elſe (if they cannot be found out) till they be debarred from his maieſties companie, and expelled the realme.

Wherefore we command and charge (in our ſouereigne lords name) all and ſundrie his ſubiects, as swell to burrow as to land, to fortifie and assist this godlie enterprise, and to concurre with vs to that effect, as they will giue testimonie of their affection to the aduancement of true religion, his maiesties suertie and welfare, and the publike quietnesse of the whole realme, certifieng all and sundrie that doth attempt anie thing to the contrarie, or will not take one fold and plaine part with vs, we will repute them as partakers of all vice and iniquitie, assisters of the treasonable conspirators aforesaid, and enimies of true religion, to his maiestie and his authoritie, and to the publike quietnesse betwixt the two realmes, and will vse them in bodies and goods accordinglie. And that all iustices as well lords of sessions as shiriffes, commissioners, and other inferiour iudges sit and administer iustice to the furtherance thereof, according to the lawes of the realme, as they will answer vpon their allegiance and vttermost perill, with certification of the disobeior as is aforesaid.

This assemblie of the nobilitie, and the proclamation thus knowne, the earle of Arrane and others which were in Sterling with the king, placed foure hundred men vpon the wals of the towne to defend the assault. But the earle of Arrane chancellor, knowing that he was the principall person, against whome they directed their force, did secretlie without anie other companie flie from thense to Dunbritaine, escaping the hands of the lords of the religion, whereupon small resistance being made by such as were within Sterling against the assailants, vsing their force by the space of two houres, the earle of Angus and the rest did quietlie enter Sterling and all parts; which being perceiued by such of the nobilitie as were within the towne, they (as the earle of Montrosse, Trawford, Rothosse, Glencarne, Arroll and the Colonell) fled to the castell whither the other faction did chase them. Now when the lords of the religion (for so they of the presbyterie terme them) had fullie gotten possession of the towne of Sterling, they placed their ensignes before the foreblockhouse of the castell, and so ordered the matter, that there was no waie for anie in the castell to escape their hands, for they had by strength inuironed the same, and by siege brought it as some said to that extremitie, that they within were in great default of vittels. Whereupon the king (after agréement made, that persons on each part might passe betwéene to compound the matter) sent forth of the castell vnto the lords of the religion, the maister of Greie his secretarie and sir Lewes Ballentine, iustice Clarke (deputie to the earle of Argile chéefe iustice of Scotland by inheritance) and colonell Steward, desiring three petitions of his nobilitie; the first whereof was, that his life honor and estate might be preserued; that the liues of Crawford, Montrosse and the Colonell, might be preserued; thirdlie, that all things might be transacted peaceablie: on which conditions he would hereafter be ruled by their aduise and counsell. Whereunto the noble men answered, first that the lord knew that they neuer had anie other intention but to preserue his noble person, his honor and estate, and to deliuer his maiestie out of their hands, who vnder his name had so grieuouslie oppressed the church and commonwealth, and therein hazarded as well his life and crowne, as the danger of other of the nobilitie. Wherefore they were onelie there assembled in the feare of God, and loue to his person and their countrie, wholie to endeuour themselues to shew the performance of their obedience and dutie vnto him, and so to shew themselues faithfull and good subiects.

To the second point they answered, that where the liues of such were desired to be preserued, which had disturbed the whole kingdome, and beene instruments of the great confusion in the church & commonwealth, they could do no lesse in respect of the loue and dutie which they bare to the king and their countrie, but vse all meanes possible to bring them to the triall of iustice, thereby to receiue the reward of their demerits. And for the third they would most humblie craue of his maiestie, that these things might be done in most peacefull maner in due time required therefore, wherby all his good subiects might be satisfied, towards the execution whereof they offered their assistance, with the vttermost of their endeuour, because they were assembled and come thither for the doing thereof.

Besides which at the returne of these commissioners, the nobilitie exhibited other three petitions vnto the king, whereof the first was, that the kings maiestie would allow of their intention, subscribe their proclamation (conteining the declaration of their cause) vntill further order were established by the estates, and so agree vnto the reformation of the premisses, & that all the common holds & strengths might be rendred into their hands to be kept as the councell of the ancient nobilitie should appoint, who were there in good number assembled. Secondlie, that the said disquieters of the common-wealth might be deliuered into their custodie, vntill they had receiued their due triall by the law. Thirdlie, that the old gard might be remoued and an other placed of modest, wise, and godlie men. Which petitions being so to the king exhibited, the first was vpon diuers considerations granted, and the castels Dunbarton & Bineile were assigned to the custodie of Iohn lord Hamilton; the castell of Edenburgh was committed to sir James Hume of Codenknolles; the castell of Sterling was restored to the earle of Marre, to whome the custodie thereof did belong by descent of inheritance; the castell of Blackneste to the lard of Dalketh; Tantallan and Dowglasse were deliuered to the earle of Angus. Touching the satisfaction of the second request of the lords, the said earles of Crawford, Montrosse, Clenkarne, Rothosse, Arroll, and colonell Steward, the lords Seton, Leuingstone, Greie, Summerwell, sir William Steward brother to the earle of Arrane, and William Steward capteine of Dunbarton (who had beene taken in the towne of Sterling, when the lords of the religion entred thereinto) were committed to the safe custodie of manie noble men. For the performance of the lords third petition, the old gard was immediatlie remoued, & the maister of Glames was appointed by the consent of the whole nobilitie capteine of the gard, with such gentlemen as the nobilitie and he should chose of those which are alreadie entred into their places and offices.

In the meane time, as is before touched, James Steward earle of Arrane did at the entring of the lords of the religion into the towne of Sterling, flie to the castell of Dunbarton, where he was inclosed, as well by sea as by land, without anie great store of vittels. The bishop of saint Andrews was taken by the scholers of the vniuersitie, and yong men of the towne aforesaid (as was said) to be presented to iustice into the hands of the lords of the religion; and so all capteins were set at libertie, the banished ministers called home (though manie of them still remained in England) and restored to their former offices, dignities, and liuings, and the Iesuits and seminarie priests woonderfullie amazed, who were willinglie minded to flie disguised in mariners attire into the parts beyond the seas. Thus the king granting the requests of the nobilitie, and yéelding to the ſtate of the preſent time, committed himſelfe to the protection of theſe lords of the religion remaining in their cuſtodie, after that they had once entred the caſtell of Sterling.

The king in the cuſtodie of the lords of the religion.

Whereupon much congratulation being made for this returne of thoſe baniſhed lords into Scotland, the queene of England hauing intelligence thereof, did ſend hir ambaſſador William Knolles eſquire marſhall of hir bench into the parts of Scotland, to vnderſtand the parts thereof, and of the maner of the proceeding of theſe noble men with the king: which ambaſſador after his abode and honorable intertainment in that countrie, returned home in December following. In which moneth there was a parlement called at Lithgo, for the full ratifieng and confirming of the reſtitution of theſe lords of the religion: at what time the earle of Arrane was diſplaced both from his earledome of Arrane, and office of chancellorſhip: and the earle of Bothwell was admitted to that office of lord chancellor. Beſides which alſo the cuſtodie of the lunatike earle of Arrane, ſonne of the duke of Chatelerault was taken from the ſame James Steward earle of Arrane, and committed to John lord Hamilton lord of Arbroth, and brother to the lunatike earle, ſometime remaining in the wardſhip of the ſaid John Hamilton, before that the ſame James Steward had gotten the poſſeſſion of that lunatike earle into his owne hands, out of the cuſtodie of the ſame John Hamilton.

William Knolles ſent ambaſſador into Scotland.

The earle Bothwell made chancellor.

But ſomewhat to leaue the lunatike earle in ſafe keeping, we will ſpeake a litle of this James Steward earle of Arrane, and of his wife; who being a woman of delight of change in marriage, was (after the ſecond ſhipwracke) married to this earle of Arrane; for ſhe being one of the daughters of the earle of Atholl, was firſt married to the lord Louet. After which, iudging it better to marrie than to burne (although by the ſequele of the ſame ſhe felt ſmall contentment therein) ſhe bound hir ſelfe with the knot of matrimonie vnto Robert Steward earle of March and biſhop of Cathneſſe; but after finding occaſion of diuorce, the contention and ſute whereof continued verie long, from the ſaid earle, ſhe was in the end ſeparated; and then the third time beſtowed hir ſelfe in marriage vpon this James Steward earle of Arrane, by whome ſhe had iſſue diuerſe ſonnes and daughters, the eldeſt whereof the king tooke from the font and chriſtened.

James Steward earle of Arrane married to the widow of the erle of March.

Thus leauing this erle of Arrane for this time, I thinke it not amiſſe in this place to ſtep aſide from the matters of theſe preſent times; and herein at the aduancement of this earle Bothwell to be lord chancellor of Scotland, to record ſome things touching ſome ſuch perſons as haue (to my knowledge by reading of Scotiſh hiſtories) poſſeſſed that office of chancellorſhip before time, as in an other place before at the mention of an other chancellor I haue diſcourſed of the originall and deriuation of the name of that office. In which this my diſcourſe of the ſucceſſion of chancellors, although I ſhall ſet downe but few perſons in number, & can not make a full continuance of their orderlie ſucceſſion, from their firſt inſtitution vnto this date: yet I ſuppoſe it better to mention thoſe which haue come vnto my hands, thereby to occaſion others hereafter to treat more liberallie of ſuch honorable officers, than vtterlie to drowne them in the pit of forgetfulneſſe. Which treatiſe of the chancellors I am the willinger to deliuer, becauſe I haue done the like (but more amplie) for England, as being better acquainted with our owne than their hiſtories.

The names and times of certeine chancellors of Scotland, gathered out of the hiſtories of that nation.

William Wod biſhop of Dunblaine was chancellor to William king of Scots, which began his reigne in the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand one hundred eightie and fiue, as ſome haue (but Leſleus lib. 6. pag. 226 giueth it to the yeare of our Lord God one thouſand one hundred and three ſcore, whoſe account herein is falſe) and continued in that office at the time of the death of the ſaid William, which fell in the yære of our redemption one thouſand two hundred and fourteene. After whoſe death he was by Alexander the ſecond confirmed in the ſame place of chancellor.

William Wod.

John Lion chancellor of Scotland (in the time of Robert the ſecond of that name, and the firſt of the houſe of the Stewards which ware the crowne) was chancellor of Scotland, who being in great fauor with the ſaid Robert the ſecond, maried the ladie Eliſabeth daughter vnto the ſaid king, with whome he had in franke mariage diuerſe poſſeſſions called Glames, whereby he was called lord of Glames; of which Lion is that ſurname deſcended, who in memorie of that marriage beare in their armes the lions and lillies with the treſſe in ſuch forme as the king of Scotland beareth the ſame, except that their lions be placed in a blacke field, as Holinſhed hath noted. Which Lion being chancellor was ſlaine in the yeare of our Lord one thouſand three hundred and eightie, being about the tenth yeare of the ſame Robert the ſecond, who after baniſhed the earle of Crawford.

John Lion.

Gilbert Grenlaw biſhop of Aberden, being chancellor about the yeare that the word became fleſh, one thouſand foure hundred and eleuen in the vacancie of the kingdome, vnder duke Mordacke, betweene the death of Robert the ſecond (which fell in the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand foure hundred and ſix, and the beginning of the reigne of James the firſt, in the yeare of our Lord God one thouſand foure hundred twentie and ſix) was ſent ambaſſador into France with other noblemen of Scotland, touching which, thus writeth Leſleus lib. 7. pag. 270. Mortuo interea Roberto Scotiæ gubernatore, filius eius Mordacus regni procurator deſignatur. Gilbert Grenlaw.

William Creichton knight, whom Leſleus termeth the wiſeſt man that euer Scotland ſaw, being chancellor to James the firſt, was (in the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand foure hundred thirtie and three, about the ninth yeare of the ſame king James) with the earle of Angus, and Adam Hepborne of Hales, ſent sent to the castle of Dunbar, with letters signed with the kings hand, directed to the keepers of the castle to deliuer the same to the bringers thereof: which the keepers of that castle durst not disobeie, but permitted them to enter accordinglie. After this, in the yeare of Christ one thousand foure hundred thirtie and fiue, and the eleuenth of the same king, he was sent ambassador into Denmarke, where he concluded a sound peace betwéene the nations of Denmarke and Scotland; which good seruice being well weied, he was after the death of James the first, and in the entrance of James the second into the gouernment of Scotland, in the yeare of Christ 1436, confirmed in his office of chancellorship, beside which he had the gouernment of the kings person, and of the castle of Edenburgh committed to his charge. Then by reason of contention which fell betweene sir Alexander Leuingston the gouernour of the realme and this chancellor, they fell to parts taking in the yeare of Christ one thousand foure hundred thirtie and seuen, whereby insued much mischéefe and bloudshed in the realme (as alwaies by my obseruation I haue found to happen during the minoritie and the insufficiencie of kings) at what time the quéene taking part with the gouernor against the chancellor) found meanes by subtiltie to get the king into hir possession out of the hands of the chancellor, after that she had handsomlie trussed vp the king in a tronke like a fardell full of apparell, whereupon the gouernor besieged the chancellor in the castle of Edenburgh, but in the end they agréed that Creichton should still kéepe the castle of Edenburgh and of his office of chancellor.

That done, in the yeare one thousand foure hundred thirtie and nine, and the third yeare of James the second, the chancellor obteined to haue the quéene Dowager, and hir husband James Steward lord of Lorne released out of the prison of Sterling, whither they were committed by the gouernor. Which done the chancellor kéeping in mind the deceit of the quéene, in ouerreaching him, by getting the king out of his possession, and séeing the gouernor to take the whole authoritie on him at his pleasure, did so worke that he found meanes, that he onlie accompanied with foure and twentie persons, did againe get the king (as he was one morning hunting in Sterling parke) into his possession, whom he carried with him into the castle of Edenburgh, wherewith the gouernor was gréeuouslie displeased, but not able to remedie the same, there was an agréement made betwéene the chancellor and him, that the king should remaine in the custodie of the chancellor, and the gouernor continue his office in administrating the affaires of the realme. Whereupon in the yeare of Christ one thousand foure hundred and fortie, and the fourth yeare of James the second, the gouernor and the chancellor assemble a councell of the nobilitie at Edenburgh. In the yeare of Christ one thousand foure hundred fortie and foure, being the eight of the same James the second, both the gouernor and the chancellor (at the persuasion of William earle Dowglas) were remoued from their offices by the king, who being now about fourtéene yeres old, had taken the absolute gouernment of the kingdome vpon him: besides which they were also put from the councell, their friends were banished the court, and they were summoned to appeare before the king, which they refused, not as giltie in conscience, but as fearing the crueltie of their enimies, whereupon they were proclamed rebels and put to the horne, which occasioned William Dowglasse the chancellors great enimie to gather a power and spoile the lands of this William Creichton, for requitall whereof, Creichton gathered a like power, entred the land of Dowglasse, and spoiled the same all that he could, which thing adding further heat to the Dowglasse, caused him to procure the king in the yeare of Christ one thousand foure hundred fortie and fiue, being the ninth yeare of the kings reigne, to demand of Creichton the deliuerie of the castles of Edenburgh and of Creichton, which he denieng to do vntill the king came to full age, had all his goods confiscat, hauing therein no iniurie done vnto him, for as saith Lesleus: Primus omnium sanciuerat Creichtonus, vt qui regi castrum aliquod postulanti restiterit, violatæ maiestatis arcessatur, cuius ille legis pœnam primus subijt, as did he which deuised Phalaris bull. But after when the king had besieged Edenburgh castle nine moneths, Creichton being therein, the same was deliuered with condition, that Creichton should still remaine chancellor, which obteined, he neuer after delt in the affairs of the common welth, whereby growing againe into the kings fauour, he was with others in the yeare of Christ one thousand foure hundred fortie & fiue, being the tenth of James the second, sent ambassador to the duke of Gelderland to obteine Marie the dukes daughter to wife for the king, which he brought to passe. All which notwithstanding in the yeare following he fell againe into the princes disgrace, and was by parlement holden in the yere of Christ one thousand foure hundred fortie and seuen, forfalted, for that his seruants would not deliuer Creichtons house or castle to the king, as before you haue heard. But after as it séemeth, such is the mutabilitie of fortune, he returned into the kings grace, for which in the yeare of Christ one thousand foure hundred and fiftie, he was by the earle Dowglasse (supposing him to be the cause that the king misliked the earle) assaulted one morning as he was comming out of the castle of Edenburgh, from which although wounded, he escaped vnto his castle of Creichton, where in short space after he assembled a power, recouered Edenburgh from the Dowglasse, and had destroied the earle at that present, if he had not shifted awaie more spædilie: who being thus dishonorablie chased from Edenburgh, drew the erle of Crawford and Rosse to ioine with him against Creichton, but he little estéeming thereof and requiting good for euill, did in the yeare of Christ one thousand foure hundred fiftie and three, or a thousand foure hundred fiftie and foure as some haue, procure a pardon for the earle of Crawford, gréeuouslie fallen into the kings displeasure. In which yeare also the king calling a parlement at Edenburgh, the earldome of Murrete was giuen to sir James Creichton, or rather restored to him, from whom it had béene wrongfullie taken by the iniust sentence of William earle of Dowglasse, who had procured it to be assigned to his brother Archibald Dowglasse, although the right remained in the same sir James Creichton. But yet when the same sir James could not kéepe that earledome without the enuie of diuers persons, he surrendred the same into the kings hands. Beside all which at this parlement was George Creichton created earle of Cathnesse, which I thought good to note in this place, because it touched the name of Creichton, whereof I do now intreat by reason of this chancellor.

Lesleus lib. 8. pag. 297.

Andrew Steward lord of Anandale was chancellor of Scotland in the yere of Christ one thousand foure hundred three score and eight, being about the eight yeare of the reigne of king James the third, & was sent with others into Norwete to conclude a mariage with the king of Denmarke, betwéene his daughter Margaret & the king of Scots, which ladie he brought with him into Scotland in Julie, at what time they were married accordinglie. Some yeares after which, that is about the yeare of Christ one one thouſand foure hundred foure ſcore and two, and the two and twentith of James the third, when Alexander Steward Duke of Albanie with the duke of Gloceſter were come vnto Raſkairig with the Engliſh power, this man amongſt others, was ſent to the Engliſh campe to treat with the two dukes, with whom in the end an agréement was made. By which the duke of Albanie, before fled out of Scotland, was reſtored home, and had both honors and offices beſtowed on him; who with this chancellor & other noble men had the gouernment of the kingdome for a certeine ſpace: during which time, this duke the chancellor and others, going to viſit the quéene at Sterling, the duke by the quénes perſuaſion without knowledge of the other, went to Edenburgh, and by force reſtored the king to libertie, before taken and kept in hold by ſome of the nobilitie, which being knowne to the chancellor and the other lords at Sterling, they fled to their owne countries.

Andrew Steward.

James Beton archbiſhop of Glaſcow was chancellor in the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand fiue hundred & thirtéene, being the firſt yeare of king James the fift. This man being of great wiſdome, was appointed amongſt others to aſſiſt the quéene in the gouernment of the realme, whereunto ſhe was for a time aduanced: but the woman not induring to be directed by others, taking quarell againſt the biſhop, did immediatlie after the mariage, performed the firſt of Auguſt, in the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand fiue hundred and fouretéene, betwéene hir and Archibald Dowglaſſe earle of Angus (which this biſhop incountred as much as he could) take the great ſeale from the ſaid biſhop of Glaſcow, at ſaint Johns towne, wher vpon the biſhop got him to Edenburgh, and aſſiſted with manie lords, kept the quéene and hir husband out of that towne, whereby great diſſention and part taking was raiſed amongſt the nobilitie of the realme. But as I gather, peace being made betwéene them, he was againe made chancellor. After this, in the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand fiue hundred and fiftéene, he commeth with the earle of Arrane, who ſubmitteth himſelfe to the gouernor. Shortlie following, the gouernor gaue to this archbiſhop of Glaſcow the abbeie of Arbroth, aſſigning to the earle of Murreis a large penſion out of the ſame, which biſhop being thus in fauor with the gouernor, was (in the yere of Chriſt one thouſand fiue hundred and ſeuentéene in May, when the gouernor went into France) appointed, amongſt others, to haue the rule of the realme vntill his returne. Two yeares after which, the nobilitie being diuided about the quarell of the earle of Angus & Arrane, this biſhop in the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand fiue hundred and ninetéene, being then alſo chancellor, with other noble men of the realme, kept the towne of Glaſcow; but after that, this chancellor who would not come to Edenburgh, the king of England and of France their ambaſſadors came to Sterling, where a peace was proclamed amongſt the nobilitie.

But what can long continue in one ſtate, or what peace will be long imbraced amongſt ambitious minds? ſith in the yeare following, being the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand fiue hundred and twentie, the noble men fell againe to factions: for when diuerſe of the péeres were come to Edenburgh to aid the earle of Angus againſt the earle of Arrane (this chancellor remaining then in the towne) they purſued the earle and chancellor ſo hotlie, that they were both conſtreined to forſake the towne, and to flie through the north Loch, about the thirtith daie of Aprill. But as the euents of quarels be doubtfull, now vp now downe, ſo this archbiſhop not long after this diſgrace, recouered breath, and in Nouember following, did accompanie the regent come out of France to Edenburgh, where was a parlement holden, to ſummon the earle of Angus to appeare; but he refuſing, it was agréed that the earle ſhould paſſe into England there to remaine.

The biſhop thus hauing the better of his enimies, Andrew Forman biſhop of S. Andrews died, in the yeare one thouſand fiue hundred twentie and two, being about the ninth yeare of James the firſt, by occaſion whereof, this chancellor James Beton biſhop of Glaſcow was aduanced to that ſée, and further made abbat of Dumfermling. Upon which new honor, in the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand fiue hundred twentie and foure, he was appointed one of the gouernors of the realme by parlement: but he not poſſeſſing this honor anie long time, the earle of Angus (who had gotten the king into his vſurped gouernment, and denied the deliuerie of the king, being ſent for by this biſhop and the other nobilitie) ſent to the chancellor for the great ſeale, which was deliuered to the meſſengers: vpon which, this biſhop not forgetting the ſame, haſtened the ſentence of diuorce ſued before him, betwéene the quéene and the earle of Angus. Whereof the earle, to reuenge the ſame, did with the king, in the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand fiue hundred twentie and ſir, ſéeke for the quéene and the biſhop of ſaint Andrews: but becauſe they were kept ſecretlie in their friends houſes (ſo that they could not be heard of) he ſpoiled the abbeie of Dumfermling, and the caſtell of ſaint Andrews, taking awaie all that the archbiſhop had. Notwithſtanding which, the archbiſhop kéeping in fauor with the old quéene and the yong king, did in the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand fiue hundred twentie and nine, and the ſirtéenth yeare of James the fift, chriſten James the kings ſonne borne at ſaint Andrews, and not long after, ſurrendered his ſoule to God in the ſaid yeare one thouſand fiue hundred thirtie and nine: of whome it ſhall not gréeue me to ſet downe what Leſleus hath written, which though it be ſomewhat long, yet becauſe it is neceſſarie, I had rather ſet downe the plaine words of the author, than by abridging of them into our our tong, to depriue the author of his due by his owne ſtile: thus therefore he writeth.

James Beton.

Iacobus Betonius archiepiſcopus Santandreapolitanus, qui maximis reipublicæ honoribus ſummáque gloria apud nos quàm diutiſſimè floruerat, ætate iam grandior, naturæ concedebat, ac in æde ſancti Andreæ tumulo honorificè tegebatur. Hic antiſtes quoſdam, quos egregiè charos habuit, viuus conſtituebat, vt in beneficia ſibi mortuo ſufficerétur. In epiſcopatum autem Santandreapolitanum, ac in abbathiam Arbrothenſem, vir ſumma prudentia, & animi magnitudine præſtans Dauid Betonius cardinalis, eius ex fratre nepos, in abbathiam verò Dumfirmlingenſem Georgius Dureus, in alia deníque alij: quam illius voluntatem rex non impediuit, quo minùs illi, quos archiepiſcopus ante obitum conſtituerat, beneficijs liberè fruerentur: ne cuius viui mentem ſemper laudaret, eius mortui voluntatem malitioſè videretur reſcidiſſe. Hic archiepiſcopus præcipuum illius collegij quod nouum Santandreapoli dicitur, partim ſuo ſumptu excitauit, ac maximam pecuniæ vim qua reliqua pars inchoata perpoliretur, teſtato reliquit: verùm pecunia illa in alios vſus poſtea traducta, collegij ius (ne quid acriùs dicam) perierat. Thus much Leſle, and thus much I, touching this chancellor, ſpoken of alſo in my treatiſe of the archbiſhops of ſant Andrews. Leſleus lib. 9. pag. 450.

Gawen Dunbar archbiſhop of Glaſcow, and the kings ſchoolemaiſter, was chancellor as appeareth by Leſleus lib. 9. pag. 399. who in in the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand fiue hundred twentie and two, writeth: Non multò poſt Andreas Formannus epiſcopus copus Santandreapolitanus vitâ ceſſit, huius quàm primũ honore ac titulo inſigniebatur Iacobus Betonus archiepiſcopus Glaſcuenſis, qui quidem archiepiſcopatus omniũ ſumma voluntate ceſſit præſtãtiſſimo cuidam viro Gawino Dunbarro; cui quòd recõditæ eruditionis, ſinceræ vitæ conſilijque grauiſſimi laudibus præſtiterit, regis tenella ætas moribus doctrináque informanda credebatur, quem intimis ſenſibus ita dilexit rex, vt ſui intimi concilij ſocium, regníque cancellarium poſtea illum coaptauerat.

Dauid Beton (the brothers ſonne of James Beton deceaſed archbiſhop of ſaint Andrews) was chancellor of Scotland, who being abbat of Arbroth, was with others ſent ambaſſador into France in the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand fiue hundred thirtie and foure, being the one and twentith yeare of the gouernment of James the fift, for to procure the earle of Vandoſmes ſiſter in mariage for the king; but the ſame tooke not effect, becauſe the king going in perſon into France liked hir not. About three yeares after, which was in the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand fiue hundred thirtie and ſeuen, and the foure and twentith yeare of James the fift, this Dauid was aduanced to the honor of a cardinall, of which title I doo not at this time remember, that euer I haue read anie other to haue inioied but Walter Wardlaw, of whome Onuphrius thus writeth: Walterus epiſcopus Glaſcuenſis presbyter cardinalis creatus, anno Domini 1383, 10 kalend. Ianua. 6 pontificatus Clemẽtis 7, obijt inter annum 1400, & 1409, whome the Scotiſh hiſtories make cardinall ſomewhat before in the yeare one thouſand three hundred fourſcore and two, about the eleuenth yeare of Robert the ſecond (at what time with others he was ſent to Charles king of France as ambaſſador to renew the league betweene France & Scotland) by Paul the third, then pope of Rome, to whom alſo the king of France gaue in commendam the biſhoprike of Miropen: of the making of which Beton cardinall, thus the ſame Onuphrius writeth: Dauid de ſancto Andrea Scotus epiſcopus Miropienſis presbyter cardinalis tituli ſancti Stephani in Cælio monte creatus, anno Domini, 1538, 13 kalend. Ianuar. per Paulum tertiũ, anno pontificatus 13. In which words Onuphrius, and Leſleus following him, refer the creation of this cardinall vnto the yeare one thouſand fiue hundred thirtie and eight, though others attribute it to the yeare one thouſand fiue hundred thirtie and ſeuen. In which yeare one thouſand fiue hundred thirtie and eight, he was with others ſent ambaſſador into France after the death of the quéene, to procure Marie of Lorreine widow ducheſſe of Longuile, and daughter to the duke of Guiſe, to be giuen to king James in mariage; which matter he brought to his deſired effect.

Two cardinals onelie in Scotland.

The nert yeare after, being the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand fiue hundred thirtie and nine, as you haue heard before, he was by his vncle James Beton archbiſhop of ſaint Andrews, & abbat of Arbroth, appointed to ſucceed in the ſame biſhops ſée and abbeie, which he inioied accordinglie: who aduanced with theſe dignities, did after the death of James the fift, falling in the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand fiue hundred fortie and two, labor by policies and other extraordinarie deuiſes to be gouernor of the realme, during the minoritie of the yoong quæne; but he was diſappointed thereof by the nobilitie, who choſe the earle of Arrane to that function; by meanes whereof, there fell continuall diſſentions betweene the nobilitie, which ended not vntill this cardinall was ſlaine as after it ſhall appeare. For ſhortlie after in the ſaid yeare one thouſand fiue hundred fortie and two, being committed to ward (in the caſtle of Dalketh vnder the cuſtodie of the lord Seton, ſmallie fauoring the French faction) becauſe he would haue perſuaded the nobilitie to forſake the motion of the K. of England, determining to marie his ſon prince Edward to the yoong quéene of Scots. But the cardinall did not long remaine there; for by the gouernors appointment he was remoued to his owne caſtell of S. Andrews, hauing watch and ward about him, to ſee him ſafelie kept, in which place alſo he did not long continue: for corrupting his keepers he found meanes to eſcape; which doone, in the yeare one thouſand fiue hundred fortie and three, he came to the coronation of the yoong queene, and ſhortlie after perſuaded the earle of Arrane the gouernor to leaue the part of the king of England, and wholie to become French.

Now at the coronation, the cardinall ordered all things, appointing euerie officer, and growing into great credit, did in like ſort at other times diſpoſe of the common-wealth as ſeemed beſt liking vnto him. Wherevpon, the earle of Leneux taking part with the Engliſh, oppoſed himſelfe againſt the gouernor and the cardinall, whereby followed ſharpe warres, the cardinall ſtill ſupporting and counſelling the gouernor: which troubles being ſomewhat abated, by reaſon the earle of Leneux was gone into England, the cardinall in the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand foure hundred fortie and foure, receiued the patriarch of Ieruſalem arriued in Scotland. In which meane time, there was great contention betweene the cardinall and the archbiſhop of Glaſcow, for bearing their croſſes in the others iuriſdiction: wherevpon they fell from words to ſwords, which the gouernor appeaſed: that doone, the patriarch the popes legat comming to Rome, procured the legantine power to be granted to this cardinall, which he long inioied not. For being greatlie enuied by reaſon of theſe honors & ſome grieuous facts, certeine perſons in the yeare one thouſand fiue hundred fortie and ſir (after that he had burned George Wiſchart a learned man, condemned at ſaint Andrews by an aſſemblie of biſhops) did the thirteenth daie of May (when they had ſecretlie in the morning entered the caſtell of ſaint Andrews where the cardinall was) expell the porters of the foreſaid caſtell, the cardinals ſeruants, and ſlue the cardinall naked as he came to meete them, whoſe death ſir James Kiermount prouoſt of ſaint Andrews thought to haue ſtaied by aſſembling a power therefore: but after that he ſaw the cardinals dead bodie hanged out ouer the wals, he made no further attempt. The death of which cardinall comming to the gouernors eares, he baniſhed the author thereof, as writeth Leſleus in theſe words: Gubernator, quòd nec cognato ſuo ſanguinis coniunctio, nec cardinali dignitas, nec cancellario maieſtas ac domus propria, ad impiorum inſidias effugendas quicquam profuerit, ægerrimè ferre. Conſilio itaque Huntlei ac Argadij ſuaſu indicto, in cædis auctores capitis proſcriptioniſque ſententia data eſt.

Leſleus lib. 9. pag. 482.

George Gordon earle of Huntleie, ſonne of John Gordon, being chancellor of Scotland, in the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand fiue hundred fortie and ſeauen, falling about the fift yeare of the reigne of Marie quéen of Scots, was taken priſoner by the Engliſh at Muſkelborow field, who pitieng the miſerie of diuerſe of his countriemen, wounded and taken at the ſame battell, did vndertake for their ranſome; wherevpon they were permitted to depart, and left to ſhift for themſelues as well as they might. In the nert yeare, which was the yeare of Chriſt (as hath Leſleus one thouſand fiue hundred fortie and eight) the protector of Scotland ſent Carnegie knight and senator to the protector of England, to ranſome Huntleie, or at the leaſt to obteine that his wife wife might come vnto him. Whereupon the earle was with his keepers permitted to come to Norphet, where expecting his wife, he thought vpon his eſcape, and from thenſe after ſupper, deceiuing his warders, he fled by night into Scotland, through the aid of one George Carre his deere friend, who prouided him ſpeedie horſſes therefore. The earle being thus come into Scotland, was ioifullie interteined of the queene, the gouernor, and the other nobilitie; but chiefelie of his wife, whoſe earneſt deſire to ſee him was the occaſion of his eſcape. But as all ioie hath ſome hard hap for the moſt part attending vpon the ſame; ſo this earle did after feele the force of like miſfortune. For about ſeuen yeares after, in the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand fiue hundred fiftie and foure, he was againe committed to priſon as after ſhall appeare. Before which, in the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand fiue hundred and fiftie, he with other noble men goeth into France with the queene mother of Scotland; but before that iourne, whileſt he was preparing for the ſame, he commanded William Mackintoſch chiefe of the Glenchattins to be executed at Stratbolgie, for a priuie conſpiracie made againſt him, being the kings lieutenant in the north parts. Which thing raiſed a great commotion like to haue ſucceeded to great ſlaughters (in that the earle of Taſſels and manie others fauored Mackintoſch) if the wiſdome of the queene mother had not appeaſed the ſame.

After that the queene mother had bin in France, ſhe in the ſame yeare of Chriſt one thouſand fiue hundred and fiftie, returned into Scotland through England: but the earle Huntleie warilie fearing to fall into the dangers of the Engliſh (whome he thought would not forget his eſcape from them, returned by ſea into his owne countrie: after which, when he had beene about foure yeares in Scotland, the queene mother regent in the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand fiue hundred fiftie and foure, ſent this earle Huntleie into Yeitland to take John Mudziad: but returning without him, he was committed to priſon in Edenburgh the eleuenth of October: at what time the regent changed all the officers, tooke awaie the great ſeale from this earle Huntleie the chancellor, and gaue it to monſieur Rubie a Frenchman, which monſieur Rubie thus made keeper of the great ſeale in the ſaid yeare of Chriſt one thouſand fiue hundred fiftie and foure, and the twelfth yeare of Marie queene of Scots, had the vſe of the ſame ſeale in the place of the earle Huntleie then chancellor in ward. But the earle of Huntleie after being ſet at libertie, it ſeemeth that he was ſtill chancellor. For beſides that Leſleus ſaith that he was reſtored to all his dignities (except the earldome of Murreie, whereof he had a gift of inheritance, the earldome of Marre, the farmes of Orkenete & Yeitland, and the queenes land at Straitſdie, all which he gaue for his libertie) he is alſo by the Scotiſh hiſtories named ſtill chancellor, in the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand fiue hundred threeſcore and one, and the nineteenth yeare of queene Marie, being then by the nobilitie amongſt other, choſen to be of the priuie councell. Of whome before this alſo Leſleus writeth, that in the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand fiue hundred fiftie and nine, the queene hauing receiued a bill of ſupplication from the proteſtants: Illa hunc protinus libellum ſupplicem per Huntleum regni cancellarium ſynodo exhibendum, vt de illis definiret, reddidit.

Monſieur Rubie keper of the great ſeale.

After this, in the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand fiue hundred three ſcore and two, in October being the twentith yeare of the ſame queene, he was in the faction betweene him and others (for diuerſe miſdemeanors alſo, vpon his comming with an armie to Cornethie in Mar) ſlaine, and John Gordon his ſonne taken priſoner, brought to Aberdine the nine and twentith of October, and there beheaded. Now for the other chancellors which followed in ſucceſſion of time, becauſe they fall yet freſh in memorie, and ſome mention is made of them in this my continuation of theſe annals; I do not intend to make anie double recitall of them in that place, being a thing ſuperfluous ſo to do; & therefore, & becauſe Omne nimium vertitur in vitium (whereto the lawiers agree ſaieng, that Fruſtra fit per plura quod fieri poteſt per pauciora) I will referre thee for the ſupplement of this title of the chancellors, to the ſame continuation of my annals, there at thy pleaſure to collect and diſpoſe them, as beſt ſhall ſerue thine owne memorie or knowledge.

Therefore leauing them, and returning to the conſideration of other things, which following time hath begotten and brought forth in Scotland: we ſaie, that as the queene of England had before time, after the taking of Sterling, ſent maiſter Knolles into Scotland to vnderſtand the eſtate of theſe times: ſo in like ſort the Scots with like congratulation, diſpatched a meſſenger vnto the queens of England, by whome ſhe might haue knowledge of ſuch things as were after done. For maiſter William Keith one of the chamber to the king, was ſent from the king of Scots to the queene of England in the ſame moneth of December, a little before Chriſtmas with letters, who comming to the court then remaining at Greenewich, did there make deliuerie of the ſame letters. During whoſe abode here in England, ſome of thoſe which had before afflicted the earles of Angus and Marre, againſt ſuch as ſeemed to nouriſh the king in the Romane religion, fell from their former opinion, & either for loue to the ſame Romane religion, or for malice to other of the nobilitie, or for a deſire to be ſingular to themſelues, imbraced the aboliſhed doctrine of the pope, & ſet vp the ceremonie of Italie. Amongſt whome, one, not of the meaneſt, the lord Maxwell, who had maried the earle of Angus his ſiſter, did in Januarie aduance the ſame, and heard maſſe at Linclouden a mile from Dumfries, contrarie to the publike lawes appointed in Scotland. Wherof intelligence being brought vnto the king, he forthwith diſpatched a meſſenger vnto him, commanding him to ſurceaſe the ſame. But the lord Maxwell perſiſting in that his former action, was (in the end apprehended, and vpon the refuſall of an oth touching the ſame, according to the lawes of Scotland) committed to priſon in Edenburgh, where he long remained.

William Keith ſent into England.

The lord Maxwell heareth maſſe.

Theſe things thus done in Scotland, the aforenamed maiſter Keith departed from London towards that countrie, about the foure and twentith of Januarie, with anſwer that hir maieſtie of England would ſhortlie ſend an ambaſſador into Scotland, who ſhould fullie ſatiſfie the king in all things, and further deliuer vnto him the full of hir maieſties determination. Whereupon Thomas Randolph eſquier, a perſon who had manie times before executed that function in thoſe countries, and was well acquainted both with the ſtate & maners of the people, was by the queene of England diſpatched into thoſe parts; who being ſo authoriſed, tooke his iourneie from London towards Scotland on the eight daie of Februarie. After which, in Aprill following, maiſter Archibald Dowglaſſe (one that had beene ſometime of the ſeſſion or parlement of Edenburgh) hauing remained ſome yeares here in England, vpon diſpleaſures which the king of Scots conceiued againſt him, did make his returne into his owne countrie, where he behaued himſelfe ſo wiſelie, wiſelie, that he obteined great fauor after his returne home. In this yeare, the preſbyterie (as they had manie times done before, but eſpeciallie in the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand fiue hundred fourefcore and three, which I thought to note in this place, becauſe I would not often vſe repetition of one thing done at ſeuerall times in ſo manie places) did excommunicat their metropolitan the archbiſhop of S. Andrews, and the reſt of the biſhops alſo, becauſe they would not in all their actions, ſupport and confirme the doctrine which the preſbyterie had eſtabliſhed. Which excommunication the preſbyterie did the more boldlie, becauſe they were ſupported by the aſſiſtance of the maiſter of Lindſeie, a great enimie to this Patrike Adamſon biſhop of ſaint Andrews.

But the king in the beginning did aſſiſt him againſt them, and the archbiſhop did in like ſort thunder an excommunication againſt them. Which diuiſion not being meete to be in the cleargie, who ought to be (as the apoſtles were) of one hart, and of one mind, will in the end as Chriſt ſaith, bring the ſame realme to confuſion: for Omne regnum in ſe diuiſum deſolabitur; which muſt needes be, where euerie man will be a lord, & that the inferior of the clergie will neither acknowledge nor obeie anie ſuperiors. In which place, ſith I haue mentioned Patrike Adamſon the archbiſhop of ſaint Andrews, becauſe I ſhall not haue occaſion to ſpeake anie more of him, I will here ſet downe a collection of all the archbiſhops of that ſée.

A Cathalog of the archbiſhops of ſaint Andrews, collected out of the hiſtories of Scotland.

THe Scots ſéeking meanes to rid themſelues from ſubiection of the biſhop of Yorke, who was the metropolitane of Scotland, did in the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand foure hundred threeſcore and fouretéene obteine of the pope that they might haue a metropolitane ſée within themſelues, by reaſon of the continuall wars which was betweene the two nations; during which they could neither vſe appellations to their metropolitane, nor haue other biſhops conſecrated. Whereupon the pope erected the church of S. Andrews into an archbiſhoprike in the time of king James the third, touching which, thus writeth Lelleus, lib. 8. pag. 317. Hoc anno (which was the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand foure hundred threeſcore and fourteene) Patricius Grahamus ſedis Andreapolitanæ eccleſiæ epiſcopus, crebris litteris ac nuntijs a papa efflagitauit, vt metropolitana poteſtas in diui Andreæ ciuitate figeretur: iniquũ eſſe enim contendit, vt Scoti ab Eboracenſi epiſcopo tanquam primate pẽderent, cùm propter crebra bella (quibus ſe Scoti & Angli mutuò laceſſunt) Scotis ad illum non pateretur tutus acceſſus, nec liberum ius, præſertim in appellationibus. Annuit ſummus pontifex, vt Andreapolitano deinceps epiſcopo poteſtas metropolitana incumbat. Dies indulto pontifici promulgandi menſe Septembri dicta eſt, atque maxima populi nobiliúmque lætitia celebrata. Epiſcopi reliqui Grahami odio flagrantes, illius authoritatem repudiant, regíſque animum ingenti pecunia (which was as other authors ſaie, eleuen thouſand marks) occupant, ne Grahami partibus ſtuderet. Interea præſules Romã mittunt qui ſui defenſionem contra Grahamum ſuſcipiunt. But in the end they did not preuaile. Graham was made archbiſhop.

Patrike Graham being biſhop of ſaint Andrews and the firſt archbiſhop of that ſée, was after his aduancement to that title depriued in this ſort. In the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand foure hundred threeſcore and ſeuentéene, pope Xiſtus the fourth of that name ſent a legat called Hulman into Scotland, which ſhould diſplace this Patrike the archbiſhop of ſaint Andrews, condemned by the ſentence of the pope and the cardinals for an heretike, ſchiſmatike, ſimoniake, wherupon he was depriued of all eccleſiaſticall dignitie, and commanded to perpetuall priſon; in whoſe place was William Schewes choſen, to whoſe cuſtodie and diſpoſition this Patrike was committed, after which Graham being remoued for his ſafe impriſonment firſt to ſaint Colms Ile, then to Dumfermeling, and laſtlie to Locheleuine, there in the end he died, and was buried in ſaint Sarffis or Seruiſianus Ile in Locheleuine after that he had béene three yeares archbiſhop. Leſleus. lib. 8. pag. 318.

William Schewes being created archbiſhop of ſaint Andrews in the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand foure hundred threeſcore and eightéene as ſome haue, or one thouſand foure hundred threeſcore and nineteene as others haue, in the Holie rood houſe in Edenburgh, in the preſence of king James and manie of the nobilitie receiued the pall, as the enſigne of his metropolitane power, being declared legat and primat of Scotland, at what time he was not withſtood by anie of the other biſhops, who being eſtranged from ſhewing anie fauor to Graham, did often infringe his authoritie, and in the end expelled the ſame Graham from his archiepiſcopall ſée. After which in the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand foure hundred fourefcore & two, this archbiſhop Schewes fled into his owne countrie, and after at the requeſt of the king reſigned his archbiſhoprike, contenting himſelfe with the biſhoprike of Murrie. William Schewes.

Andrew Steward vncle to king James the third was vpon the reſignation of William Schewes made archbiſhop of ſaint Andrews, after which in the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand foure hundred foure ſcore and foure the king ſent this archbiſhop ambaſſador to Rome for the obteining of certeine priuileges, which he brought to effect. In the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand foure hundred fourefcore and eleuen, in the time of king James the fourth, about the third yeare of his reigne was great contention betweene the archbiſhops of ſaint Andrews and Glaſcow, touching both their authorities: which when it had drawen manie of the nobilitie into diuers factions, it was ceaſed by the king for a certeine time, vntill all doubt thereof might be taken awaie, by deciding the ſame by the canon law before eccleſiaſticall iudges. Then in the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand fiue hundred and ſeuen, being about the nineteenth yeare of James the fourth, the biſhop of ſaint Andrews with the earle of Arrane were ſent ambaſſadors into France. Andrew Steward. Leſleus, 1483

Alexander Steward baſtard ſonne to king James the fourth, was made archbiſhop of ſaint Andrews in the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand fiue hundred and ten, about the two and twentith of the reigne of the ſame James the fourth: this man hauing long ſtudied with Eraſmus in Germanie, and in the low countries was aduanced to this ſée of the archbiſhoprike when he was yet in Flanders; who hauing intelligence thereof by his frends, came forthwith into Scotland, where he was ioifullie receiued by the king, the nobilitie, & his kindred. He was ſlaine together with his father king James the fourth at Floden field, in the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand fiue hundred and thirtéene. After which, John Hepburne prior of ſaint Andrews ſtronglie beſieging the caſtle of ſaint Andrews, forced the ſame to be yéelded vnto him. The cauſe of which beſiege grew, that Hepburne being choſen biſhop of ſaint Andrews by his canons of that church (whereunto the whole nobilitie were Alexander Steward. Leſleus. lib. 8. pag. 353.

were helpers) was hindered to poſſeſſe that archbiſhoprike, by ſuch ſtipendarie people of Galwine Dowglaſſe as kept the caſtle; whereupon the quæne and the earle of Angus, after that they vnderſtood how the caſtle was by force come into the hands of Hepburne, did take in euill part that he who was ſo troubleſome vnto them, ſhould aſcend to ſo high a dignitie, and that Galwine Dowglaſſe ſo déerelie to them beloued, and to whom they had giuen that biſhoprike ſhould be helpleſſe of the recouerie therof. Lesl. pag. 373.

Whereupon the quæne and the duke of Albanie diligentlie labored by ambaſſadors ſent to Rome, that a third perſon (ſith Galwine Dowglaſſe could not obteine it) might be aduanced thereunto, which third man was Andrew Forman biſhop of Murrie: further requiring therewithall that he might be abbat of Dumfermling, & Aberbroth, which in the end with much intreatie they obteined of the pope.

Andrew Forman.

Andrew Forman biſhop of Murrie was at Edenburgh by the popes buls on the eighth kalends of Januarie in the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand fiue hundred and fiftéene (being about the ſecond yeare of the reigne of James the fift) declared archbiſhop of S. Andrews, and abbat of Dumfermeling and Aberbroth. Whereupon the prior of ſaint Andrews before named, ſtill contending that he was archbiſhop, both in reſpect of the election of the couent, and the conſent of the nobilitie, did labor all he could againſt Forman, appealing him to Rome, for which cauſe he with the lord Hales and other his frends came to Edenburgh to defend the matter, at what time the lord Hume chamberlaine of Scotland and ſuch others as openlie aſſiſted Forman, did oppoſe themſelues againſt the prior, which nobilitie (becauſe they were great in the court) did the more moleſt and hinder Hepburne, ſhortlie after by publike edict (and proclamation of the king) baniſhing the prior & his followers. Hepburne being ſtriken with the ſharpnes of that precept, did priuilie depart the towne, and the prior went to Rome, hoping by the popes authoritie to wreſt from Forman the archbiſhoprike, which he could not obteine by violence. But how he ſped at Rome I do not know, for I onelie find this, that in the yeare following, being the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand fiue hundred and ſirtéene, about the third yeare of the ſame James the fift, that the gouernor perceiuing that all theſe contentions, hatreds, and diuiſions of the nobilitie did ariſe by theſe bralles, which were betweene Forman and Hepburne for the ſée of ſaint Andrews, deſired to cure this gréeuous wound made in the commonwealth. Wherefore he perſuaded Andrew Forman that he ſhould reſigne all his eccleſiaſticall benefices into his hands in an open aſſemblie at Edenburgh, for by that meanes the gouernour thought that he might pacifie the minds of the nobilitie, and vtterlie root out thoſe breaches of diſſention. Whereupon there was a daie appointed to the nobilitie to aſſemble: at what time Andrew Forman frælie reſigned to the gouernor the duke of Albanie all his eccleſiaſticall promotion, to be diſpoſed at the dukes pleaſure. In conſideration thereof, the duke beſtowed the archbiſhoprike of ſaint Andrews and the abbeie of Dumfermling vpon the ſame Andrew Forman, and gaue the biſhoprike of Murrie to James Hepburne (greatlie fauored of the earle Bothwell and the competitor of Forman) being thereunto ſubſtitute by John Hepburne prior of ſaint Andrews in place of the ſaid John, to whom moreouer the duke appointed a yerelie penſion of a thouſand marks, to be paied by the ſame Forman out of the abbeie of Dumfermling. After which, about ſix yeares or ſomewhat leſſe, this Forman departed his life, being in the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand fiue hundred twentie and two, and the ninth yeare of king James the fift, to whom ſucceeded James Beton.

James Beton archbiſhop of Glaſcow and chancellor of Scotland, was made archbiſhop of ſaint Andrews (as is before touched) after the death of Andrew Forman, hauing therewith the abbeie of Dumfermling, as his predeceſſor before had poſſeſſed it, of whom ſée more in my diſcourſe of the chancellors of Scotland. James Beton.

Dauid Beton brother to the ſame James Beton was after the death of the laſt archbiſhop of ſaint Andrews named to that ſée by his brother before his death, which place he poſſeſſed accordinglie, after the death of the ſame James Beton. Of this man being a cardinall I haue ſpoken more liberallie in my diſcourſe of the chancellors of Scotland. Dauid Beton.

John Hamilton (brother to the gouernour) being abbat of Paſlate, was by the ſame gouernour in the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand fiue hundred fortie and ſix, being about the fourth yeare of Marie quæne of Scots made archbiſhop of S. Andrews, after that he had returned out of France (where he applied his ſtudie) in the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand fiue hundred fortie & thrée, being the firſt or ſecond of quæne Marie of Scotland. This man comming out of France, paſſed through England, and hauing other learned men in his companie, did viſit the king of England, of whome he was moſt honourablie and courteouſlie receiued. From whenſe going into Scotland he was made treaſuror, which office he kept as long as his brother was gouernour, whome he did further in all good counſels at home, and ſaue & defend in the wars abroad. Then in the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand fiue hundred fiftie and nine, being the ſeauentéenth of quæne Marie, he was with the quæne beſieged in Leith. After ſtill following the quæenes part, he with others méeteth hir in the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand fiue hundred ſixtie and ſix, at Muſkelborow, and ſo attendeth on hir, who not long after in the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand fiue hundred ſeuentie & one, being about the fourth yeare of James the firt, was taken in the caſtell of Dunbritaine, and ſent priſoner into Sterling, where being examined by the regent Matthew earle of Leneux, about the murther of Henrie king of Scots, ſonne to the ſaid Matthew, he was there drawne, hanged, and quartered, being the firſt archbiſhop that I haue yet heard of that ſuffered ſo ignominious a death. John Hamilton.

Patrike Adamſon alias Conſtance ſucceéded John Hamilton in the archbiſhoprike of ſaint Andrews, who poſſeſſing this place at this daie, and hauing occaſioned me to ſpeake of him in ſeuerall places in this my continuance of the annales of Scotland, is héere to be ouerpaſſed, and therefore I referre thée to the ſame annales, if thou deſire to know what I haue ſaid of him. ¶ Thus knitting vp the catalog of the archbiſhops of S. Andrews, we ſaie that as you haue heard before, that in Februarie laſt Thomas Randolph eſquier was ſent ambaſſador from the quæne of England into Scotland, ſo he ſtill remaining there a long time in that countrie diſpatcht his ambaſſage to good effect. During whoſe aboade there, there was an aſſemblie holden at Edenborough in Maie, wherein theſe things which follow were concluded vpon for the eſtabliſhing and order of the ſame commonwealth. Patrike Adamſon.

The articles concluded in the aſſemblie holden at Edenburgh in Maie.

FIrſt, the whole realme was diuided into 52 preſbyteries, & the number of miniſters and churches appointed to euerie preſbyterie.

2 That there ſhall be two prouinciall aſſemblies in the yeare in euerie prouince, the firſt tueſdaie of October and Aprill.

3 There ſhall be one generall aſſemblie in the yeare, the firſt of October nert inſuing.

4 All aſſemblies dоо conſiſt of theſe perſons, the paſtor, doctor, and elders, & all the three to haue votes, as well in the preſbyteries prouinciall as generall aſſemblies: and that all ſuch as haue anie ſutes in the aſſemblies may ſée and here, but giue no vote except they be of the number of the three afore ſpecified.

5 That there was onelie foure offices in the church, the paſtor, doctor, elder and deacon, and that the name of biſhop was onlie proper to the paſtor or miniſter, and that he had eſpeciall charge and function in the church, but no greater than a common paſtor.

6 Item, that viſitation in the church was lawfull, and at this time neceſſarie, in reſpect of the elderſhip as yet is not lawfullie planted, and that this viſitation did apperteine onelie to a paſtor or paſtors ſent from the aſſemblie, and not elſe.

7 That whenſoeuer the aſſemblie maketh mention of a biſhop, they meane onelie S. Paules biſhop and none other.

8 That the receiuing of preſentations, giuing of collations, triall of miniſters, depoſing them for iuſt cauſes, ſhall be in the power of the moſt learned and ſoundeſt iudgement of two preſbyteries, and this to ſtand vntill the preſbyteries be better erected.

9 That a commiſſioner appointed by the generall aſſemblie, being a paſtor, as paſtor ſhall be tried and cenſured in life and doctrine by the preſbyterie, or prouinciall aſſemblie, but in reſpect of his commiſſion, he ſhall be tried by the generall aſſemblie, of whome he receiued the ſame.

10 If he admit or dо any thing without conſent of his aſſemblie, it ſhall be of no effect, and a iuſt cauſe of his depoſition.

11 The power which he ſhall receiue ſhall be Ordinis cauſa non iuriſdictionis.

12 Commiſſion appointed by the prouinciall or generall aſſemblies to viſit, ſhall viſit preſbyteries or particular churches, alwaies not preiudging the power of the preſbyterie within the bounds of their viſitation.

13 The viſitors appointed by the generall aſſemblie for this preſent to ſtand for one yeare, and thereafter as the aſſemblie ſhall appoint.

14 That no commiſſion giuen by anie in times paſt before the date of this aſſemblie ſhall be vaileable, but ſuch onlie as the ſaid aſſemblie ſhall appoint.

In which aſſemblie alſo it ſéemeth that the kings maieſtie made certeine requeſts, to haue ſomewhat eſtabliſhed concerning the biſhop of ſaint Andrews, whereupon theſe things were concluded againſt him, and he brought to ſubſcribe the ſame, to the preiudice of his metropolitane iuriſdiction ouer the reſt of the clergie of his crowne.

The meanes taken in this generall aſſemblie, touching the biſhop of S. Andrews, at the deſire of the kings maieſtie.

IF the biſhop by his owne handwriting or perſonall appearance in the aſſemblie, will in Gods preſence denie, that euer he publikelie profeſſed or meant in anie ſort to claime a ſupremaſie, or to be iudge ouer other perſons and miniſters, or euer auowed the ſame to haue a ground in Gods word: and that if he had ſo donne, it had béene great error and againſt his conſcience and knowledge.

2 If he will denie, that in the laſt ſynodall aſſemblie he claimed to be iudge thereunto, and that if he had donne it, that he erred in it, and in his impious behauiour or contempt of the ſaid ſynod and his brethren, in that he will remit him to the brethren preſent, and craue pardon for the ouerſight thereof, and promiſe good behauiour in the time to come.

3 If he will promiſe to claime no further than he iuſtlie may by God his word, and according to the laſt conference, and endeuour himſelfe in all behauiour to ſhew himſelfe in all time to come a moderat perſon, and ſo ſerue, as that he may prooue agreeable for a biſhop preſcribed by S. Paule, and ſo ſubmit his life and doctrine to the iudgement and cenſure of the generall aſſemblie without anie reclamation, prouocation, or appellation from the ſame in anie time to inſue.

These things being demanded at the archbiſhops hands, he was contented to yéeld to them by ſubſcribing his name with his owne hand thereunto, which donne, the ſaid aſſemblie at Edenburgh did for their part in like ſort publiſh their dutifull mind & obedience to his maieſtie, in annulling the proceſſe of excommunication againſt the ſaid biſhop of ſaint Andrews, and to continue him in his former eſtate, as followeth.

The decree of the aſſemblie at Edenburgh, concerning the reſtitution of the biſhop of S. Andrews.

FOr his maieſties ſatisfaction, and to giue teſtimonie with what good will we would obeie his heires ſo farre as we ought, or in conſcience we may, and for good hope we haue in his maieſties fauourable concurrence in building vp of the houſe of God within this realme, and bicauſe the proceſſe of excommunication was laid, and the ſentence pronounced during the time of the conference, whereupon his maieſtie hath taken occaſion of offenſe, which for manie good cauſes were conuenient to be remoued, we will forbeare to examine the ſaid proceſſe, or decide it, whatſoeuer prouocation or appellation, or to call in doubt the legalitie or forme of the ſaid proceſſe, or to condemne the ſaid ſynod. Yet for the reſpects afore ſaid, and vpon good and weightie conſiderations, we hold the ſaid proceſſe and ſentence as vnlaied, vndeducted or pronounced, and reſtore the ſaid biſhops in all reſpects ſo farre as may concerne the ſaid proceſſe and ſentence of excommunication in the former eſtate he was immedatlie before the ſame, like as no proceſſe nor ſentence had bеen laid and deducted againſt him. Prouiding alwaies he obſerue what hath béene promiſed by him in the premiſſes, & behaue himſelfe dutifullie in his vocation in all times comming.

This donne the earle of Rutland (hauing a commiſſion directed to him, to William lord Euers, and to the ſame Thomas Randolph) went to Berwike as hir maieſties ambaſſadours, to confirme that league betwéene the two nations of England and Scotland, which the ſaid Randolph had before concluded. Whereupon the commiſſioners of England, the earle of Rutland, and the lord Euers, from out of England, and Thomas Randolph from out of Scotland, came to Berwike the place appointed where this league ſhould be fullie eſtabliſhed. For the meeting of whome at the ſame place, were commiſſioners of like number, and equall honor and authoritie, appointed to come to Berwike for Scotland. But ſome delaie being made of their appearance, and manie excuſes therewith to interteine time by meſſengers vſed, at the length commeth to Berwike Francis earle Bothwell, Robert lord Boid, and and sir James Hume of Colden Knowles knight and baron, commissioners for the king of Scots, who there meeting with the foresaid commissioners of England, did conclude a league defensiue and offensiue betweene these two nations: which done, the earle of Rutland returned home, and maister Randolph departed againe into Scotland to take his leaue of the king, whome when he had saluted he left, and returning into England came to London about the fifteenth of August, where I will now leaue him. But before I turne my pen to any of the persons of Scotland, I determine to set downe certeine verses which Buchanan dedicated vnto him. For although they be matter impertinent to this historie of Scotland, yet bicause they were written to him (here mentioned) by a Scot, and are meet for the instructions of the yong Scotish king, I will not refuse to set them downe in this sort as followeth:

Sæpe tibi Randolphe iubes me pingere regem,
Qualem optem, tribuat sic mihi vota Deus.
Accipe: sit primùm veræ pietatis amator,
Effigiem summi se putet esse Dei,
Pacem amet: & si res poscat, sit ad arma paratus,
Exuat in victos arma, odiúmque simul,
Nolo nimis parcus, nimiùm sit nolo benignus,
Vtráque regno æqua est exitiosa lues,
Non sibi sed populo sese putet esse creatum,
Et se communem ciuibus esse patrem: Puniat inuitus, cùm res iubet esse seuerum,
Publica cùm poscent commoda lenis erit.
Viuat, vt exemplar populo sit recta sequendi,
Sit vultus prauis terror, amórque bonis,
Excolat impensè ingenium, corpúsque modestè,
Luxuriem frænet cum ratione pudor:
Iam tacitus tecum, tentas me fallere, tanquam
In tabula nostram qui mihi pingit heram.

During the time of the abode of this Randolph in Scotland, there was an ambassador sent from the king of France to the king of Scots, which ambassador being called monsieur D'annauall had at this time small interteinment in Scotland; where not staieng long after that Randolph was come into England, he also came hither out of Scotland, to the end to passe through this countrie into France. This summer Montgomerie erle of Eglinton, whose father died not manie yeares before, hauing married the daughter of the lord Boid was slaine in this sort. The earle being a goodlie yong gentleman, and like to proue a good member of his countrie, as manie of his ancestors had done before, did for his delight ride forth on hunting (a warlike exercise, & much vsed by the Scots) about fiue or six miles frõ his owne castell, where hauing satisfied his pleasure, he returned home. But hauing wait laid for him by an ambush of his enimies, he was in his iorneie towards his castell intercepted by the lord of Glencarns brother, with the lards of Hacket and Robertlands, and some of the surnames of the Wuirs; at what time he was most miserablie slaine by them to their great dishonor, and his countries discommoditie. After which, in September Archibald Dowglasse (who as you heard before departing this realme in April last, was admitted to come into his owne countrie) was sent ambassador from the king of Scots to the quéene of England; in whose companie were attendant on him William Purro one of the kings chamber, and Richard Dowglasse nephue vnto the same Archibald. Which ambassador after his comming into England, had full audience at the court then remaining at Windsore, on the first of the same moneth of September, with whome remaining still here in England, at the writing hereof, expecting the end of his ambassage; I will set end to this slender discourse. Thus hauing patched vp a Rapsodie of some few things done in Scotland since the yeare of our Lord one thousand fiue hundred seuentie and one, in which I began my annals of that countrie so nakedlie deliuered by me, I determine to knit vp all what soeuer is set downe before, with a catalog of such writers of Scotland, as either by mine owne search in histories, or by others intelligence by conference haue come vnto my hand. The which I haue bene the willinger to do, because I would obserue that course in Scotland which I haue done in my additions to the historie of England, first written by Raphaell Holinshed. For hauing there closed vp that historie with a generall catalog of all such as haue written anie thing concerning England, so will I wrap vp these annals of Scotland, much after that manner, with a generall discourse of the writers of that countrie. In doing whereof I haue not refused to follow the order of Lesleus and other historiographers of Scotland, obseruing the like course in the repetition of the names of a few persons at the end of most of their kings.

A generall catalog of the writers of Scotland, with the times in which they liued, as well of the yeare of Christ, as of the reigne of Scotish kings.

Before I enter into the discourse thereof (which I speake not by waie of impeaching anie glorie of the Scotish nation) I must deliuer the opinion which I conceiue of some of the Scotish writers, set downe by manie of their historiographers, who (sauing correction) finding manie learned writers to be termed Scots, do transferre them to all their owne countrie of Scotland. But in that they séeme vnto me (holding the same for this present vntill I may sée good authoritie to disproue it) to be ouer couetous in taking from other that which is their due. For I do verelie suppose, that manie of those men so termed Scots were Irishmen borne. For vntill late yeres a little before the conquest (if my memorie faile me not) the Irishmen were called Scoti or Scots; whereupon it is, that the Scots and Irishmen at this date now knowne by seuerall names, do chalenge Duns, Columbanus, and others to be borne amongst them, some calling them Scots, and other naming them Irishmen, and rebuking the Scots for chalenging those men vnto them. For although the Scots came out of Ireland, and the Irish were called Scots, it is no reason to call a Scot borne in Ireland, by the name of a Scot borne in Scotland, as some writers do vnder the amphibologicall name of Scot. But I (whose determination is not to aduance the one, or derogat from the other) will onlie in this place set them downe as I find them, & shew the different opinions touching the same, still leauing it to the iudgement of others, to thinke thereof as they please; for I neither may nor will sit as Honorarius arbiter betweene those two nations. Wherefore thus I enter into the catalog of the writers of Scotland as followeth.

Fergusius the first of that name king of Scots, who died, as hath Gesnerus out of Bale, in the yéere of the world three thousand six hundred seuentie and eight, and two hundred ninetie and two before the birth of our Lord Jesus Christ, but Lesleus saith three hundred and fiue before Christ, did write Leges politicas lib. 1. This man the Irish make to be there borne amongst them; for thus writeth Stanihurst in his writers of Ireland: Fergusius sonne to Fergardus king of Ireland, the first king of Scots, whome some affirme to be borne in Denmarke, the more Fergusius.

part suppose to haue bëene an Irishman, was in the fiue and twentith yeare of his reigne by misfortune drowned neere a rocke in the north part of Ireland, that of him at this daie is called Caerfergus. Vpon whose mishap these verses following were made:

Icarus Icareis vt nomina fecerat vndis, Fergusius petræ sic dedit apta suæ.

Iosina. Iosina, the ninth king of Scots, after Fergusius the first, who florished in the yeare of the world, as hath Gesnerus, three thousand eight hundred twentie and sir, before the birth of Christ one hundred thirtie and seuen, as the same author saith, but one hundred three score and one as hath Lesleus lib. 2. pag. 89 did write De viribus herbarum lib. 1.

Ethodius. Ethodius the first of that name king of Scots, who (delighting in musike) was in the yeare of Christ one hundred ninetie and foure, and the third yeare of his reigne, as hath Lesleus, but one hundred ninetie and sir, as hath Gesnerus, slaine by a musician of the Hebrides, did write Ad Pictorum regem plures epistolas.

Celius Sedulius. Celius Sedulius a Scot by birth, as hath Gesnerus, which florished about the yeare of Grace foure hundred and thirtie, in the reigns of Fergusius the second, and Eugenius the second, kings of Scots, who being a companion to Hildebert a learned bishop of the Scots, did after the death of Hildebert for further learning trauell into Spaine, France, Italie, Grëece, and Affa, as hath Lesleus lib. 4. pag. 134. whome the pope Gelasius wondering at his vertue and writing was wont to call Venerabilem, or worthie reuerence, as our English Bede is accustomed to be termed. This Sedulius did write Carmen paschale lib. 4. which bookes are intituled Libri mirabilium diuinorum. Besides, he penned Annotationes in omnes Pauli epistolas, printed at Basill by Henrie Peter, Hymnum de seruatore. Ad Theodosium Cæsarem lib. 1. In æditionem Donati lib. 1. In Prisciani volumen lib. 1. Exhortatorium ad fideles lib. 1. De Christo lib. 2. with diuerse other verses and epistles.

Merlinus Calidonius. Merlinus Calidonius otherwise called Merlinus Syluestris, or Uplandish (a different person from him which is called Merlinus Ambrosius Britannus) was borne in the borders of Scotland, and the scholer of the Britis prophet Telesinus. This Merline Calidon executed manie prodigies or strange things against the English Saxons, which man florishing about the yeare of Christ fiue hundred and seuentie, did write De vaticinijs lib. 1. in which he intreated of matter belonging to historie.

Columbanus. Columbanus, whome Gesnerus, Bede, and the Irish histories affirme to be an Irishman borne in Ulster, but Sixtus Senensis in his Bibliotheca sancta, Lesleus, & the Scotish & Englishmen name to be of other nations, as of Scotland and England, was a monke & father of manie monasteries, being Abbas Luxuriensis, as hath Gesnerus, Sixtus Senensis, and Lesle, being a place in Burgundie, which abbeie he built (by the permission of Theodoricus the king) togither with the abbeie of Fountnelle in France. This man at the first held the feast of Easter contrarie to the west church, but in th'end was reduced thereunto. He went into Almanie now Germanie, where he left saint Gall, and after passed into Italie, where he liued a most holie life in the monasterie of Bobiens, or (as hath Marianus) of Bouiens, which he built for a perpetuall monument of his liberalitie, and died in the same on the twentith daie of November. He florished in the time of Conballus king of Scots, about the yeare of our redemption fiue hundred ninetie and eight, and left these books to posteritie, Commentaria in totum psalterium lib. 1. Epistolarum lib. 1. Monasteriorum methodos lib. 1. Aduersus Theodoricum regem adulterum lib. 1. De moribus monachorum metricè lib. 1. Collationes ad monachos lib. 1.

Brigit. Brigit, a most holie woman, whome the Irish affirme to be borne in Limster, but Gesnerus and Lesle with the Scots do affirme hir to be borne a Scot, being by Gesner called Brigida Laginensis, she became religious, and was veiled by the bishop of Man, as hath Lesleus lib. 4. pag. 149. she florished about the yeare of our Lord fiue hundred three score and eight, as hath Lesleus, in the reigne of Conballus king of Scots; some other saie she florished in the yeare fiue hundred and ten, Gesnerus in the yeare of Christ fiue hundred and eightëne, and wrote twelue bookes of reuelations verie darke and full of mysteries, which bookes Lesleus will not haue to be written by this Briget a Scotish woman, but by Briget called Brigita Suetica that florished manie yeres after this Scotish Briget, writing thus: Imperitè tamen hanc nostram cum Brigita Suetica, cuius nomine reuelationes multæ inscribuntur, quidam cõfundũt: siquidẽ multis sæculis hanc Brigita nostra fuisse posteriorem satis constat. Tanta veneratione Scoti, Picti, Britanni, Angli & Hibernenses diuam Brigitam sunt vbique prosecuti, vt plura templa Deo in illius memoriam apud illos omnes erecta videas, quàm in vllius cæterorum diuorum omnium. Illius sanctum corpus Hibernici, Duni, quo loco sancti Patricij illorum apostoli corpus seruatur se habere contendunt. Nostri eandem gloriam sibi vendicant, qui idipsum in canonicorum collegio Abrenethi rectè se colere hactenùs putantur, &c. Touching which I haue read these old verses, by which the Irishmen chalenge hir with Columbanus and Patricius to be buried in Ireland, which verses are thus:

Hi tres in Duno tumulo tumulantur in vno,
Brigita Patricius, atque Columba pius.

Maidulphus or Maidulbus Scotus, as Gesnerus termeth him, did flourish in the yeare of our Lord six hundred foure score and nine, he writ De Paschatis obseruatione, whom I take to be Maidulphus, who was notablie learned in the Grëeke and Latine, first a schoolemaster, and after abbat of Malmsburie called in the beginning Maidulphi curia, or Maidulphsburie, after the name of this Maidulphus, who as hath Lesleus lib. 4. pag. 137. did flourish in the yeare of Christ seuen hundred and sirtëne. Now it is certeine both by our and the Scotish chronicles, that Maidulphus the builder of Malmsburie monasterie was a Scot.

Kilianus a Scot being a monke, was martyred in Germanie about the yeare of our Lord six hundred three score and nine, as hath Gesnerus out of Bale, but Lesleus affirmeth him to liue in the gouernment of Ethelinus, which died in the yeare of our Lord seuen hundred three score and two, being the thirtith yere of his reigne. This Kilianus did write Contra peregrinos cultus, lib. 1. Gesner also out of Mat. Dresserus nameth Lecturã Kiliani super magistrũ sententiarum, which peraduenture might be this Kilianus the Scot.

Ionas Monachus being borne in Scotland, and the disciple of the abbat Columbanus, flourished in the yeare of Christ six hundred and thirtie, as hath Gesnerus, he writ Vitam sancti Columbani lib. 1. Vitam sancti Eustacij abbatis lib. 1.

Adamannus Coludius, being a Scot as hath Gesner out of Bale, was a monke of the apostolicall order, and moderator, ruler, or abbat of the monasterie in the Ile of Hua, who flourished in the years of Christ six hundred foure score and nineteene, and writ De locis terræ sanctæ lib. 1. De situ Ierusalem lib. 1. De pascheta legitimo lib. 1. Epistolas multas. From this mans works Bede affirmeth that he had had manie things which he inſerted in his owne bookes. But I much doubt whether this Adamannus were a Scot, in that he is called Adamannus Coludius, that is Adam of Coludi, which Coludi is a place in Yorkeſhire belonging to the biſhoprike of Yorke, and now at this daie is in Engliſh called Cawood.

Florentius (whom Scotland brought forth flouriſhed in the yeare of Chriſt ſix hundred foure ſcore and eight, in which yeare Eugenius the firſt king of Scots began his reigne) was, as hath Leſleus, noblie borne, who trauelling into ſtrange countries, conuerted manie from paganiſme vnto Chriſt, leading a moſt auſtere life in the ſolitarie woods, not far from Bruſchius the famous riuer in Alſatia, and built a monaſterie for ſuch religious perſons as came to him out of Scotland, being after the death of Rotharius by the Argentines made their biſhop. He was buried in that monaſterie before named, builded for his Scots. This man I take to be the ſame man of whom thus writeth Geſnerus: Florentius Voluſenus Scotus ſcripſit theologicã orationẽ ſiue cõmendationem piam & eruditam, Griphius excudit Lugduni 1539. Idem de animi trãquillitate carmen ibidem excuſum 1543. & Baſiliæ apud Ioannẽ Oporinum cum pijs aliquot poetis an. 1551, Idem edidit aphoriſmos beatæ vitæ & dialogum de animi tranquillitate, which maie be the booke of that matter before mentioned.

Artuillus. Artuillus, or Artullis a worthie gentleman, the ſonne of a moſt noble perſon borne in Scotland, flouriſhed, as hath Geſnerus out of Bale, in the yeare of Chriſt ſeuen hundred and ten, but Leſleus appointeth him to haue liued in the time of Eugenius the eight of that name king of Scotland, who as he further ſaith, began his reigne in the yeare of Chriſt ſeuen hundred three ſcore and two, this Artuillus writ De rebus mathematicis librũ vnũ, ad Adelmum epiſcopum lib. 1.

Sedulius Junior. Sedulius Junior being biſhop of the ſouth Scots did write Statuta concilij Romæ ad ſanctum Petrum habiti, and liued in the yere of Chriſt ſeuen hundred and foure tẽne.

Bonifacius. Bonifacius, as hath Marianus Scotus by the witneſſe of Leſleus lib. 4. pag. 166, being of the Scotiſh bloud, went to Rome, from whenſe by pope Gregorie the ſecond he was ſent into Germanie to conuert them to the faith, where he was made the firſt archbiſhop of Mentz, being called the Germane apoſtle, after which he was the popes legat and ſent into France: In qua (as ſaith Leſle) Thuringis, Heſſis, & Auſtraſionibus ad rectam religionis viam traductis, meſſem longè copioſiſſimam collegerat; after which he went againe into Germanie, & from thenſe into Friſia, where he was martyred in the yere of Chriſt ſeuen hundred fiftie and fiue, who being a monke of the order of ſaint Benet, did write; Epiſtolarum ad diuerſos lib. 1. Vitam quorundam ſanctorum lib. 1.

Ioannes Maſſrose. Ioannes Maſſroſe whom Geſnerus maketh mention to be all one with Ioannes Scotus, being the companion of Alcuinus, in the time of Charles the great: this man being ſkilfull in all diuine knowledges, liued in the time of Donald the firſt of that name king of Scotland, as ſaith Leſleus biſhop of Roſſe, and alſo flouriſhed in the time of Gregorie king of Scots, in the yeare of Chriſt eight hundred foureſcore and twelue. This Ioannes Scotus after many yeares ſpent at Athens in the Greeke letters, was called into France by Lodouike emperor of the Romans, who beſides other monuments of his learning, at the commandement of the ſaid emperor, did turne the Hierarchie of ſaint Denis into Latine, beſides the commentaries of Hugo de ſancto Victore, a moſt notable diuine: Shortlie after which, the ſaid John was ſent by Charles the great into England, to Alured, or Alfred the king thereof, to congratulat ſo worthie a prince for the victories which he had of the Danes: who after that he had ſetled a perfect league betweene the French and the Scots, remained in England continuallie, interteined by Alured, of whoſe children he was admitted to be chiefe ſchoolemaiſter and inſtructor.

But ſhortlie after, profeſſing diuine and humane learning in the monaſterie of Malmeſburie, to all ſuch as would come to his lecture, he was by certeine ſcholers of his (whoſe pride and euill conditions he did ſharpelie rebuke, wounded & killed pitifullie with Pugionibus, as ſaith Leſleus. Which John, the king of England (as I ſuppoſe) by the authoritie of the pope, procured to be numbred amongſt the martyrs of Chriſt, ordeining a notable monument to be erected ouer him in the ſame monaſterie: of whoſe writings and doings thus writeth Geſnerus in theſe words: Ioannes Mailroſius cognomine & natione Scotus, Alcuini ſocius, ſcripſit ſuper canones Aizachelis lib. 1. Ad Carolũ regẽ lib. 1. Verſus diuerſi generis lib. 1. In euangel. Mat. lib. 3. De officijs humanis lib. 8. De officijs diuinis lib. 1. Dialogum de natura lib. 1. De naturæ diuiſione lib. 1. De primo rerũ principio lib. 1. De euchariſtia lib. 1. Commentaria ſcripturarum lib. 1. Homilias eruditas lib. 1. De German. iuxta Irenium lib. 1. Claruit anno 792, Baleus. Idem libros Dionyſij Areopagitæ in Latinam linguam tranſtulit. Carmen eius ad Carolum magnum extat apud M. Dreſſ.

Kennethus king of Scots. Kennethus king of Scots, who died in the yeare of Chriſt eight hundred fiftie & fiue, wrote a booke of godlie lawes which are expreſſed by Leſleus lib. 1. pag. 75. of whome thus writeth Geſnerus: Kenethus Scotorum rex, Alcuini regis filius, ſcripſit Breuiarium antiquarum legum, quibus in foris per Angliam iuriſconſulti vtuntur. But in that Geſner is deceiued; for we neuer read (as far as my memorie ſerueth) that euer the Engliſh borrowed lawes of the Scots; but contrarie, the Scots haue borrowed, & béene inforced to obſerue the lawes of England, as receiuing them from the kings of this land, their ſuperior lords: to whome they haue done their homage, although time hath now worne the ſame out of vſe.

Claudius Clemens. Claudius Clemens, by birth a Scot & a monke, being the diſciple of Bede, was companion to Albinus or Alcuinus, as ſaith Sixtus Senenſis in bibliotheca ſancta: he was verie ſtudious in the ſcriptures, & ſkilfull in other humane knowleges, who liuing in the time of Charlemaine, in the yeare of Chriſt eight hundred, and eight hundred and ten, did in verſe and proſe write manie learned works, whereof theſe are knowne to be his: In pentateuchum lib. 5. In Ioſua lib. 1. In Iudicum lib. 1. In Ruth lib. 1. In pſalterium. In Matthæum lib. 1. In Paulum ad Galatas. De euangeliſtarum concordia. Contra Bonifacium Anglum, & alia multa.

Beornillus. Beornillus biſhop of the Scots, of whome thus writeth Parker in his booke of the liues of the archbiſhops of Canturburie: Beornillus Scotorum epiſcopus acerrimus verborum & ſententiarum aculeis carmine ſcriptis, monachorum turbam laceſſiuit: which Beornillus was alſo at the councell of Calne in Wiltſhire in England, about the yeare of Chriſt nine hundred three ſcore and ſeuenténe. For Alfritha the quæne procured Alfrith or Alfred earle of Mercia in England, that he ſhould labor to haue this Beornill to be preſent there, which this biſhop Beornill did performe, and vehementlie ſpake in defenſe of the ſecular prieſts, againſt the placing of monks in their romes.

Leuinus

Lewinus. Lewinus archbishop of the Scots, being martyred, and so termed a martyr, is supposed to haue written certeine homilies; he flourished as hath Gesnerus out of Bale, in the yeare of Christ one thousand and seuen, vnder the gouernment of Grime and Malcolme (the second) kings of Scots.

Malcolme. Malcolme the second of that name king of Scots, who began his reigne in the yeare of Christ one thousand and ten, and reigned thirtie yeares, departing the world in the yeare of Christ one thousand and fortie, did write of his countrie lawes, Lib. 1. being at length slaine by his owne courtiers.

Marianus Scotus. Marianus Scotus so called, because that he was borne in Scotland, was a monke of the order Benedictine, who when he perceiued all the realme of Scotland to be kindeled with continuall and ciuill hatred in the time of the tyrant Mackbeth, beginning his reigne in the yeare of Christ one thousand fortie and six, he forsooke his countrie, and first came vnto the monasterie of Fulda in Germanie; where for a time he continued vnder Richard the abbat (a Scot, no lesse famous for his godlinesse, than for his learning) which at the time of his comming thither, had the gouernment of the same abbeie. After which, Marianus went to Mentz, and passing ouer a solitarie life by the space of thirtie yeares, in an opinion of all men for his vertue, he shortlie after died, who (flourishing vnder the said tyrant Mackbeth, & Malcolme the third of that name king of Scots) did leaue behind him these works of his: Chronica ab initio mundi vsque ad sua tempora lib. 3. De concordantia euangelistarum lib. 1. De computo lib. 1. Emendationes Dionysij. Annotationes scripturarum. De cyclo paschali Algorithmum. Breuiarium in Lucam. Epistolas hortatorias, obijt Moguntiæ, anno Dom. 1086.

Turgotus. Turgotus by Gesner called deane of Durham, and by our chronicles called prior of that house, was a verie vertuous person, and after created bishop of saint Andrewes, who being in life in the yeare of Christ one thousand fourescore and sixteene, in the time of Malcolme the third, surnamed Camoir, or with the great head king of Scots, did write De Scotorũ regibus lib. 1. Chronica Dunelmensia lib. 1. Annales sui temporis lib. 1. Vitam Malcolmi regis, & vitam Margaretæ Angliæ reginæ. In which Gesner hath mistaken himselfe, for there was not anie Margaret quéene of England manie hundred yeres after this Turgotus, vntill the latter time of king Edward the first. Wherefore it should rather be the life of saint Margaret quéene of Scotland, and the wife of that Malcolme.

Dauid Scotus. Dauid Scotus, of whom Gesner maketh two distinct writers one after another, first setting downe Dauid Scotus, and next Dauid Presbyter Scotus, this man being borne in Scotland, was first schoolemaister at Wiceburgh, who being after called into the court by Henrie the fift the emperor, of whom Auentinus abbas Vrspengensis & manie others do write, was after made bishop of Bangor in Wales. This man writing the discourse of the iournete which the emperor Henrie the fift made into Italie after the pacification had betweene him and the pope about the inuestiture of bishops, did occasion William of Malmsburie to saie thus much of him in his fift booke De regibus. At verò Henricus antiquis Cęsaribus in nulla virtute deiectior, post pacatum regnum Theutonicum præsumebat animo Italicum; rebellionem vrbium subiugaturus, quæstionémque de inuestitura suo libito recisurus; sed iter illud ad Roman magnis excercitationibus peccatorum magnis angoribus corporũ consummatũ, Dauid Scotus Banchorẽsis episcopus exposuit, magis in regis gratiam quàm historicum deceret accliuis. He liued and prospered about the yeare of our Lord one thousand one hundred and ten in the times of Edgar and Alexander (the first) kings of Scotland, & did write Henrici imperatoris in Italiam expeditionem lib. 1. Magistratuum insignia lib. 1. Apologiam ad Cæsarem de regno Scotiæ lib. 1.

Richardus de sancto victore. Richardus de sancto Victore (of whom I do not as yet find anie mention in Gesner, but in Iohn Maior and Lesleus) liued in the yeare of Christ one thousand one hundred twentie and foure, vnder Dauid the first king of Scotland, who being a religious person of the order of saint Augustine, and not inferior to anie diuine of his time, aswell in scholasticall as other diuinitie, did set foorth manie works to be read, & was buried in the cloister of saint Victor in Paris, whose monument is yet to be séene with this epitaph recited by Iohn Maior in his memoriall:

Moribus, ingenio, doctrina clarus & arte,
Puluereo hîc tegeris docte Richarde situ: Quem tellus genuit felici Scotica partu,
Te fouet in gremio Gallica terra suo.
Nil tibi parca ferox nocuit, nec stamina paruo
Tempore tracta graui rupit acerba manu:
Plurima námque tui superant monumenta laboris,
Quæ tibi perpetuum sunt paritura decus.
Segnior vt lento sceleratas mors petit edes,
Sic propero nimis it sub pia tecta gradu.

Walter the bastard sonne of king Dauid the first. Walter the bastard sonne of Dauid the first of that name king of Scots by a widow sometime the wife of one Walter a Scot, was so far estranged from the vaine things of this world, that from his youth he was (as saith Lesleus lib. 6. pag. 223.) wholie consecrat to holie exercises and offices, being first indued with the rich canonrie of saint Oswald, and after with the honorable priorie of Kirkham. But he rightlie considering with himselfe that there was nothing which did more weaken the force of vertue than riches and idlenesse, did refuse the archbishoprike of saint Andrewes, and closed himselfe in a monasterie, where he remained vntill he was aduanced to be abbat of Melrosse, wherevnto being so preferred, he was the author and occasion that Malcolme (the fourth of that name king of Scots, surnamed the virgin) laied the foundation of manie abbeies. This man made commentaries vpon the booke intituled the Ecclesiasticall rule, and at length being famous through manie miracles (as that age did simplie suppose) he was installed amongst the number of the saints, and flourished vnder the same king Malcolme, which began his reigne in the yeare of our redemption one thousand one hundred fiftie and three, which Walter I suppose to be the same man of whom Gesnerus writeth in this sort: Gualterus Albanensis monachus scripsit de libris ecclesiæ lib. 1. claruit anno Domini 1180. Balcus.

Thomas Liermant aliàs Erslton. Thomas Liermant aliàs Erslton being borne in Scotland, was had amongst the common people in great admiration, who not being greatlie learned did by a certeine diuination (as though Apollo had spoken from the curteine) foretell things to come, but with what spirit we will not iudge, whose words obteined the more authoritie and credit, because he had foretold the fatall date of the death of Alexander the third king of Scots, which lost his life in the yeare one thousand two hundred fourescore and three. He wrot Prædictiones rerum Scoticarum rithmicis versibus, speaking most commonlie also in rime, and was therefore by the English surnamed Rithmicus, or the Rimer, liuing some yeares after the death of Alexander the third, for Gesner maketh him to florish in the yeare of Christ one thousand two hundred fourescore and six.

Michaell

Michaell Medicus.

Michaell Medicus, being a learned man in all philoſophie, aſtronomie, and the other mathematiks, whereby he grew in admiration amongſt the people, is twiſe mentioned by Geſner, a fault which I manie times find in his Bibliotheca, firſt pag. 607, by the name Michael Mathematicus cognomine Scotus, who flouriſhed in the time of John Baliol king of Scots, and in the yeare of Chriſt 1290, being an old man, he wrote In gratiã Frederici 2. imperatoris. De ſphera lib. 1. In Ariſtotelis meteora lib. 4. De conſtitutione mundi lib. 4. De anima lib. 1. De cœlo & mundo lib. 2. De ſomno & vigilia lib. 2. De generatione & corruptione lib. 2. De ſubſtãtia orbis lib. 1. De ſenſu & ſenſato lib. 2. De memoria & reminiſcentia lib. 2. Contra Auerroem in meteora lib. 1. Imagines aſtronomicas lib. 2. Aſtrologorum dogmata lib. 1. In ethica Ariſtotelis lib. 10. De ſignis planetarum lib. 1. De chiromantia lib. 1. De phyſiognomia lib. 1. Abbreuiationes Auicennæ lib. 1. De animalibus ad Cæſarem lib. 1. whoſe booke of phyſnomie was printed at Uenice Anno Dom. 1503. by John Baptiſta Seſſa.

John Duns.

John Duns by ſome called Iohannes Scotus, and tearmed the ſubtill doctor, was ſo ſurnamed Duns of the towne of Duns, eight miles from England, who (when he was yet but a boie) was by two frier minors brought into England to Orford, there to be inſtructed: for at that time nor long after was there not anie vniuerſitie in Scotland. By means of which two friers he was placed in a houſe of their profeſſion, in which this Duns at length toke the habit and order of the Franciſcans, prouing of a moſt ſingular wit, whereby he became a ſharpe and ſubtill diſputer, who departing from Orford, went to Paris, being called thither by the frier minors, where when he had for ſome ſpace remained, and read vnto them of ſcholaſticall matters, he traueld to Cullen, and there vntimelie died in his youthfull yeares. He liued in the time of John Baliol king of Scots, which began his reigne in the yeare of Chriſt 1283. of which Duns all they which follow his opinions are (as ſaith Leſleus lib. 7. pag. 250) called Scotiſtæ or Scotiſts as all they of an other faction are furnamed Thomiſtæ or the Thomiſts, after Thomas Aquinas. But now in our age it is growne to be a common prouerbe in deriſion, to call ſuch a perſon as is ſenſeleſſe or without learning a Duns, which is as much as a fole: although trulie the ſame cannot ſtand with anie reaſon, this man Duns being ſo famous for his learning as he was, who wrote manie volumes as after ſhall appeare. But before I come to him, I thinke it not vnfit to ſet downe what other haue written touching him, ſith both the Engliſh, the Iriſh, and the Scots, do chalenge him to be their countriman, borne amongſt them. Thus therefore writeth Stanihurſt in his deſcription of Ireland vnder the title of the Iriſh writers. Iohannes Duns Scotus an Iriſhman borne, as in the forefront of this treatiſe I haue declared. Howbeit Iohannes Maior a Scotiſh chronicler lib. 4. cap. 16. would faine proue him to be a Scot. Leland on the other ſide ſaith, that he was borne in England. So that there ſhall be as great contention riſe of him as in old time there roſe of Homers countrie, for the Colophonians ſaid that Homer was borne in their citie, the Chyians claimed him to be theirs: the Salaminians auouched that he was their countriman. But the Smirnians were ſo ſtiffelie bent in prouing him to be borne in their territorie, as they would at no hand take no nale in the matter, and thereupon they did conſecrate a church to the name of Homer. But what countriman ſo euer this Scotus were, he was doubtleſſe a ſubtill and profound clearke. The onelie fault wherewith he was duſked, was a little ſpice of vainglorie, being giuen to carpe and taunt his predeceſſor diuines, rather for blemiſhing the fame of his aduerſaries, than for aduanſing the truth of the controuerſies. Thus much Stanihurſt. Now the bookes which he wrote were theſe. Super ſententias lib. 4. Quodlibeta quoque lib. 1. Sermones de ſanctis lib. 4. Sermones de tempore li. 1. De cognitione Dei lib. 1. Cõmentarios Oxonienſes lib. 4. Reportationes Pariſienſes lib. 4. In metaphyſicã quæſtionẽ lib. 12. Quæſtiones vniuerſaliũ li. 2. Quæſtiones prædicamẽtorũ lib. 1. In analytica poſteriora lib. 1. In Ariſtotelis phyſica lib. 8. In Categorias eiuſdem lib. 1. Lecturam in Geneſim lib. 1. De rerum principio lib. 1. Commentaria in euangelia lib. 4. In epiſtolas Pauli. Collectiones Pariſienſes. Tetragrãmatum lib. 1. & alia. Claruit Anno Dom. 1308. Of whoſe works thus further writeth Geſn. Iohanni Scoto ſententiarum interpreti primæuam ſacratiſſimi Dionyſij tranſlationem aſcribunt, cùm alteri cuidam Iohanni Scoto (before named, and liuing about the yeare of Chriſt eight hundred ninetie & two, about three hundred yeares before this Duns) Qui iſtũ multis ſæculis anteceſſit, & Athænis Græcè didicit, accepta referri debeat. Of the death of this man ſæ Petrus Crinitus lib. 24. cap. 11. De honeſta vita, where he affirmeth that this Duns did turne the hierarchie of S. Denis ont of Greeke into Latine.

Thomas Uarreie.

Thomas Uarreie or Uarraie flouriſhed at the battell of Otterburne, which was in the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand three hundred eightie and eight, in the time of Robert the ſecond of that name king of Scots, at what time the Engliſh were put to the worſt. This man vpon this victorie did compoſe manie things in Latine rime beginning in this ſort:

Muſa refert fatum fore ſcriptum carmine vatum, &c.

Who being maiſter and ruler of Bethwallie, is not greatlie eſteemed of the Scotiſh hiſtoriographers. Geſnerus referreth the time wherein he liued, to the yeare of Chriſt one thouſand two hundred and ninetie, which is almoſt a hundred yeares before that, in which the hiſtories of Scotland make anie mention of him.

William Elphinſtone.

William Elphinſtone being borne in Scotland was a great learned man, but becauſe I do find one hundred and fortie yeares difference touching the time wherein he liued, ſet downe within three or foure lines the one of the other by Geſnerus, I will ſaie nothing of him, but onelie verbatim ſet downe the words of the ſame author in this ſort. Gulielmus Elphinſton natione Scotus, Albonenſis epiſcopus, ſcripſit antiquitates Scotorum, & conciliorum ſtatuta librum vnum. Claruit anno Domini 1480. Laudat hunc valdè Boſtonus Burienſis in magno ſcriptorum catalogo, ob ſingularem eruditionem. Vixit circa annum 1340. Thus much Geſnerus.

James Steward.

James Steward the firſt of the name of James, being brought vp in England as a perſon eſtranged from his natiue ſoile, is by Geſnerus ſaid to haue beene by ſome called Robert the third, which can not be ſo; for he that was ſo named was John Steward, and not James. This man in the time whileſt he remained in England, being a kind of baniſhment from his owne countrie, did compoſe one booke of verſes, and manie other ſongs, he being both a learned diuine, philoſopher, and muſician, who was in the end ſlaine of his owne people, in the thirteenth yeare of his reigne, falling in the yeare of our Lord God one thouſand foure hundred thirtie and ſir.

Johannes Maior.

Johannes Maior borne in Scotland, whom Sixtus Senenſis in his Bibliotheca ſancta doth (not rightlie) call an Engliſhman, was brought vp in Orford, where atteining to ſufficient learning, he went into France for the obteining further knowledge

George Buchanan. George Buchanan an Irish Scot, greatlie learned, but manie times malicioustie affected, and that so vehementlie, as that he would not forbeare in the highest degrée of malice to vpbraid and backebite euerie person and nation which had offended him, as maie appeare by his immodest spéeches, not beseeming a man of his learning, was schoolemaster to James the first of that name king of Scotland, of whom liuing in the yeare of Christ one thousand fiue hundred three score and nineténe, I will forbeare to saie what I could, least I might offend in that which I mislike in him, & therfore will onlie set down what Gesner hath written of him. John Durie. Iohannes Duræus or Durie, whom Gesner calleth Bureus, being borne in Dumfermling, and the son before he was abbat of the abbat of Dumfermling brother to the lord of Duries, was brought vp in Paris and Louan, after which he became a priest, and then a Iesuit, who now liuing did in the yere of Christ one thousand fiue hundred foure score and foure, write a booke which was intituled Confutatio responsionis Iohannis Whitakeri, ad rationes decem quibus fretus Edmundus Campianus Anglus Iesuita certamen Anglicanæ ecclesiæ ministris obtulit in causa fidei: which booke was printed at Paris in 8 by Thomas Brunelius, In clauso Brunello sub signo oliuæ.

He writ also De vulgari sacræ scripturæ phrasi, lib. 2. whereof the first doth intreat of the sinne against the Holie-ghost, which they call irremittable or vnto death: the second booke doth with great diligence and fidelitie vnfold the most hard and most obscure places of both the testaments, hitherto by manie euillie vnderstood, and worse interpreted: which worke was printed at Paris by Robert Messiline in the yere of our Lord one thousand fiue hundred fiftie and two in 8 chart. 13.

John Lesle. John Lesle sometime officiall of Aberden, and bishop of Rosse, of whom I haue spoken in the continuance of the annals of Scotland, being an obstinate fauorer and furtherer of the Romane religion doth yet liue in the yeare of Christ one thousand fiue hundred eightie & sir, in the time of Charles James the first king of Scots, and hath written Pii afflicti animi consolationes diuináque remedia lib 1. Minianus Wenzetus. Minianus Wenzetus, who flourished in the yere of our Lord one thousand fiue hundred three score and one, in the time of Marie quæne of Scots, was a fauorer of the popes doctrine, and enimie to John Knokes, touching whom I will set down the words of two seuerall authors, whereof the one is Lesleus a Scot, and the popes and his friend, and the other is Bibliotheca Gesneri, whereof the first saith: Hæc res (which was a disputation in religion) Niniano Winzeto maximam apud hæreticos inuidiam conflauit, vnde cum audirent illum (Ninian Winzet) iam apud typographum calere in libro excudendo, quo cogitarat cum Knoxio de fide violata ad nobilitatem expostulare, consilium ineunt de opere disturbando, Winzeto capiendo, typographo mulctando. Magistratus cum satellitibus irruit in typographiam, libros quos reperit, aufert, Iohan. Scotũ typographũ bonis mulctatum in carcerem abripit: sed Winzetum, quẽ tantopere cupiebant, præ foribus magistratui occurrentem quòd incognitus elapsus fuerat, dolent hæretici, rident Catholici. On the other side thus writeth Bibliotheca Gesneri: Ninianus Winzetus Renfrous, S. theologiæ doctor, & apud sancti Iacobi apud Scotos Ratisponæ, abbas flagellum sectariorum qui religionis prætextu iam in Cæsarẽ aut in alios orthodoxos principes excitare studeant, quærentes ineptissimè quidem, Deo ne magis an principibus sit obediendũ. Accessit velitatio in Georg. Bucchan. circa dialogũ, quem scripsit de iure regni apud Scotos 4. Ingolstadii ex officina typographica Dauidis Sartorii, an. 1581.

Adam Blackwood. Adam Blackwood borne in Scotland in Dumfermeling, was brought vp in Paris, where atteining to manie degrées of learning, is now liuing, being aduanced to the place of one of the chiefe councellors of Poitiers. This man hath learnedlie written manie works, amongst which are his bookes De coniunctione religionis & imperii, Funebres orationes admeralli regni Franciæ, & Iacobi Stuarti primi regentis (after that Charles James the first, atteined to the crowne) Scotiæ. Besides which hauing written against the work of Buchanan intituled De iure regni, he is now in hand with a booke which he writeth against the chronicle of the same Buchanan.

land, and one who came hither into England with the earls of Angus and Mar, about the yeare of our Lord one thousand fiue hundred fourscore and foure, hath written manie epigrams, and amongst the rest, one inuectiue against the quéene mother, to the king of France, which beginneth Vipera cum catulis.

James Tirie. James Tirie did (as hath Lesleus lib.10.pag.587) go to Rome, after which he became a companion of the Iesuits, who comming to Paris, trauelled by writing with his elder brother being a baron, to forsake the doctrine of Caluin; he florished in the yeare of our Lord one thousand fiue hundred threescore and one, vnder Marie quéene of Scots, and did write Ad fratrem epistola 1. Responsio ad Knoxium lib.1.

Charles James. Charles James the first of that name king of Scots now liuing, a toward yoong prince, and one well furnished with the gifts of nature and learning by birth and instruction, did in his yongest yeares about the age of seuentéene or eightéene, write a booke of verses in his mother tong, conteining manie matters of sundrie rare inuentions, and of sundrie forme of verses both learned and eloquent, which booke was after published to the world; whom I haue here placed the last in this catalog of Scotish writers, to the end that I would close vp the same title with no lesse honorable and rare person, than I first made entrance thereinto: and therefore beginning with a king, I thought good also to knit it vp with a king.

Thus setting end to my trauels touching Scotland (which I haue not performed as the maiestie of an historie requireth, but as my skill, helps, & intelligences would permit) I desire thée reader to take it in good part, remembring that Vltra posse non est esse, sith according to our old prouerbe, A man cannot pipe without his vpper lip. For being denied furtherance (as in the beginning I said) both of the Scots & other of mine owne nation, and thereby not hauing anie more subiect whervpon to worke, I can do no more than set downe such things as come to my knowledge. And therefore contenting my selfe with this, that In magnis voluisse sat est; I commit my selfe and my labors to thy fauorable iudgement, who measuring my meaning with the square of indifferencie, and pardoning all imperfections in these my first labors, in respect of the shortnesse of time to performe the same (for I protest to thee that both the historie of England and Scotland were halfe printed before I set pen to paper to enter into the augmentation or continuation of anie of them, as by the inserting of those things which I haue done maie well appeare) thou shalt incourage me hereafter vpon more leisure, and better studie, to deliuer to the world rare matters of antiquitie, and such other labors of mine (Absit verbis philautia) as maie both shew the discharge of my dutie to God, to my countrie, to my prince, and to my frends. For though I maie séeme to be idle, yet I saie with Scipio, Nunquàm minùs sum otiosus quàm cùm sum otiosus.
